THE LIBERATION OF SHANGHAI after nearly four years of Japanese rule may restore that city to its traditional place as one of the great cosmopolitan trading centers of the world. But the old Shanghai, capital of the white man's imperialism in the Far East, will never return. The story of this old Shanghai with all its bizarre characteristics and of its passing under the impact of Japanese aggression is brilliantly told by Edna Lee Booker and her husband, John S. Potter, in "Flight from China" (Macmillan, $2.50). No one has ever described the exotic atmosphere of Shanghai in the 1920's more vividly or more accurately than Miss Booker; her husband contributes a significant section on Japanese policies in Shanghai after Pearl Harbor and on his experiences in a Japanese concentration camp. It is not a sensational book; neither of the authors went through or witnessed any of the cruelties which others have suffered. Nor does it contribute to an understanding of Chinese politics or culture. The China one sees is that of the treaty ports, which are more Western than Chinese. Yet as one who knew old Shanghai, its colors, smells, and glaring social inequities, I found it an intensely human, absorbing book. Those who have never lived in China may get a false impression of the Chinese people, particularly from the constant use of pidgin English, but they can hardly fail to be delighted by Miss Booker's charming account of an incredible city that is truly the crossroads of the world.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

STAGE PLAY

MICHAEL TODD Presents
UP IN CENTRAL PARK
Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS
Lyrics by DOROTHY FIELDS
Music by SIGMUND ROMBERG
BROADWAY THEA. at 53rd Street. Mats. Wed. & Sat. AIR CONDITIONED

FINAL NOTICE!

Fall Book Number

Deadlines for The Nation's Fall Book Number, to be published on October 13, are:

For space reservation, Monday, October 1.
For final OK's on set copy, or for delivery of complete plates: Thursday, October 4.

Publishers' advertising rate, $200 per page. Net paid sale, 42,300 weekly (ABC).

To reserve space or for additional information, telephone BArclay 7-1066 or write

ADVERTISING DEPARTMENT
THE Nation
20 VESEY STREET NEW YORK 7, N. Y.

Films

JAMES AGEE

THE following are more or less recommended:

"The True Glory." Official war film, invasion of Normandy to German surrender. Bold, welcome, but inadequate use of blank verse; much more successful use of many bits of individualized vernacular narration, unusually free of falseness. Very jab-paced, energetic cutting; intelligent selection of shots, of which several hundred—so it seems—are magnificent. Lacks the greatness of the best short war films, but for the hugely complicated kind of job it is, it could hardly have been done better, on a fact-telling plane anyhow.

"Pride of the Marines." A true story of a blinded Marine. Very good performances by John Garfield and Dane Clark. An exciting combat sequence, unusually persuasive of authenticity, at least to this layman. Considerable liberalizing about racial and post-war problems, most of it a pleasure to hear, some of it rather mouthily over-optimistic (don't crab—if we fight for our rights and needs we're sure to have nothing to crab about). Long drawn out and never inspired, but very respectably honest and dogged, thanks considerably, it appears, to Albert Maltz's screen play.

"Isle of the Dead." Val Lewton-Mark Robson horror film, with Karloff, Katherine Emery, Helene Thimig especially effective. Tedious, overloaded, diffuse, and at moments arty, yet in many ways to be respected, up to its last half-hour or so; then it becomes as brutally frightening and gratifying a horror movie as I can remember. (More self-contained, and more pleasingly toned and told, is Lewton's recent "Body Snatchers," with Karloff, Lugosi, Henry Daniell. It too, for all its charm and talent, is a little dull and bookish; but it explodes into an even finer, and a far more poetic, horror-climax—which, however, is sustained for only the last few minutes.)

"State Fair." Rodgers and Hammerstein adaptation of the Phil Stong novel; nice performances by Jeanne Crain, Dana Andrews, Henry Morgan; pretty tunes, graceful lyrics. Otherwise lacking any real delicateness, vitality, or imagination, and painfully air-conditioned-looking, for a bucolic film; it is nevertheless good-natured and pleasant.

"Our Vines Have Tender Grapes." Life on a Wisconsin farm with Margaret O'Brien, Edward G. Robinson, Agnes Moorhead, who perform exceedingly well. Here too a lack both of rural redolence and of fresh air; in stretches almost as indigestible as its title. But some of the wilful leisureliness comes properly to life, and several scenes and many details are as gracious and touching as the intention of the whole film.

"Love Letters." A story so inconceivably factitious that only a poet-moralist or a romancer of genius could have been wisely attracted by it, or could have brought it above the sill of absurdity. But Lee Garmes's lighting and photography are wonderful, in a romantic way I do not personally care for; and his—or William Dieterle's—camera set-ups and shot-series and Dieterle's directing are like a highly skilled piece of wrestling. Most of the acting, especially that of Ann Richards (in a rather easy role), has unusual intensity and style.

Considerably less commendable is "Her Highness and the Bell-Boy," a would-be Modern Fairy Story told with incredible heaviness and made only sporadically enjoyable through the friendliness of Robert Walker and Rags Ragland, the beauty of Hedy Lamarr, the sincerity of June Allyson.

Music

B. H. HAGGIN

ON VICTOR'S September list are Brahms's Symphony No. 3, performed by Koussevitzky with the Boston Symphony (Set 1007; $4.50); Schönberg's "Verklärte Nacht" for string orchestra, performed by Golschmann with the St. Louis Symphony (Set 1005; $4.50); a sequence of passages from Strauss's "Rosenkavalier," performed by Goossens with the Cincinnati Symphony (Set 997; $3.50); and Airs de Ballet from Grétry's "Céphale et Procris," performed by Defauw with the Chicago Symphony (11-8825; $1).

The group is interesting for what it reveals about American orchestras. Cities like St. Louis and Cincinnati have no trouble in finding the players for excellent string sections; but—judging from the Cincinnati performance—equally good players for the woodwinds are not available. Chicago, however, can provide its orchestra with woodwinds as fine as the strings; and one hears the playing of a great orchestra. But then one listens to Boston's orchestra, and hears strings, brass, woodwinds, and refinements of execution and sonority that carry one into the realm of the fabulous.

The group also is interesting for what it demonstrates about Victor's recording of orchestras. One hears those fabulous things in the Boston performance of Brahms's symphony because they are reproduced by the recording as I cannot recall their having been done before. This time Victor's engineers managed to prevent the noisy confusion from excessive reverberation and the slight coarseness of the other recently made Boston Symphony recordings; and in the quiet the sound is cleanly defined and retains its real-life refinement. Played with a Brush pick-up, the recording is well balanced; with an Astatic Tru-tan it sounds limited in the upper frequency-range.

The Chicago Symphony recording is even better than the ones Victor made with that orchestra three years ago: the hall is reverberant, but the sound now is marvelously clear and clean and bright. The Cincinnati Symphony performance is beautifully reproduced except at a few points where excessive reverberation creates noisy confusion. And the St. Louis Symphony performance also is excellently recorded—even to the occasional thickness and heaviness of the sound produced by Schönberg's writing for strings or by Golschmann's performance of this writing.

I like the second and fourth movements of Brahms's symphony; but I don't like them with the sentimentalities and overemphases imparted to them by Koussevitzky's tempos and changes of tempo. I might acquire the Victor set to have a good reproduction of the fabulous playing of the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky's direction; but if I wanted a good performance of Brahms's symphony I would take Weingartner's in Columbia Set 353.

The music from Grétry's "Céphale et Procris" is charming and well-performed. Schönberg's "Verklärte Nacht," best listened to with Tudor's "Pillar of Fire" to distract one during its interminable length, also is well-performed. And so is the pointless collection of the few scraps of orchestral luxuriance and sugary melody from Strauss's "Rosenkavalier."

Also on Victor's September list is Beethoven's Sonata Opus 30 No. 2 for violin and piano played by Yehudi and Hephzibah Menuhin (Set 1008; $4.50). Nos. 1 and 3 of Opus 30 are among the best of Beethoven's early works; but the dramatic first movement of No. 2 is, for me, one of those in which, as my correspondent expressed it a couple of weeks ago, Beethoven "is trying to create a mood which has no actual occasion or objective correlative in the music itself"; and the rest of the work seems weak. The performance is good: as always, Hephzibah's playing has the musical style and life that her brother's has not; and though his tone is over-sweet he plays simply except for a few tearful phrases in the slow movement. The recording, which must have been made several years ago, is good, but must be played with the volume turned up higher than usual.

CONTRIBUTORS

STUART CHASE is a well-known economist and writer. His latest books are "Where's the Money Coming From?" and "Democracy Under Pressure."

JOSEPH FREEMAN is the author of "The Soviet Worker," "An American Testament," and "Never Call Retreat."

SHEBA STRUNSKY is executive secretary of the International Rescue and Relief Committee.

E. FRANKLIN FRAZIER, a frequent contributor to The Nation, is head of the Department of Sociology at Howard University and author of "The Negro Family in the United States."

Next Week in The Nation
"The German Talks Back"
By Heinrich Hauser
Reviewed by Franz Hoellering

NEW VIEWS IN EVENTS AND BOOKS
Monthly letter of independent opinion. World Affairs. Politics. Labor. Economics. Edited by H. Integer. Introductory offer $1.00 ten issues.
NEW VIEWS, 505 FIFTH AVE., N. Y. C. 17

BOOKS FOUND FREE/0¢
WHAT BOOKS DO YOU WANT?
We quote lowest market prices. No charge for locating Hard-to-Find and Out-of-Print Books All books OLD or NEW, mailed POST-FREE.
SEARCHLIGHT BOOK NATION
22 East 17th Street, New York City

LEARN RUSSIAN
FOR IMMEDIATE APPLICATION
Practical 33-Week Course under the recognized authority.
DR. E. MARKOFF
Classes held Thursdays, beginning October 11. Scientifically planned and tested method in grammar and useful conversation for beginners and advanced students. Also special normal course for teachers of Russian.
AMERICAN RUSSIAN CULTURAL ASS'N
200 W. 57 St., N. Y. 19, N. Y. CI 5-5377

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

Instructive and Disquieting

Dear Sirs: I found Mr. Padover's article in The Nation of September 22 very instructive and trebly disquieting: (1) because of the evidence he gives of slavishness in German labor, (2) because of his charge that our officials are neglecting German labor in their efforts to create a democratic Germany, and (3) because so good a democrat as the editor of "The Complete Jefferson" would apparently neglect, instead, the farmer—shades of Thomas Jefferson!—and all other elements in Germany except labor.

Democracy to me is a government built on no one class or section of the community but equally on all members of the community, to safeguard impartially the individual liberty of each person, each minority of one. Mr. Padover rules out the "upper strata"—and by implication the middle class—as "opportunists" who "supported Hitler because he was successful" and "are collaborating with us because we are victorious." His evidence convicts labor of all this, too, but his conclusion rules labor in.

He convicts Germans in general and German labor in particular of tending blindly to follow the leader. Judging from the case he makes, I would conclude that the best way to create democracy in Germany would be to make the most of whatever truly democratic leadership asserted itself, regardless of whether it rose from the factory or the farm, the middle or the upper class. From this last group, after all, came Thomas Jefferson and other founders of our own individualist democracy.

CLARENCE K. STREIT

Washington, D. C., September 17

A Fully Paid Labor Reserve

Dear Sirs: I. F. Stone calls attention in The Nation of August 11 to the fact that Mark Sullivan has come out for "full employment." That appears to line him up with many liberals and others throughout the country. In labor circles there is a real desire for full employment; but in other circles the words denote only as much employment as can conveniently be attained within our present free-enterprise system. They imply a larger or smaller body of unemployed whom industry cannot absorb no matter how great the volume of production. The hope is that if production can be increased to the limit and held there, then unemployment can be reduced so low that it can be neglected. In other words, "full employment" does not really mean full employment.

The unemployed, as distinguished from loafers and the merely idle, are those able and willing to work and anxious to support themselves. Persons who are actually working for pay and also those who are paid to assume a responsibility to work should be considered employed. Shop foremen are not always at work, but they have a responsibility and are employed. City firemen are not always at work, but surely they are employed. Architects and lawyers are sometimes paid a retainer to hold themselves in readiness for work. Is it unthinkable that labor should be treated in the same way?

I propose a "fully paid labor reserve" to include all the unemployed, that is, those able to work and anxious for a job. Such a fully paid labor reserve added to those already having jobs would cover the whole labor supply and would constitute a continuous maximum demand for consumer goods, a steady market on which industry could depend—in other words, real full employment.

The reserve might be a revolving pool; while at first it might be thought that the pool should be as small as possible in order to get maximum production, efficiency of production might eventually be sufficiently high for the pool to be larger. The labor reserve should be paid by the federal government from the proceeds of a personal income tax, which should be a flat tax, not graded. Enrolment in the reserve should be entirely voluntary. An applicant would state his preferred trade or occupation together with alternatives, and might be asked to attend training courses.

A fully paid labor reserve would offer many advantages to both labor and industry. Workers would no longer be subject to outside competition, and as there would be no fear of a lay-off, soldiering on the job would stop, resulting in quicker deliveries and lower costs for industry. Industry would have a pool of ready and efficient workers with which to expand and start new undertakings.

HENRY V. D. ALLEN

Schenectady, N. Y., August 16

Nominating Mr. Welles

Dear Sirs: In the formation of the United Nations Charter and in discussions concerning its implementation, no suggestions have been made regarding possible candidates for the post of Secretary-General. Not only will the Secretary-General be responsible, as an administrator, for directing the machinery of the newly created organization, but as a statesman he will have the power to "bring to the attention of the Security Council any matter which in his opinion might threaten international peace and security."

Thus the Secretary-General has important discretionary power. The League members elected to this post individuals who were administrators and unwilling to assume greater responsibilities on their own initiative than the Covenant permitted. In fact, they did not even speak before the Assembly meetings—a right accorded them in the Rules of Procedure of that body. The delegates were thus denied an interpretation of international trends and possibilities of action which a keen Secretary-General, as top official of the world organization, could so ably have given them.

We cannot again afford to elect an individual who is solely an administrator, for the Charter expressly empowers the Secretary-General with functions of a political nature. A wise and able statesman, as well as a capable administrator, is needed for the task. I therefore suggest the election of Sumner Welles. As ambassador, as Under Secretary of State, and as special emissary of the late President Roosevelt he has on numerous occasions demonstrated his abilities. Moreover, the continued growth and development of the Pan-American Union can be attributed largely to his efforts.

Mr. Welles is known and respected by the leaders of many nations. The public has on many occasions manifested its liking for and trust in him. When he was forced to resign as Under Secretary of State it voiced strong disapproval; his book, "The Time for Decision," and his syndicated newspaper column are read avidly by millions of people.

The keen insight into international affairs, the ability to analyze present problems, and the faculty to foresee future events that characterize Mr. Welles are prime requisites for any Secretary-General if he is adequately to fulfil the political functions assigned him in the Charter. ALVIN B. GLAZER

Tacoma Park, Md., September 10

Louis Boudin Impenitent

Dear Sirs: Because of articles I recently published in the ORT Economic Review, Mr. Albert Guérard called upon me, in your August 4 issue, to apologize to the shade of Clemenceau for attacking the Versailles treaty. I do not feel apologetic at all. Speaking of Lord Vansittart's recent book, which put him in a penitent mood, Mr. Guérard said:

> It is the hardest thing in the world to confess an error . . . "Liberals"—Harry Elmer Barnes for twenty years, Harry Emerson Fosdick in 1939, Louis M. Boudin as late as 1945—attacked Versailles and the French policy in terms which had a Hitlerian ring: they have not apologized yet to the shade of Clemenceau, and probably they never will. Well, I too hate to acknowledge a mistake. But, to my infinite embarrassment, I found that I agreed with Lord Vansittart.

As to the "Hitlerian ring" of criticism of the Versailles treaty, long before the world at large was aware of Hitler's existence, the Versailles treaty was denounced by one Nicolai Lenin, whose criticism was substantially in the same "terms" and had the same "ring" as that subsequently voiced by Hitler—as Mr. Guérard will find if he takes the trouble to read Lenin's speeches between 1919 and 1922.

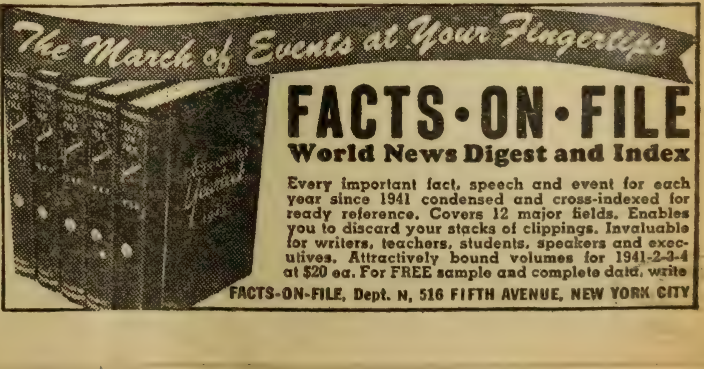
Actually my criticism was never in the "terms" nor had it the "ring" of either Lenin's or Hitler's criticism. And it was entirely different from that of Dr. Harry Elmer Barnes, whose position was that World War I was caused by "capitalism" as such, and that all capitalist nations were therefore equally guilty. My position, as stated in a book which I wrote during the war, was that "capitalism" is a historical phenomenon whose character with respect to peace and war has undergone a number of changes; that it had its peaceful periods as well as its bellicose ones. I was of the opinion, and still am, that capitalism was then in one of its warlike moods, and that Germany was the spearhead of this particular warlike phase of capitalism. It was, in my opinion, a serious mistake to assert that Germany was no more guilty than any other capitalist country. But it was an even greater mistake to put the entire blame on Germany—since that would of necessity lead us to the wrong kind of peace.

When "peace" came, I did object to the Versailles treaty. But not, as Dr. Barnes did, on the ground that it was unjust. As a student of history I know that one man's justice is another man's injustice. Like John Maynard Keynes, I was of the opinion that the principal vice of the Versailles treaty was its stupidity, since it could not be enforced and would of necessity become a source of mischief. Stupidity in such matters is a far greater crime than injustice: God in his mercy may forgive injustice. History never forgives stupidity.

But my criticism went farther than that of John Maynard Keynes. For the greatest stupidity of the Versailles treaty was not in any of its specific provisions, but in its failure to provide effectively for a lasting peace by setting up a real world organization.

I agree with Mr. Guérard that liberals should now feel in a penitent and apologetic mood. But their apologies are not due to Clemenceau or Vansittart but to those of us, including Lenin, who based their criticism of the Versailles treaty on the fact that it treated the symptom—Germany's eruption—instead of the disease. But I do not expect such apologies. From all appearances, liberals are again going to argue about the justice or injustice of this or that mode of treating Germany—utterly oblivious of the fact that it is the world that needs treatment. Germany may be the sickest of all, but she is not the only patient requiring attention. And quackery will do no more good now than it did at Versailles. L. B. BOUDIN

New York, August 15



The March of Events at Your Fingertips

FACTS • ON • FILE

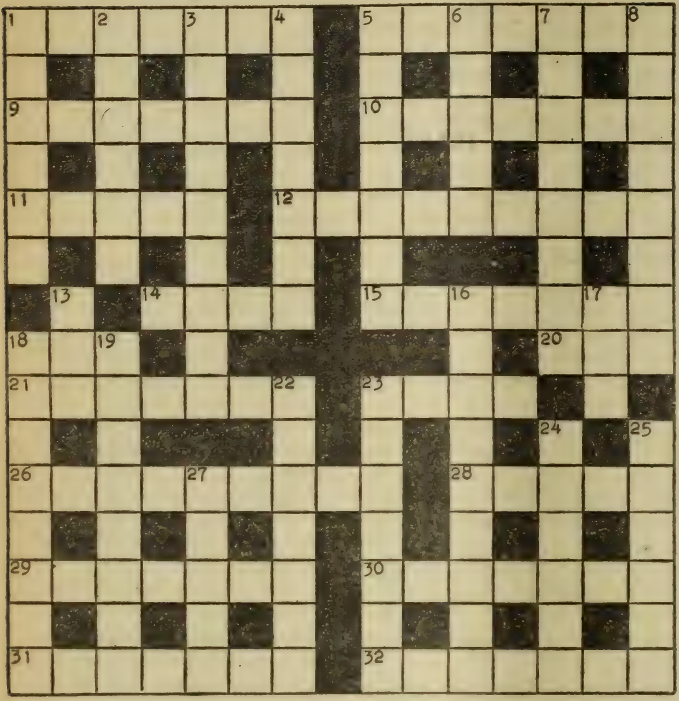
World News Digest and Index

Every important fact, speech and event for each year since 1941 condensed and cross-indexed for ready reference. Covers 12 major fields. Enables you to discard your stacks of clippings. Invaluable for writers, teachers, students, speakers and executives. Attractively bound volumes for 1941-2-3-4 at $20 ea. For FREE sample and complete data, write

FACTS-ON-FILE, Dept. N, 516 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK CITY

Crossword Puzzle No. 128

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 Inseparable companions
5 Walpole and White both were 9 Acquit
10 Pup, alas, disorderly in a Swedish university
11 Sounds like a big gun in church circles
12 To have a suspicion (three words, 5, 1, 3)
14 A beastly king
15 Fiery thatch of the hothead? (two words, 3 and 4)
18 Diamonds, in underworld terminology
20 The Frenchman's "no"
21 The field or the shelter may be his place in war
23 It is marked out
26 Oliver Twist ran away from one
28 If you want to raise the dough, try this 29 Of little importance
30 Famous falls
31 Superlatively strong-scented
32 Leaf out of a book by Lamb in his later years

DOWN

1 A sporting attitude
2 Silence usually spells this
3 Not as broad as it is long
4 It's quite a hat
5 Arrogance
6 Repulse
7 After telling us the chief speaker needs no introduction, he introduces us to the chief speaker
8 Untidy woman
13 No can do (hidden)
16 This is the place to get your milk, butter and eggs (two words, 5 & 4)
17 A sort of credit note
18 Mr. Porter discloses his identity and business
19 Skin trouble which comes with much smoking
22 A tract that may not attract
23 She offered Fair Rosamond the choice of a dagger or a cup of poison
24 A word in Mexico for postponing the evil day
25 To machine-gun from the air
27 She kept her sisters on a leash, in Arabian Nights

* * *

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 127

ACROSS:—1 PLEASANT; 5 ISOBAR; 10 STIRRUP; 11 LESIONS; 12 OLIVER; 14 PEARMAIN: 16 AUGUSTA; 17 TERNS; 18 HESS; 20 THE LIAR; 22 ROAD; 24 SAHIB; 26 GROUSER; 29 SPIKES IT; 30 SANDAL; 32 ENTITLE; 33 INVITES; 34 TEAZLE; 35 PRESERVE.

DOWN:—1 PISTOL; 2 EDIFICE; 3 SERGEANT; 4 NAPE; 6 SISERA; 7 BROCADE; 8 RASHNESS; 9 CLUES; 13 RUSHERS; 14 PULL OUT; 15 ATLASES; 19 PROSPECT; 21 RARA AVIS; 23 ARIETTA; 25 INDITER; 26 GENTIL; 27 OILED; 28 ELYSEE; 31 BIER.

RESORTS

"Fore" the Golfer
Newly Conditioned Course
A Grand "Pro"
New Clubhouse
. . . await your pleasure.

28 miles of beautiful private trails. Also — excellent tennis, boating and fishing on our private 7½-mile lake, swimming, golf, game rooms, cocktail lounge, dancing, really fine food . . . congenial atmosphere.
Only 51 Miles from New York
The Glenmere
CHESTER, N. Y. Chester 200 (N. Y.) RE 2-5047

HATHAWAY LODGE
Formerly the palatial 592 acre Macy estate in the beautiful "Hills of the Sky." Large, luxurious rooms, most of which have open fireplaces and private porches. Tennis, Handball, Swimming Pool. Horseback Riding, also Golf nearby. Marvelous food. Open all year. Attractive rates.
For reservations or further information write or call
HATHAWAY LODGE, Haines Falls, N. Y.
Telephone: Tannersville 299

BREEZEMONT PARK
ARMONK N.Y.
35 MILES FROM NEW YORK CITY
"A Country Estate in the Scenic Hills of Westchester County"
The nearest of all nearby resorts. Exclusive location. Luxuriously furnished. Dignified. All sport activities. Excellent cuisine
OPEN ALL YEAR Phone Armonk Village 955

The Fieldstone
On Round Island Lake
A place of unexcelled beauty for rest and relaxation. One hour from New York
ALL SPORTS — OPEN ALL YEAR
MONROE, N. Y. Phone 7965

Birdland
CENTRAL VALLEY, N. Y.
200-ACRE ESTATE 1,000-FT. ELEVATION
Congenial adult resort. All sports. Clay Tennis Courts. Golf, fine food. Only 45 miles from N. Y.
10% DISCOUNT FOR SERVICEMEN
Highland Mills 7895; N.Y.C.: LO 5-3715, WA 5-4671

50 MI. FROM NEW YORK
MAMANASCO Lake Lodge
Ridgefield, Conn. Phone 820
A resort of distinction fashioned from a country estate. Water sports, hiking trails, tennis. Library, open fireplaces. Congenial atmosphere. Famous cuisine.

OAKWOOD
NEW WINDSOR, N. Y. Newburgh 4477
Delightful...swimming & boating on private lake.
Different...the colonial atmosphere.
Delicious...our unexcelled cuisine.
Diverting...recordings for listening & dancing.
All this only 53 miles from New York City
A Resort for Adults Only

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS
THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 161 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • OCTOBER 6, 1945 NUMBER 14

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 325

EDITORIALS

London Fog 327
Wages, Prices, and Taxes 328
The Fascist Survivors 329

ARTICLES

The Plight of the Jews by I. F. Stone 330
AMG—Innocents Abroad by Saul K. Padover 331
In the Wind 333
Diplomats in Conference by Harold J. Laski 334
Some Don't Wear the Purple Heart by Frank N. Trager 335
The Driver Was a Nice Guy by Edgar Brooke 337
Spanish Prison by Percy Winner 338

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Back Number Talk by Franz Hoellering 340
Ends and Means of Education by Gail Kennedy 341
The Rocking Chair by A. M. Klein 341
Briefer Comment 342
Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling 346
Drama by Joseph Wood Krutch 349
Music by B. H. Haggin 350

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 351

CROSSWORD PUZZLE, No. 127 by Jack Barrett 352

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor J. KING GORDON
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Editor Political War Section
J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates
LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL
JONATHAN DANIELS
CAREY MCWILLIAMS
REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

SENATOR TAFT'S PROBLEM IN REGARD TO THE Full Employment Bill was to wreck it without incurring the political risks of voting against jobs for all. By winning acceptance of his amendment rewriting the clause providing for compensatory government investment, he has achieved a satisfactory solution from his point of view. What dismays and astonishes us is the way in which the bill's backers persuaded themselves that this and other amendments made no important difference. Fortunately a large group of progressives in the House appear to appreciate to what a degree it has been emasculated. A statement signed by 115 co-sponsors of the measure declares: "We are committed to the principle that the government must make full use of all its powers and functions relating to employment and production and must specifically pledge its financial resources to make good on the assurance of continuing full employment opportunity." Representative George E. Outland, one of the leaders of the group, told reporters: "We'll make a fight for the original language and we think the people will go with us." They will, indeed, if steps are taken to expose to the country the fact that the deadly words injected into the heart of the bill will, unless removed, serve to paralyse it.

*

THE SPECTACLE OF HIROHITO, SON OF HEAVEN, politely doffing his silk hat to a crowd of press photographers is an intensely gratifying one to the average American. But it seems most unlikely that the Son of Heaven planned his tradition-shattering jaunt to the American embassy for the purpose of driving home any lessons to the Japanese people. His purpose was more probably that of impressing the American people with the thoroughness of Japan's regeneration. Under the spur of criticism from this country MacArthur has gradually stiffened his occupation policies. The list of war criminals has been steadily lengthened. All army and navy stocks have been seized, and steps have been taken to control Japan's financial resources and to weaken the potential capacity of its war industries. Some of these steps have doubtless proved a severe shock to the ruling clique, who had hoped to escape with their industrial resources virtually intact. To counter this, the Japanese have launched what appears to be a skilfully planned public relations campaign. First, the Emperor granted two interviews to American newsmen in which he stressed Japan's determination to become a peaceful democratic nation and injected a carefully worded bid for American economic assistance. These were followed by a formal statement by Prince Takamatsu, the Emperor's brother, asking the American people to "extend sympathy toward the Japanese people in their sincere endeavors for peace." Hirohito's visit to MacArthur, with polite bows to all and sundry, was staged some forty-eight hours later. Perhaps it will turn out that the Emperor magic works both ways—on the Americans as well as on the Japanese.

*

THE ONLY SAVING GRACE OF GENERAL PATTON as an administrator is his talent for self-exposure. His complacency toward Nazis and near Nazis and his naive but as ever blustering admission of it, have won him a special interview with General Eisenhower. The only sensible outcome would be the removal to cold storage of a superman who is obviously useless between wars, and we hope his ready promises of good behavior will not be taken too seriously. With the best will in the world General Patton is incapable of changing his unique ways. But it would be a mistake to assume that the removal of one problem general would put an end to the use of Nazis in the governing of Germany. Mr. Padover's analysis of AMG, which appears on another page of this issue, makes it abundantly clear that Patton's complacency is not so much an exception to the rule among officials of the AMG as it is an extreme example of the prevailing attitude. General Eisenhower's own opinions and his stated policy are impeccable. In a showdown Schaeffer, pro-Nazi, is booted out as Minister-President of Bavaria and Hoegner, anti-Nazi, is taken in. But the great question is whether, as a matter of course, the Eisenhower policy will be implemented through an organization honeycombed with people who are "non-political" except that they don't like reds.

*

THE HUNGARIAN GOVERNMENT, WHICH IS headed by Bela Miklos, formerly one of Horthy's generals, is composed of the representatives of five parties—the Social Democrats, the Communists, the Small Holders Party, the Peasant Party, and the Liberal-Democratic Party—in numbers proportionate to the seats they won in the recent election of the national assembly. However, this Cabinet is chiefly an executive body. Real power is in the hands of Arpad Szakasits, chairman of the Social Democrats; Matthias Rakosi, leader of the Communist Party; Zoltan Tilday, a Protestant clergyman who leads the Small Holders Party; and Emery Kovacs, chairman of the Peasant Party which is nearly as radical as the Communists. Thus the charge brought by Mr. Bevin that the government is undemocratic would seem to be unfounded. It is true that the Communists, being very active and dynamic, appear to be dominant in spite of the moderating influence exercised by their leaders. Mr. Byrnes made recognition hinge on the elections for Parliament to be held November 4; Russia resumed diplomatic relations at once; Britain refused recognition of the provisional government but declared that they had no objection to the American move. What strength the Hungarian parties will show in the November elections cannot be predicted with certainty, but in view of the general trend in Europe it seems probable that the Social Democrats, being the organization of longest standing, and next to them the Small Holders, will gain a majority over the Communists and the Peasants. The Liberal-Democrats have a few followers, chiefly in the cities. Recently a workers' council was elected at the Weiss Manfred Works at Csepel near Budapest, the largest producer of machinery in Hungary. Of the approximately 15,000 workers 75 per cent voted for the Social Democrats and only 25 per cent for the Communists. In view of the fact that Russia has an army of occupation in Hungary and is sending food supplies to the country, this election would indicate that we can take in good faith its declaration that it does not intend to sovietize Hungary. The democratic trend is likely to continue unless the reactionaries at home and abroad interfere.

*

THE NEW ANGLO-AMERICAN PETROLEUM PACT, according to the Wall Street Journal, is "very different" from the treaty signed in August, 1944, which was subsequently smothered in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. For ourselves, we fail to see much change. Among the ambiguities of the earlier document one fact stood out clearly—the official blessing given to "all valid concession contracts and lawfully acquired rights." This clause which, it seemed to us, served to underwrite the well-established Anglo-Dutch-American monopoly of the international oil trade and to render fairly meaningless pious references in other paragraphs to "equal opportunity," has been left unaltered in the new draft. It was not this aspect of the agreement, however, that provoked the antagonism of the independent American producers who forced its withdrawal. They were perturbed by vague proposals for an international petroleum commission, which they feared might prove an instrument for government interference. Still more, they were upset by the implication that the treaty would facilitate imports into this country to supplement dwindling oil reserves. The new treaty meets their objections, first, by making it plain that the international commission will have power merely to talk, second, by excluding from the agreement operations of the domestic industry and the regulation of imports. Thus what remains is assurance of smooth sailing for the international oil cartel in world markets, aided by harmonization of Anglo-American interests in exploiting resources in the Near East. Of course there is no specific mention of this region but we note that surveys have recently begun for two new pipelines across the Arabian Desert, one to serve the Iraq fields (British) the other the new Saudi Arabian concessions (American). The pipelines of peace, no doubt!

*

GENERAL OMAR BRADLEY'S RECENT STATEMENT that some of the doctors in the Veterans Administration were "pretty poor" was a hopeful augury of much needed reform. After all the whitewash, the Congressional inquisition of reporters who made similar statements last spring, and the effusive buttering-up of General Frank T. Hines when he left his post as Veterans Administrator, this frankness was a breath of fresh air. Outspokenness and lack of dissimulation in generals can be a good thing. General Bradley obviously means business, and telling the public the truth must be the first step in giving the Veterans Administration the housecleaning it has so long needed. What remains to be seen is whether the general can do the job quickly and thoroughly enough to prevent long-continued inadequacy of treatment to disabled veterans. The VA now has only 2,300 doctors—including the unknown percentage of men who are "pretty poor"—and 1,300 vacancies, with the overall need perhaps rising to 6-7,000 within twenty years. These vacancies will not be filled easily unless the medical side of the agency is drastically reorganized. Minimum requirements include raising of salaries in all brackets, guaranties that promotion will be by achievement not seniority, and affiliation with civilian medical centers to encourage research and professional advancement. A reorganization along these lines might serve to attract many doctors now leaving the armed forces. Lack of such a reorganization will mean added difficulties in recruiting physicians, and that in turn will mean continued treatment of disabled veterans by physicians who are "pretty poor."

*

ON ITS FORMATION THE HOUSE COMMITTEE INvestigating un-American Activities promised not to repeat the scandalous career of the Dies committee, whose heir it is. But heredity and its most influential member, Representative Rankin of Mississippi, have proved too much for it. True to Dies precedents, it has started operations with a general inquiry into the Communist Party, prominent members of which are being asked the kind of questions which used to be the specialty of Japanese "thought controllers." Even more sinister, however, is a formal letter sent by the committee to President Truman requesting delivery of personnel archives of all terminated war agencies, including the OSS and the OWI. In the interests of security such agencies kept elaborate personnel records containing detailed information about employees and their friends, business associates, and former employers. The information was requested, and given, in strict confidence, and to pass it on to a Congressional inquisition would be a breach of faith. In the light of the history of the Dies committee, to whose files favored columnists were given access, the possibilities of abuse are terrifying.

*

JUST AS WE GO TO PRESS WORD REACHES US that the Governor of Texas has commuted the death sentence passed upon L. C. Akins to life imprisonment. This is welcome news to the thousands of Nation readers who have followed with active concern a case in which race bias so patently distorted the processes of justice.

London Fog

SOME commentators, seeking an explanation for the bad temper and unproductiveness of the London Conference of Foreign Ministers, lay the blame on lack of proper preparation. Sumner Welles, for instance, has asserted that the success of the conference was jeopardized in advance by failure of the diplomatic technicians to secure "prior agreement upon the agenda and upon procedure." This is a just criticism, but in attempting to understand the gloomy spectacle in London we must look deeper. We are then likely to find that the real trouble was not mechanical but a failure to agree on the elementary purposes for which the machinery was to be employed.

The policies of all three of the big powers appear to be based on concepts which were obsolete long before the atomic age opened. They are all clinging to the belief that the first duty of a nation is to safeguard its own integrity, as if security on a national basis were still possible. All of them, of course, pay lip service to international ideals but all of them, quite plainly, regard the United Nations Organization as a secondary line of defense. They are willing enough to prescribe collective remedies for troubles outside their own spheres of influence; inside, they insist on administering unilateral medicines.

A good many Americans are fully aware of the sins of Russia, and to a lesser extent of Britain, in this respect but fail to realize that the United States is playing power politics just as strenuously as its allies. When the Russians demand a free hand in the Balkans or the British take steps to keep the Mediterranean a private lake, we cry shame. But, at the same time, we make no bones about our determination to use our own strong right arm to keep any intruders out of our back yard. We boggle at the idea of giving our Allies even a minor role in the control and reorganization of Japan. We boast that we are the most powerful nation in the world and advertise our intention to maintain that primacy. The United States Air Force and Navy are to remain superlative and the Pacific is to be kept as an American lake with the aid of whatever bases are required for that purpose. Finally we are continuing to manufacture atomic bombs. The secret of their construction is to be released, if at all, on our own terms. In fact there is an inclination, in influential quarters, to preserve it indefinitely, while redoubling our scientific researches, in the hope that we shall be able to keep ahead of the rest of the world.

Such plans suggest that we have little trust either in collective security or in our allies, who, not surprisingly, are suspicious of the uses to which we may put our vaunted power. Yet when Russia seeks to promote its own security we are hurt and indignant.

This is not written in defense of Russia's diplomatic aggressiveness, which, while it sometimes succeeds in exposing Anglo-American hypocrisy, appears to us to be self-defeating. Russia's attempt to bolster its security by building up a thick hedge of buffer states between itself and the West is the cordon sanitaire policy in reverse and likely to prove just as futile. Nor do we consider its forays into the Mediterranean and the Red Sea clever strategy. No doubt their purpose was to discourage British interference in the Russian zone but the likely result is to spur the building of the Western bloc which Moscow is so anxious to prevent.

Many problems have been taken up by the Foreign Ministers but no final solutions have been found, and the conference is in danger of breaking up with no more to show for its labors than an agreement to postpone action on all major questions pending further study by experts. This means prolonging the period of uncertainty for a dozen European countries which desperately need a definitive settlement to aid their political and economic reconstruction. Even so, postponement of decisions will be better than hastily improvised compromises or a series of ambiguous decisions which each power would interpret to suit itself. It will, at least, afford an opportunity to prepare for the next meeting of the powers by an attempt to reach an understanding on the foundations of peace.

The question that has got to be settled is: Shall we build the house of peace on the rock of joint responsibility for security or is UNO destined to be no more than a rickety façade behind which power politics are to continue as before? If the second alternative is to be adopted, then let us be candid about it and negotiate on a frankly horse-trading basis which will enable the world to be divided up into clearly recognized spheres of influence. That will be a poor way indeed of providing for lasting peace, but it may very well make possible a longer truce than a settlement based on organized hypocrisy.

Wages, Prices, and Taxes

THE current wave of strikes is being variously attributed to unpatriotic labor leaders, reds, and avaricious employers. Many columns have been written about how small groups of selfish men are delaying reconversion and imperiling the country's economic future. Granted that men are selfish, it is necessary to probe considerably deeper for the basic causes of the existing labor unrest. Logically, the strikes may be viewed, depending upon one's political philosophy, as an inevitable part of the post-war economic readjustment or as a failure on the part of the government to develop an adequate post-war reconversion policy.

Those who believe that the government has no business interfering in economic matters regard the present labor strife, if they are at all consistent, as inherent in the shaking-down process by which wages and prices are finding new levels following the relaxation of war-time controls. Their logic points inexorably to a long, heated period of strife with settlements being reached on the basis of the relative economic power of the various groups. By and large big business faces this struggle with equanimity, since it is confident that industry's war-swollen surpluses, plus the rebates due on war-time excess-profits taxes, will enable employers to outsit labor in practically every instance. At worst, the big business groups feel that they may have to pay compromise wage increases which they will pass on to the consumer. At best, they hope to make substantial inroads on the war-time gains of organized labor so as to recover what they emotionally describe as control over their own industries.

Strikes and lockouts are of course the traditional way of arriving at a new equilibrium of wages and prices after the drastic upheaval of war. The costs of such labor disturbances may be reduced somewhat by effective systems of conciliation or arbitration but are bound to be frightfully high. The alternative to settlements arrived at by the tug-of-war process of industrial strife is a government-imposed price-wage formula such as was enforced during the war by the joint efforts of the WLB and the OPA. Unfortunately, the government has not yet come up with an adequate formula for the reconversion period. President Truman may have felt that he was meeting the situation when he announced that the government would permit wage increases which did not necessitate a rise in prices. But this was essentially an evasion of the issue rather than a practical post-war policy. It ignored labor's deep-rooted aversion to accepting a cut in take-home pay. And it ignored the immense practical difficulties of determining how much wages can be increased without necessitating an increase in prices. Industry is certain to fight to retain its present profit levels, just as labor will fight to maintain its war-time level of take-home pay. Furthermore, an effort to retain the present wage-price level presupposes continued enforcement of the entire war-time stabilization program. This is not being done.

The task of arriving at a satisfactory wage-price formula is further complicated by the necessity of knowing the approximate levels of production and employment at the end of the reconversion period. The steel industry, for example, could readily grant the C. I. O.'s wage demands if it were assured of operating at 95 to 100 per cent of capacity as it did during the war; but it could not pay wages even at the present level without an increase in prices if restricted to 50 per cent of capacity. Experience has shown that capacity operation of our industrial plant depends on the maintenance of consumer purchasing power. Once a deflationary spiral sets in, production is curtailed and unemployment develops. In his recent message to Congress President Truman called for the immediate passage of a series of emergency measures designed to maintain the buying power of workers adversely affected by the reconversion process. None of these measures has so far been enacted. The House Ways and Means Committee has rebuffed the President on the provision of adequate unemployment protection for former war workers. The Full Employment bill has been shot full of holes in the Senate and has not even been considered by the House. The bill for a 65-cent minimum wage is meeting vigorous opposition from Southern Congressmen. Instead of giving first attention to the measures that are needed to support production and employment in the post-reconversion period, the House Ways and Means Committee frittered away a week of its time squabbling over Elliot Roosevelt's personal debts, and now proposes to write a new tax bill. True, tax policy must necessarily play a vital role in the post-war readjustment process. Some lightening of the tax burden is essential both for psychological and economic reasons. A reduction in the withholding tax will increase the worker's take-home pay and lessen the pressure for higher wages; a cut in excise taxes, which fall chiefly on the lower-income groups, would help support purchasing power and stimulate business. But the House Ways and Means Committee is reported to be chiefly concerned with reducing the taxes on business and on families in the upper income brackets—precisely the policy followed with such disastrous results after the last war.

Under the leadership of President Roosevelt the United States came through World War II with much less economic dislocation than it suffered in World War I. This was achieved by an over-all economic policy that embraced production, distribution, wages, prices, and taxation. If we are to come through reconversion without the disturbances that characterized 1919, 1920, 1921, and 1929, we shall similarly have to develop and maintain an over-all policy adequate for this period. We need now a wage-and-price formula which is realistic enough to appeal to labor and management alike. Such a formula should have been worked out before V-J Day. But it is still not too late. If price and wage controls are retained and vigorously enforced until after the reconversion period is over, it should be possible to work out a compromise that would essentially restore the pre-war balance between production and purchasing power. Only then can the controls safely be lifted to permit free play for the normal processes of competition and collective bargaining.

The Fascist Survivors

SPAIN and Argentina have come into the headlines again. And it is not strange that they should appear under a common caption of fascism. The two countries form a double nucleus of the fascist conspiracy with which the world has grown all too familiar: both offer continuing proof of the weakness of our foreign policy.

Fascist Argentina was smuggled into the United Nations Organization by the United States. It is not true, as State Department stooges would have us believe, that the United States was forced to sponsor Argentina because all Latin America was crying out for its admittance. Latin Americans themselves were the first grimly to laugh off this suggestion. Mr. Stettinius's Man Friday in the Argentine maneuver was Mexico's ex-Foreign Minister, Ezequiel Padilla. His helpful role cost him his job in the Mexican Cabinet immediately after the conference had ended.

Argentina's admission to UNO under United States sponsorship was not only not welcomed in Latin America but it awakened deep skepticism from Buenos Aires to Mexico City over our claims to have fought the war for democracy. Inside Argentina itself the bitterness was greater than anywhere else. Argentine democrats could scarcely credit the reports from San Francisco that told of Nelson Rockefeller explaining to several hundred journalists that as a matter of fact the admission of Argentina would compel the Farrel-Perón clique to give way to a democratic regime. Of course, exactly the opposite happened. The dictatorship was strengthened to such a degree by United Nations recognition that all the democratic efforts of Ambassador Braden were brought to nought and eventually the democratic elements were forced to revolt.

They demonstrated in a huge public rally on September 19. Perón responded in flagrant fascist style. Argentina entered a state of siege. The police tracked down generals, bankers, business men, labor leaders, editors, professors, students—any who might belong to the opposition. The students called a strike "to persuade all Argentines to join in the disobedience campaign." Over last week-end the government closed the six universities and all dispatches and radio broadcasts of American correspondents ran into heavy censorship. Rumors of a general strike were in the air.

The Argentines arrested include former Foreign Minister José Maria Cantilo, the former governor of Buenos Aires, Rodolfo Moreno, and former Senators Antonio Santamarina and Gonzales Iramain; also Luis Mitre of La Nacion, Carreras of Critica, Paz of La Prensa, Simone of Noticias Graficas, and Americo Ghiohldi, editor of the Socialist weekly, Vanguardia, and an outstanding Socialist and former Deputy. Even such conservative but anti-fascist persons as Eustaquio Mendez Delfino, president of the Stock Exchange, José Maria Bustillo, president of the Rural Society, Armando Massone, head of the Chamber of Commerce, and Luis Colombo, president of the Union Industrial, the principal association of Argentine industrialists, have been imprisoned. Perhaps in jail they are recalling the comforting reassurances of our officials at San Francisco of the imminent dawn of Argentine democracy!

Our policy toward fascist Spain has been as irresponsible and as inexplicable as our policy toward Argentina. Last week the State Department made public President Roosevelt's letter of March 10, 1945, which was written to Norman Armour on the eve of our Ambassador's departure for Madrid. The letter stated that "our victory over Germany will carry with it the extermination of Nazi and similar ideologies." President Roosevelt saw "no place in the community of nations for governments founded on fascist principles." Why do we only hear of this letter seven months after it was written? Why are the anti-fascist policies so explicitly outlined still not applied to Hitler's Iberian ally? What excuse was there after the war in Europe had ended for continuing relations with Franco?

As The Nation revealed two weeks ago, Stalin bluntly asked the United States and Great Britain at the Potsdam Conference to break with Franco. In the Roosevelt letter, defining American anti-fascist foreign policy, President Truman had ample basis for action. A positive stand by the American President would have spurred the British out of their hesitation. It is a grisly thought that the substitution of words for action at Potsdam and the withholding of the Roosevelt letter may be explained by the fact that the mechanics of Franco's "retirement" had not yet been perfected. It now appears that there is more than an outside chance that an effort will be made to reestabish the monarchy. Against such an effort Dr. Negrín recently warned that "those outside of Spain who still flirt with the idea of restoring the monarchy must share the moral responsibility if a new civil war breaks out inside Spain." But throughout the world the forces of reaction move to bring to pass this disastrous event. And in the vanguard of such forces, as Harold J. Laski declared in his recent address broadcast to the Madison Square Garden meeting of September 24, is the Vatican. It is the duty of our government to separate itself from such forces. Its line is quite clear. Break off relations with Franco. Once this is done the State Department need not search for possible substitutes; the only democratic alternative is the Republic.

The Republic enjoys the support of the great majority of the Spanish people—reports from Spain agree that Republican sentiment is stronger than ever. Recently in Mexico it established its institutions of democracy with Señor Martinez Barrio as President and a new government fully recognized even by those parties not now represented in it. We think that important political groups which have not joined the government ought to be included. But that, after all, is a matter for the Spanish republicans to attend to. The duty of the American government is to break relations with Franco, end all maneuvers to impose upon the people of Spain a monarchy they hate and despise, and offer prompt recognition to the Republic in Exile.

The Plight of the Jews

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, October 1

IT WAS William O'Dwyer's final report as executive director of the War Refugee Board, issued on September 21, which first called attention to the Harrison mission, up to then a rather well-kept secret, only known to a few in close touch with Jewish affairs. O'Dwyer disclosed that in July Earl G. Harrison, United States representative on the Intergovernmental Committee on Refugees, had been sent by the government to investigate the needs and conditions of diplaced persons in Western Europe, "particularly the Jews." The O'Dwyer report declared that while much had been done to improve conditions among these "displaced peoples," Harrison had found "glaring inhumanity . . . prevailing in many areas." On inquiry it was learned that Harrison had made a report to the White House in the latter part of August and that publication had been promised but postponed. It was said in informed circles that the British had objected to release of the report, but it was pretty obvious that there were objections from within the Administration as well. At the State Department the report was in the hands of Loy W. Henderson, now top official for Near Eastern Affairs, and the first off-the-record response was that it would not be made public until Secretary of State James F. Byrnes returned from London. The newspaper PM ran an editorial calling attention to the withholding of the report and demanding its release. Late Saturday, some twenty-four hours before Governor Dewey was to address a Zionist mass-meeting in New York City, the White House, without waiting for the return of Byrnes, gave out the text of the report and of the letter Mr. Truman sent to General Eisenhower about it on August 31.

The report, as released, made it easy to understand why some people in the War and State departments and the British embassy preferred to keep its fierce light hidden under a bushel. Harrison is a leading Philadelphia lawyer, long prominent in the civic and charitable life of that city, a former United States Immigration Commissioner, now dean of the University of Pennsylvania Law School; his report is gratifying evidence that there is at least one man of heart and vigor on the mummified Intergovernmental Committee. He does not happen to be Jewish; he seems to be, in more than a nominal sense, a Christian. It would take more than a political reporter, it would take a Hebrew prophet, to discuss that report and its implications adequately. For let no one imagine comfortably that Harrison's story concerns only the tragedy of a few hundred thousand Jews and other stateless persons who too often found their liberators as callous and indifferent as their Nazi oppressors had been savage and sadistic; who found a passive replacing an active cruelty, the former in some ways harder to bear. That is only a small part of the tragedy. One who reads the Harrison report with discerning and imaginative mind will see reflected in it the fatal weaknesses of our society, the lurking shadow of a terrible retribution. Events since 1933 would seem amply to have demonstrated the consequences and the cost of anti-Semitism for all peoples and for civilization, the need for resolute action in stamping it out, the desirability of some great and graphic act of justice to the homeless of Jewry as an object lesson for the Nazi-infected peoples. The picture which emerges from the Harrison report is, by contrast, only likely to convince the enemies of world order in Central Europe, at home, and elsewhere that the democratic forces of the Anglo-American world are weak and irresolute, too half-hearted to live up to their grandiose moral pretensions, not genuinely anti-fascist, easily gulled, and perhaps next time, with more luck, to be defeated.

Can anyone be so foolish as to believe that we earn the respect of the Germans by treating their victims as Harrison reveals we have been treating them? Three months after V-E Day Harrison found many of the Jews and former slave laborers of the Nazis living in the same concentration camps, fed a diet "composed principally of bread and coffee," still clothed in hideous concentration-camp garb or, even more ignominiously, in S. S. uniforms left behind by their oppressors, facing fuelless months in quarters "clearly unfit for winter use," and often unable to present their grievances to Military Government authorities "because ironically they have been obliged to go through German employees, who have not facilitated matters." The liberated are treated far worse than the defeated. I do not refer to prisoners of war or war criminals—their food and housing are a paradise by contrast—but to ordinary Germans. Harrison found Germans "still the best-dressed population in all of Europe," with a diet "more varied and palatable," in rural areas at least, than that of their freed victims. Harrison asks—and the point was emphasized in the President's sharp letter to Eisenhower—whether this is the way to implement the Potsdam pledge "to convince the German people that they have suffered a total military defeat and that they cannot escape responsibility for what they have brought upon themselves."

There is another side to this picture which must give the Nazis even greater satisfaction. Harrison went abroad unsympathetic to Zionism. He found that the Nazis had succeeded in spreading anti-Semitism almost everywhere in the occupied countries. He found that of the 100,000 Jews surviving in the camps of Germany and Austria, very few of the German and Polish Jews wished to return to their old homes, nor did many of those from other East and Central European countries. They want to go home as others are going home,, and this for most of them means going to Palestine. They had sought to live as Germans and Poles—and no one can deny what fervent patriots the German and Polish Jews have been in the past—but they were persecuted as Jews, and most of them now wish to live as Jews, to hold their heads up as Jews; they look to the colonization of the Holy Land as their one hope of restored self-respect, their deepest need. Harrison neither applauds nor deplores the feeling, but he recognizes that there is really nowhere else for them to go; covert anti-Semitism and xenophobia greet them even in America and England. Harrison asks that the gates of Palestine be opened to 100,000 at least and cites the past pledges of the British Labor Party as basis for an appeal to this effect by the American government. If the British people, oppressed by their own multitudinous troubles in the wake of a heroic struggle, are inclined to be tolerant of these broken pledges, let them ask themselves if the broken pledges on Palestine are not of the same pattern as the pledges the Attlees and Bevins have made to British labor, and if they do not foreshadow similar disillusion for themselves. They may well ask themselves also whether this reluctance to do justice to the Jews in the matter of Palestine is not of the same pattern as the Chamberlain policies that were responsible for their own ruined homes and cities.

It is to Mr. Truman's honor that he has already acted on both aspects of the Harrison recommendations. He has ordered General Eisenhower to take immediate steps to improve conditions among the remaining Jewish and other stateless displaced persons in the Reich—and Eisenhower has made a personal trip through the Reich to see that this is done. The President has also asked the British formally to grant 100,000 entrance certificates for Palestine. But it will still take much public pressure to achieve these purposes.

The problem of enforcing both the President's recent order and previous directives on the treatment of refugees in the Reich is but part of the general problem of getting the military to obey Potsdam and Presidential directives designed to denazify the Reich. Let no one be deceived by the statements issuing from anonymous spokesmen at Patton headquarters. A New York Times dispatch from Frankfurt today reports not only that Patton is unwilling to requisition decent housing for refugees but that "large numbers of American troops are still living under canvas in Bavaria, while Germans, some of them Nazis, luxuriously entertain American officers in fine houses." The problem of Jewish immigration into Palestine is similarly part of the greater problem of substituting Allied cooperation for power politics. Pledges to the Jews on Palestine are being broken because of British imperialist desires to use the thin layer of the Arab ruling class as a pawn in a game of oil politics with America and power politics with the Soviet Union. The Arab League, from which much is being heard, is the creation and the tool of the British Foreign Office. A Palestine settlement beneficial to both Jews and Arabs is possible any time the British government wants it. If Truman can bring that about, he will do humanity as well as Jewry a historic service.

AMG—Innocents Abroad

BY SAUL K. PADOVER

(Historian and political scientist; during the war an officer in the army's Psychological Warfare Division)

IT IS always slightly embarrassing to say unkind words about Military Government officers. They are so vulnerable and yet so innocent, in any sense of the word, that in criticizing them one has the uncomfortable feeling one is supposed to have when one takes the proverbial candy from the proverbial baby. They are, moreover, generally nice people who act to the best of their knowledge and ability. It is not their fault that their knowledge and ability are limited. Whatever shortcomings MG officers may have, they cannot be accused of malice. Least of all can they be charged with abuse of power. The trouble lies elsewhere. It began with the inception of MG.

Military Government was organized as an integral part of the army, with a staff function (G-5), and was expected to be merely an ancillary of the military. It was not properly trained to rule Germany in peace time. During the combat phase MG's objective was, first, to facilitate military operations and, second, to govern German civilians. While the war was on, the army was necessarily more interested in order than in politics. It had to see that there was no disturbance in its rear. This task was intrusted to MG officers.

MG thus entered Germany without any long-range program. If there was such a program, it was a White House arcanum hidden from the MG officers in the field. The short-range objective, the maintenance of order in the period of combat, was accomplished without difficulty. From the first day we entered the Reich the Germans fell over themselves to collaborate with the military authorities. Those who were fortunate enough to get jobs with MG put up signs on their doors proudly proclaiming, "Here lives Herr X, collaborator with the Americans." I remember one MG major in a Rhineland town saying with humorless admiration: "They are wonderful people, these Germans; I must hand it to them. At ten o'clock this morning I ordered the evacuation of a number of houses by three in the afternoon for the billeting of troops. By eleven o'clock they were all evacuated. Isn't that a record?" (Incidentally, of the thirty German families evacuated, the heads of only three were members of the Nazi Party; the rest were non-Nazis or anti-Nazis, and they asked bitterly why they were being discriminated against by the Americans.)

It was when the combat phase ended that MG's severe headaches began. It was then that it began to encounter difficulties, mainly political, for which it was not prepared; and friendly observers, viewing its fumbling actions, were obliged to conclude that Military Government personnel was not equipped to govern, least of all to govern Germans.

During the seven or eight months that I was in contact with MG officers in Germany I often asked myself the question: How and why were these men selected? They were so obviously out of place that it was sometimes embarrassing to watch them. They were commissioned civilians, not regular-army officers. Why were they commissioned? I still do not know whether the selection of MG personnel was governed by a deliberate policy of taking only men who had no anti-fascist bias or political convictions. One could not but be struck by the like-mindedness and political apathy of the officers, particularly those of field grade and over, but knowing something about the wheels on which Washington rolls, I am inclined to doubt that there was conscious purpose in the choice of MG candidates. I believe that conservative and "unpolitical" general officers simply preferred men in their own image, men who were "safe and sound," with no liberal nonsense about them.

MG officers were certainly not chosen because they were specialists in politics or experts on Germany. One officer told me that when he was in the Charlottesville school, cradle of MG, discussion of political questions was never encouraged. As regards a knowledge of Germany, the facts are, I think, sensational. MG officers do not know the German language; they rely upon German interpreters, who are frequently dubious characters. Many of them had never been in Germany before. They have no special knowledge of German problems; in civilian life they had no contact with German affairs. There may be some exceptions, but not enough to invalidate these conclusions.

Many MG officers are small-town professional men, reflecting the prejudices and virtues of their backgrounds. Among those with whom I worked were lawyers, judges, newspapermen, fire chiefs, police chiefs, social-service workers, building contractors, chemical engineers, and sanitary engineers. They were chosen precisely because they had certain special skills, for the army's short-range aim was to keep the municipal machinery going. But in stressing narrow skills the army neglected the larger qualifications; it overlooked the fact that one able individual with administrative experience can supervise a hundred plumbers and firemen and electricians. As a result MG in Germany today is staffed with officers who are competent in their special fields and decent in their personal relations but who are psychologically and professionally unprepared for the job of governing a foreign country, least of all a defeated country demoralized by a dozen years of fascism and riven by class hatreds. There are thousands of competent Germans who know how to run fire departments and sewers and water mains and public utilities; their eagerness to work under American supervision makes most of our MG officers superfluous. What MG needs is fewer plumbers and more men with political wisdom and training, fewer officers who want to keep the street cars running and more who are concerned with how to eradicate Nazism.

Most MG officers are "anti-Nazi" in a vague and general way, without any realization of the political and social implications of fascism. In some places, notably in Leipzig, they displayed antipathy for German anti-fascists and threatened to jail them. Of all those I met, only one MG officer had a passionate dislike of Nazis as Nazis and would have no dealings with them of any kind; he was, in my memory, a shining exception. The majority prided themselves on being "unpolitical," and that in a country like Germany meant being morally insensible. They employed Nazi Party members, not out of fascist convictions, but out of political neutrality and ignorance of recent history. I remember the MG officer in a big Ruhr town who regretted that the incumbent Bürgermeister was a notorious Nazi and S. A. man. "He is really a fine fellow," the MG captain said. "He told me frankly that he was a member of the Nazi Party. You know, I respect that man for his honesty. I wish I were allowed to keep him as mayor." I asked the captain what he was in civilian life. "Sanitary engineer," he said.

It was not until Headquarters issued a sharp order last winter—mainly as a result of an investigation made by two colleagues and myself—that the widespread MG practice of tolerating Nazis in office was curbed. Incidentally, it is noteworthy that the higher-ranking officers, especially those on a staff level, have showed themselves to be more anti-Nazi than the juniors in the field. General Eisenhower and his deputy, General Clay, are the best, as well as the highest, examples. General Patton is probably not typical.

The directive forbidding MG to retain Nazis in office or to appoint known nationalists and militarists caused consternation in MG circles. Up to that time it had been easy for an MG officer, ignorant of German conditions and indifferent to political problems, to administer his post by retaining the German incumbent. As a rule office-holders were members of the Nazi Party, either out of conviction or for the sake of their career. Since they were also the men with experience, they had no difficulty in persuading MG that they had been forced to join the Nazi Party but at heart were anti-Nazi, and that they were indispensable. Consequently, Nazi and nationalistic bureaucrats were confirmed in their positions and obstinately defended in the face of protests from German Social Democrats and other anti-fascist elements.

When the employment of Nazis was finally interdicted, MG did not know where to turn to find qualified officials. Germans with a clean anti-Nazi record were not immediately at hand. They were either in concentration camps, or in hiding, or living in obscurity. It took a knowledge of the German language and of German conditions to find them; and MG officers were not equipped with such qualifications. Many of the true anti-Nazis, moreover, were Social Democrats, Communists, or Left Centrists, and MG officers, even when they knew the difference between one German political party and another, were not enamored of the choice before them. They preferred, as a last resort, to employ clericals.

There was another difficulty that hobbled MG. It attempted to operate in a foreign country without a most vital instrument of government—a political-intelligence department. Strange as it may seem, no provision was made to supply MG personnel with political intelligence; MG teams contained no specially trained political officer. Everywhere MG had to depend upon the army's Counter-Intelligence Corps, which is primarily concerned with problems of military security and only incidentally with political matters or persons,. Generally, therefore, MG officers were about the last persons to know what was going on politically in the areas of their jurisdiction; they knew only as much as some individual, either someone in the CIC or Psychological Warfare or a German official, happened to tell them. When my colleagues and I entered a town, we used to win the gratitude of MG by dispensing a little political information.

Last winter a special representative of the White House drily told the MG team in Aachen that the President's objective in Germany was not efficiency but democracy, and that Roosevelt was willing to "settle for 10 or 15 per cent efficiency" if he could get the right kind of political choices. The MG officers listened courteously—I am not sure they understood what he meant—and then went on doing as they did before. MG is not actively hostile to General Eisenhower's and General Clay's de-Nazification program but is without enthusiasm for it.

If MG officers are not politically neutral or indifferent, they are anti-Germans or anti-reds. Both groups are in the minority, the latter being the larger. The anti-Germans are those who insist that all Germans are alike and that there is no difference between Nazis and anti-Nazis. Consequently, so their argument runs, why bother to make any distinctions, and why not leave the Nazis in office? This attitude is by implication pro-Nazi. If all Germans are equally guilty, one must punish them all alike, but since it is easier to indict than to penalize a whole people, it follows that one must punish nobody. Thus the guilty escape retribution and the innocent are tarred with the brush of obloquy. There is, furthermore, something morally repugnant in the bland assertion that the Germans who suffered tortures in concentration camps are no better than the Germans who inflicted those tortures. The former are, to be sure, in a pitiful minority, but they do exist, and their number runs into the thousands. It is one of the ironies of the whole befogged German situation that MG in no way encourages or favors the German inmates of concentration camps, the K.Z.'s, and usually prefers those who never raised a voice against the Nazi terror. K.Z.'s, far from being accepted as fighters against Nazism, are just tolerated; in some cities—in Munich, for example—they have genuine grievances.

The anti-reds among MG officers allow their attitude toward German problems to be colored by their unreasoning hostility to Russia and their emotional bias against communism. To them anti-fascists, Social Democrats, Communists, and Left Centrists are nothing but reds, and reds are of course worse than Nazis. These MG men are susceptible to pan-German and Nazi propaganda, which tirelessly hammers away at the thesis that Russia, not Germany, is the real enemy, and that Europe is threatened by a Communist revolution. In consequence they develop an almost unconscious predisposition in favor of Nazis, who are supposed to be the champions against communism. The red-baiters justify their attitude by saying that, after all, the Nazis are just a political party, something like Republicans and Democrats at home. To the statement that the Nazis are anti-democratic, the anti-reds reply cynically, "Do you mean to say you are naive enough to believe that we have democracy in America?"

I repeat: the anti-Germans and anti-reds form only a minority of MG personnel. But they do help to set the tone, particularly in view of the political neutrality of the majority of MG officers, and their views affect the carrying out of policy in their jurisdictions. I have said enough to show why a fundamental change in MG personnel and policies is needed. Subsequently I shall describe MG at work—how it operated at Aachen, the first large MG experiment, and more recently at Munich, the metropolis of the American zone.

[This is the second of a series of articles on Military Government and democracy in Germany.]

In the Wind

POLITICAL ECONOMY: "Republican control of the state," said the Chicago Tribune of September 6, "is retained by a thread. . . . The party has a good deal of legitimate patronage at the disposal of the state administration. It should be used to strengthen its organization in Chicago. The election returns over the last few years raise a strong suspicion that that patronage isn't going into the right hands."

RACE RELATIONS: Miss Etta McGee, a Negro of Evanston, Illinois, recently called on a friend at the Orrington Hotel there and was told to use the service elevator. Palmer Jones, manager, told representatives of the Evanston and North Shore Civil Liberties committees that the hotel "assumes that all Negroes are servants and therefore directs them to use the service elevator." The Civil Liberties committees are making this a test case under the state civil-rights law.

LABOR RELATIONS: Business Week for September 22 carries on the first page of its labor section a photograph with the caption "Preparations for Peace-Time Living." It shows one of two armored reconnaissance cars purchased from the army by the Cleveland police "to augment their fleet of squad cars. The 'cruisers' will mount two machine-guns each."

EDUCATION: A. A. Nichoson, assistant vice-president of the Texas Company, gave this advice to the Kansas City Real Estate Board on September 14, as reported in the Kansas City Star: "As for the selling of the post-war product, Nichoson pointed out that the salesman must learn to reach the emotions of the prospective buyer in preference to his reasoning. 'Education has fallen down,' he said, 'when it has failed to enlarge its methods in teaching emotion while the emphasis has been on reasoning.' "

EUGENICS: Scientific note from Pamphlet No. 40 of the Eugenics Society of Northern California: "Displacement of our native robins by immigrant English sparrows is described in Condor Jan.-Feb., 1945, number by Mr. Frank Richardson. . . . If this story could penetrate the consciousness of every Senator and Representative at Washington, it would end carelessness in immigration-control legislation. . . . If U. S. A. had been wiser as to immigration control, Pearl Harbor might have been avoided."

WRONG NUMBER: From the script of the Fred Waring show on N. B. C. September 18: "Now we turn our attention to South America, where so many countries are celebrating their independence—all this week. Here's 'Down Argentine Way.' "

HANDS ACROSS THE SEA: The Shirley Food Stores advertised sliced ham in the Washington Post of September 14 thus: "Ah! Slices of ham browned a bit . . . and cream gravy and mashed potatoes, and green peas! Enjoy it like people would in England!"

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. One dollar will be paid for each item accepted.]

Diplomats in Conference

BY HAROLD J. LASKI

(Professor of political science at the University of London and chairman of the British Labor Party Executive)

London, September 15

THE big automobiles draw up elegantly at Lancaster House. The little crowd presses nearer to catch a glimpse of the statesmen who pass swiftly through the entrance. The secret police take a sharp look around to make sure that no dangerous character of the political underworld has slipped past them. As the Foreign Ministers enter, to the click of fifty cameras from the newspaper photographers of twenty nations, they try to look indifferent to the knowledge that they are already a part of history and that at tomorrow's breakfast tables their wives and children, friends and enemies will be gazing at the scene. After the last one has arrived, the policemen good-humoredly move the crowd on with the assurance that the show is over for the day.

Within, everything is ready for the statesmen to begin their work. Their deputies sit beside them, with their papers neatly arranged in the exact order of the agenda for the session; behind the Ministers are their secretaries, with duplicate papers in case of mishap; and behind the secretaries are the experts—learned historians who know everything that was said and done at the Congress of Vienna, sociologists who have twice taken an ethnic census of the population of Trieste, eager young American lawyers who can compile a brief on the Trentino almost as easily as one on the Teamsters' Union in Seattle. The experts have never shared the lives of the men and women whose fate they will help to decide; they have been chosen because they have read in the unpublished archives of half a dozen countries the aides-mémoire of earlier experts long since in their graves, or because they once suggested a happy phrase to a Minister who had got stuck in the middle of an important sentence, or because they read papers for an important personage and thus save his eyes and time. In the row behind them are the secretaries to the secretaries, miraculously capable of recording every word said; late in the evening they will deliver to the next grade in the hierarchy a flawless transcript, and later still the experts will explain to the Ministers the exact meaning of the things to which they have committed themselves and to which they have delivered up the patient masses who have no function but to await the decisions made for them.

All concerned realize the importance of the work they are doing at Lancaster House. It is a complex and massive task for tired men, many of whom learn of a problem for the first time when they have to decide it. They are all oppressed by the defective preparation, the overwhelming amount of material, the absence of clear directives, the difficulty of coordination. Did Mr. Molotov make his point precisely clear to Mr. Bevin? Did Mr. Byrnes grasp just what was behind that emphasis of M. Bidault which caused the British experts such acute perplexity? To the distress of all the others each one of them makes separate agreements, throws out separate "feelers" to this state or that, passes swiftly from the unity of war aims to the division of unreconciled philosophies of peace. Though all agree that only the great powers can really direct the process of peace-making, each is careful to consult the representatives of the smaller powers, who, excluded from the inner discussions, find compensation in lobbying and memorializing and getting this or that eminent journalist to publish their propaganda or to launch some useful, if sinister, rumor.

There are also the dinner parties and the receptions without which no conference is complete. Most of them are magnificently staged, and to all but the old hands a little bewildering, even awe-inspiring. Just what does it mean that the Yugoslav Minister was invited to this dinner but not to that? What is behind that earnest smile on Mr. Noel-Baker's face as he talks to the French Ambassador? Is it significant that Mr. Bevin is listening in a corner to the obviously vivid talk of the Italian representative, who gesticulates as eloquently as he speaks? When Mr. Byrnes was talking to that high-ranking British officer, what was the rest of the sentence of which the visiting French diplomat caught only the words "atomic bomb"? Is there some special reason why the reserved British Prime Minister and the smiling but shy Benjamin Cohen, of the American delegation, seem when they meet to engage in a game of dumb crambo? Is the sum total of ministerial exhaustion at the evening entertainments balanced by the delight of the academic experts in these threats to their digestions? Is this long succession of receptions to half the world and dinners to the influential few a really useful way of making contacts without journalistic interference, or is it part of that dreary diplomatic ritual which made Colonel House, a quarter of a century ago, write angrily in his diary that "much of the time of the conference was wasted in a grotesque effort not to offend"? One day, perhaps, Sir Edward Crankshaw, who seems less weighed down with responsibility and innermost secrets than was Lord Hankey as Secretary to the British Cabinet, may try to measure the moral and intellectual value of his skill in arranging post-prandial contacts which, despite the protocol, are intended to appear spontaneous.

I doubt whether anyone who watches, even at a properly respectful distance, the eminent and less eminent actors in this elegant if slow-moving ballet can help contrasting the hot-house world in which it is staged with the cold facts of the world outside. Millions of people—when there are millions they become a meaningless abstraction—are on the road in Europe—old people and young people; men, women, and children; soldiers, airmen, and civilians; Poles, Germans, Jews, Spaniards, and Italians. The wrongs they have done or the wrongs done to them now seem to matter less than the fact that they must be divided into those who will die this winter and those who will not die. Most of them are penniless, all are hungry, many are stricken with disease. In terror of the police, they dream that beneath the uniform of a British or an American soldier they will find the kindly heart of a powerful magician. They do not know where they are going, or whether they will ever arrive. They die afresh every day while diplomats in conference and military governments in occupied territories prepare against the need to bury them. If the meetings of Ministers make a noble minuet, is it exaggeration to describe these mass-migrations as a dance of death?

I think of a lonely girl in a Chelsea flat, fearing, hoping, always waiting. Her husband was last heard of, wounded, on the land side of Singapore, the day before its surrender. All these years she has waited for the telegram that does not come. She telephones in a fierce frenzy to this friend or that who may perhaps have access to some eminence in the War Office willing to send an urgent telegram of inquiry to Singapore. She goes to the War Office and fights her way to the room of a tired but kindly officer who tells her that all is being done that can be done, that every speck of information is being collected that it is possible to collect.

I should like to put this girl for whom life is tortured waiting, or some tired old Jew from that uncounted army of marching derelicts, into the conference room at Lancaster House. They might symbolize to the Council of Foreign Ministers, to their alternates and experts and secretaries, the inner reality of their discussions. They might convince them that they meet, not at St. James's, London, but at Golgotha, where they must seek to prevent a new crucifixion of mankind.

Some Don't Wear the Purple Heart

BY FRANK N. TRAGER

(After thirty months of service as an army psychologist, Mr. Trager has recently regained civilian status. He is the author of an article in The Nation for July 14 signed Militaris.)

IN THE First World War one fighting man out of every seven casualties suffered from neuropsychiatric breakdown. According to competent authority each such casualty cost $34,000. In this war, in which the total casulties were much greater than in World War I, no final figures have been released. The dollar costs will undoubtedly be relatively as well as absolutely higher. As of October 1, 1945, disability pensions for neuropsychiatric injuries have been awarded to approximately 300,000 men and women. By the time demobilization has been completed, the ratio to all casualties will probably be higher than the earlier one of one in seven.

In World War I the typical psychoneurotic breakdown, known as "shell-shock," was actually a form of naive hysteria with conversion symptoms producing temporary paralysis and/or loss of some sensory reactions. In World War II the typical diagnosis has been "anxiety reaction." Its elements are fear, startle reactions, tremors, guilt feelings, gastro-intestinal upsets, irritability, restiveness, and the like. It occurs usually as an end product of a series of traumatic events, either during or after combat. For example:

> S/Sgt. R. C., twenty-seven years old, married, no children, almost three years in the Pacific, fine mechanic, rotated for regular furlough, "broke down" in this country and had to be discharged. He is a sober, conscientious individual who always won commendation for his meticulous performance. But he could not return to duty, for he could "take" no more. He felt guilty for "quitting," could not understand that three years' service plus two attacks of dengué fever and various traumatic experiences which included finding a dismembered marine and the head of a Jap had worn him out.

or

> Sgt. B., twenty-three, only survivor when his plane collided with another; he plummeted in the split-off tail and managed to get out at about 1,000 feet. He hated planes after that, kept "seeing" his buddies burn, felt he should not be alive, or should "at least" be avenging them, but could not get into combat again.

These men, and others like them, are suffering from deep-seated anxieties which get worse the longer they remain untreated. Their emotional disturbances are as real and as serious as any disabling wound. They require careful psychiatric attention unless we are prepared to repeat the errors of omission and commission perpetrated upon the "shell-shocked" veterans of the last war.

Thus far few explanations have been offered for the sharp difference in the soldiers' psychic reaction to the two wars. True, this war has lasted longer; there have been greater hazards; flying, a major part of World War II, is in itself more difficult to "take" than land warfare. Dr. E. A. Strecker, consultant to the surgeons general for the army, navy, and air forces, believes that the present clinical manifestations of anxiety neurosis mean that "deeper emotional recesses have been penetrated . . . that we have come perilously close to the saturation point of human emotions, and that while there may be no limit to the resources of engineering genius in perfecting machines of war, there is a limit to the capacity of human emotions to survive the psychic devastation and degradation which are produced."

To restore to health men functionally disabled in this war, the public, the government, and the Veterans Administration must cooperate as they never have before. Medical science has made great advances; the armed forces have been awakened to the gravity of the situation by sheer professional persistence; personnel, though still insufficient, has been made available in greater numbers. Only the will and the wisdom to carry out promptly an adequate therapeutic program are needed.

Certain fundamental facts must be kept in mind. In the first place, men who receive a medical discharge from the armed forces are sick or wounded men. The more obvious instances, the amputation cases, always excite sympathy. The others, functionally or organically wounded, are often ignored. It should be remembered that the armed forces discharge these men as soon as it is medically possible, that is, before complete restoration. In the second place, the soldier with a neuropsychiatric wound will appear to be a whole man. In fact he will be as much a wounded veteran as if his body bad been pierced by bullets or shell fragments. Emotional disorder needs treatment even though no purple heart is awarded for it. Moreover, if the organically wounded soldier is disabled either for a long time—as in regeneration of nerve injuries—or permanently, he needs psychiatric as well as physical medical service both before and, frequently, after he is discharged.

Once the public has an elementary appreciation of his condition, it will recognize its responsibility for the wounded veteran—and I mean both the physically and the psychically wounded man. The armed forces have developed excellent convalescent programs for these men while they are still in "service," and there is no reason why they should not get equally good physical and emotional care during their period of civilian adjustment.[*] However, the present Veterans Administration does not yet supply it. A program which can truly help a man to recover from combat must be based on three principles: (1) integration of medical services, so that a man is thoroughly examined organically and functionally and not bedded unless necessary; (2) freedom of choice for the soldier among such beneficent activities as shops, classes, games, and sports; (3) vocational preparation for renewed army duty or civilian life.

The program developed by the army should be examined and adapted to civilian life. Its out-patient concepts should be applied in the Veterans Administration and community agencies. But something else is needed: public and private institutions must be educated to the continuing needs of the discharged veteran. The army discharges a man as "improved" who has achieved the maximum benefit under its administration but who is not cured. He will need further help in civilian life, especially when the initial excitement of the return has worn off and when adversity hits him, in his emotions or his pocket-book.

I doubt whether the army, as constituted at present, can help in this task of public education. Many men resent the army's rigid caste system, so thoroughly un-American in its structure and function. Perhaps the air force, which pioneered in this field and has been less affected by caste, can help the public to understand the problems of the returning men.

The public must learn that the sensitive, permanently wounded veteran can acquire a secure place in society if he is given a chance to regain his inner equilibrium. The public must realize that the psychoneurotic ex-soldier is not "crazy" or "going insane." He is a man whose emotional balance has been sharply disturbed by the fears and anxieties legitimately created by participation in man's greatest social evil—war. It is almost certain that this balance can be restored completely by a program of medical guidance, gainful activity, and love.

The public can provide the security, the family the love. Competent professional assistance is more difficult to obtain. Even after doctors have been released by the armed forces, there will not be enough psychiatrists to meet the need. It should be possible, however, to provide adequate care for ex-soldiers through guidance clinics and out-patient treatment, through greater utilization of trained psychiatric social workers and psychologists, and through accelerated training of regular medical doctors, who can be fitted into civilian clinics much as "assistant psychiatrists" were trained by the AAF.

Obviously, we are not yet prepared for such a program. The Veterans Administration, which should have been geared for this, is handicapped by the dead weight of its past. Perhaps General Bradley can move this dead weight. Already, partly in response to public pressure, the neuropsychiatric division of the VA has been given the signal to expand after years of humiliating stultification. Counseling services should be set up at all Veterans' Service Centers and comparable social agencies; similar services should be provided by the personnel departments of industry and particularly by unions. The returned soldier does not need maudlin sympathy or coddling; he may need a helping hand to restore his inner reservoir of emotional strength. Take, for example:

> Sgt. R. O'C., twenty-three years old, married, no children. He was evacuated from one of the Marshall Islands after repeated exposure to enemy bombs. His outfit, a headquarters company, had little or no means with which to "fight back." Sgt. O'C. got "the shakes," couldn't sleep, and when he arrived at the Convalescent Center he was twenty-eight pounds under weight, still shaking, and sweating profusely. He couldn't keep food down, had nightmares, and almost literally jumped at unexpected sounds. He was treated with pentothal, one of the "uncovering" drugs, on the basis of which a program of counseling and activity was prescribed. Ten weeks later he was discharged for anxiety neurosis. He was given every advantage of the convalescent-hospital program—including vocational testing. The outcome indicated the type of job he should seek. During his treatment he was given time to go home, arrange the details with his wife—it will be their first home after two and a half years of married life—seek employment with a concern which could use his indicated skills. He was vocationally tested by this company, confirming the above findings. Today he is thoroughly on the road to complete recovery. He has security and love, is reacquiring contact with reality, and is thus able to dispose of his fears. The traumatic events of the past will disappear because he has been facing, not repressing them. He knows that he can find counseling services if he needs them. For all purposes he is "set."

The anxiety-ridden veteran is not unlike the child who slowly and painfully has to socialize his individual world of fantasy—and nightmare. The veteran has to a certain extent

---

[*] The AAF pioneered in this field. The key man has been Colonel Howard Rusk. In December, 1942, encouraged by Air Surgeon General Grant, Colonel Rusk began the job of persuading some 250 AAF Station Hospitals to accept in principle the theory of an active convalescence. His program restored men to health and duty faster and reduced the incidence of relapse. In September, 1943, the Surgeon General of the army showed his approval of the program by adopting it. In the AAF it was called "convalescent training"; in the army "reconditioning." In November, 1943, Colonel Rusk pushed on. He organized a seminar for twenty-two medical and administrative officers (I was the only enlisted man at this first seminar) who should plan and launch a program for eight new convalescent centers. He enlisted the experience of the New York Institute for the Crippled and Disabled and, again with the blessing of General Grant, formulated the policy which guided these new centers. In short order, the Surgeon General followed suit.

"regressed" to a dependent, childlike state. His return to an adult world of reality can surely be predicted. He can be aided, not by babying, scolding, bribing, but by treating him progressively as a real person with rights and duties. The family setting, parental or conjugal, can provide much of this; but just as contemporary experience proves the wisdom of treating both the parent and the child when the child has become a problem, so, too, the family as well as the soldier can benefit from expert advice. Rest and isolation are not the therapy for these men. In most instances they do not need long vacations. They do need gradual participation in the life about them, along with the security and affection and insight which society and the family can contribute to their recovery. This much we have learned: in a third world war emotional devastation would probably parallel the devastation of atomic power.

The Driver Was a Nice Guy

BY EDGAR BROOKE

(A native of Richmond, Virginia, now an officer in the United States Naval Reserve)

IT TOOK me about an hour and a half to fly from the army's Bolling Field, at Washington, to Winston-Salem, two-thirds of the distance to Union, South Carolina. The remaining third took ten and a half hours. The operations-duty officer at Winston-Salem regretfully explained that no southbound planes were leaving the field until the next day. My only recourse was the Greyhound bus. I found the platform jammed, which made me among the last to get on the bus, and so I had to stand, up front near the driver. That night on this and other buses made me feel as if I had been projected back fifty years in time. It was because of the people.

There is apparently something about driving a bus which affects the personality of the driver, as appearing on the stage affects an actor. Our driver was an engaging example of his trade. He was the blond, heavy type that we see labeled fullback on the sports pages. He radiated good cheer, was pleased with himself and the world. Everyone liked him. His manner infected the passengers and established a friendly atmosphere. His occasional sallies and his accounts of the local landmarks drew an intimate response, as in a little theater.

My naval officer's uniform obtained a special mark of favor from him. He pulled down a concealed seat to his right, just inside the door, and cordially insisted that I occupy it. Over my head passed a conversation which disclosed something of his background. A lean young man who might have been painted by Thomas Eakins was evidently an old friend of the driver's. It developed that they had graduated together from the Statesville High School, known the same people, gone with the same girls. They were probably called by their first names by half the people in Statesville.

The driver and his friend were affectionately insulting each other, running down each other's tastes, habits, and progress in life to date, when the driver abruptly broke off the talk, slammed on the brakes, and brought the heavy bus to a halt. The voice in which he then spoke, as he glared into the mirror over his head, bore little resemblance to the lazy, amiable tones of a minute before. It was cold, menacing, hostile.

"You nigger," he shouted, "get out of that seat! Get out! That stuff doesn't go on this bus. No nigger sits down when white people are standing. That's right. Now you, sir—" to a white man in the aisle—"you take that seat." The passengers reacted to this episode with apathy; no one said a word. Soon we pulled into a village, and the driver called out, "Ten-minute stop!" The bus station here was a drugstore, toward which the driver headed. A policeman sauntered out to greet him, a tall, white-haired, red-faced man, with slouched, powerful shoulders. The driver laughingly told him about the nerve of the "damn nigger" in taking the seat and about how he had told him off. The cop listened with relish, and his seamed face grinned evilly. "Nigger took a seat on the bus," he said softly, raised his clenched fist, shook it meaningfully, and said, "Bus' him in the head! Bus' him in the head!"

The next incident occurred an hour later in Statesville, where we made a thirty-minute stop. The passengers were sauntering in twos and threes out of the restaurant by the station and going back to their seats in the bus. As I stood on the platform, my attention was caught by a group off to my left. A short Negro soldier, a private, wearing combat and good-conduct ribbons, was bidding his family goodby. They were all emotional, and the eight-year-old daughter's eyes were glistening with tears. "Don't cry, honey," the soldier said, "I'll be back soon." He turned and headed for the bus, lurching a bit in his emotion, which was heightened perhaps by a couple of drinks. Inadvertently he walked between two white couples conversing nearby. He muttered an apology and boarded the bus. He had got halfway down the aisle when the bus driver raced over, hammered on the side, and bellowed, "You, nigger! Get off that bus! Get off!" The Negro went back toward the door, and the driver caught his arm and pulled him off. "Now get away from here and don't come back."

"I got my ticket. I got my ticket," the Negro protested. "I'se got to git back to camp. I ain't done nothing."

An electric change had come over everyone standing around the platform. The Negro soldier slowly walked back to his family, who were shocked into stillness. His wife began to reason with him. "I've worked for you," she said with low fierceness. "Now be quiet. Don't git in no trouble."

"Lock me up," the soldier began in a chanting voice, "Let 'em lock me up. I ain't done nothing. Lock me up."

A group of young Negro men and girls on my right were arguing in undertones. I heard enough to know that the men were threatening violence and the girls were urging them to keep out of it. A Negro girl of about twenty, at this point, came up behind me where I stood alone and deliberately bumped me as she passed. A comprehension of the evil feelings among all the whites and Negroes there went over me, and the hopelessness of the situation so affected me that a cold sweat broke out on my forehead and my stomach churned with nausea. I had to sit down on a platform step to regain physical control and did not entirely succeed until I had found a seat on an extra bus which was added here and we were under way with the cool air blowing in the window. As we pulled away from the station, I saw two big policemen with the bewildered Negro soldier between them, force-marching him down the street, obviously to the jail.

Perhaps the nausea which assailed me came from a sense of guilt in my having made no effort to intervene, to protest, to assert the injustice of the treatment which the Negro had received. I had wanted to take the Negro's side against the bus driver but had desisted out of a conviction that my effort would be futile and a fear that it might be the spark to set off general violence. A riot was very close.

The most dismaying feature of the whole situation was this: it was clearly impossible for either whites or Negroes here to achieve tolerance toward the other race, and nothing else will really do. No man could make that Negro soldier alter his way of thinking and feeling; nothing could adequately lift his powers of understanding; nothing soften his sense of persecution and permit forgiveness. And, clearly, no one could make that bus driver realize how tragically guilty, sadistic, unjust he was. "I hate a nigger," he had said. Who could teach him better?

Spanish Prison

BY PERCY WINNER

(Percy Winner, a newspaperman and radio commentator, was on General Eisenhower's staff as chief of propaganda operations in North Africa; later he became deputy director of the Overseas Branch of the Office of War Information.)

IN MADRID the American colonel couldn't figure it out. "What's got into the folks back home?" he demanded. "Why are so many of them yapping about conditions over here, and what's wrong with conditions anyway? I walk all over this town and everybody I see and talk to is all right." The colonel wasn't with me that night when Pedrazza, who still limped from the wound he'd got in Russia, drove me toward a pool of light which hung over the dark streets. As the car passed the high walls behind which were the glaring flood lights that illuminated the sky, Pedrazza was busy watching the street ahead. "You use Nazi methods," I said. Without looking at me Pedrazza said, "They got them from the Russians." It was the first of the many prisons I was to see in Spain, some from the walls, some inside. All were crowded; so were the concentration camps I saw: they were crowded with the men the colonel didn't see or talk to.

The biggest camp in the north was Miranda del Ebro, but they let me see that only from the outside. At Barbastro the stench in the street outside the jail was so strangling that we hadn't the intestinal courage to go in. At Lérida we were in the territory of Captain General Moscardó, the "hero" of the Alcázar, and there wasn't a chance, but we had good luck at Jaca. The cartons of Lucky Strikes and Chesterfields we carried ostentatiously under our arms made the fat little warden eagerly cooperative, and we spent two hours talking to men who had escaped from France. The interviews took place in the low-ceilinged administration room on the second floor. We saw but weren't allowed to talk to the Spanish prisoners, and the foreigners were led in to see us one at a time. For form's sake—there was some sort of vague rule about it—we went through the motions of talking to them through an interpreter. Actually I talked to the men quite freely, as did Mrs. Stebbins, the wife of an American in the embassy, who was also making a tour of inspection. Occasionally the warden would break in with a "What does he say?" and the gaunt, shifty-eyed clerk would make a little speech which seldom had anything to do with the questions and answers. All went well until Mrs. Stebbins asked about the food. The French chef de groupe, whose dignified bearing contrasted oddly with ugly sores all over his face and shaved head, replied haughtily that it wasn't food which concerned his men; it was the length of time they had to wait to be free. "Of course," he said, "I wish to say, free to fight. It is the only freedom that interests us. Time presses." The clerk-interpreter hesitated, looked down at the two cartons of cigarettes on the ink-stained wooden table. Before he could find words for his speech, the chef de groupe interposed: "One can tell him that the nourishment is sufficient, that is to say, we eat better than the Spaniards." The interpreter looked frightened; then he translated: "He says they are treated well, the food is good." Pleasure loosened the folds of fat of the warden's cheeks. He shouted a sentence I did not understand, and presently the door opened to admit two little men carrying between them a large tin bucket. In it was a pale mustard-colored fluid with green gobs floating on the surface. This, the warden explained, was the superior soup prepared specially for the foreigners. Mrs. Stebbins lifted the spoon, sniffed, tasted, and swallowed once. She nodded her head as in approval, but in English said, "Good God! Let's get out of here." In the car she was sick.

Some of the jails in the frontier area were much worse than the one at Jaca. The best of the large prisons was at Pamplona. It was large, fairly new, relatively clean. The day we saw it there were many foreigners in the cells—Frenchmen, Poles, Czechs, Dutchmen, Belgians, a few German deserters, and even a tragic little Hungarian Jew. In most cases, especially among the Frenchmen, it wasn't bad food, vermin, or ill treatment they complained about. They wanted to be free, and free in order to fight; they were worried that the fighting might be finished before they were liberated. We were permitted to talk to all the prisoners, except the Spaniards, individually or in groups, and there was no nonsense about interpreters. One of the Frenchmen, a former army officer, was suspicious of Mrs. Stebbins, and to reassure him she told him we represented "the American government." Letting her sense of the dramatic carry her away, she added, "To tell the truth, my colleague is the personal representative of the President of the United States." That exciting bit of misinformation must have spread quickly through the prison, for several Spanish prisoner-trusties appeared at the doorway of the room in which we were working and stood there staring at me. They left after a while, and I followed them across the corridor into another, smaller room. In the small room I found a uniformed guard sitting on a table against the wall, his rifle slanting between his legs. Standing near him were the three trusties. Smoking American cigarettes from Mrs. Stebbins's store, they remained silent, watching me.

I knew I wasn't supposed to talk to them, but they were the first Spanish prisoners I had been able to get close to. I asked one of them how much longer he had to serve. He replied, "I think I have been here five years. They gave me thirty years. How much does that make?" He knew how many, of course. He may even have known how many months and days, but he was being careful, he was telling me, carefully, that a rojo, a Republican, still alive, in jail, and a trusty to boot, cannot be too careful with a stranger who has the run of a Franco jail. I said I had just come from America. He arched his brows, registering polite interest, but his face showed he wasn't going to be any the less careful. I said I was going back to America to make a report. That was why I was questioning the foreigners. I had come in here for a rest from the interviews. By the way, did they have enough cigarettes? Yes, they had, he said. I said I had been in many prisons and this was a good one. Yes, it was, the trusty said. I waited. None of the Spaniards said anything. I said I didn't think I'd mind so very much being in this kind of a prison if I had to be "inside," but I supposed I'd want very much to be "outside." Didn't he? There was a pause, a rather heavy pause, and I turned my head to see whether there was anyone at the door. The trusty slowly, carefully took the cigarette out of his mouth, looked first at the other trusties, then at the guard, finally at me. "Why?" That was all he said. "Why?" I echoed. "To be free, of course. Doesn't everyone want to be free?" "Claro," the trusty agreed; "everyone wants to be free. But why should I want to be outside?" One of the other trusties chimed in, "We are well here, we eat, we live; why should we want to be outside?" The guard laughed. I must have looked pretty blank, for the guard spoke to me as if it was plain that I was a foreigner, needing to be helped. "Look, Mr. American," he said, "they wish to say that a man is not free outside. Not now. You are free outside. For us, it is not worth the pain to be outside. Not for a rojo. Not for a National like me either. I myself, I say it." The guard was a man of tact and generosity; he liked American cigarettes very much, but the Caudillo supplied his bread and filled his wine glass. He grasped his rifle, slid off the table, brushed straight the folds of his uniform, and walked out of the room.

"What do you want to know?" the first trusty asked quietly after the guard was out of the room. "Whether we," he gestured toward the cell block, "want to be free? Yes. We want Spain to be free, and then we Spaniards can be free." "But," I interrupted, "don't you want to help Spain free herself?" "Look, Mr. American," the trusty replied, speaking slowly and making an effort to be patient, "I know that those others, the foreigners, want to be outside. They want to go where they can fight for their country. Good. Let them go and may they have good fortune. We fought and we lost. We fought for them too, and they did not know it. Now it is their turn. They want to fight, and they have the chance to fight. Now it is our turn to wait." I turned to the others and asked whether these were their thoughts too. They said they were. "You must remember," the first man began again, "that we were defeated by foreigners. Time was against us then. It works for us now. The men in Madrid know it too. That is why they try to destroy us—so that when the time comes again to fight, there will be few of us left. It is their kind of war. They must be many against few. They must have arms against men who do not have arms. Yes, Mr. American, any Spaniard who wants to be free can do worse than to wait here, inside, for a chance to die with a gun in his hand like a man. Outside, now, a Spaniard cannot live like a man and he cannot die like a man." He stopped. The guard was at the door. The session was finished.

A few days later I told a group of friends the story of the Frenchman who was in a hurry and the Spaniard who wasn't. We were in the cafe of the Hotel del Norte in Irun. M. A—— of the French Red Cross replied. "It is a question of the chapter," he said. "We have a volume of history to write with our work, our blood, our faith. We Frenchmen and the Spaniards are working on different chapters. They fought for freedom first, they fought against the same enemies, they were defeated first. Only they fought for us too, and now they have the right to wait while we fight for them." A Spaniard spoke. "If you will permit me," he said, "we have the duty, too. Yes, the duty. The first task of a Spaniard who wants freedom for his country—and how can a man be free if his country is not free?—is to survive. And for a Spaniard who wants freedom for his country it is not easy to survive, even in prison. Day by day, week by week, month by month, Spaniards have been taken outside, to die. In Spain it is now the highest social duty to survive. It takes the greatest heroism to wait quietly for the time to act. When that time comes, we cannot expect the graves to open to give us Spaniards. We cannot expect help from outside the prison which is Franco Spain. No. We must survive for a chance to die—and to die well, so that Spain can live again, a Spain where a man can be a man. Freedom? Yes, of course. But it is not enough. There must be dignity and pride and honor, too. There must be love and the passion of faith."

Late that night, M. A—— and I stood looking over the Bidasoa toward France. The air was soft and perfumed. "It is hard to wait," he said. "But neither for France nor for Spain is the present chapter the last. There remains much to be done. But we shall do it, with love and the passion of faith."

BOOKS and the ARTS

Back Number Talk

THE GERMAN TALKS BACK. By Heinrich Hauser. Henry Holt and Company. $2.50.

WITH the rhetoric of sales talk the publishers headline the advertisements of this volume with the question: "How dangerous is a book?" They would have done better to ask themselves, and seriously: "How dangerous is a book title?" The one they recklessly chose for Herr Hauser's attempt to "épater l'Américain" is, to say the least, grossly misleading. Heinrich Hauser is a German. He is not "the German" any more than, say, a Lavalist is "the Frenchman" or Senator Bilbo is "the American." Germans will talk back some day, those Germans who were betrayed in their fight against the Nazis by the big powers which found Hitler useful against one another. Those Germans will talk back, as will the Austrians, the Spaniards, the Czechs, the Greeks, and all the others who were sacrificed before Hitler forced his open or secret allies to become "liberators." The prematurely aged, bombed-out children of Coventry and Berlin will enter upon a great dialogue. But Herr Hauser's harangue, intermittently hysterical and sentimental, or flippant and monocled, is not the opening voice of this future chorus. His publishers, however, have persuaded themselves—as they explain in an uneasy notice to the reader—that this exposition of Hauser's state of mind can "honestly be issued as a representation of a dominant state of mind in contemporary Germany"—as if, to begin with, there were any certainty that such a thing exists at all or can at this juncture be recognized. To issue the rantings of Gerald L. K. Smith as representative of contemporary America would be an equally justifiable publishing scoop.

The publishers' claim will be admitted only by those readers who out of one emotion or another are disposed to believe every absurdity so long as it is anti-German. And these may not even notice that it must be quite impossible for the German people, especially after their experiences of the past few years, to have the thoughts and feelings of a man, adventurous by disposition, who has spent twenty of his forty-three years outside Germany, the last six of them in the United States. The objective reader will take this "document" of mental and moral atrocity for what it is, the self-exposure of a dated German variety of a type which can be found in any nation—the haughty, ambitious individual who thinks of himself as "élite" and of the common people as canaille. It is no accident that Herr Hauser learned his first political lessons as a member of the soldateska which murdered Rosa Luxemburg, Karl Liebknecht, and countless unknown fighters who, whatever their illusions were, knew as early as the end of World War I that it was time to get rid of the militaristic rulers of Germany.

Professor Hans J. Morgenthau of the University of Chicago repudiates, in a preface, the more obvious fallacies of Herr Hauser's concepts and in footnotes points out his ignorance and his habitual disregard of facts. Yet the learned historian is not free of the usual misjudgments which result if one treats a nation in a state of civil war, whether latent or active, as a homogeneous entity. He accepts Hauser's thesis that the humanistic tradition of Germany's classical period had long been dead, or had become a charming pastime, because it served the power-wielding class as little more. Yes, Hindenburg prided himself on never having read a book, and after World War I the discharged professional officers and the sons of the impoverished middle class did without books. But from among the people the cry rose, "Nie wieder Krieg!" and the German General Staff needed Hitler's terror, and in addition a world economic crisis, to suffocate it. Like Herr Hauser in his superficial glance at American life, so the American historian in his view of Germany ignores the fact that when new means of production (and war) are introduced in any country, "classical traditions" are for the time pushed into the background—this does not mean that they are dead. And where is the happy nation which is able simultaneously to absorb modern technology and to stress the values achieved during more reflective periods?

Professor Morgenthau is to be thanked for contradicting, partly at least, the publishers' contention as to Herr Hauser's significance. He says that while this German does not speak for the German people as a whole, "he certainly speaks for the politically active intellectual élite." But this is still an overestimation. The Tatkreis to which Herr Hauser belonged was a group of nationalist speculators who took care to climb on the Nazi band-wagon when the time came. The German people's true intellectual spokesmen, like Carl von Ossietzky, to name only one, were thrown into concentration camps and murdered by Himmler's predecessor in command of the terror, Marshal Göring, to whom Hauser dedicated one of his books at the time—a fact he forgets to mention now.

Hauser's avowed purpose in talking at all is to interpret Germany to America, and he promises in the future to interpret America to Germany. The kind of service which he renders and will render in this capacity can be judged from his axioms: Democracy is under no circumstances whatsoever suitable for the Germans; Prussianism equals socialism; American democracy is irresponsible mass-rule and slavery, typified by the Taylor system. With Hollywood, the commercially misused radio, high-pressure salesmanship, and similar manifestations he is, of course, justly irritated, as is everyone else. But he confronts Babbitt not with the German Koofmich but with an abstraction—the spartan Prussian who serves his people unselfishly and knows no other impulse than the Categorical Imperative. It is one thing to criticize manifestations, another to diagnose their causes. Herr Hauser fails here, as his already obsolete political prophecies show. The realities of the dawning atomic age will prove stronger than the historical neurosis of nationalists.

The interpreter Hauser never sees the world as a whole, nor how much of it exists outside of America, Germany, and Russia. He does not see the creatures called human slowly emerging from a wilderness of scarcity and disease, still obsessed by once reasonable but now obsolete fears; nor is he able to draw useful conclusions from their not so very different phases of development. He does not understand the meaning of the concept that "all men are created equal," and he does not perceive that the privileged among men who look down at the "masses" and mock them, instead of feeling responsible for their plight, are separators, not interpreters. FRANZ HOELLERING

Ends and Means of Education

IS social planning compatible with democracy? This is probably the greatest single question of our day. The liberal would answer, "Yes, if the means can be devised by which people may learn how to solve their problems cooperatively on every level, from that of the local community to that of an international order." The basis for this positive freedom, the essence of which is rational agreement for the attainment of common ends, could be provided by a system of education which would produce a socialized intelligence capable of applying the methods of science to the problems of society. As John Dewey has said, "Democracy must be born anew every generation, and education is the midwife." The dominant issue in education today is whether it should be designed to promote such enlightened participation of everyone or be based on the assumption that the organization and control of society are the prerogative of a hereditary or self-constituted élite.

The contributors to "The Authoritarian Attempt to Capture Education," a collection of the papers delivered at the second annual Conference on the Scientific Spirit and Democratic Faith (King's Crown Press, $2.50), are clearly aware of the issue. Each of them attempts to define it in relation to his particular topic. The several papers are uneven in merit. One or two of them are brilliant. John Dewey's brief preliminary essay, The Democratic Faith in Education, gives a wholly adequate definition of the problem before the conference. Arthur E. Murphy's criticism of Tradition and Traditionalists (that is, St. John's College and the Education for Freedom programs over the Mutual Broadcasting System) is the most trenchant analysis of that particular brand of authoritarianism that I have yet encountered. But as I continued reading these essays—which deal with the newspaper and the radio, the role of science in our increasingly complex society, the contribution of progressive education, the ends of liberal and vocational education, the place of religion in a democracy—an increasing sense of disappointment grew upon me. The book as a whole seemed to provide definitions without diagnosis. Its authors were meeting the challenge of the authoritarians on their own ground. It was essentially an exchange of arguments. The main battle had not yet been joined; and after such a skirmish each side might retire in good order.

Discussions of this sort do not, I think, go to the root of the authoritarian threat. In combating the theories of articulate and highly sophisticated proponents of authoritarianism, these writers seem to turn their backs upon the vastly more potent but inarticulate and surreptitious forces of which those theories are a comparatively insignificant expression. There are no analyses in this book of the way in which our public schools have been covertly used to reinforce class standards in the community, as Warner, Havighurst, and Loeb have shown in "Who Shall Be Educated?"; or of the disturbing evidences of increasing racial tensions and class hatreds, disclosed by Marie Syrkin in "Your School, Your Children"; or of the way in which business associations, fraternal orders, and church groups have brought pressure upon the schools to insure that the right things are taught in the right manner; or of the way in which the cults of guidance, mental tests, objective examinations, and "scientifically" constructed curricula are tending to set up a system of machine-like education for the masses, a factory-like process to produce more factory workers.

It is said in the preface to this volume that "certain organized movements in education constitute a threat to the scientific spirit and democratic faith." Such a threat can be met only by counter-organization. Intellectual leaders in a democratic society must construct working hypotheses that work. Therefore, they must do more than hold conferences. Philosophers must join with social scientists in cooperative research to discover the concrete means of implementing democratic aims. GAIL KENNEDY

The Rocking Chair

It seconds the crickets of the province. Heard in the clean lamplit farmhouses of Quebec, wooden, it is no less a national bird,
and rivals, in its cage, the mere stuttering clock.
To its time, the evenings are rolled away;
and in its peace the pensive mother knits contentment to be worn by her family grown-up, but still cradled by the chair in which she sits.

It is also the old man's pet, pair to his pipe,
the two aids of his arithmetic and plans,
plans rocking and puffing into market-shape;
and it is the toddler's game and dangerous dance.
Moved to the verandah, on summer Sundays, it is—among the hanging plants, the girls, the boy-friends—sabbatical and clumsy, like the white haloes dangling above the blue serge suits of the young men.

It has a personality of its own, is a character (like that old drunk Lacoste, exhaling amber, and toppling on his pins) it is alive, individual, and no less an identity than those about it. And it is tradition. Centuries have been flicked from its arcs, alternately flicked and pinned.
It rolls with the gait of St. Malo. It is act and symbol, symbol of this static folk which moves in segments, and returns to base—a sunken pendulum: invoke, revoke, loosed yon, leashed hither, motion on no space.

Oh, like some Anjou ballad, all refrain, which turns about its longing, and seems to move to make a pleasure out of repeated pain, its music moves, as if always back to a first love.

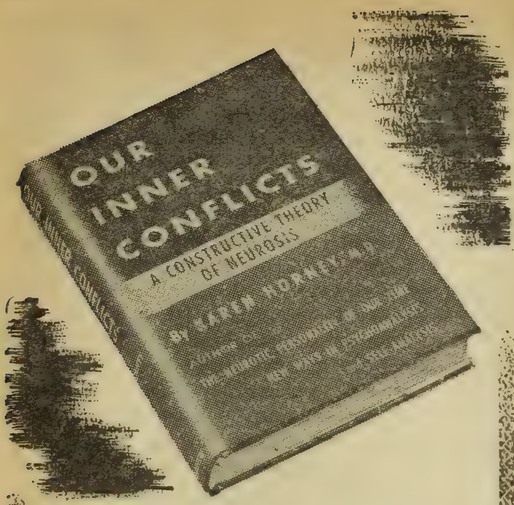
A. M. KLEIN



A Constructive Theory of Neurosis

OUR INNER CONFLICTS

by
KAREN HORNEY, M.D.

Author of The Neurotic Personality in our Time, New Ways in Psychoanalysis and Self-Analysis

Karen Horney's books, notable for original thinking and clear expression, are very widely read and discussed. In Our Inner Conflicts she breaks new ground. Here is a book which should benefit all of us who want to know ourselves. It goes beyond the range of merely technical matters or abstract theory. Most of us who live in these difficult times are caught in some of the conflicts here described and need all the help we can get. Though the author makes it clear that severe neuroses belong in the hands of experts, she expresses her conviction that with persistent efforts we can ourselves go a long way toward disentangling our own conflicts. Thus conflicts can be resolved, she says, by changing the conditions within the personality that brought them into being. $3.00

At all bookstores

W·W·NORTON & COMPANY
70 Fifth Avenue, New York 11

BRIEFER COMMENT

Introduction to Brazil

GILBERTO FREYRE'S "Brazil: an Interpretation" (Knopf, $2) can be firmly recommended as a mature discussion, from the viewpoint of a somewhat eclectic sociology, of the main cultural forces in Brazilian life. The book opens with a suggestive chapter on the European background of Brazilian history, in which Senhor Freyre attempts a description of the social and psychological characteristics of the original Portuguese colonizers. It is extremely good, though one may think that in attributing the readiness of the Portuguese to consort with Indian women to tradition derived from contact with Moslem conquerors in Iberia he speaks somewhat slightingly of plain concupiscence. There can be few reservations about the chapter called Frontier and Plantation and none at all about Senhor Freyre's discussion of ethnic conditions. This generous, sober-minded, and completely unembarrassed chapter of itself would make the book important to liberals seriously concerned with racial problems in this country. Brazil, says the author, "is a community inclined toward ethnic democracy." Upon the evidence he might have claimed more. At least, if a North American liberal could wake up tomorrow morning to find that the public mind had overnight journeyed one-quarter of the way toward the Brazilian position he would be hugely relieved. If I was less impressed by the section on Regionalism, it is because a foreign reader, particularly one whose earlier background was European, needs greater proof than the author gives of the vitality and wilful energy of Brazilian regionalism. The least valuable chapter, it seems to me, is that which deals with foreign policy. There is a necessarily brief account of the relation of Brazil's modern literature to its social problems.

The faults of the book are obvious enough. One cannot "interpret" a country with so few concepts as Senhor Freyre employs. The sociological method of the book has led to certain lacks. Again, that method is usually accompanied by a vagueness which derives from the habit of taking as dynamic forces what are merely colorations of mind. And this defect is occasionally present. But the merits of the book are many. Within its areas it is rich in fact and suggestive thought; it is generous in temper and as a rule quite candid. There is no padding, and its style is rather better than readable. Senhor Freyre, who has a long-sustained interest in this country and much experience of it, does not see his own country through North American spectacles; yet his North American experiences have enabled him to grasp the nature of his audience. The result is a most serviceable introduction to the study of Brazil. RALPH BATES

Genetics and Physics

"WHAT IS LIFE?" by Erwin Schrödinger (Macmillan, $1.75) offers further proof, if it is needed, that the step from physics to metaphysics is a non sequitur. The book in substance is a brief, extremely condensed account of the present state of genetic studies, sufficiently clear and compre-

PAUL SCOTT MOWRER

THE HOUSE OF EUROPE

Behind the irrefutable aims of the peacemakers are the necessary compromises, the ambiguities, the elaborate system of checks and balances that make the peace work or ultimately wreck it. Paul Mowrer watched the weaving of the peace after World War I, saw it grow and saw it warp and disintegrate. As foreign correspondent of the Chicago Daily News for 30 years in Europe he has had an unparalleled view of power politics in France, in the Balkans and in Africa. Few analysts have had such an opportunity to observe at first hand why that peace failed. Few books could be more timely in a year when we must try again to make the peace stick.

At all bookstores, $3.75 HOUGHTON MIFFLIN COMPANY

hensive to commend itself to anyone interested in such matters; but in addition Professor Schrödinger, by profession a physicist—a very distinguished one, by the way—proposes to show that biological principles are formally no different from physical ones. In fact, he is persuaded that biological processes exhibit more fixity, order, and regularity than any others.

Dr. Schrödinger bases this paradoxical view on the statistical nature of modern physics, its inability to predict or control the behavior of anything but large numbers of minute entities. What distinguishes live matter from dead, he feels, is that it consists of an immense multiplicity of disparate individuals, each of them embodying a unique order, continually struggling to replenish that order from the surrounding world. Various speculative notions, such as quantum mechanics and the entropy principle, are invoked to expound this distinction; but it chiefly hinges for Professor Schrödinger on the fact that although the determinants of heredity are in all likelihood molecular, or sub-molecular, they nevertheless display a highly calculable design—except, of course, for those spontaneous mutations that have persistently puzzled geneticists but, as Professor Schrödinger shows, are intelligible enough from the point of view of quantum physics.

Professor Schrödinger's strength as an expositor lies in the relative innocence with which he approaches much of the material he deals with; he warns us that he is a "mere physicist" with no first-hand acquaintance with what he is talking about, that his knowledge of genetics is only book learning. The result is that there is the requisite amount of wonder and incredulity in his discussion to convey the sense of discovery that properly belongs to any subject in its historical aspect. On the other hand, his thesis about organisms possessing "regularity and orderliness unrivaled by anything we meet with in inanimate nature" seems to be largely verbal; it mistakes a formal or methodological condition for a factual or metaphysical one. Admittedly, method in any field is conditioned by subject matter; but in the case of quantum physics the most modest and reasonable assumption—perhaps even the most fruitful one—about the present necessity of formulating laws statistically rather than mechanically is that it stems from the fineness, remoteness, and elusiveness of quantum phenomena.

There is an epilogue, On Determinism and Free Will, propounding a form of Buddhism that suggests, even if the rest of the volume doesn't, that the shoemaker should stick to his last. But on the whole this book is certainly interesting and worth while. MARTIN LEBOWITZ

The PREDICAMENT of MODERN MAN

Is ours a "cut-flower" civilization?

read

D. ELTON TRUEBLOOD'S

answers in

THE PREDICAMENT OF MODERN MAN

The Western powers "have an ethic without a religion, whereas they are challenged by millions who have a religion without an ethic."

"If we had even the beginning of wisdom we should encourage our brightest men and women to devote themselves to the task of spiritual reconstruction."

"A very able and profound analysis of the situation of our time." —REINHOLD NIEBUHR

At all bookstores $1.00

HARPER

Congress Versus Executive

"CAN REPRESENTATIVE GOVERNMENT DO THE JOB?" by Thomas K. Finletter (Reynal and Hitchcock, $2) packs a maximum of argument into a minimum of space. In 179 short pages Mr. Finletter first shows convincingly that the "ends to which we have committed ourselves and our means of governing are out of balance" and then advances a scheme for bringing them into harmony. At the core of the breakdown, he argues, is the running conflict between the executive and the legislative branches. "You cannot have a government capable of handling the most difficult problems that peace-time democracy has ever faced, with the two main parts of it at each other's throats." So far, so good. But Mr. Finletter's solution would seem to raise as many problems as it solves. In the direction of substituting a much-needed improvement in liaison between Congress and the Executive he goes much farther than the Kefauver proposal for having Cabinet members appear on the floor of Congress, and even beyond a joint executive-legislative Cabinet. He would amend the Constitution so as to give the President the right to dissolve Congress and call a national election in the event of a deadlock between the two branches. Moreover, he would establish a single six-year term for members of both houses, to run concurrently with the Presidential term. The objective is a homogeneous government, but if the joint Cabinet is to be solidly of the President's party, as Mr. Finletter urges, and Congress is expected to follow its lead, wouldn't the national legislature have the black-and-white alternative of following the executive unswervingly or forcing a new election? Mr. Finletter's plan would assign a much greater degree of power to political parties than they now possess. Perhaps such a development would increase their sense of responsibility, but is it desirable, or even possible, in a country where political parties are merely machines, without ideological distinction? Mr. Finletter's study gets at the heart of an American governmental weakness which is of extreme gravity. However the reader may feel about its specific recommendations, the book deserves a wide circulation and a good deal of thought. R. D.

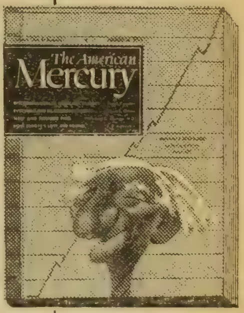
JEWS, CATHOLICS, NEGROES, AND THE MEDICAL COLLEGES

We were advised and cautioned not to print this article. It would rub too many people the wrong way. The survey on which it was based has already stirred up a hornet's nest. But we can't neglect or ignore the subject. When schools like Harvard, Cornell, Yale, Johns Hopkins, Columbia deny to youths the right to become doctors —not on grounds of scholarship, character, personality and other criteria of fitness— but solely on grounds of race and creed, the public ought to know the facts. The matter is long past due for an airing, not only on the score of fair play to minorities, but also for the future welfare of the medical profession. Read "Discrimination in Medical Colleges" by Frank Kingdon, in the October AMERICAN MERCURY.

SLEEP AND SLEEPING PILLS

The nerve strain of war and its aftermath have destroyed sleep. Four million sleeping pills are consumed each day. We read of suicides and accidental deaths ascribed to overdoses. Legislation against the pills is being debated. What is the truth? What makes us sleep? What keeps us awake? Can sleeplessness be overcome without pills? Just how dangerous are the pills? Dr. Theodore G. Klumpp presents all aspects of the problem, and corrects much popular misinformation, in "Sleep and Sleeping Pills."

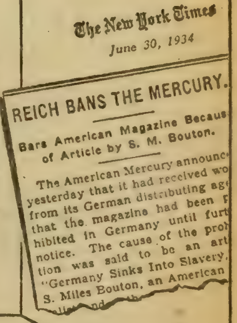
THE AMERICAN MERCURY—for October—NOW ON SALE



What are the Germans like today after five months of defeat? What are they thinking, doing, planning? An O.W.I. official just returned tells you in Everyday Life in Germany Today... Your radio may soon "print" your morning newspaper in your own home while you sleep. Read about a sure-to-come development that can revolutionize newspaper publishing, in The Facsimile Newspaper... Everybody has heard about the "Beveridge Plan," but few Americans know the fascinating story of its author. William Bayles, noted correspondent, has sketched a dynamic, on-the-scene profile of Britain's Beveridge... How would you like to be a Russian official in Washington, beset by spies and informers, with every aspect of your private life strictly supervised? Read The Life of a Soviet Official Abroad, by Victor Kravchenko... How can Hitler's concentration camp victims find their American relatives? How can Americans trace their desolate families uprooted in the old country? Read How Europe's Lost Are Found... Many other articles in the October issue offer rare reading pleasure, including the regular MERCURY features—The Library, the Check List, the Open Forum, several poems, and a distinguished short story.

A Prophecy Hitler Didn't Like

Recently a friendly reader sent us a clipping from the New York Times from way back in 1934. The headline said: "Reich Bans THE MERCURY." It was news to be banned in those days. Later, of course, it became almost disrespectable not to be banned. Our offense was in an article entitled Germany Sinks Into Slavery, by S. Miles Bouton, which contained this prophecy: "The Nazi leaders declare that their Third Reich will endure 'forever.' If history has any meaning and if all human experience is not a lie, they are mistaken by a good many millennia. The end will come sooner than a horrified civilization... as yet dares to hope. The only thing uncertain is whether the end will come through revolution or through war. If it be war, that will also be the end of Germany." Think back. That was a daring phophecy in 1934.



The New York Times

June 30, 1934

REICH BANS THE MERCURY.

Bars American Magazine Becaus of Article by S. M. Bouton.

The American Mercury announc yesterday that it had received wo from its German distributing ag that the magazine had been p hibited in Germany until furt notice. The cause of the pro tion was said to be an art
"Germany Sinks Into Slavery,
S. Miles Bouton, an American

Lawrence E. Spivak PUBLISHER

Listen to "MEET THE PRESS"—The American Mercury radio program over the Mutual network, Friday, Oct. 5, at 10:30 P.M., E.S.T. Eric Johnston holds a press conference on the relations between capital and labor.

FALL BOOKS

NEXT WEEK'S 40 page Fall Book Number will bring Nation readers rich and varied commentary on literature and the arts, at home and abroad.

CYRIL CONNOLLY, writing from London, will discuss the effect on life and letters in Britain of the Labor victory, war's end, and other vast events. Mr. Connolly, editor of Horizon and author of "The Unquiet Grave," wrote the lively account of Paris Regained which appeared in The Nation last spring.

MARGARET MARSHALL will resume her Notes by the Way.

RANDALL JARRELL, one of the most distinguished of contemporary poets, will contribute a long war poem, "Burning the Letters."

KAY BOYLE in "The Jew Is a Myth," gives a dramatic picture of an episode of the Occupation in France, based on the volume, " 'Step-children' of France," by Dr. Charles Odic, recently published.

FICTION IN REVIEW. Diana Trilling will discuss Sinclair Lewis's new novel, "Cass Timberlane." F. W. Dupee will write about significant new poetry in the VERSE CHRONICLE.

IMPORTANT CURRENT BOOKS will be reviewed by George Genzmer, Keith Hutchison, Merle Curti, Rolfe Humphries, Reinhold Niebuhr, Ralph Bates, Clement Greenberg, Delmore Schwartz, and others.

THE ARTS. Joseph Wood Krutch, B. H. Haggin, and James Agee will contribute their regular columns on the Drama, Films, and Music.

NEXT WEEK
in
THE Nation

FICTION IN REVIEW

EVERY so often this department comes across a novel which, though it is not worth reading and certainly not worth recommending, is sufficiently meaningful from a social or psychological point of view to be worth writing about. The latest instance of this discrepancy between literary value and sociological interest is "Woman Without Love" by André Maurois (Harper, $2.50). Having lost track of Mr. Maurois's work back in the Ariel-Byron days, I began "Woman Without Love" with, as I see now, a quite inadequate notion of what I should find. Mr. Maurois's new novel is at once less substantial than one might expect from a writer of Mr. Maurois's scholarly commitments and less frothy than I anticipated from a novelist advertised for his "uncanny insight into the mind and heart of a woman." The history of a woman who is unsuccessful in her two marriages because she is sexually frigid, "Woman Without Love" bolsters its unhappy love story with one of those knowing, and thoroughly unrevealing, accounts of contemporary politics which are becoming regulation in French fiction. And its unhappy love story is itself informed with that curious tone of sexual pedantry which one encounters in so many French novels, whether grave or gay, and which is such a contradiction to their supposed sophistication in sexual matters. That is, "Woman Without Love" is one of those books that, in a peculiarly French fashion, simultaneously take everything and nothing for granted.

Of course, the announcement that a male author is notable as an analyst of the female mind is always provocative to the female reader. But myself, I fortify the cliché of resistance to this masculine presumption with the opinion that there is no such thing, for either sex, as being a novelistic specialist in either sex. None of Mr. Maurois's characters, either men or women, have any vital dimension. The virginal heroine of "Woman Without Love," the self-made industrialist, the "myth-eaten" poet, the prudish English governess, the mistress of the industrialist—these are all familiar fictional figures. The fact that Mr. Maurois stays so largely in the mind and heart of a woman, while it may prove a special interest in this woman's problem, proves no special knowledge of women.

What caught my attention in Mr. Maurois's novel is what one might call its unconscious social atmosphere, the insight that—all unaware, I think—Mr. Maurois gives us into the attitude of his section of French society toward the relation of the sexes. Omitting the governess character, who is not only English but portrayed as a bit on the pathological side, "Woman Without Love" opposes to Claire, its frigid heroine, a whole gallery of Frenchwomen whose sexuality the author seems to regard as standard and desirable. There is the free-lance lady who is able to capture both of Claire's husbands; there are Claire's happily married cousin and her twice happily married best friend; there is Claire's mother: all these women, having the unpleasant habit of getting together to discuss the failures of poor Claire, give clear expression to Mr. Maurois's ideas of a proper female attitude toward love and sex. And so far as I can make out, this proper attitude is for a woman to be so engrossed in her husband's career and so ambitious for her family fortunes that she overcomes her own innate non-sexuality in favor of her husband's grosser needs; her marital devotion will then very likely be rewarded with a certain pleasure, for herself too, in the physical intimacies of marriage. Or, in the case of a mistress, a resolute determination to please her lover—that is, to listen to him when he wishes to talk about himself, but never to talk about herself—will similarly be rewarded with satisfactions both physical and financial. Admittedly, this process of a woman's accepting her sexual role requires some schooling and will-power; it is Claire's tragedy that until almost the close of her life she is far too egotistical, too idealistic and romantic, too bluestocking to be able to force this discipline on her body. She herself recognizes her incompetence and suffers miserably from her sexual coldness. She even takes her distress to her gynecologist and to a psychoanalyst. But evidently French medicine shares Mr. Maurois's impatience with a woman who lacks the sense to respond to a good husband. Claire's first husband was one of the richest men in France, her second a famous literary man: what better cure for sexual frigidity could a woman ask?

In other words, Mr. Maurois, setting out to give us a candid study of a sexual disability, gives us instead, and approvingly, the picture of a society in which female sexuality is still thought of as essentially an adjunct of financial security and social advancement. I have no way of knowing, of course, whether or not this is a true representation of the feeling of the educated French middle classes, but I see no reason to doubt that it is. And if it is, perhaps the moment has come to discard the assumption bred of long years of Anglo-Saxon sexual inferiority—"they order these matters better in France." For instance, a new British novel which is also on the sexual theme, "Leave Cancelled" by Nicholas Monsarrat (Knopf, $2), is like a breath of healthy air after "Woman Without Love," and this despite the precious tone of Mr. Monsarrat's little idyl of an English war marriage and despite the very precious packaging in which its publishers offer it. Whatever the inadequacies and over-conscientiousness of Mr. Monsarrat's example of contemporary British sexual sophistication, it surely comes closer to a desirable mark than Mr. Maurois's French "wisdom."

If Mr. Monsarrat's book can be thought of as a product of the newer generation of English literacy, Clemence Dane's "He Brings Great News" (Random House, $2.50) is a product of the there-will-always-be-an-England generation that is still primarily concerned with the thrills of national pride. Miss Dane's novel is about the death of Nelson and the bringing of the news of the Trafalgar victory to England. It is very brightly told, full of interesting antiquarian detail, and can be recommended to anyone with a taste for historical fiction.

"Three O'Clock Dinner" by Josephine Pinckney (Viking, $2.50), being off to a glamorous commercial start—Literary Guild, fabulous movie sale, etc.—is one of the new novels you will no doubt be hearing about. I am afraid that I found Miss Pinckney's narrative of semi-traditional everyday life in Charleston homely without being warming, tedious without compensations of virtue.

DIANA TRILLING

A Message to Nation Readers from
The East and West Association

We know that you believe in all the things we believe in, that we're worked up over the same issues—WHAT'S HAPPENING TO THE PEOPLES' RIGHTS ALL OVER THE WORLD, in Japan, in Spain, in India, Africa?

But today we've all got to do a lot more than just believe. We've got to make our voice heard. Others must be made to believe, too! That's why you should attend the

3d SESSION, PEOPLES CONGRESS
10 Weekly Meetings

THEME: Search for a Common Ground: Forging a World Bill of Human Rights

PLACE: TOWN HALL, 123 W. 43d St., N. Y.

TIME: Wednesdays, 5:30-7:15 P.M. beginning October 10

SPEAKERS: (Plus an international panel at each meeting)

Oct. 10—PEARL S. BUCK
The Freedom to Be Yourself

Oct. 17—J. RAYMOND WALSH
ARTHUR MOTLEY
The Right to Work

Oct. 24—KENNETH CRAWFORD
CLAUDE A. JAGGER
The Right to Speak One's Mind

Oct. 31—BISHOP G. BROMLEY OXNAM
The Right to Worship

Nov. 7—W. E. B. DuBOIS
The Right to Self-Government

Nov. 14—ASSEMBLYMAN IRVING M. IVES
MADAME FRANCES PERKINS
The Right to Social Security

Nov. 21—HOMER P. RAINEY
The Right to Know

Nov. 28—JUSTICE WM. A. DOUGLAS
The Right to Justice

Dec. 5—MARGARET MEAD
The Right to a Stake in the Commonweal

Dec. 12—G. A. BORGESE
Human Rights for All—The Right to Diversity

Bring your hard-to-convince friends. Ask questions of the speakers from the floor. Hear what men and women of other nations say about these rights.

Encourage the work of such people as Justice Douglas, Pearl Buck, Assemblyman Ives, W. E. B. DuBois.

Our slogan—Go Tell the People! Make it yours, too.

SEND IN YOUR REGISTRATION TODAY

EAST AND WEST ASSOCIATION
40 East 49th Street, New York 17, N. Y.

I enclose $........ for .... series tickets (at $5.00 each) for Peoples Congress.

MRS.
MISS..
MR.
HOME ADDRESS.......................... .... ZONE..............
NT

MOTION PICTURES

"A great film . . . I cannot suggest my regard for it without using such words as veneration and love."
—Agee, Nation

LESTER COWAN presents

ERNIE PYLE'S "STORY OF

G.I. JOE"

Starring BURGESS MEREDITH as Ernie Pyle

Now playing at 2 Theatres

Brandt's GLOBE
BROADWAY AT 46th STREET
Popular Prices

Brandt's GOTHAM
BROADWAY AT 47th STREET
All Seats Reserved

NOEL COWARD who brought you the immortal "IN WHICH WE SERVE" now brings his naughtiest comedy to the screen

NOEL COWARD'S

"BLITHE SPIRIT"

in Blushing Technicolor

now at the

WINTER GARDEN
BROADWAY AT 50th STREET

IT'S THE YEAR'S GREATEST MOTION PICTURE EVENT AT BROADWAY'S
NEW MOTION PICTURE THEATRE

NOW RKO

ALHAMBRA
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
COLISEUM
81st STREET
86th STREET
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
58th STREET
[illegible]
HAMILTON
MARBLE HILL
125th STREET
PELHAM
REGENT
RIVERSIDE
ROYAL
23rd STREET
WESTCHESTER
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCHELLE
WHITE PLAINS
YONKERS

"An American army officer's struggle to win a fascist-haunted Italian town to a love of democracy." —PM.

JOHN HERSHEY'S
PULITZER PRIZE NOVEL

'A BELL for ADANO'

STARRING
GENE TIERNEY • JOHN HODIAK • WILLIAM BENDIX

—PLUS—

'SWINGING ON A RAINBOW'
Brad TAYLOR • June FRAZEE

"The most exciting picture ever! . . . Louis Sobol

20th Century-Fox presents

THE HOUSE ON 92ND STREET

Plus a star-studded stage show
Monte Proser's COPACABANA REVUE
ROSARIO and ANTONIO

Now Playing ROXY 7th Ave. at 50th St.

BALLET

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE

Oct. 7 to Nov. 6 incl.

Eves. Incl Sun., 1.20 to 4.80
Mats. Oct. 13, 14, 20, 21, 27, 28, Nov. 3, 4, 1.20 to 3.60
Premiere 1.20 to 6.00 tax incl.

TICKETS NOW AT BOX OFFICE

Mail Orders Filled
5 New Productions

S. HUROK
presents

Ballet Theatre

THE GREATEST IN

RUSSIAN BALLET

Alicia Markova • Anton Dolin
Kaye . Eglevsky . Laing
Alonso . Kriza . Chase . Reed

OPERA

N.Y. CITY CENTER OPERA COMPANY

FALL SEASON TO OCT. 28 Laszlo Halasz Artistic and Musical Dir.

THE BARTERED BRIDE • LA TRAVIATA • LA BOHEME • GYPSY BARON • MANON LESCAUT • CAVALLERIA & PAGLIACCI • FAUST

SEATS NOW— Matinees and Evenings: Entire Orchestra, $2.40; 1st Balcony, $2.40, $1.80; 2nd Balcony, $1.20, 90¢; Tax included.

N. Y. CITY CENTER, 131 WEST FIFTY-FIFTH STREET
MAYOR LA GUARDIA, President

CONCERTS

Starting October 8, 12 Monday Eve. Symphonies at 8:30

NEW YORK CITY SYMPHONY LEONARD BERNSTEIN

TICKETS at Box Office . . . 90c — $1.80. Limited Number of Subscriptions open. Entire series, $9.00 to $24.00, tax included.

NEW YORK CITY CENTER 131 WEST 55th STREET
F. H. LaGUARDIA, President

MOTION PICTURE

Paramount Presents

ED GARDNER'S

"DUFFY'S TAVERN"

FEATURING
32 HOLLYWOOD STARS

IN PERSON
THE ANDREWS SISTERS
Featuring
Tim Herbert
Vic Shoen
And His Recording Orchestra
Foy Willing's
Riders of the Purple Sage
Pig-Meat Alamo
Markham

COOL PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

STAGE PLAYS

"A SWEET AND HAPPY HIT."—Garland, Journal-American.
Rodgers and Hammerstein present
MADY CHRISTIANS • OSCAR HOMOLKA
in JOHN VAN DRUTEN'S

I REMEMBER MAMA

from Kathryn Forbes' "Mama's Bank Account" with FRANCES HEFLIN

MUSIC BOX 45th Street, West of Broadway. Phone Circle 6-4636
Eves., 8:35 Sharp. Mats. Thurs. and Sat., 2:35 Sharp

MICHAEL TODD Presents

UP IN CENTRAL PARK

Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS
Lyrics by DOROTHY FIELDS
Music by SIGMUND ROMBERG

BROADWAY THEA. at 53rd Street. Eves. 8:30. Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:30

Drama

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

TENNESSEE WILLIAMS awoke one morning last spring to find himself famous. Very shortly thereafter the Critics' Circle voted his play the best of the year, and a little later it won also the Sidney Howard Memorial Prize. Not since Odets produced "Waiting for Lefty" had there been quite this sort of hullabaloo about a new playwright as distinguished from merely a new play, and the author no doubt thought pretty highly of critics. Last week, however, some of the same reviewers who had hailed him as the theater's new hope turned on his second Broadway play to rend it limb from limb. "This," they said, in various accents and with varying degrees of exasperation, "will never do."

In actual fact the difference between the two plays when measured in terms of the absolute value of each is by no means so great as the reviews would indicate. Or, rather, the lack of difference is about what anyone wise in the ways of critics might expect. At his second appearance any intemperately praised new writer is very likely to suffer from the results of the hangover which intemperance produces, and critics who have gone out on a limb are all too likely to vent their irritation on the man who enticed them there. "The least you could have done," so they seem to say, "was to write something which would have made my former enthusiasm seem prophetic. All you have done is to leave me feeling a little bit foolish."

"The Glass Menagerie" deserved attention and praise. The author was obviously no merely routine playwright. His play revealed flashes of power and exhibited moments of insight unusual enough to justify hopes. It was also often forced, often overwritten, often fumbling. In a word, it was the work of a man who might some day do great things but was obviously immature, both emotionally and as a craftsman. Precisely the same things might be said with equal truth of "You Touched Me!" his new play now current at the Booth Theater. Mr. Williams might possibly have grown to full stature in the course of five summer months. Miracles like that do happen. But they can hardly be taken for granted, and he is here at about the same point on the road to maturity he had reached last spring. On the basis of internal evidence it would be impossible to say which play was written first, and for all I know, "You Touched Me!" may have been composed before "The Glass Menagerie." If they had been produced in reverse order, then, I strongly suspect, the one now damned would have been hailed and the other dismissed as a bitter disappointment.

"You Touched Me!" is by Mr. Williams in collaboration with one Donald Windham, hitherto unknown to Broadway. On the program it is described as a romantic comedy (which it isn't) "suggested by a short story of the same name by D. H. Lawrence," and the plot is, basically, the familiar one which tells how a manly young man rescues a timid young girl just about to be suppressed into neurotic spinsterhood by a prurient and parson-ridden maiden aunt. In this case the young man is egged on by the Rabelaisian reminiscences of the girl's father, an ex-mariner driven to drink by the same maiden lady. This bibulous father supplies most of the comedy, and the thing which distinguishes the play from the usual treatments of similar stories is the fact that it is told, not from the standpoint of romantic comedy, but as an intense, half-symbolical drama in which boy-getting-girl seems intended to represent the triumph of good over evil. The best individual scenes—and some of them are genuinely moving—are those in which the hero and heroine try to understand the ardor of the one and the fears of the other. The worst are those in which the attempt is made to give this personal drama some significance both political and cosmic.

I have either overlooked or forgotten the Lawrence story, and so I am unable to say how many of the confusions are present in the tale as originally told, how many result from the addition to it of the ideas struggling for expression in the mind of Mr. Williams or of Mr. Windham. I suppose, however, that the hero's concern with the post-war world and his revulsion against the destruction for which he, as a flier, has been responsible, must be new matter. Undoubtedly, on the other hand, the now rather old-fashioned earnestness about sex stems from Lawrence, and the two do not always succeed in achieving a very satisfactory integration. There may be some connection between phallic worship and a new league of nations, but it is not to me immediately a very clear one. Almost at his first appearance we see the hero playing a penny flute, and no reader of Lawrence needs to be told what that

LANGUAGE IS POWER
. . . Forge ahead, win special assignments, promotion, better job in global peace time opportunities through ability to speak a foreign language.
MASTER A NEW LANGUAGE quickly, easily, correctly by LINGUAPHONE
The world-famous Linguaphone Conversational Method brings voices of native teachers INTO YOUR OWN HOME. You learn the new language by LISTENING. It's amazingly simple; thousands have succeeded. ◆ ◆ 29 LANGUAGES
Send for Free book, Call for Free demonstration
LINGUAPHONE INSTITUTE
81 RCA Bldg., New York 20 • Circle 7-0830

LEARN RUSSIAN
FOR IMMEDIATE APPLICATION
Practical 33-Week Course under the recognized authority.
DR. E. MARKOFF
Classes held Thursdays, beginning October 11. Scientifically planned and tested method in grammar and useful conversation for beginners and advanced students. Also special normal course for teachers of Russian.
AMERICAN RUSSIAN CULTURAL ASS'N
200 W. 57 St., N. Y. 19, N. Y. CI 5-5377

BOOKS FOUND FREE!
WHAT BOOKS DO YOU WANT?
We quote lowest market prices. No charge for locating Hard-to-Find and Out-of-Print Books All books, OLD or NEW, mailed POST-FREE
SEARCHLIGHT BOOK NATION
22 East 17th Street, New York City

WIN THE PEACE!
BUY VICTORY BONDS

Alcoholics ARE Sick People
ROBERT V. SELIGER, M.D.
Assistant Visiting Psychiatrist
JOHNS HOPKINS HOSPITAL
(An educational pocket-size monograph sent in a plain envelope.)
Book Dealers' Agent
REMINGTON PUTNAM CO.
Baltimore 1, Md.
ALCOHOLISM PUBLICATIONS
2030 Park Avenue, Baltimore 17, Md.
Please send: ALCOHOLICS ARE SICK PEOPLE.
☐ copies $2.00 cloth bound
Name..
Address...
....

means. Very shortly thereafter he is in the midst of a passionate speech about a new world order, and to me it never does become quite clear whether society is to be saved through better international understanding or whether, as Lawrence sometimes seemed to think, all we need is more and better copulation.

In this production as in the previous one, Mr. Williams enjoys the advantages of fine performances. Edmund Gwenn, the mariner, very nearly steals the show. Catherine Willard is excellent as the menace of virginity. The others are all at least quite satisfactory.

The

New Statesman and Nation

England's Leading Weekly Review

may now be obtained through

THE NATION

20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y.

●

Yearly subscription $6.50 including postage

SPECIMEN* copy on request

STATEMENT OF THE OWNERSHIP, MANAGEMENT, CIRCULATION, ETC., required by the Acts of Congress of August 24, 1912, and March 3, 1933, of The Nation, published weekly at New York, N. Y., for October 1, 1945.

STATE OF NEW YORK } ss.
COUNTY OF NEW YORK }

Before me, a notary public in and for the State and county aforesaid, personally appeared Hugo Van Arx, who, having been duly sworn according to law, deposes and says that he is the business manager of The Nation, and that the following is, to the best of his knowledge and belief, a true statement of the ownership, management, etc., of the aforesaid publication for the date shown in the above caption, required by the Act of August 24, 1912, as amended by the Act of March 3, 1933, embodied in section 537, Postal Laws and Regulations, printed on the reverse of this form, to wit:

1. That the names and addresses of the publisher, editor, managing editor, and business manager are:

Publisher, The Nation Associates, Inc.
20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.
Editor, Freda Kirchwey,
20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.
Managing Editor, J. King Gordon,
20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.
Business Manager, Hugo Van Arx,
20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

2. That the owners are:

The Nation Associates, Inc. (no stockholders),
20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.
Freda Kirchwey, President,
20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

3. That the known bondholders, mortgagees, and other security holders owning or holding 1 per cent or more of total amount of bonds, mortgages, or other securities, are: None.

4. That the two paragraphs next above, giving the names of the owners, stockholders, and security holders, if any, contain not only the list of stockholders and security holders as they appear upon the books of the company but also, in cases where the stockholder or security holder appears upon the books of the company as trustee or in any other fiduciary relation, the name of the person or corporation for whom such trustee is acting, is given; also that the said two paragraphs contain statements embracing affiant's full knowledge and belief as to the circumstances and conditions under which stockholders and security holders who do not appear upon the books of the company as trustees, hold stock and securities in a capacity other than that of a bona fide owner; and this affiant has no reason to believe that any other person, association, or corporation has any interest direct or indirect in the said stock, bonds, or other securities than as so stated by him.

HUGO VAN ARX,
Signature of Business Manager.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 17th day of September, 1945.

[SEAL]
IRENE B. COX,
Commissioner of Deeds,
New York County Register's No. 6C34.

My commission expires March 21, 1946.

Records

B. H. HAGGIN

IN ADDITION to the Casadesus recording of the Saint-Saëns Piano Concerto No. 4 that I received and discussed several weeks ago, Columbia's September list offers a volume of passages from Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde," performed by Helen Traubel, Rodzinski, and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony (Set 573; $5.50); Bach's Concerto in D minor for two violins, performed by Adolf Busch and Frances Magnes with the Busch Chamber Players (Set X-253; $2.50); and Samuel Barber's Symphony No. 1, performed by Bruno Walter with the New York Philharmonic (Set X-252; $2.50).

After the spaciousness, clarity, clean definition, brightness, and sensuous beauty of the marvelous Victor recordings of the Chicago and Boston Symphonies that I reviewed last week, it is astounding to hear the dull, murky, muddy, buzzy sound of the New York Philharmonic in Columbia's "Tristan" set, or the shrill, brash, and otherwise disagreeable sound of the Bach concerto performance. Another point about the "Tristan" recording is the sudden cutting-down of volume at the climax of the Prelude, so that the long crescendo builds up and up and up to—nothing. On the other hand, the balancing of voice and orchestra is good; one hears the orchestra clearly around the voice. The sound of the Barber Symphony performance has spaciousness and clarity, but none of the warmth and glow of the Victor recordings.

The "Tristan" set offers the great orchestral Preludes to the first and third acts, part of Isolde's first-act narrative, which I find boring, and the finale of the opera. I said the crescendo of the Prelude builds up and up and up; it would be more accurate to say that, as performed by Rodzinski, it plods up and up and up. As for the vocal passages, they shocked me with the evidence of the deterioration of Traubel's voice in the few years since she recorded the "Götterdämmerung" finale with Toscanini: its upper range has lost the amplitude and ease it had, and is now thin, tremolo-ridden, and shrieky.

The wonderful slow movement of the Bach concerto also plods at the excessively slow pace set by Busch; and the fast movements are given rough, insensitive, and tonally unlovely treatment. There is still no good version of this work available on records.

From Barber's symphony I get again the impression I got when I heard it performed by Rodzinski in New York and Salzburg in 1937, and that I have had from whatever else I have heard since then: that Barber is one of the people—they may be composers, they may, as I have just had occasion to observe, be choreographers or even dancers—who have a facility in the use of the resources of an art that enables them to go through the motions of artistic creation without being able to make these motions effective as the medium of genuine artistic communication.

I have had the same impression from the works of Villa-Lobos, who is represented on Columbia's September list by No. 5 of his Bachianas Brasileiras, an aria which, to my ears, has some relation to Brazilian popular music but none to Bach. It is well sung by Sayao, with Leonard Rose, solo cellist, and seven other cellists and bass under the direction of the composer (71670-D; $1).

On another single disc (17377-D; $.75) is Chopin's Polonaise in A flat, played by Egon Petri. Whether the competition with Victor's Iturbi record of the piece is intentional or not it is successful: Petri's performance is, in its own ways, as poor as Iturbi's and as poorly recorded. And I forgot to mention last week a Victor single (11-8824; $1) on which three of Shostakovitch's Preludes Opus 34—the usual Shostakovitch rubbish—are well-performed by William Kapell. On the reverse side is Rachmaninov's Prelude in C sharp minor.

CONTRIBUTORS

FRANZ HOELLERING was editor of the Berliner Zeitung and the Arbeiter Illustrierte Zeitung of Berlin before he came to this country. He has been on the staff of The Nation and is the author of two novels, "The Defenders" and "Furlough."

GAIL KENNEDY is a member of the Department of Philosophy and Religion at Amherst College.

A. M. KLEIN is a Montreal attorney. He has published two books of verse, "The Hitleriad" and "Poems."

MARTIN LEBOWITZ has contributed to the Journal of Philosophy and the Kenyon Review.

Letters to the Editors

German Labor's Record

Dear Sirs: Mr. Padover's article in The Nation for September 22 was informative and extremely fair. I venture to mention two or three factors which in my opinion help to account for the attitude of German workers he describes. For one thing, the long internecine conflict between the Social Democrats and most of the trade union-leaders on the one hand and the Communists on the other contributed to the lack of spirit and faith among the workers. Each faction called the other liars and traitors, and the workers came to believe that both were right. To this is largely attributable, I believe, the tragic fact that when Hitler was about to come to power there was not even a gesture of violent or non-violent resistance by the mighty German labor movement. Many of the Social Democrats and trade-union bureaucrats lacked any genuine will to resistance. The Communists, as Mr. Padover points out, had actually helped the Nazis in many instances, because they were convinced that the republic must be destroyed first and then Hitler could be tackled.

In the second place, the victor nations after World War I gave the German workers no reason to believe that they had "much to hope for from democracy." The story need not be repeated here.

In the third place, resistance in the occupied countries was inspired to a considerable extent by patriotic opposition to the foreign invader. The German working class did not have this incentive. In both cases, working-class groups were acting on narrow and largely mistaken nationalistic motives. So long as workers support sovereign nation-states and the institutions they represent, and permit themselves to be drawn into war by these states, tragedies of this kind will multiply.

A. J. MUSTE

New York, September 26

Disagreement?

Dear Sirs: Commenting on Admiral Halsey's remarks, "I would have liked to kick each Japanese delegate in the face," The Nation informs America that this "expressed the emotions that must have boiled through the veins of most of his fellow-countrymen," and that the declaration "was very exact and satisfying—and somehow reassuring."

The Nation hardly advances the cause of liberalism by presenting this "kill-Japs, kill-Japs, kill-Japs," admiral as the mouthpiece for thousands of peace-loving Americans who in the depths of their hearts are troubled by what such loud-mouthed war leaders are doing in Japan today. In Korea they are keeping the Japanese war lords and civil administration in control. In Japan they are leaving untouched the feudal-industrial structure in which the Tojos and the industrialists and the landlords have a gentlemen's agreement. And at the top they are strengthening the Emperor, who symbolizes the racial, religious, and military ideology against which we have been fighting. By their actions and words the war-loving Halseys are revealing their fundamental lack of faith in the potentialities of the Japanese people. They are satisfying and reassuring to reactionaries but to few true liberals.

DAVID S. BURGESS

Memphis, Tenn., September 11

[Our concern over American policy in Japan and Korea is quite as great as Mr. Burgess's, and we think it should be obvious that we approved of Admiral Halsey's remarks exactly because they were not directed toward the Japanese people but toward the military leaders who were responsible for the war and for the system of government that supported it.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Occupation for War

Dear Sirs: Since early May I have been in Austria with Military Government and I consider the Austrians even more disgusting than the Germans, mainly because of their enormous hypocrisy. In 1938 they heiled Hitler and continued doing so during the Anschluss. Now they say they have never been Nazis and were the first country invaded and enslaved by the Germans.

The American army, that is, MG, in its efforts to prepare Austria to become a "free and independent nation" is according it a benevolence and sympathy almost unbelievable in the case of a defeated enemy. The Austrian population is infinitely better treated by the army than the unfortunate "dirty" displaced persons, slave laborers, and K.Z.'s from other countries. I have seen some concentration camps and some Jews who by accident survived; and the fact that the camp guards will obviously not be punished, or at least not nearly as much as they deserve, makes my blood boil. Ever since I have been stationed in Austria I have considered it my duty to fight local Nazis and have put a good number of fascist swine, like Ortsgruppenleiters, in jail. This has involved me in serious trouble with my superiors. I was finally transferred from a position of responsibility to one in which I do nothing but drive a jeep on occasion, and have ample opportunity to write letters and jot down my observations, some of which are destined for the United States Congress, if the United States is still a free parliamentary country by the time I get home. I might add that the situation in the United States occupation zone of Germany, although not identical, is similar, and that it would in my opinion be prudent to expect another German war in ten or fifteen years.

SERVICE MAN

Somewhere in Austria, July 15

FREE to All AUTO owners

AUTOMOBILE USER'S GUIDE with wartime suggestions

196 PRACTICAL SUGGESTIONS

that will help you to get ☞ better gas mileage

☞ longer tire life
☞ better performance
☞ lower upkeep costs

Get a FREE COPY from any General Motors dealer, or use coupon below.

Customer Research Dept., Room 1817
GENERAL MOTORS, DETROIT 2, MICH.

Please send FREE COPY of new edition 64-page "Automobile User's Guide"—containing 196 practical suggestions on care and operation.

Mr.
Mrs. ....
Miss please print
Address ....
please print
City ....
Zone State
Make of car now owned .... year model

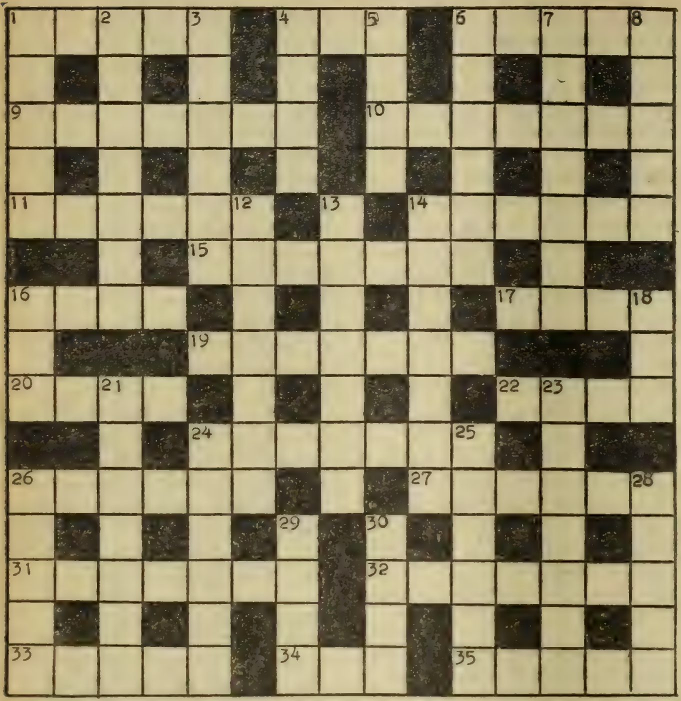
Crossword Puzzle No. 129

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 Bottled? Just the reverse (two words, 2 and 3)
4 Sleepy? Yes
6 In cab? No, on shipboard
9 Locomotive Americans swear by (two words, 3 and 4)
10 She combed her hair with a golden comb, the siren!
11 The doctrine of belief
14 Composer of Slaughter On Tenth Avenue
15 One of Napoleon's marshals goes on tour
16 Barrel containing sack
17 Where the castle's defenders held fast?
19 New York's famous horizon
20 Not a mistake in the practice of graft
22 Love made Jupiter turn himself into one 24 The man on the flying trapeze, undoubtedly 26 Black ones wear white robes, and vice versa
27 Sounds like a suitable story for the breakfast table
31 Question of personal ability which is answered with a smile
32 O in silk I can defy the weather!
33 The right hat for Pat?
34 She turns in welcome
35 American philosopher (1855-1916)

DOWN

1 Attack on the radio?
2 Meddles
3 Ripest type of clergyman
4 World's longest river
5 Impossible to shine in such company
6 Green bottle full of acid
7 Regard as true, though it contains a lie
8 Slain, as Sisera was by one
12 A different head would give them long ears
13 This nut candy might be plainer
14 High color
16 On account of salad?
18 "The tongue of the mind"
21 The first letter
23 Over 4,000 brands of the Scotch variety alone
24 Descriptive of those who lived in Grub Street?
25 The trick, apparently, is to get this bank clerk to listen
26 This old German appears to be an outspoken fellow
28 Weapon which became obsolete in World War I
29 We're here!
30 O gay, but now ascetic

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 128

ACROSS:—1 SHADOWS; 5 HORACES; 9 ABSOLVE; 10 UPPSALA; 11 CANON; 12 SMELL A RAT; 14 LION; 15 RED HAIR; 18 ICE; 20 NON; 21 MARSHAL; 23 EXIT; 26 ORPHANAGE; 28 YEAST; 29 TRIVIAL; 30 NIAGARA; 31 RANKEST; 32 RAMPAGE.

DOWN:—1 STANCE; 2 ASSENT; 3 OBLONGISH; 4 STETSON; 5 HAUTEUR; 6 REPEL; 7 CHAIRMAN; 8 SLATTERN; 13 OCA; 16 DAIRY FARM; 17 IOU; 18 IMPORTER; 19 ERUPTION; 22 LEAFLET; 23 ELEANOR; 24 MANANA; 25 STRAFE; 27 AMINE.

RESORTS

"Fore" the Golfer
Newly Conditioned Course
A Grand "Pro"
New Clubhouse
. . . await your pleasure.

28 miles of beautiful private trails. Also — excellent tennis, boating and fishing on our private 7½-mile lake, swimming, golf, game rooms, cocktail lounge, dancing, really fine food . . . congenial atmosphere.
Only 51 Miles from New York
The Glenmere
CHESTER, N. Y. Chester 200 (N. Y.) RE 2-5047

Birdland
CENTRAL VALLEY, N. Y.
200-ACRE ESTATE 1,000-FT. ELEVATION
Congenial adult resort. All sports. Clay Tennis Courts. Golf, fine food. Only 45 miles from N. Y. Open all year.
Columbus Day Special: $22.50 for 3 full days
Highlands Mills 7895 N. Y. C.: WA 5-4671

The Colonial Terrace Hotel
Hillside Ave., Peekskill, N. Y. Tel. Peekskill 400
Open All Year
Winter Sports — Homey — Friendly — Restful
Informal — Excellent Cuisine
Special Winter Rates Now Prevail
Room — Suites — Available — Make Reservations Early — Rates on Request

ZINDOREST PARK Monroe, New York
CLOSED FOR THE WINTER
Will Reopen in the Early Spring

HUDSON VIEW HOTEL
HAVERSTRAW NEW YORK
A 50-minute ride
"Deservedly Famous for 25 Years"
Fine Food—Scenic Beauty—Steamheated
Private Baths—Sports—Quite Reasonable
Make Holiday Reservations NOW
Dietary Laws Haverstraw 2076

CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING RATES:
62c a line (six words)
Minimum 3 lines
$6.16 an inch

DISPLAY ADVERTISING:
Base rate, $250 per page.
Rates by classification, on request.

THE Nation
20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 161 · NEW YORK · SATURDAY · OCTOBER 13, 1945 · NUMBER 15

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 353

EDITORIALS

Horse-Sense in the Atomic Age 355
Relief for Park Avenue 356
Chinese Powder Barrel 357

ARTICLES

Will There Be Jobs? by I. F. Stone 358
Britain Expects Action by Aylmer Vallance 359
France Swings Socialist by Oreste Rosenfeld 361
How the Nazis Stay in by Saul Padover 362
What About This Bureaucracy? by Ruth Landes 365
In the Wind 366

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Britain: The Middle Kingdom by Cyril Connolly 367
The Jew Is a Myth by Kay Boyle 368
Burning the Letters by Randall Jarrell 372
The American Style by George Genzmer 374
Pull Dick, Pull Devil by Katherine Anne Porter 376
Briefer Comment 378
Verse Chronicle: Lewis and MacNeice by F. W. Dupee 380
Fiction in Review: Of Husbands and Wives by Diana Trilling 381
Drama by Joseph Wood Krutch 384
Films by James Agee 385
Records by B. H. Haggin 386

CROSSWORD PUZZLE NO. 130 by Jack Barrett 388

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor J. KING GORDON
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Editor Political War Section
J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates
LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL
JONATHAN DANIELS
CAREY MCWILLIAMS
REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

DEBATE ON THE QUESTION OF WHO KILLED THE London conference is now in full swing. Secretary Byrnes, while restrained in his language, has placed the blame squarely on the Soviet delegation, which, he charged, sought to dictate to the other conferees. His Republican assistant, Mr. Dulles, has suggested that the Russians devised the procedural controversy to test whether American principles were stronger than the American desire for unity. In so doing, he added, they were within their rights and the result was a useful demonstration of the fact that the United States really did mean to stick to its principles. What would be more convincing, however, is a demonstration that American, and British, principles are not for export only. In Moscow, continued references to Greece remind us of the danger of name-calling by pots. Further, while on this side of the world we are very prone to accuse the Soviet government of breaking its word, Russian commentators maintain that it is Byrnes and Bevin who have violated both the spirit and the letter of the Potsdam agreement. Examination of the text shows that this charge has some technical basis. The weakness of the Soviet position lies in Molotov's willingness to proceed for ten days in accordance with a broad interpretation of the Big Three's directive to the Council of Foreign Ministers. His subsequent insistence on the text, and nothing but the text, appeared therefore as a rather obvious maneuver to outflank the solid front of the western powers.

*

EVEN SO THIS MANEUVER WAS NOT A TOTAL failure from the Russian point of view. Mr. Byrnes's compromise proposals, outlined in his broadcast, seem to concede the substance of the Soviet demands on procedure. They would leave the preparatory and exploratory work on the peace settlements with the various enemy powers in each case to the signatories of the surrender terms. This would exclude France and China so far as the Balkans and Finland are concerned. But their views and those of other powers would be heard at a later conference in which not only the Big Five but all European members of the UNO, together with non-European nations which had given substantial military aid during the war, would take part. This plan appears to meet the objection raised by Pravda: If France is to share in Balkan treaty-making, why not Czechoslovakia, Poland, and Yugoslavia, which are more intimately affected? Not only these states but the Ukraine and White Russia would be eligible members of the suggested conference. On such lines there appears some hope of loosening the procedural knots tied in London. The basic problem, how to soften the mutual suspicions of Russia and the west, remains.

The best that can be said is that London has highlighted the difficulties of collaboration and the dangers of disunity.

*

THE SUCCESS OF THE WORLD LABOR CONFERENCE in Paris is in striking contrast to the failure of the Foreign Ministers' meeting in London. Where Byrnes failed to reconcile Bevin and Molotov, Sidney Hillman achieved a compromise between Sir Walter Citrine and Vasili Kuznetsov. On the eighth day of the conference the formation of a World Federation of Trade Unions was announced. The Russian demand for permanent organization was met and so were British reservations. As a result, the Executive Committee of the permanent W. F. T. U. can amend the constitution during the next two years subject to confirmation by the general council. During that period also officials of the old I. F. T. U. can be absorbed into the new body as individuals and negotiations can be carried on for adherence to the W. F. T .U. of existing international trade secretariats. On the question of voting, the credentials committee reported last week that Russia, representing 27,000,000 workers, will have forty-one votes; Great Britain and France, each credited with about 6,000,000 workers, will have twenty-three votes each; and the United States, represented only by the C. I. O., will have twenty-two. By refusing to participate in the new labor organization, the A. F. of L. and John L. Lewis have insured a great preponderance of votes to the Russians. Sir Walter Citrine has been elected president of the new body, permanent headquarters of which will be Paris. Louis Saillant, the secretary-general, comes from the French resistance, in which he gave able and daring leadership, and the new formation needs strong leadership if it is to play its role in the transition to a democratically planned society.

*

IT IS HEARTENING TO NOTE THAT AFTER A slow and sorry start, occupation policies in Japan have moved more rapidly and in a better direction than we had reason to anticipate a month ago. The elimination of Japanese censorship, the opening of political prisons, the weakening of the Gestapo-like police system, preliminary sallies at the Zaibatsu and State Shinto, and the promise of support for trade unions, peasant unions, and other democratic groups, are all highly commendable steps. The publication of the basic American directive on September 22 and the application of some of its tenets precipitated the shift in the Japanese Premiership from the reactionary Prince Higashi-Kuni to the "liberal" Baron Kijuro Shidehara. The removal of the totalitarian Home Minister Iwao Yamazaki and the freeing of political prisoners were first called for by The Nation in Andrew Roth's articles. It would be disastrous, however, if liberal pressure abated at this critical juncture. Premier Baron Shidehara is liberal only by comparison with other members of the reactionary ruling oligarchy. He is related by marriage to the Iwazaki family, which controls the giant Mitsubishi octopus, and is far removed from the common people. It is dangerous to put our trust in Shidehara, and in phony liberals like Yusuke Tsurumi and Yoshihiko Kawaga and ersatz socialists like Dr. Iso Abe. In the past they mouthed liberal, Christian, and democratic phrases to "explain" and support Japanese aggression. Today they hope to siphon off mass discontent into innocuous, oligarchy-controlled parties which will indulge in fulsome talk but leave intact the feudal land system and the intensely monopolistic financial overlordship which are the twin breeding plots of fascism and war in Japan.

*

WE HAVE CRITICIZED GENERAL PATTON FOR over-tolerance of Nazis, but we never suggested that he shared Nazi views. This accusation comes from his ardent defender, John O'Donnell of the New York Daily News, who alleges that "foreign-born political leaders" such as Justice Frankfurter and Sidney Hillman were out to "get" Patton because when he slapped a soldier in Italy he accompanied his blow with the words "yellow-bellied Jew." In thus smearing the General with his own anti-Semitism, O'Donnell appears to be living up to his normal standards of inaccuracy. For the slapped soldier, who has been identified as Herman Kuhl of Mishawaka, Indiana, is of German extraction, and has denied that the General used O'Donnell's phrase. Poor Patton! He may well sigh, "God save me from my friends!"

*

WE AGREE COMPLETELY WITH THE STATE Department decision not to conclude a treaty for hemispheric defense with fascist Argentina as one of the signatories. But the Rio conference at which the collective security alliance was to have been drafted next week should not have been called off. On the surface our summary action in "suggesting" that it be "postponed"—read cancelled—looks like the old Yankee imperialism at work again. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee has formally protested because neither it nor the Latin American countries were consulted until after the machinery for calling off the Rio conference had been set in motion. Chairman Tom Connally said that if the Administration had really wanted to make an effective demonstration against Argentina it should have gone to the conference and refused to cooperate with the Argentine delegates in drafting a security pact. He is right. Actually if the conference had been held and if the delegates had agreed that Argentina was a threat to hemispheric peace they could, in accordance with the Chapultepec agreements, have taken any one of the following measures: "Recall of chiefs of diplomatic missions; breaking of diplomatic relations; breaking of consular relations; . . . use of armed forces. . . ." Even the first of these measures would pose a ticklish problem. Perón is not the only dictator. He has his peers in Brazil, Bolivia, and Paraguay, to mention only three outstanding examples. And neither they nor the heads of state in many other Latin American countries want to establish a precedent of forcing a change of government through outside intervention. This is the issue the State Department dodged in calling off the Rio conference.

*

THE ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY-POWER PROJECT began to be visible through the political fog as a result of President Truman's appeal for swift Congressional approval. "Public and private agencies," Mr. Truman said, will be able to pass on to consumers "all the advantages of this cheap power." What still remains unclear is whether there will or will not be public transmission lines. If not, transmission will be entirely in the hands of private utilities. President Truman's reaffirmation of faith in the Tennessee Valley and Columbia River developments would indicate that he wants public lines. His deft avoidance of a commitment can perhaps be attributed to fear that the whole project might be blocked. This fear seems now to be unjustified, in view of the speed with which Congressional action may develop on the Senate resolution (S. J. 104) authorizing the development. There are signs that it will get a favorable report by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Clarification, however, is as much a responsibility of Governor Thomas E. Dewey's New York State administration as of the federal government. In his repeated avowals of support for the project Mr. Dewey has conspicuously avoided any mention of transmission lines. Since the resolution pledges in effect that New York State will handle the American end of the United States-Canadian establishment, and since the international agreement would be subject to approval by the New York legislature as well as by Congress, a plain statement of policy on transmission is needed immediately.

*

THE NOMINATION OF RAYMOND S. McKEOUGH as a member of the Maritime Commission has been rejected by the Senate Commerce Committee. In voting, the committee divided on orthodox political lines—that is to say, two reactionary Southern Democrats, O'Daniel of Texas and Overton of Louisiana, teamed up with a solid Republican bloc to beat the Administration forces. One count made against McKeough was that he lacked intimate knowledge of maritime affairs, but according to Senator Bailey, chairman of the committee, the deciding factor in his defeat was opposition registered by the American Federation of Labor. Because he had recently been associated with the C. I. O. as a regional director for P. A. C., the A. F. of L. turned thumbs down on a man who could have been relied upon to give sympathetic consideration to labor viewpoints on a key policy-making body. It is shortsighted factionalism of this kind which is doing so much to weaken labor's influence in Washington.

*

SIXTH AVENUE IN NEW YORK CITY MUST feel like Cinderella. Not many years ago it was an ill-dressed thoroughfare oppressed by an elevated railway. The El was torn down some time ago. And one morning a couple of weeks ago, Sixth Aveneue woke up to find that a powerful prince, Fiorello, by a wave of his wand and a surprise coup in the City Council, had changed its name to Avenue of the Americas. Some people say that Fiorello is a politician not a prince. Others suggest that real-estate interests with property on the avenue had something to do with the miracle, and some feel that it is less than diplomatic to have an Avenue of the Americas that leads straight to Rockefeller Center. Finally, there are critics who maintain that it is silly to drop a good findable designation like Sixth Avenue and that it will mean a lot more questions—and confusing answers—about "how to get to . . . ," thus making work for the Missing Persons Bureau and swelling the ranks of the lost generation. This last objection seems to us worth consideration. Why not compromise and call it Sixth Avenue of the Americas? That would make the name even longer and more pompous, besides giving it exactly six times as much significance as a symbol of hemispheric solidarity.

Horse-Sense in the Atomic Age

PRESIDENT TRUMAN'S long-awaited message to Congress on the control of atomic energy was a neat, politic, and cautious approach to the—literally—most explosive problem which has yet confronted Western man. It was the sort of message befitting a man from Missouri—well-balanced, undogmatic, waiting to be convinced. Unfortunately, in the standard Missouri scale of values and virtues imaginativeness does not rank high; and in this message, delivered in a season when imaginativeness is the most urgently desirable and necessary of all public virtues, there was little trace of the functionings of imagination.

The President proposed that the Congress create an Atomic Energy Commission to control and promote the development of atomic power for peace-time uses in the United States. He revealed that he is planning direct negotiations with Great Britain and Canada, coholders with the United States of the immediate key to this Pandora's box, and later with other nations not named, "in an effort to effect agreement on the conditions under which cooperation might replace rivalry in the field of atomic power."

The bulk of the message was devoted to the domestic phase of the problem, and the recommendations here seem sound: that the Atomic Energy Commission be given all jurisdiction over government-owned facilities, mineral sources, research, and industrial or commercial applications of atomic energy. It proposed supplanting the army with the civilian authority in these matters, and made it clear that private enterprise was not to gain control of this tremendous development built up by public servants and public money.

Even Senator Connally could not fail to see the horse-sense of these proposals. When the President turned to hint at the international phase of the problem, however, one was left with the faintly sinking sensation that horse-sense is not altogether adequate. "The hope of civilization lies in international arrangements looking, if possible, to the renunciation of the use and development of the atomic bomb, and directing and encouraging the use of atomic energy and all future scientific information toward peaceful and scientific means," the President said. "The hope of civilization," "renunciation," "encouraging," "peaceful"—this, indeed, is where we came in. One had imagined, rather wistfully, that "hopes" might be set aside in the face of this colossal dilemma, that a modicum of wisdom and imagination would be brought to bear and would point a clear path toward the establishment of world law.

Hoping for renunciation is a luxury not to be enjoyed with impunity in this catastrophic season. We pay for it immediately with jangled nerves and the jitters. We will pay for it eventually with an explosion that will blast all hope. Any policy of attempting to control the greatest power in the universe by "hopes" and "arrangements" to "renounce" its use in war would be a singular manifestation of what Melville calls "the weakness of mere unaided right-mindedness and virtue": the effect of "outlawing" a weapon is always that only the outlaws use it, while the nice people shake their heads sadly over so much wickedness. Had Mr. Truman lived in Missouri during its frontier days, he would presumably not have offered to protect the lives and property of citizens by inviting them all to renounce the use of six-guns. He would have mustered a police force, or invited the federal marshal to open an office, or at least gathered together a vigilante committee.

The last course, in fact, is what the loudest voices in Washington are now proposing, and the most effective part of the President's message is that in which he undercuts the fatuous hopefulness of this position—the position that the United States should "keep the secret" of the bomb, keep ahead of other countries in development of atomic energy, build bigger and better bombs, and police the world with them. Every responsible scientist connected with the work has said that there is no secret; the layman can assure himself that this is true by reading the extraordinary and fascinating official report on the project, "Atomic Energy for Military Purposes," by Henry D. Smyth of Princeton. Other nations will be able to produce better atomic bombs more easily, cheaply, and inconspicuously than we did: because of the press of time we tried four methods, of which three worked, and were lavish in the expenditure of money, men, and materials. The Smyth report recapitulates the basic data on atomic fission in handy form, is on sale at your bookseller's, and should allow you to build a bomb yourself after a few years of research to work out the production details. So the question, "Should we keep the secret of the atomic bomb?" (to which a majority of Congressional answerers said yes) is similar to the old trick question, "Have you stopped beating your wife?"—and just about as pertinent.

Equally pertinent are schemes for defense. "The protection . . . is to go underground," says Mrs. Luce; "There has never been a weapon against which man has been unable to devise a counter-weapon," says Admiral Nimitz. Well, Niels Bohr, General Groves, and all the others associated with the project say no defense is possible against the bomb, but only against its carrier; and who has suggested a defense to keep completely away all rocket-propelled, radar-directed, atomic-explosive missiles, launched from over the oceans?

Yet Nimitz asks for a large navy, Barkley and Vandenberg quarrel over which committee of the Senate would consider the problem, Truman hopes for a Sunday School reformation in man's warlike character. Scott Lucas made the relevant comment: "We are fooling around with horse-and-buggy rules while the world is threatened with atomic destruction."

The world will continue to be threatened with destruction as long as men continue to deal with the atomic problem in horse-and-buggy terms. As long as the nations remain separate, dividing men from one another, we shall continue to view this first truly global affair of life or death from a national viewpoint; and we shall never be able to settle it from a national viewpoint. By all means let us have a new, broad-based commission to study the problem and make recommendations. By all means let us accept Senator Vandenberg's suggestion that Congressional leaders confer with the President on the problem. By all means let us pass Senator McMahon's bill for a mutual and free interchange of information and research among all the United Nations, clearing through the Security Council and granting it the power to inspect all munitions plants and laboratories in all nations. But let us recognize that our danger lies not with atomic energy but with the present organization of society, which tends inevitably toward conflict just because it sets nations apart from one another; and let us raise a clamor for the establishment of world government under world law, so that we may find a new and broader sovereignty under which atomic energy will not be a threat but a promise.

Relief for Park Avenue

THE Stock Exchanges have been pushing ahead with their peace boom in the past week in anticipation of good news from Washington, where Congress has at last turned to the really important subject of tax reduction. We are keeping our fingers crossed, however, until we see who is going to get the benefit. Taxes are an economic matter and ought to be settled by bankers and other practical thinkers, but unfortunately one can't keep politics out. Lots of Congressmen have thoroughly sound instincts. They would like to do something to brighten the pinched faces on Park Avenue, but they cannot forget for long that the votes are elsewhere. So instead of starting to cut income taxes at the top, where the burden is the heaviest, they tend to begin at the bottom.

In putting the Treasury's proposals before the Ways and Means Committee, Secretary Vinson said, "Taxes must be fair among the people." A nice platitude! But as Mr. Krock asks in the New York Times, "How can taxes be fair among the people when more than twelve million of them are in the same breath released from them?" It would be much more just to make a horizontal reduction for all taxpayers, as some of the Republican Congressmen have suggested. That should satisfy laborers, who have been earning more than they know how to spend sensibly, and, to quote Mr. Krock again, "would permit the very prosperous few to regain some of their former purchasing power." Those of us in the top brackets would still be giving the Treasury nearly three-quarters of our incomes, but out of a net income of $1,000,000 we would have $280,000 left instead of a beggarly $100,000 as at present.

There is one thing to be grateful for: in spite of his New Deal taint Mr. Vinson has been made to see the light on the excess-profits tax. He realizes that this is really a way of controlling profits and that to continue it in peace time would deprive corporation executives of any incentive to go on breaking their backs to provide a brave new world for everybody. It is too bad that the Ways and Means Commitmittee should not have accepted his proposals in full, deciding instead to continue the tax during 1946 at 60 per cent. Of course this is better than the present confiscatory rate, and the committee has done something to mitigate its error by cutting the corporation surtax from 16 to 12 per cent.

A clean sweep of the excess-profits tax, however, would give a bigger fillip to business and particularly to those large corporations which are the mainstay of our economy. The real beneficiaries, according to one very respectable authority, the Wall Street Journal, would be consumers in general, for, it contends, all corporation taxes are really paid by the public with the corporations simply acting as tax-gatherers for the government. That is to say, corporations treat taxes as part of costs and therefore add them to prices. Of course, under sharply competitive conditions, it may not be easy to pass taxes on to the public in this manner, but in the big, well-organized industries, where cutthroat competition is regarded as unethical, price schedules can usually be administered in such a way as to insure a proper margin of profit after taxes.

However, while the Wall Street Journal's arguments are of great interest, we feel it is rather unwise to give them publicity at the present time. For ignorant people might make the over-logical deduction that since excess-profits taxes have been absorbed in prices, their elimination should lead immediately to reduced prices. They might notice that a certain liquor company has been handing over some $20 per share in excess-profits taxes, and suppose that as soon as the tax is dropped, the price of whiskey would drop too. But, of course, that isn't the idea at all—not so long as there is a sellers' market. What is really encouraging about the prospective abolition, or at least reduction of the excess-profits tax is that it will give business a period of excess profits without the tax. That is what Wall Street is counting on when it bids up the stocks of companies which have been particularly successful in collecting this tax for the Treasury and now have a chance to go on collecting it for their shareholders. Our brokers tipped us to buy Schenley on this basis soon after V-J Day and it has risen over twenty points since. Really, it is almost like the days of dear Mr. Mellon.

Chinese Powder Barrel

REPORTS that heavy fighting has broken out between Chinese Communist and Kuomintang forces at several points emphasize the explosive nature of the Chinese situation. The danger of civil war persists even though the Chungking negotiations appear to be making progress. For while most of the basic issues dividing China's two great parties remain unsettled, agreement has been reached on the procedure for setting up the framework of a democratic political structure. A political council is to be established containing equal representation from each of four groups—the Kuomintang, the Communists, the Democratic League, and non-party independents. The decisions of this council are to be binding on all parties. This procedure promises well not only because the center and non-political groups can mediate in the seemingly insoluble disputes between the right and left, but because these groups, to a greater extent than either the Kuomintang or the Communists, can be counted on to insist on an effective democracy with guaranties of basic civil rights.

Foremost among the issues facing this new council will be the method of selecting delegates to the People's Congress which is to be intrusted with the responsibility of drawing up China's new constitution. The Kuomintang has heretofore insisted on convening the Congress that was chosen in 1936, even though many of the delegates chosen at that time have died or have been guilty of collaboration with the Japanese. This insistence has been based on a desire to obtain ratification of the Draft Constitution that was promulgated in 1936. The Communists and the Democratic League have opposed this constitution, chiefly because it concentrates too much power in the hands of the Chief Executive and fails to make provision for regional and provincial differences. Since the Kuomintang-picked delegates of 1936 would presumably uphold the Kuomintang-prepared constitution of that year, the Communists have been unyielding in their demand that the Congress delegates be chosen again, this time by popular vote. They believe that the Congress should then draw up a completely new constitution providing for a more decentralized form of government. Such a constitution would make possible a solution of the Kuomintang-Communist controversy along traditional Chinese lines of regional spheres of administration and at the same time lay the basis for the emergence of a modern democratic state.

All this represents substantial progress toward Chinese unity. But the difficulties which remain should not be minimized. The negotiators have thus far been unable to reach an agreement on the crucial problem of the Eighth Route Army. Chungking is reported to be willing to permit the Communists to retain twenty divisions—less than one-sixth of the Central Government's forces—provided they accept Kuomintang governors in the northern provinces under their control. The Communists have indicated that they will accept this arrangement only if they are permitted to name the governors. The most explosive problem, however, concerns the disarming of the Japanese and puppet troops in the Tientsin-Peiping area. Acting under orders from Chungking, the Japanese have refused to surrender their main body of troops to the Communists who dominate the area. American marines have landed at Tienstin to take over control of that city, but the Japanese still control Peiping. The Communists do not object greatly to the use of American troops to disarm the Japanese. But if the United States carries out its previously announced intention of convoying Kuomintang troops into North China to seize this region, trouble is bound to develop.

It has been evident for some time that a settlement of China's internal problems requires a neutral attitude on the part of the United States. A reporter in Chungking says that a mere suggestion of change in American policy has had a "barometric effect" on the Kuomintang-Communist negotiations. Left to themselves, the negotiators will probably compromise their differences, since neither side feels strong enough to wage civil war. But if American military assistance encourages the Kuomintang to force the issue, a conflict is almost certain. Nor should we assume, as some Americans do, that such a war would be a minor affair now that Russia has abandoned the Communists. Russia has indicated that its treaty of alliance and friendship applies only to a united and democratic China. If Chungking, with our help, were to attempt to enforce unity by arms, Russia might feel that its conditions had not been met. Similarly, if we continue to pour troops into North China, Moscow, with some color of excuse, might reconsider its undertaking to withdraw from Manchuria. Foreign intervention at this stage in China's internal affairs can only serve to enhance the possibilities of an explosion.

Will There Be Jobs?

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, October 8

THE latest report made by John W. Snyder, Director of War Mobilization and Reconversion, touches but gingerly on the question of coming unemployment. "By next spring," the report says, "with demobilization running at better than a million a month, unemployment may rise to about eight million." The next sentence seems to imply that this will be temporary. "The total," the report continues, "will depend on how fast reconversion and expansion can be accomplished." But from the information available here we seem to be headed at the best toward chronic unemployment after reconversion: optimistic estimates add up to about 7,500,000 jobless by the end of next year; pessimistic, to 10,500,000.

As in the early '30's, business organizations are again putting their faith in hoopla; there seems to be a feeling that full employment can be achieved if only business men will jolly one another and the country along, like good fellows at a Rotary Club get-together. The Committee for Economic Development has become a leading practitioner in the field of synthetic cheer, with Walter D. Fuller of the Curtis Publishing Company as director of optimistic statement. Yesterday, on the basis of a "spot check" in 884 cities, the CED announced that by next fall there would be 7,000,000 to 10,000,000 more jobs available than in 1940. The basis of computation was not disclosed, but Fuller's earlier press release, of September 10, did provide some way to assess the value of the CED estimates.

"Survey Predicts Job Total 24 per cent Higher than '40 Level" was the New York Times headline on that earlier survey. It covered 100 cities and counties but did not get the same type of data from all of them; in 47 the figures covered both industrial and commercial employment. The survey showed the number employed in 1940, the number employed at the peak of war production, and the number expected to be employed after reconversion. In the forty-seven cities and counties giving figures on both industrial and commercial employment, the CED survey showed a rise of about 36 per cent in the number of jobs from 1940 to the war-time peak and an expected decline of about 10 per cent after reconversion. That seems to be a pretty good sample. The actual figures on nation-wide employment in industry and trade as given by the Bureau of Labor Statistics show a rise of 31 per cent from 1940 to 1944.

If we apply the percentage of decline shown in the CED findings to the actual BLS figures, we get a loss of about 2,300,000 jobs in industry and trade combined. To these 2,300,000 lay-offs we must add 1,500,000 lay-offs by government. For civilian employment in war agencies, largely arsenals and shipyards, rose from 241,000 to 2,052,000 during the war. In addition, demobilization will release 9,000,000 from the armed services. This gives us a total of 12,800,000 looking for work. This number will be reduced, however, by the number of married women, young people, and older folk who worked during the war but will return to their homes or schools after the war. The net withdrawal from the labor market from this source is estimated at 3,000,000. This reduces the number of job seekers to 9,800,000.

Where can jobs be found for them? No great expansion in employment is visible in transportation, where the railroads have been carrying a load 25 per cent greater than that which would come to them under peace-time full-employment conditions. The output of public utilities will likewise drop after the war. Increased mechanization made it possible for mining to boost output during the war, despite a decline in employment from 916,000 in 1940 to 835,000 in 1944; return to the pre-war level of employment will not make a substantial dent in joblessness. In finance, service, and the miscellaneous trades average employment during the first six months of this year was 4,220,000, as compared with 4,310,000 in 1940; obviously not much expansion is possible there. The one sizable source of new jobs is in construction, where employment fell from 1,722,000 in 1940 to 679,000 in 1944. The Federal Works Agency estimates a somewhat lower level of construction next year than in 1940, but let us assume 1,000,000 restored jobs in the building trades. That would reduce the number of jobless after reconversion to 8,800,000. If the professions absorb 100,000, if 700,000 go into business for themselves, and if 500,000 go back to the farm, we would still have 7,500,000 jobless, or about the same number we had in 1940.

The secret of our coming difficulties lies in another sentence of the Snyder report from which we quoted above. "During the war we have increased our national output 75 per cent, and we have done so with 12,000,000 of our strongest and youngest men and women in the armed forces." The increase in productivity is so great that even the pent-up demand to be expected in consumer durables immediately after the war will not take up the slack in employment. The automobile industry, for example, hopes for a 60 per cent increase in output over the pre-war level but expects a 40 per cent cut in jobs from the war-time peak. Thus in the automobile industry during the peak period of meeting pent-up demand there will be a big net loss in jobs. Peak employment during the war was 700,000. The post-reconversion peak is expected to be 425,000. Pent-up demand for consumer durables will not create full employment even temporarily.

Nor is there any prospect of new private capital investment large enough to do the job. Let us take as our measuring rod the generally accepted estimate that about $40 billion of investment annually would be necessary for a $200 billion full-employment level of national income. Peak investment during the war period came in 1941, when private and public capital outlay was $21 billion, the highest in our history. This declined to $14 billion in 1942 and $7 billion in 1943.

But in these years, with that capital investment, we built a whole new synthetic rubber and aviation industry. We raised aircraft output in value from a half million to $30 billion annually. We increased shipbuilding from three-quarters of a million tons to twenty million tons annually. We boosted steel capacity by one-third, aluminum capacity more than ten times, and turned out more machines and machine tools in four years than in the whole previous generation. After that vast splurge of expansion who is going to put new money in any quantity into shipbuilding, aircraft, steel, aluminum, radio, electronics, or petroleum—which expects to produce a billion barrels less in peace time than it did during the war? The Department of Commerce Survey of Current Business, in a recent study of Capital Outlay Plans of Business, managed, by many shaky assumptions, to forecast $12 billion in investment next year but admitted in an aside that this estimate lumped together "plans having varying degrees of definiteness. They range all the way from firm commitments . . . through the desirable expansion or modernization which will take place if general conditions are more or less in line with present expectations to those tentative projects which depend on technological or competitive developments."

Some look to expanded foreign trade for full employment. But this cannot take up the gap left at home by cessation of war spending by government. The United States is so enormously rich in productive capacity that it required both a vast domestic expansion and an equally enormous rise in foreign trade to achieve full employment during the war. Exports rose to $8 billion in 1942, $12 billion in 1943, $14 billion in 1944. But it took abnormal war-time imports of materials plus a huge lend-lease program to make these exports possible. In foreign trade, too, we face a sharp deflation.

Our problem is our wealth of productive capacity, our dearth of brains, our prejudice against planning. Even spending for social improvement on a scale beyond that of the New Deal will not suffice to give us full employment of machines and men. Let me offer a few figures. Against that $40 billion of annual investment necessary for full employment, measure the fact that the whole TVA project since its beginning has cost only $1 billion, that $3 billion a year for fifteen years would wipe out every slum in this country. Peripheral spending to prime the pump is not adequate. The time is coming when we shall have to plan output, industry by industry, in terms of need rather than the "normal" hit-or-miss market of a scarcity economy. Only that way lies full employment. Only so can the Midas of nations cope with its golden touch.

Britain Expects Action

BY AYLMER VALLANCE

London, October 1

PERHAPS to say that enthusiasm for the Labor government has evaporated in the past six weeks would be an overstatement. A parliamentary recess which lasts from August 24 to October 9 is not long enough for a fundamental change in the attitude of a mass electorate. Labor meetings in the three by-elections now in progress have been drawing big audiences ready enough to cheer; increasing shortages in the shops, from cigarettes to children's shoes, from cleaning materials to (mystifyingly) kitchen salt, are borne with good humor; and there is still solid confidence in the legislative program outlined at the beginning of the session. Yet there are visible beginnings of an estrangement between the government and its supporters. Though disillusionment might be too strong a word, the feeling is widespread that in the broad field where action is possible by administrative decision Ministers are taking an unconscionably long time to do anything positively Socialist in character, and that their approach to the problems which touch everyday life is excessively cautious and rigid.

In particular, the Cabinet has apparently been unable so far to adjust the Bevin plan of gradual demobilization—on an "age-plus-service" basis—to the new conditions created by the collapse of Japan. Though certain areas, such as South Wales, Tyneside, and the Clyde valley, which are hit by the cancelation of war contracts may not be over anxious for "the boys" to return and swell the queues outside the employment exchanges, the general judgment of the country—witness the emphatic resolution passed by the Trade Union Congress this month—is that Britain simply cannot afford to go slow with demobilization when the whole business of "revival," home production and export trade alike, depends so largely on the speedy redeployment of man-power. Suffering from the acute shortage of personnel on the railways, in road transport, and in the telephone system—to say nothing of in building and other essential industries—the public impatiently asks why, and gets no convincing answer.

Demobilization is only one example of the issues in which Ministers are conveying the impression of inaction. There are, however, exceptions. Sir Stafford Cripps shows welcome signs of energy; he is hustling the Lancashire cotton industry into setting its obsolescent house in order, and he clearly intends to press vigorously for new methods and closer collaboration with labor in all the old, staple British trades not earmarked for nationalization. At the Ministry of Fuel, too, Mr. Shinwell is creating an encouraging "go-getter" atmosphere. Having removed all pains and penalties for absenteeism, he is appealing to the miners to work hard for the community, and has tried the interesting experiment—on "poacher-into-gamekeeper" lines—of appointing a Communist miners' leader, Mr. Arthur Horner, as national production officer to step up output. But save for these two, and setting aside for the moment Mr. Bevin's efforts in the political strip-poker sessions of the Big Five, Ministers have tended, during the recess, to slide out of sight. "What are 'our men' doing?" ask the electors.

They are asking this not least of the Minister of Health. Popular, dynamic, self-opinionated, and the "star" performer of the left wing in debate, Aneurin Bevan has been given a portfolio whose dual-compartmented size he may rue. Not only has he got to evolve a National Medical Service in the teeth of opposition from the diehards of the British Medical Association; he has also got to make good the worst shortage of all—houses. So far, except for a limited number of prefabricated "temporaries," building has quite simply not begun, and winter, with bad weather for building operations, is close ahead. Mr. Bevan has decided not to license any luxury construction and to give no subsidies for privately built houses until insistent working-class demands for houses to rent have been met. The question is: who is to do the building? The Minister is credited with the intention of relying entirely on municipalities as his building agencies. (Actual construction, of course, would be carried out under contract by private firms.) The difficulty, however, is that municipalities cannot obtain from their already burdened rate-payers the money needed for interest on the immense fresh capital involved, that their technical housing staffs are scattered through the armed services, and that as the building workers are, very slowly, demobilized, they drift back to their old homes and employers without regard to the fact that present-day building needs, determined as they are by war damage, do not correspond at all to the pre-war geographical pattern. If the local authorities prove a broken reed, as may well be the case, Mr. Bevan will probably have to have recourse to a National Housing Corporation—controlling mobile labor and the resources of the big war contractors—to supplement municipal efforts. But of this there is as yet no hint; nor is there evidence of the walls of a single permanent house going up.

Aneurin Bevan

Add to these "slow-motion" impressions the government's failure, so far, to announce definitely that old-age pensions are to be raised before all the lengthy "Beveridge" legislation is through, or to meet complaints that many elderly people are dying before they get their compensation for "total-loss" war damage or can cash the some-day-repayable "credits" due on account of war increases in the income tax. Add, again, the fact that the Compensation for Industrial Injuries bill is found to be identical with that drafted by the Caretaker government and to provide benefits quite unacceptable in trade unionists' eyes. Add, if you like, the government's "caginess" over the awkward, unsolved problem of how workers are to be attracted into essential but low-wage export industries when the unpopular powers of labor "direction" are, as promised, rescinded. All this totals up to a lot of minor disappointments.

Underlying these particular causes of discontent is the government's lack of good "public-relations" sense. Broadcasting to a nation made up, be it remembered, of pretty tired people faced with pretty drab living conditions, Mr. Attlee adopts the style, Olympian yet deflating, of a pedestrian Pericles preaching "patience." Herbert Morrison as always has been talking sound economic sense, with refreshing robustness; but by and large Ministerial speeches since Parliament adjourned have been chilling: difficulties rather than the resolve to overcome them have been the keynote. And there has been a signal and damaging failure to organize, so far, any machinery for giving the country what in its present sober mood it wants above all else—the hard facts about practical problems: food and raw-material stocks, shipping resources, numbers needed for armies of occupation, and so forth. Journals as divergent in policies as the Times and the New Statesman have been urging the government to realize that without a better supply of factual information it will be impossible to obtain sustained, intelligent co-operation from the electorate in the difficult job of reconversion. Not, perhaps, wholly in vain: it seems likely that a Bureau of Information headed by a respected Labor journalist will be set up, attached to the Cabinet offices. But the question how Ministers are to keep their policies alive in people's minds and project the affairs of state vividly into the common man's home remains to be answered.

The Tories, of course, are quick to see that their best hope lies in exploiting the rift—narrow as yet, but significant—between the Cabinet and Labor rank and file. In the expansive mood of the after-dinner stage they will tell you that Churchill, who can be feline as well as swashbuckling in debate, counts on producing in a year or two a situation in which the Labor front bench, irked by back-bench mutinies, will "do a MacDonald," ask for a dissolution, and after an election form another "National" coalition. This is wishful day-dreaming: the Labor Party is much too solid for such a split between "moderates" and left wing to be likely, and the Cabinet is of very different stuff from the men of 1931. Moreover, the Tories, in these fond calculations, are leaving one important factor out of account: whatever disappointment may be felt by restive Socialists at hesitant, "look-before-you-leap" progress on the home front, developments in foreign affairs look, on a short view, as if they would rally Labor voters, and many others, solidly behind the government.

In the light of the Foreign Secretary's peculiar achievements up to date this may sound paradoxical. In one sense it is. In the judgment of every liberal-minded person who has an inkling of what has really been happening, Mr. Bevin is a disaster. Not only has his attitude toward Greece and his brusque disregard of the Resistance in Europe lowered our stock among our best friends on the Continent; he has been largely to blame for the series of head-on disagreements which prevented the Lancaster House conference of the Big Five from achieving one single constructive settlement. Obsessed by the narrow idea that communism is inherently inimical to the trade unionism which gave him power, he supported—and, indeed, encouraged—Mr. Byrnes in offering blank opposition to every Russian proposal, good or bad. His hope, apparently, is thus to secure American backing for his conception—not so very different from Mr. Churchill's—of British imperial interests, a conception which has led him to claim a naval base in Eritrea, to refuse to cede Hongkong on any terms to the Chinese, and generally to join with elephantine gusto in the present big-power game of animal grab, at the cost even of alienating the British dominions.

But though this is the view of a small "informed" minority, it would be an error to suppose that the picture looks like this to the mass of Labor supporters. Staunch friends as they are of the U. S. S. R., they are inclined to listen when they are told that Mr. Molotov is a bit dictatorial. Above all, they are stoutly determined that British policy at home shall not be determined by Wall Street. Nothing wins louder applause at Labor meetings than the assertion that Britain must "stand on her own feet"—and, if need be, do without American food, petrol, tobacco, and films. Mr. Shinwell gets orchids for insisting, in his oil pact with Mr. Ickes, that Britain must have the right to "regulate" imports, a proviso which, incidentally, makes nonsense of the "non-discriminatory" professions of the agreement. Halifax and Keynes are immensely popular because it is believed, rightly or wrongly, that they are taking a "tough" line in Washington. No one yet dares to ask, at least in public, the question whether Britain is now a big-enough power to be able to afford truculence. So Mr. Bevin gets away with it, in the role of a downright, "penny-plain" Socialist Palmerston, ready to "take on all comers."

It will be ironical if the first Labor government to hold real power atones, in the public eye, for timidity and inertia in domestic issues by defending valiantly, against both American capitalism and Russian communism, a social democracy which it is doing little as yet to make Socialist or democratic. But then, the pen which writes history is often dipped in gall.

France Swings Socialist

BY ORESTE ROSENFELD

(Editor-in-chief of Le Populaire, organ of the Socialist Party of France)

Paris, October 4 (by cable)

FRANCE has entered into a month-long election period. Cantonal elections took place on September 23 and 30; on October 21 French voters will go to the polls to elect a Constituent Assembly.

The cantonal elections were for the purpose of choosing the General Councils. These councils have no voice in the big problems of domestic and foreign policy; their sole concern is local administration. In the past they designated the Senators, that is, the members of Parliament's upper chamber. But the Senate provided for by the constitution of 1875, which enjoyed the same prerogatives as the Chamber of Deputies, no longer exists, and the new constitution will certainly not resuscitate it, at least not in its old form. In general, therefore, the cantonal elections are not political.

This time, however, the situation was different. Many of the pre-war general councilors had betrayed France by entering the service of Marshal Pétain. Thus the elections offered the voters a choice between the spirit of the Resistance and the spirit of Vichy. The Resistance won: pro-German collaborationists, anti-republicans, anti-democrats were swept out of office; the reactionary and conservative parties, which had compromised themselves during the occupation, were smashed. The Radical Socialist Party, whose record is not without blemish, emerged from the contest greatly reduced in strength. What is more, the whole liberal-capitalist regime was found bankrupt. The French people voted for the parties which stand for a profound reform in the structure of government and against the parties which would preserve the social status quo. Thus the usually "non-political" cantonal elections took on a sharply political and social character.

The Socialist Party won the greatest victory. It received more than a fourth of the votes cast and a similar proportion of the seats. The Communist Party ran a close second in the popular voting, but the system of double-balloting worked against it in the matter of seats. The Socialists, with slightly less than four million votes, gained 800 Council seats; the Communists, only 370. The Radical Socialist Party—the party of Messrs. Herriot and Daladier—lost a third of its seats; the reactionary parties, half of theirs. On the other hand, a new party, the Christian Democratic Party of Foreign Minister Georges Bidault, emerged as an important political force. It obtained 12 per cent of the votes and 230 seats.

These figures are eloquent, and yet they do not give a true picture of the situation. Personal factors played an important part in the elections and blurred the meaning of the results, particularly in certain districts where the voters supported well-known candidates, notably Radical Socialists, who had built up a following over a long period of years. Actually the country is farther left, more Socialist in temper, than is revealed by the election figures. This fact will emerge clearly in the elections for the Constituent Assembly, which will not be conducted by the double-balloting method but by a system of proportional representation in each department. They will not, however, result in true proportional representation, such as the Socialists and Communists have demanded, for despite the efforts of the three Socialist Ministers and contrary to the advice of the Consultative Assembly, the De Gaulle government has set up an electoral law which distorts the meaning of proportional representation. As a result, the number of Socialist and Communist seats in the new Assembly may not correspond to the number of votes those parties receive at the polls, for the less populous agricultural regions are favored at the expense of the industrial centers. However, the disparity should not be too great, particularly if the Socialist sweep which is indicated materializes.

Both the Socialist Party and its leader, Léon Blum, have tremendous popular support. The French people like clarity. The Socialist Party offers them a clear program, logical and daring: it calls for a sovereign Assembly whose job it will be to draw up a democratic constitution, for the abolition of monopolies, and for thoroughgoing economic reforms, including the socialization of key industries, natural resources, and credit. In foreign policy the party favors collective security. It has neither concealed nor camouflaged its aims.

The same cannot be said of the Communists. Their domestic program fails to face squarely the problem of socialization of industry; their foreign policy appears equivocal on the critical question of collective security. Their influence has suffered as a consequence of the position taken by the Soviet Union at the meeting of the Foreign Ministers in London, which collided with the position of the French delegation. Moreover, the Communist Party has entered into an electoral alliance with the Herriot Radicals. And finally, in many localities the Communist candidates are running on two tickets—Front National and Union des Républicains. Frenchmen do not like such camouflage, and it is reasonable to believe that the Socialist Party will register further gains on October 21. That does not necessarily mean that the Socialists will have a clear-cut majority. They foresee the necessity of a coalition government which will include the Communists and perhaps the Christian Democrats, provided the latter do not oppose the system of secular education to which the Socialists are firmly committed.

How the Nazis Stay In

BY SAUL K. PADOVER

(Historian and political scientist; during the war a member of the army's Psychological Warfare Division)

IT WAS in Aachen that MG first acquired practical experience in governing Germans, and the methods used in Aachen were apparently so satisfactory that they were applied in other cities, notably in Munich. The fact is that MG made a thorough political mess of Aachen, and had it not been for war-time censorship, the American press would have had a scandalous story to spread before the public.

Aachen is no longer within the American zone, but the tale of what happened there last winter provides the necessary background for understanding what is going on in Munich this autumn. It is also, of course, a part of the strange MG saga. I shall relate it here, as briefly as I can, for the first time.

MG's first act in setting up a civil government in Aachen last October was to consult the Bishop, and for many days afterward no step was taken without the advice of the head of the church. It was the Bishop who not only proposed but also introduced Franz Oppenhoff to MG. Oppenhoff was made Oberbürgermeister with the specific assurance by MG that the American army would have no objection to the employment of Nazis; he was given full powers to hire anybody he chose. Thus allowed a free hand, he chose eight Bürgermeisters to serve under him—as compact a clique of ultra-reactionaries and fascists as could be found anywhere in Germany.

Oppenhoff was undoubtedly an interesting character. I spent many hours in conversation with him and found him to be a vigorous and aggressive individual who knew exactly what he wanted. He had been a lawyer for the Aachen diocese and for the Veltrup works, the biggest armament plant in the region. To his credit be it said that in the terrorized thirties he was one of the few lawyers in Aachen with the courage to defend in open court Jewish firms and Catholic clergy. Like most of his colleagues, Oppenhoff was neither a Nazi nor a democrat. He was a fascist in the original sense of the term, in the same sense that Mussolini was a fascist, or Dollfuss, or Franco; and he did not hide his convictions but proclaimed them with passion and vehemence.

Oppenhoff was a believer in the Ständestaat, the authoritarian corporate state with a paternalistic small-scale industry based upon a hierarchical, unfree labor system. He favored a labor force consisting of skilled artisans and divided into masters and apprentices, with the masters in absolute control. His fear of labor was an obsession, almost as great as his fear of political parties. He wanted to see workers placed in fixed categories, without any right to political action or economic demands. "Only such a system," he told us, "can prevent agitations, votings, and elections. This is my idea of democracy, true democracy. This is my philosophy, and I tell you honestly I would refuse to appoint anyone to any responsible post who did not share my basic ideas."

The reason he collaborated eagerly with the Military Government was his fervent hope that for a decade at least Germany would be spared political parties and trade unions. "Gott sei Dank," he said to us, "that the Military Government and not the Germans will rule. Government by the military will exclude all talkers, politicians, and agitators." His hatred of labor was so intense that he pleaded with us not to make any appeals to German workers under any conditions. "You must promise them nothing, nothing."

The men with whom he surrounded himself were anti-democratic and anti-labor and anti-Russian, and some of them were anti-Ally. The roster of these men, operating under the protection of the American flag, is impressive. The Bürgermeister for Labor, Gerhard Heusch, was a Wehrmacht major who had done occupation duty in Pskov, Russia. A member of five Nazi-affiliated organizations, he was exposed by the Counter-Intelligence Corps but defended by Oppenhoff and retained by MG. Army Intelligence finally arrested him as a potential war criminal. The Chief of Police, Schefer, had spent the period of the war working for the Wehrmacht in Berlin. The Bürgermeister for Law and Administration, Pontesegger, was an Austrian Russophobe who had been an ardent follower of Dollfuss. The Bürgermeister for Schools was a chauvinistic clericalist and church politician who had not seen the inside of a school for some forty years. The City Treasurer, Pfeiffer, was a wholesale merchant who had joined the Nazi Party in 1933 and then became a member of five Nazi-affiliated organizations. The Bürgermeister for Housing and Construction, Mies, the least reactionary of the Oppenhoff appointees, had been a manager of a war industry in Cologne and was decorated by the Nazis with the Kriegsverdienstkreuz in 1943. The Bürgermeister for Food and Commerce, Hirtz, was a rich textile manufacturer who hated labor and loved Nazis; he told us that had it not been for the Jewish blood of his mother he would not have stayed out of the party—rumor in Aachen had it that this unsavory reactionary had tried persistently but vainly to join. The Bürgermeister for Economic Affairs, Faust, was an armaments engineer and a dour fascist. Finally, Oppenhoff's executive assistant in charge of personnel, a man with the strange name of Op de Hipt, was a high official in the Veltrup plant and a notorious informer who was responsible for the denunciation of foreign slave laborers to the Gestapo and perhaps for even worse deeds.

There was not a Social Democrat, a democrat, or a liberal in any top position, or in any secondary position, or in any third-rank position, although in the last free election, in 1932, Aachen had voted 20 per cent Social Democratic and 5 per cent Communist. Of the seventy-two key positions, so defined by Oppenhoff himself, twenty-two were held by Nazi Party members. One of these, an official named Anton Felser, was placed in charge of licensing food shops, a vital post. Herr Felser issued sixty-three licenses—thirty of them to Nazis or their wives. As a consequence Aacheners said bitterly, "Under the Americans you have to be a good Nazi to get permission to open a business"—a gibe about 50 per cent true. Another individual in an influential secondary position was Bolognini, a member of the Italian Fascist Party and one of Aachen's big war contractors, who had a rotten record as an employer of foreign labor. Oppenhoff appointed him to the potentially fat job of municipal building contractor. Upon the insistence of CIC a few Social Democrats were made policemen.

The people of Aachen, the overwhelming majority of whom were anti-Nazis, as they had proved by their defiance of S. S. attempts to evacuate them, viewed the situation with dismay. In the absence of established channels of communication, rumors multiplied the evils of the government a hundred-fold, although the bare truth was bad enough. People saw the massive Regierungsgebäude, once the home of the Gestapo, occupied by a new group of German masters, whom they dubbed variously the "clique" or the "Herrenklub," and they asked cynically what difference there was between Nazi rule and American rule. Two intelligent middle-class girls whose father was in a concentration camp said to us: "It's the same old racket. But nothing can be done about such things in Germany. Germans have always been like that, and they will always be. We ask ourselves why a city of 11,000 people needs eight or nine Bürgermeisters? Before the Americans came, we had one Bürgermeister with one assistant. Now these Herren drive around in official automobiles while there is no gasoline to transport necessities for the people." And a Social Democratic worker, whose fifteen-year-old tubercular son was working on a public body-burying detail, at a time when members of the middle class were not forced to do communal labor, remarked: "We imagined it was going to be different. The British radio had said that all the Nazis would be wiped out. Now you see them everywhere in fine jobs and opening up stores."

The army's alert CIC investigated the situation, was alarmed to find so many Nazis and ultra-nationalists in power, and recommended their dismissal. MG, however, stood on its rights. The primary task of CIC being military security, it could recommend dismissal on the ground that an individual was a threat to the army, but it had no power to enforce its recommendation. To take the bite out of the Nazi-hunting CIC, MG appointed its own Special Branch to make separate investigations—as if there were any doubt about these men.

It turned out, however, that MG's own Special Branch made exactly the same recommendations as CIC, and so did my two colleagues and I when we were sent in to make an independent survey. All of us, separately and together, pointed out that the Oppenhoff administration was a reflection on America's intelligence and on the Allies' integrity. But Oppenhoff, the shrewd lawyer, and MG, his patron, had tied up things so cleverly that it was virtually impossible to rid the administration of undesirable characters. "Once a man is in office," an exasperated Special Branch lieutenant remarked, "it takes blasting to get him out."

The way the bureaucratic mechanism worked reminded one of a Rube Goldberg cartoon, except that it wasn't funny. A typical case would be that of Herr X. Oppenhoff appointed Herr X. CIC, in the course of its routine security check, found that he was a Nazi and recommended his dismissal. The name of Herr X was then sent to Special Branch for scrutiny. Special Branch approved CIC's recommendation and wrote out an "Action Sheet." The Action Sheet was sent to the MG head, who sent it to the American officer in charge of the department that employed Herr X. If this officer agreed with the recommendation, which he frequently did not, he forwarded the Action Sheet to the German chief of his department. The latter then took up the matter with Oberbürgermeister Oppenhoff. And Oppenhoff rushed to see the MG Officer and protested that Herr X was absolutely "indispensable." Oppenhoff, moreover, reminded the MGO that he had been originally assured the right to hire and fire whomever he pleased. As a rule, the MGO took Oppenhoff's word that Herr X was "indispensable" and retained him in office. There were 750 employees in the Oppenhoff administration, all of them more or less "indispensable."

On the rare occasions when the MG Officer braved Oppenhoff's displeasure and dismissed an objectionable individual, the Oberbürgermeister calmly appointed him to another position. When that happened, the whole cumbersome machinery was set in slow motion again—CIC, Special Branch, Action Sheet, MGO transmittal, American officer's recommendation, German division chief's complaint, Oppenhoff's protest—and in the meantime the official remained in power despite CIC's insistence that he was a threat to military security. A case in point was Dr. Brehm, one of Oppenhoff's Nazi friends whom he placed in a key post in the police department. CIC, objecting strongly to a Nazi in so strategic a position, put up a fight and had him kicked out. Oppenhoff then obtained for Brehm a license to practice law in Aachen, the first issued. CIC protested, and the license was revoked. Oppenhoff then made Brehm chief of the important Wohnungsamt (Housing Bureau). Again CIC, with the backing of Special Branch, managed to force him out. I left Aachen soon afterward and do not know where the ubiquitous Brehm turned up next. A similar case was that of Dr. Görres, an active Nazi Party member who had earned the Nazi commendation of Wehrwirtschaftsführer (Leader of War Industry). For this reason Oppenhoff and MG appointed him City Manager of Trade. CIC was able to have him dismissed, but he was given another job, this time not by Oppenhoff but by the MG legal officer, who made him technical consultant to investigate the affairs of an American corporation in Aachen.

Why did MG behave in such a strange way? Were MG officers consciously pro-Nazi? I think not. I am convinced that it was a case of political ignorance and moral indifference. They not only knew nothing about German problems or the German language, but with one or two exceptions they had no understanding of or interest in the causes and problems of the war, and hence no feelings about Nazism, either for or against. They were men who should never have been put in MG positions in the first place. Politically color blind and completely insensitive to the moral questions involved, they thought mainly of efficiency, and when they were told that a given Nazi or reactionary was "indispensable," that clinched the case for them. After we sent in our shocking report to Headquarters, the responsible MGO was summoned before his superior, a West Point colonel, and told sharply to clean out the Nazi-nationalistic gang. The MGO returned to Aachen and did very little. A few of the small fry were dismissed. As for the rest, MG officers argued that it took time to find qualified non-Nazis to replace the "indispenable" men. They made no sincere effort to locate non-Nazis.

After Oppenhoff was assassinated last winter—at the instigation of his own colleague Faust, the fascist armaments engineer, according to my informed Aachen friends—MG appointed Pontesegger, the Austro-fascist, to his place. I do not know whether he is still there, now that Aachen is under the British. Men of good-will can only hope that the British MG is a little more concerned with democrats and a little less tolerant of fascists than the American.

Six months after MG went into Aachen, it entered Munich and duplicated its earlier performance, but this time on a much vaster scale. As in Aachen, so in Munich the first thing MG did was to consult the head of the church. This time it was not a bishop but a cardinal, and the one was no greater lover of democracy than the other. Cardinal Faulhaber is reported to have described the democratic Weimar Republic in 1928 as founded on "perjury and treason"; now MG took his advice in setting up a civil administration. The Cardinal had the reputation of being anti-Nazi, but a Catholic priest who has spent years in concentration camps told friends of mine that "Faulhaber's activities against the Nazis were much overrated."

As a result of his influence MG handed over power to men of one political party, the reactionary Bayerische Volkspartei, on the assumption that it was truly representative of overwhelmingly Catholic Bavaria. The record, however, shows that the B. V. P. was actually a minority party, smaller than the Social Democrats. The figures of the last democratic election, that of November, 1932 (the election of March, 1933, was not representative, since it excluded the Communists), show that the Catholic B. V. P. polled only 25 per cent of the total vote, while the Social Democrats got 29 and the Communists 10 per cent. Today there is reason to believe that the Social Democrats have retained their strength and the Communists gained a considerable following.

The B. V. P. under the leadership of Oberbürgermeister Scharnagl, a figurehead, and Bürgermeister Stadelmayr, the real ruler, kept itself and its friends in power by means of skilful maneuvering. Of the eight department heads appointed by Stadelmayr, two were B. V. P. (Berrenburg and Ochs), one was non-partisan (Hamm), one was a Social Democrat (Preis), and four were Nazis (Meitinger, Keller, Kleeblatt, and Hindelamm). When the question of forming a new city council came up, Scharnagl chose the year 1929 as a base on which to apportion the candidates. In that year the Munich council of fifty contained seventeen Social Democrats, twelve B. V. P.'s, and three Communists, the rest being Nazis and Nationalists. Since this would have given the parties of the left twenty seats as against twelve for the B. V. P., Scharnagl asked the Social Democrats to cut their representation to ten and the Communists to two. The rest of the posts he arbitrarily apportioned among business and religious circles, and thus effectively smothered the left.

In setting up the provincial administration the B. V. P. under Minister President Friedrich Schäffer used similar tactics. The left was systematically kept from power, either by the appointment of the oldest and most weak-kneed Social Democratic politicians, whom even the Nazis could not find dangerous, or by procrastination. Four sexagenarian Social Democrats (Rosshaupter, Preis, Schieffer, and Wimmer), so tired and disillusioned that they were always muttering, "It could be a lot worse," were appointed to unimportant positions. Young and vigorous men of that persuasion were kept out of office. As early as last May 22 President Schäffer told the discontented Social Democrats—the Communists did not enter the picture—that if their chief, Dr. Wilhelm Högner, would return from exile in Switzerland he would be given any post he desired in the Bavarian ministry. Early in June Dr. Högner arrived in Munich, but nothing happened. It was not until General Eisenhower shook up the whole Bavarian administration late in September that Högner emerged from the obscurity to which the B. V. P. had relegated him and took over power.

Under Schäffer and Scharnagl the church exercised great influence. Schäffer was always in the company of leading church personages, including Cardinal Faulhaber. "Never," said one Social Democratic official, "have so many churchmen been seen in the Rathaus as now."

The policy of the church and the administration toward the Nazis, militarists, and reactionaries in Bavaria, I shall discuss in my next article.

[This is the third of a series of articles by Mr. Padover on Military Government in Germany.]

What About This Bureaucracy?

BY RUTH LANDES

(Miss Landes's Washington experience was in the Office of the Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs and the FEPC. Previously she had been a member of the Anthropology Department of Columbia University.)

PRESIDENT TRUMAN'S announcement that he intends to overhaul and streamline the multitude of offices in the executive branch of the government and the start already made in the Labor, State, and Commerce departments have raised the old cry of "Washington bureaucracy." This epithet has long been thrown at New Deal officialdom, and especially at the war-created agencies. It is used most freely by those who feel that the set-up in Washington—it may be the OPA, the WLB, the WPB, the Department of Agriculture, or some other agency with wide regulative authority—is agin' them. It is an opposition term, a pejorative that says plainly that Washington procedures are usually incompetent, often unnecessary, and possibly suspect.

Where there is this smoke, there must be some fire. The opposition may be hitting too hard and too wide, but it has something to hit at. Government employees in Washington are out of touch with responsible public opinion. Indeed, they are supposed to remain out of touch in order to retain their official integrity. The Hatch act penalizes frank political activity, and a Congressional statute of 1874 withholds the suffrage from the District of Columbia. Generally speaking, appointed officials in the executive branch of the government cannot give unauthorized speeches or interviews or receive formal recognition of their personal accomplishments. (They are not even supposed to receive a gift at Christmas time from a person of subordinate classification.) All assertions of individual thinking, whether in speech or writing, are discouraged by the requirement that they must first be submitted to a member of the legal or public-relations staff or to a supervisor. Study and reflection about the job are belittled on the ground that federal agencies are committed to action, not to planning programs.

The theory appears to be that government officials are simply anonymous exponents of agency policy. The responsible force is the administration, not the officials through which it acts. This is true not only of individual administrations like the AAA or the Veterans Administration or the War Department, but of the whole grand federal Administration. The reason why the theory falls down, and government officials are called bureaucrats—which often means "autocrats"—is that anonymity of this sort is thoroughly irreconcilable with the political practice of democracy. Anonymity of the bureaucratic type belongs properly in a totalitarian sphere of reference, where it is generally understood that an official is not a responsible authority, and where the public knows that it has no right of criticism.

What happens in Washington is that officials grow more and more remote from the flow of public needs. Paper work stacks high on their desks, and all communications must be handled through so-called "channels." One is in the government only a short time before one runs smack against "channels." In my case, it happened the third day after I was hired. I had to interview the newly appointed chief of a newly created emergency office, and the interview was arranged by the familiar device of phoning for it. Everything seemed fine, until some time later my boss was taken to task by the head of the personnel branch of an over-all agency. He said it was his job to clear such arrangements as I had made by telephone. It appeared that everybody involved in that interview should have been certified by this official, who to our uninitiated understanding had no discernible connection with it.

Knowing no freedom from "channels" after that, I understood the electric significance of an item printed several months ago to the effect that Mr. Stettinius, then Secretary of State, had substituted telephoned communications for routed paper work. (The WPB in its earlier period also encouraged the use of the telephone to expedite "preparedness," but this realistic procedure was soon superseded by tradition.) "Channeling" means recognizing authority while stressing anonymity. It means that no step can be taken without informing or inquiring of the person next highest in authority, who then passes it higher up, and so on. This is all done in writing, and as the desks are already piled high with memoranda, any particular communication may require some time for clearance, and occasionally gets lost.

Swamped with paper work, confused by forms, forbidden to exercise initiative or their critical faculties, office-holders are also protected from exposure to criticism. This is accomplished by that wall of anonymity which sometimes seems to the public like irresponsibility. When criticism or question appears in the press, most officials cannot answer except through channels. Most of them prefer not to answer under such circumstances, especially as it is bad form to come too often to the notice of the administrators. So little of self-esteem is allowed indeed to many federal officers that they look to sources like the lists of the old Dies committee for assurance that they still matter. Only last year a Washington official showed me proudly a copy of testimony filed with the Dies committee about his alleged subversive opinions.

It is a striking commonplace that most government workers in Washington complain of chronic fatigue—in spite of the fact that they enjoy very superior conditions of work. They have good food, good incomes, good medical facilities, ample sick leave and recreational and even mental-hygiene facilities. I imagine that this fatigue is a form of neurosis resulting from the suppression of practically every manifestation of their personality. Psychiatrists, including a former chief of the mental-hygiene section of Selective Service, believe that our nation's capital is an enclave of personality disorders.

Though anonymity is a shield against criticism, it is linked with an insecurity of employment that does not help morale, and that can contribute to arbitrariness. People are often dismissed without notice, and no one knows where the lightning may strike next. The agencies and the Civil Service Commission provide appeals machinery, but the procedure involves such delays that some plaintiffs prefer to forgo their rights. Since their personal opinions are usually the cause of their dismissal, they feel that they are made to suffer more humiliation than they find it necessary to tolerate.

There is also uncertainty about promotions. It is a mystery why a hard-working official of proved capacity should be passed over while another with no obvious qualifications is promoted. In this anonymous sphere there should be a machine-like progression of promotion. I believe there is some such theory, but under the war program men have been suddenly jockeyed up out of nowhere. There was the young man, twenty-seven years old, with merely high-school and clerical experience behind him who was suddenly presented with a $4,225 job—about which he did have the grace to express embarrassment. There was the union official brought in as a labor adviser at a superior salary, though his qualifications were confined to the field of union organization, who waited around while abler heads rolled in the gutter and finally found himself in the very top job in his department.

Anonymity is the basic evil in the Washington administrations. Possibly it once was desirable; it was part of the philosophy of small, peace-time agencies when government was largely a symbol of federation and touched the lives of voters at few points. But government in the executive branch has grown vastly since then. The hand of government is felt now in most of our major preoccupations. Who is responsible for the acts of the appointed officials?

Theoretically and ultimately the President is responsible, as the head of the executive branch of the government. Whether the agency has been created by executive order or Congressional enactment, the top executive officer is nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate; the staffs are hired through the Civil Service Commission. The immediate responsibility for carrying out the program of the various agencies rests with the staffs, that is, with those whose salaries range from about $8,000 a year down to $2,300. They are the technicians, the statisticians, the letter-writers, the lawyers and reviewers, the field investigators, the prosecutors. They are "the government."

By the nature of federal administration they are removed from the real situations in which the general citizenry finds itself trapped. They tend to seek solutions through paper work and closed conferences. This evil is less prominent in the field offices that are set up close to local problems and often staffed by local men. Washington has no roots in local situations. It is only the central office, to be appealed to when local facilities cannot handle a problem. The local staff feel local pressures and try to respond to them; their reputations can be made or marred there. The personal fortunes of Washington officials are touched only when the four-year cycle of Presidential elections wheels around. Then they may get thrown out. Yet even this cannot touch them professionally. They know that they are thrown out not because of their performance but because of party fortunes.

Under our present system, I doubt that the opposition could improve the performance if it filled all the posts with its own men. The remedy does not lie in a mere substitution of Mr. Brown for Mr. Smith. Washington officials are unreachable and consequently can be irresponsible because of the administrative philosophy that refuses to allocate responsibility to them. In no other career or scheme of organization are men conscious of so meager a sense of belonging, of contributing.

Our administrative system is outmoded. It clashes with modern notions of the procedures proper to a democracy. It smothers responses and adjustments to the country's changing needs. And it is a waste of much good human material selected conscientiously to handle our problems.

In the Wind

SCIENCE: "Every sensitive humanitarian," says a letter in the San Francisco Chronicle of September 26, "has reacted in horror to the savage atomic bomb. As a socialistic project under a New Deal brain trust of starry-eyed professors it is a flagrant example of the dangers of government meddling in the field of free enterprise. These same reformers now want a federal department of science to allow these same dreamers to continue their experiments, the end in view being, no doubt, to develop such new cheap sources of power as to undermine our way of life under private enterprise."

RELIGION: The Camelback Inn, Phoenix, Arizona, states in a brochure, "Clientele is rigidly restricted to 125 Gentiles. Priding itself on the quality of its patrons, the inn's 100 per cent restricted policy has met with wide approval from old guests."

MEDICINE: Lonnie Hearon, a sixteen-year-old Negro, was badly burned in a gasoline fire at a Memphis garage on September 26. In response to a call a private firm sent an ambulance to take him to a hospital. But it was an ambulance for white people only, and when the driver saw that the victim was a Negro he left him lying on the ground and drove away. An ambulance for Negroes came some time later. Lonnie Hearon died next day.

GOVERNMENT: Tamon Mayeda, who was Japan's Minister of Education in the Higashi-Kuni government and has been reappointed by Premier Shidehara, was formerly director of the Japan Institute, a pre-war propaganda outfit with offices in Radio City, New York.

QUESTION: William E. Laurence of the New York Times, who observed the effects of the atomic bomb in New Mexico and over Nagasaki, stated recently, "Atomic energy is here to stay; the question is whether we are."

STRIKE! "If we are really serious about sometime inculcating the Japanese with our democratic doctrines," said the New York Herald Tribune on September 26, "baseball would seem to be an excellent way to start."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. One dollar will be paid for each item accepted.]

BRITAIN: THE MIDDLE KINGDOM

BY CYRIL CONNOLLY

London, October 1

I AM writing on a sunny morning in my new house in Regent's Park. It is in a terrace of twenty-six houses, twenty of which are uninhabited. All suffered from bomb damage last summer, and the labor and expense of rendering them habitable is greater than the Borough Council will allot, even to private individuals who would pay for it themselves. One or two homeless people may be able to find a way around the regulations, but the majority of these lovely Nash houses will be turned into government offices by the Office of Works. I have been in my house since July but have not yet been able to take a bath there. For three months I have been down on a gas-and-electricity and a coal merchant's list. When one of these can supply me, preferably the coal merchant, I shall feel properly installed, but I shall still be without curtains, chair-covers, and stair-carpets, for all these materials are rationed, and only those who have been bombed out or have been married since the war are accounted in sufficiently grave plight to receive them. Before me stretch the 600 acres of Regent's Park, half of which is closed to the public till next summer because the turf over the bomb-disposal craters has not yet grown and because there are no chestnut stakes to make fences around them. I am smoking a large ladies' cigarette about six inches long, which I was lucky to find on sale, and reading the New Statesman. I stop to meditate on this sentence from the editor's diary: "Up at Smethwick the other day, where Patrick Gordon Walker is fighting the first of the autumn by-elections, I was amazed at the roar of approval which greeted the suggestion that we must stand on our own feet, even if this means tobacco rationing and fewer films next year. If it goes on being tough and outspoken to the Americans, the Labor government stands to score its first really big victory." My first reflection, inspired by my six-inch cigarette, is horror of the Anglo-Saxon puritan complex, in which the victim derives more pleasure from saying no than yes, and which makes it possible—in a country where everyone wears braces—for the idea of "belt" to suggest immediately the pleasure-reflex "tighten." Next I wonder if the incident means that this country is profoundly anti-American. The answer is, certainly not, and I think that by explaining what is behind the crowd's approval I shall be able to illustrate the present mood of England clearly enough to justify this long digression.

The power of a country is the power of its industrial potential, its coal-iron-oil. All "realists" accept this. But it is also more, and it can best be measured as a combination of coal-iron-oil with man-power and with an intangible, the validity of its myth. Where the myth is weak—as in czarist Russia or the old Austrian Empire, or France today—statistics are meaningless. The American myth, which I will call dollar democracy, is very strong, for it is a passionate belief in the union of liberty with comfort. Liberty makes you enjoy life. Comfort makes you forget death. An excellent combination. The Russian myth, equally powerful, is Stalin's invention, Blimp Communism—a collective economic socialism without liberty, wrapped in the flag of whichever nation accepts it. What is the English myth? A long pause. One knows what it used to be. The great, just, generous, free-trading, respectable, battleship-crowned British Empire of the nineteenth century. Then the last surviving form of that, the aristocratic green-lawns, gold-plate England of Baldwin and Chamberlain, with the City breathing appeasement, profit, and old port over a grateful world. That, too, has gone. And now there is only the last myth—the "finest hour," "blood, toil, and sweat"—the myth of 1940. That still is strong, and any appeal to it—stand up to Russia, do without America, and so forth—is always valid. But it is not constructive, and when we try to find a myth which corresponds to our temperament, abilities, and geographical situation we see how badly dented has been the British "persona," "soul," or "way of life" by American dollar democracy.

The American myth is so sympathetic to us that we have largely absorbed it, without unfortunately having the necessary resources to keep it up. Yet we cannot continue on this road without becoming a backward American state. Hence our desire to shake off the insidious American domination and to recreate a robust myth of our own. The Labor government is part of this myth—it reminds us not so much of the nineteenth century, whose splendor is over, as of our seventeenth century, when we were the most politically advanced country in the world, the home of Pym and Hampden and Cromwell, of the Levelers, Milton, and Locke. It is a proof that our political vitality is strong and that we can settle down to shaping a regime which is neither capitalist nor totalitarian and which reflects our unpretentious position as the middle kingdom. When we have forged an ideology in which we, our dominions, and Western Europe can believe, we shall have established an Atlantic civilization which will stand for the creativeness of the Western mind, with a planned security in which the harmonious relation of the individual to society is discovered to be a greater source of happiness than wealth, comfort, and tyrannous competition. It is because we feel, however dimly, that we are on the way to this, and that in this or perhaps the next Labor government we have chosen the right instrument, that there is such widespread optimism, and even excitement, to be found in all classes in England beneath our surface irritation and fatigue and our pessimism about immediate prospects.

It would be pleasant to prophesy a renaissance in the arts, but I do not think that is likely to happen until the rewards of our political vision and economic planning have been established. Culture, to develop, requires a free mind and a full stomach, and there are still too many millions here without either. Thus although we talk about civil aviation, it is still quite impossible for most civilians to get anywhere near an aeroplane; we boast about the great tourist center England is going to be on the assumption that the tourists are going to come from all the countries where we allow no tourists ourselves, and that when they do arrive they will be delighted with the aggressive absence of comfort, manners, and taste which will be their welcome, and with that gloating "no" which is rapidly becoming our national greeting.

What effect has a Labor government on the arts? So far, of course, none. And in the near future it will have very little. What effect will the arts have on the Labor government? is a better way to put it. The Conservative attitude to the arts was ambivalent. Conservative politicians were reasonably well educated, and they knew something about art and literature—but they liked the arts to "keep their distance." Labor politicians know less but perhaps respect the arts more; and certainly are more aware of their possibilities as propaganda. But let us be practical. What is the highest level in each Cabinet at which a lover of the arts is found? Churchill, for instance, though a writer and painter, detested "intellectuals," whom he thought responsible for decadence, defeatism, and a Hamlet-like indecision over such obvious questions as India. Beaverbrook remarked that "there was no place for culture in war time" (conversely, there is now no place for him). Are things now any better? Bevin holds much the same view about intellectuals as Churchill. Morrison is reported to have said that he had no use for "the long-haired merchants"; his opening speech at the exhibition of painting by firemen was in our best philistine tradition. Professor Laski, fairly close to the very top, is our first prominent intellectual. On the lowest slopes of the pyramid, however, among the young M. P.'s, are several genuine lovers of art, and Labor's victory was certainly also largely due to the immense influence of small left-wing papers edited by intellectuals.

But there is a great deal more to be done. The state has got to take patronage over from the old aristocracy and from the merchant princes who are now too poor to maintain it, and the state must also learn to how be a wise, detached, and generous patron, not a slaughter-house for making propaganda sausage. In matters of taste, as in many matters of policy, the present government is far behind the people who elected it. Thus the year has witnessed a real revolution in English taste. The modern movement has won the battle; composers like Benjamin Britten, painters like Graham Sutherland, sculptors like Henry Moore, difficult poets like T. S. Eliot and Edith Sitwell, who seemed in the pre-war years to be buried under mountains of breezy humorists and complacent second-raters, are now almost national figures. They owe their large audience to the victory of serious critics and art-promoters such as Herbert Read, Sir Kenneth Clark, Edward Sackville-West, John Lehmann, and Stephen Spender over a motley collection of Conservative naggers, Vichy-type academicians, and opulent Fleet Street hacks. The danger is now from other directions. The best writers and painters are fast becoming the "best people," exposed to the terrible temptation of respectability. But if enlightened socialism gives England a myth in which it can believe, its artists will believe it too and, despite themselves, become responsible. Fortunately, the peerage is still many years off for most artists, who remain deprived of leisure, privacy, nobility, paper, paints, and canvas.

. The sun is sinking behind the terrace, and I am still without my bath. Besides, there is an antipathy between artists and governments. Politicians do not take to the "long-haired merchants," who seem to achieve money and even fame without working for them, while artists, for their part, are not over fond of the dupes of power, of those men who, whatever their party, have apparently forgotten that they are going to die.

THE JEW IS A MYTH

BY KAY BOYLE

LET us take Madison Square Garden as parallel. It will serve as proscenium, not for the pomp and tomfoolery of the circus, not for the streaming, stampeding panic of the rodeo, but for a quite humble pageant of incarceration. For within Madison Square Garden will be inclosed eleven thousand Polish and Russian Jews. These Jews will have been arrested at their homes in New York City, will have been rounded up by the New York police in their apartments, rooms, tenement dwellings, where they have been living for a number of years. Entire families—old people, some of them scarcely able to walk, babies carried in their parents' arms—will be brought to Madison Square Garden, and they will be given the benches to sit on, but they will be forbidden to circulate in the empty arena below. There they will remain, seated, awaiting the performance which is never to take place, for they themselves are the performers as well as the spectators.

"The tide rose," writes an eyewitness of the scene. "The ring of misery widened hour by hour, invaded the amphitheater, reached to the roof, and came down to the row of boxes. Fresh files of people carrying suitcases surged through the dark entrances and were at once seized and devoured by the benches. . . . Everyone was seated and could sleep only seated. . . . Sleep thus lost its hours, its rights, its substance." As the hours passed, no food was provided, there was no question of washing. "By the end of the first day," continues the report of the eyewitness, "the latrines were full and overflowing. . . . There were a large number of women among the prisoners. . . . They menstruated. Soiled, ashamed . . . they searched everywhere for newspapers . . . they stained with blood the already impossible latrines. . . . Sickening pools spread everywhere. An intolerable stench filled the vast amphitheater and dishonored it." The first intermission in the performance will come on the fourth day, when certain of the spectator-performers, such as women in labor and persons actually too ill to be moved, will be evacuated either to hospital or to concentration camp.

Such a performance did take place. The date of its opening night was July 16, 1942, and it was not staged at Madi-

A Life-in-America Prize Book

The nation is a rope of many strands. If one strand is frayed, this rope is that much weaker. Few would deny that, but many willfully chafe those strands.

The analogy holds no further, for the strands are men and women — the rope lives, it is possessed of a powerful tendency to grow stronger. The parted strands eagerly reknit whenever, wherever unequal friction is removed.

We are a nation of many cultures. Diversity has been our strength. We are founded upon belief in individuality and the power of cooperation.

We are built on the idea that races can learn the love of liberty and the responsibility that goes with it. Out of this comes an unimagined vigor, a rich flow of art and science, a towering originality of form and power of disinterested thought which make the nation what it is: One nation, indivisible so long as there is liberty and justice for all.

ONE NATION is a book about some of the minority peoples who have meant so much to American culture. It is a book that takes you deep into Chinatown and Pachuco shack town, into the back slums of Chicago, and out upon the Navajoes' prairies. In pictures and by word, it shows how these peoples react to bad treatment and to good treatment at the hands of other Americans.

One Nation

BY WALLACE STEGNER AND THE EDITORS OF LOOK

At all bookstores. $3.75 HOUGHTON MIFFLIN COMPANY · PUBLISHERS

One of the most controversial books we have ever published

THE GERMAN TALKS BACK

By HEINRICH HAUSER
With an Introduction and notes by HANS J. MORGENTHAU

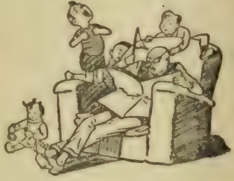
SOME critics have called this book "dangerous" We believe it would have been more dangerous to suppress it or ignore it. For this, like Mein Kampf, is a warning to America and the world. THE GERMAN TALKS BACK presents a German's point of view towards the war his country lost, towards his conquerors, and towards the future of Western civilization. The author professes to repudiate Hitler, but his mentality typifies that which made Hitler possible. Angry, contentious and unrepentant, his book will nevertheless be, for many Americans, their first realistic contact with the way Germans think. It is of vital importance to us and to the world that we understand them before we try to re-educate them. $2.50

Пáпа кепт кам
Papa kept calm



If you see the connection between these two sentences, you'll be

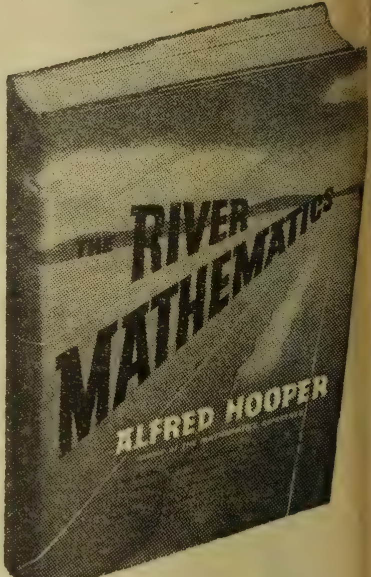
TALKING RUSSIAN

BEFORE YOU KNOW IT

BOTH sentences are pronounced alike. But one is in Russian characters. That's the secret of this new book by MORRIS H. SWADESH which can teach you to speak Russian the effortless way, by simplifying the biggest obstacle—the alphabet. Once you've mastered that, Russian is as easy as any other language. And this unorthodox little handbook makes it fun. Illustrated with cartoons, $1.75

HENRY

Reading this book is as easy as π*



THROUGH 4,000 years—from the finger-coun ing of primitive man to the calculus of Newtc and the wonders of modern science—this deligh ful outline of the history and techniques of mat ematics is as pleasant to read as it is instructiv

Among other things, it will tell you how tl pyramids were built by an ingenious Egyptia some slaves, and a rope; who first stumbled ov the decimal point; and many other curious ar fascinating things. It will appeal to everyone wi a sense of wonder.

401 pages, indexed. 300 illustrations, 4-pla tables, and materials for making a practice slid rule. $3.7

A Greek letter used in mathematics, and pronounced p*
(as if you didn't know)

THE RIVER MATHEMATICS

By ALFRED HOOPER author of THE MATHEMATICS REFRESHER

LT BOOKS

"One of the year's important books about music."—Atlanta Journal

Florestan

THE LIFE AND WORK OF

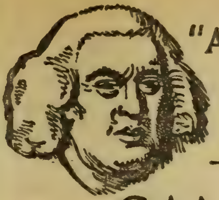
ROBERT SCHUMANN

by Robert Haven Schauffler

author of THE UNKNOWN BRAHMS

"I am ready to cheer . . . A stirring book, made the more useful by a list of Schumann's recorded works and separate indexes of his instrumental and vocal compositions."—JOHN ERSKINE in the N. Y. Herald Tribune. "Fascinating . . . A must for all musical people."—TED ROBINSON in the Cleveland Plain Dealer.

574 pages, illustrated, $3.75



"A literary event of the first importance."

—Philadelphia Inquirer

SAMUEL JOHNSON

A biography by

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

RARELY has any book by an American biographer won such acclaim. "No one who delights in good biography can afford to miss it." — GERALD W. JOHNSON in the N. Y. Herald Tribune. "Superb, brilliant, immensely readable."—Philadelphia Inquirer. "Witty and perceptive. Deliberately inclusive and written with love."—Boston Globe.

599 magnificent pages, 4 indexes, $3.75

"Brilliant...A lesson for Americans to ponder."

—N.Y. Times Book Review

TIN HORNS & CALICO

By HENRY CHRISTMAN

Introduction by CARL CARMER

THE thrilling story of an unknown American revolution —New York's Tin Horn Rebellion of 100 years ago. "Documented history as thrilling as any novel."—St. Louis Globe-Democrat. "A deeply significant American story."—Louis Adamic. "It would be difficult to recommend it too highly." —Minneapolis Tribune.

377 pages, illustrated, $3.75

HENRY
HOLT
& COMPANY
257 FOURTH AVE., NEW YORK 10

son Square Garden in New York but at the Vélodrome d'Hiver in Paris. During the first days and nights of its run news of these mass arrests spread through the city, and a number of doctors, "nearly all Jews," volunteered their services to care for the eleven thousand prisoners. Among this group of doctors was the eyewitness quoted above—Dr. Charles Odic, not a Jew, but a Catholic of Breton stock.

"Only the children remained something like children," Dr. Odic writes in his book.* "They played, they ran about. If one looked closely, their games were not the usual kind. Invented as a necessity, they hid a deep distress of which I later had numerous proofs." They played, at least, until they succumbed to tuberculosis, to pneumonia, to starvation, or to the "furious epidemic of measles" which broke out in the Vélodrome d'Hiver. "As I leaf over the entry book, there is a T. B. mark against almost every name on every page," writes Dr. Odic when he follows some of these victims to Drancy. "When at last a doctor had an opportunity to listen, the child was lost. It could not be sent anywhere for a change of air. If Jews pay taxes even when the state has deprived them of all means of livelihood, they have no right to sanitariums. Vichy drove out all who were patients in such places. . . . Some day one coughs up a little patch of poppies, and then one arrives at the end of a journey so ill begun, a journey that might have ended so differently from in horror at the bottom of a pit of hate."

From this document, which deals with the despair of countless people, emerges an army of terribly living, unforgettable individuals. On these pages, which record the anguish of an entire race, is set down the shameful story of the Jews of France. "French to the core," writes Charles Odic, "Israel of France had the honor to bear our Cross when it was heaviest. What better patent of nobility!" There is Bertha Fraidrach, three years old, who must stand there naked in her bed forever, forever demanding that her mother be returned from her gas-chamber fate; there is Gaby Feld, who, "as she disappears under the arches of Death becomes Gabrielle," "a little Jewess, as humble as a violet in the woods, who Hitler had not foreseen would perfume her adopted country with the odor of her suffering"; there is Henri Krasnopolski, thirty months old, who explains to the doctor that the new-born babies crying near by "are not crying about the cocoa, but because they want their mommies who have been taken away." And then one day, our eyewitness writes, a child does not leave its bed. "By evening it is delirious. It still breathes, it breathes too hard, its little carcass wriggles on the straw, but its mind gallops afar on the swift courses of fever. It has broken its halter and escaped."

Dr. Odic, who was himself finally imprisoned in Buchenwald, holds no place in the world of contemporary French literature. Although he has written a book, he cannot be said to belong to any of the recent schools of French expression and thought which have been divided into "the literature of collaboration, the literature of occupation, and the literature of resistance." And yet how futile, when compared with his testimony of action and of faith, appear the rhetorical discussions of a "littérature engagée" and a "littérature dégagée"! How beggarly the cautious subtleties of a Gide written in the time of France's occupation! How utterly beyond debate the debatable roles that Guitry and Chevalier played! I believe that if no other book had been written in France during the years of its defeat, if no other book about those years had been made available to us here, Charles Odic's modest volume—revealing as it does the stature of its author—would alone serve as final answer and rebuke to the contemptuous doubts which have been advanced concerning the quality of French principles and French probity.

> The Jew is a myth [Dr. Odic concludes], the myth of German impotence. There is no more useful myth.
>
> The Jew exists because I have failed. Every time I fail, it is the fault of the Jew. Each of my failures shows the pattern of the Jew, and all these patterns make up "international Jewry."
>
> A German has a nightmare. On awakening it is the Jew that he accuses.
>
> "He wanted to ruin me, to soil me, to kill me."
>
> "Who?"
>
> "The Jew who hovered over my bed last night. That one, I recognize him."
>
> "That cannot be, he was elsewhere."
>
> "Then that one. All of them, for if it was not he, it was one of his."

Burning the Letters

Here in my head, the home that is left for you,
You have not changed; the flames rise from the sea
And the sea changes: the carrier, torn in two,
Sinks to its planes—the corpses of the carrier
Are strewn like ashes on the star-reflecting sea;
Are gathered, sewn with weights, are sunk.
The gatherers disperse.

Here to my hands
From the sea's dark, incalculable calm,
The unchanging circle of the universe,
The letters float: the set yellowing face
Looks home to me, a child's at last,
From the cut-out paper; and the licked
Lips part in their last questioning smile.
The poor labored answers, still unanswering;
The faded questions—questioning so much,
I thought then—questioning so little;
Grew younger, younger, as my eyes grew old,
As that dreamed-out and wept-for wife,
Your last unchanging country, changed
Out of your own rejecting life—a part
Of accusation and of loss, a child's eternally—
Into my troubled separate being.

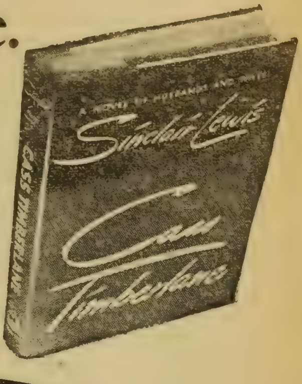
A child has her own faith, a child's.
In its savage figures—worn down, now, to death—
Men's one life issues, neither out of earth
Nor from the sea, the last dissolving sea,
But out of death: by man came death
And his Life wells from death, the death of Man.
The hunting flesh, the broken blood
Glimmer within the tombs of earth, the food

---

* " 'Stepchildren' of France." Roy Publishers. $2.50.

Sinclair Lewis

has written many great novels in his time, but none so frank as this one. It reveals with tenderness and relentless satire what is happening to American marriage.



A NOVEL OF HUSBANDS AND WIVES
Sinclair Lewis
Cass Timberlane
CASS TIMBERLANE

Cass Timberlane

A NOVEL OF HUSBANDS AND WIVES

390 PAGES, $2.75
A BOOK-OF-THE-MONTH
CLUB SELECTION

RANDOM HOUSE
20 E. 57th ST., NEW YORK 22
Publishers of the Modern Library

Of the lives that burrow under the hunting wings
Of the light, of the darkness: dancing, dancing,
The flames grasp flesh with their last searching grace—
Grasp as the lives have grasped: the hunted
Pull down the hunter for his unused life
Parted into the blood, the dark, veined bread
Later than all law. The child shudders, aging:
The peering savior, stooping to her clutch,
His talons cramped with his own bartered flesh,
Pales, flickers, and flares out. In the darkness—darker
With the haunting after-images of light—
The dying God, the eaten Life
Are the nightmare I awaken from to night.

(The flames dance over life. The mourning slaves
In their dark secrecy, come burying
The slave bound in another's flesh, the slave
Freed once, forever, by another's flesh:
The Light flames, flushing the passive face
With its eternal life.)

The lives are fed
Into the darkness of their victory;
The ships sink, forgotten; and the sea
Blazes to darkness: the unsearchable
Death of the lives lies dark upon the life
That, bought by death, the loved and tortured lives,
Stares westward, passive, to the blackening sea.

"Will make intellectual history"
—JOHN COLLIER in the N. Y. Herald Tribune

THE Governing of Men

THE LESSONS OF JAPANESE RELOCATION

By LT. COMDR. ALEXANDER H. LEIGHTON, Medical Corps, U.S.N.R.

The Japanese Relocation Center at Poston, Arizona, provided this trained psychiatrist and anthropologist with a unique chance to observe human beings under stress. The recommendations of his objective report are equally pertinent to problems of race and labor relations, civil liberties, relief and rehabilitation.

"Absorbing, illuminating and permanently valuable." —Chicago Sun. "Recommended for all who want a better understanding of minority problems."—New Republic. Sponsored by the American Council, Institute of Pacific Relations.

40 photos, 420 pages, $3.75

At your bookstore
PRINCETON
UNIVERSITY PRESS

In the tables of the dead, in the unopened almanac,
The head, charred, featureless—the unknown mean—
Is thrust from the waters like a flame, is torn
From its last being with the bestial cry
Of its pure agony. O death of all my life,
Because of you, because of you, I have not died,
By your death I have lived.
The sea is empty.
As I am empty, stirring the charred and answered
Questions about your home, your wife, your cat
That stayed at home with me—that died at home
Gray with the years that gleam above you there
In the great green grave where you are young
And unaccepting still. Bound in your death,
I chose between myself and you, between your life
And my own life: it is finished.
Here in my head
There is room for your black body in its shroud,
The dog-tags welded to your breastbone, and the flame
That winds above your death and my own life
And the world of my life. The letters and the face
That stir still, sometimes, with your fiery breath—
Take them, O grave! Great grave of all my years,
The unliving universe in which all life is lost,
Make yours the memory of that accepting
And accepted life whose fragments I cast here.

RANDALL JARRELL

The American Style

THE AMERICAN LANGUAGE: SUPPLEMENT I: AN INQUIRY INTO THE DEVELOPMENT OF ENGLISH IN THE UNITED STATES. By H. L. Mencken. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

MR. MENCKEN has grown weary of the recurring task of ripping apart and rewriting "The American Language." He has gone through the process three times, and the third revision he has described as "almost appalling." It resulted in what was virtually a new book, almost two and a half times as long and inestimably better in scholarship than the original edition of 1919. All this is simply the penalty that attaches to writing a book so good that it can neither be superseded by the work of another nor be allowed to fall into obsolescence. Mr. Mencken's feeling is understandable but unfortunate, for it has led him into making an awkward compromise. Persuading himself that the projected fifth edition, running to an estimated 2,000 pages, would be too long for comfort, he decided to keep the fourth edition of 1936 in print and to add a supplementary volume to bring it down to date. The supplement, however, grew under his hand, and what is now published is merely the first half. "Supplement II" is promised, "if all goes well, in about a year."

"Supplement I" parallels the first six chapters, or shorter half, of the parent work and adds 789 pages of text and index to the 809 of the 1936 edition. "Supplement II," it is safe to predict, will be at least as long. The end product will be an overgrown work—a veritable Handbuch in the unforgettable German manner—of approximately 2,400 pages, needlessly long, expensive, and inconvenient to use because of frequent references from one volume to another for the treatment of a single topic, and because, also, of the necessity of consulting three separate indices. The author has done his best, however, to make the supplement easy to use. The order of topics is the same as in the original, and an ingenious set of bracketed catch-lines and quotations keeps the two volumes in complete alignment. There is remarkably little repetition of matter. The publisher's claim that "Supplement I" "may be read without reference to its predecessor" may be literally true, but it is not a procedure to be recommended. Incidentally, I am happy to say, the necessities of war time have compelled Mr. Knopf's designers, doubtless much against their will, to use paper of appropriate weight and thickness, with the result that "Supplement I" is lighter, compacter, easier to hold, and altogether comelier than "The American Language."

"Supplement I" corrects some errors in "The American Language" and sometimes adds more material from sources already utilized, but its chief function is to fit into the old framework the new materials made available during the past ten years. These include not only the huge miscellany forwarded to Mr. Mencken by his clipping bureaus, friends, and correspondents in all parts of the globe, a unique and valuable contribution by itself, but the "Dictionary of American English," the "Linguistic Atlas of New England," and such lesser yet formidable works as Berrey and Van den Bark's "American Thesaurus of Slang," the third volume of Thornton's "American Glossary," Ramsay and Emberson's "Mark Twain Lexicon," Fries's "American English Grammar," Kenyon and Knott's "American Pronouncing Dictionary," and Wentworth's "American Dialect Dictionary."

The mere enumeration of these works serves to show how the study of American English has advanced in recent years. Perhaps the chief service rendered by Mr. Mencken's first venture into the field, the "preliminary inquiry" of 1919, was its exhibition of an untilled field and its lampooning of American linguists for their neglect of their native speech. Mr. Mencken, fuming over his revisions, supplements, and indices, has got what he asked for, and in getting it he has made an enviable host of friends glad to share with him their observations and knowledge. His book testifies not only to his own industry but to his power to enlist the help of others and his punctilious courtesy in acknowledging it.

"The American Language" and "Supplement I" deserve, in a general way, all the praise that has been heaped upon them. Yet it is fatally easy to mispraise them. They are not a great original contribution to the study of American English. With the passing years Mr. Mencken has acquired a wider and more detailed knowledge of the field than is possessed by any professional scholar that I can name, and none of them could have written a book on the subject that would be half as interesting to the general public. Yet his scholarship, genuine though it is, remains doggedly unprofessional, unscientific. He is a lexicographer of the line of Johnson and Webster, endlessly curious about words and people, not a linguist like Henry Sweet or Edward Sapir, who pursue a more complex and elusive subject. Mr. Mencken's book—to take "The American Language," "Supplement I," and the projected "Supplement II" as a single work—is more pro-

Nationalism and After
By
Edward Hallett Carr

International organization, says Professor Carr, must have "a higher ideal than orderly stagnation." In this timely and stimulating essay he analyzes the development of nationalism in the past, describes its crisis at present, and discusses the possibility of a workable internationalism for the future, based not on the security of nations but on the welfare of individuals. Professor Carr is the author of the widely discussed Conditions of Peace. $1.25

Food or Famine
By Ward Shepard

Here is a revolutionary plan for meeting the most gigantic and complex economic task confronting men—the task of reconstructing the world's broken-down soils and river systems. Mr. Shepard describes soil erosion, the most insidious and destructive scourge of civilization, and suggests how it can be overcome by national and international action. Illustrated. $3.00 found as a study of style than of language. He is little interested, it seems to me, in language as structure and mechanism; he is absorbingly interested in it as a revelation of the minds of its speakers. That is the great value of his book, and, from the linguist's point of view, its limitation.

At your bookstore
THE MACMILLAN COMPANY

GEORGE GENZMER

Pull Dick, Pull Devil

SAINTS AND STRANGERS. By George F. Willison. Reynal and Hitchcock. $3.75.

ARTEMUS WARD said, "I believe we are descended from the Puritans, who nobly fled from a land of despotism to a land of freedom, where they could not only enjoy their own religion but prevent everybody else from enjoying his." Ward was a fairly low humorist in a period of dowdy local humor, but he managed to say that at a time when it badly needed saying. You will find this note at the back of the book, with many others that are just what notes should be, true marginalia, illuminating sparks flying out from the main narrative, sly, witty, apropos, full of health and purpose. Don't miss the notes; and you will also do well to take a look at the selected bibliography, if for no other reason than that you will think twice before rushing into an enterprise like this. In spite of the easy reading, this is a work of long-suffering scholarship. As a student of the period, having read more than two thousand "items" on that and related subjects, I assure you that when you have read it, you will know all you need to know, now or ever, about that group of early American settlers now called the Pilgrim Fathers, their lives and hazards in the Plymouth Plantation.

Whatever else Mr. Willison does in his career of writing, teaching, editing, it would be useful and heroic of him to abandon everything else and devote his days to clearing up and putting in shape other murky, demon-haunted spots in American history. As a nation we are in danger of becoming myth-ridden to a point where our true story will be lost. Rarely have I seen a handsomer job of imposing chronological order, narrative sequence, and the plain facts of the matter on utter chaos than in this book. It is a pattern for writing from documentation, and is the first completely understood, coherent account, in all its large importance and pettifogging, abject detail, that I have seen not written by a specialist for other specialists. The large importance takes care of itself: the story is told in terms of personal experience, of human relationships on every plane of society, event modifying event, character striking sparks from character; and the eternal conflicts and sympathies between religion, economics, and politics could hardly be more clearly and fairly presented.

These English emigrants from Holland by way of England were not, it seems, Puritans in the technical sense of the word. That title belonged to the later theocrats of Massachusetts Bay. The Pilgrims were not theocrats, either; they were Separatists in every sense: separated from other Christians by God's own election; separated from the mummeries and superstitions of the Church of England; separated from the things of this world, so far as they were able. This turned out to be the most difficult clause. They began with fairly definite notions of communal property interests, a ban on profits and usury, a more or less clear division between the secular and the religious office. So far so good; but during the long years of hardship in Holland that mere handful of not very imaginative or intelligent people had gone maggoty-minded with their troubles and the religious manias of their time, and had reached the benumbing conclusion that they were God's Chosen and nobody else at all was in His favor. In time they became so Elect they could no longer mingle with their fellow-men on any reasonable terms. They got so they could hardly endure each other, for they were all saints but no two in the least alike, and such uniqueness is more than the human soul can bear, the terrible spiritual pride of Chosenness brought to its dead end. They really had the effrontery to call themselves Saints. And their fellow-voyagers outside the Discipline they called Strangers.

Nothing could be less true than that they were looking for religious freedom in this country. This is a myth of later times; freedom of thought and of conscience as we regard them were abhorrent to the Pilgrims. They had religious freedom in Holland, but so had everybody else, and this was a condition intolerable to them. In England their activities were treasonable: in liberal Holland they were mere economic liabilities and social nuisances. During that time they must have learned that no religion has any real power without the support of the state. Their intention, they believed, was pure and unworldly: they were to restore the Golden Age of primitive Christian unity and simplicity of announces a new issue

TWICE A YEAR
$2.00 Clothbound: $2.75

FOREMOST BOOK OF ITS KIND IN AMERICA

DOUBLE NUMBER
XII-XIII
1945

FULL DOCUMENTATION on INTERNATIONAL ISSUES:
United Nations Charter; Bretton Woods; Inter-American Conference; Big Three Conferences and Agreements; Cartels; International Bill of Rights; International Office of Education; Nazi Atrocities; First World War Documents; etc.

ANDRE MALRAUX: Interview
RICHARD WRIGHT: Exchange of Letters
HART CRANE: Collected Prose
POETRY: MUMFORD, BORGESE, RUKEYSER, STARK—and 6 New Poets

DISCRIMINATION IN AMERICA: SPECIAL SECTION
FULL EMPLOYMENT—SOCIAL SECURITY—CIVIL LIBERTIES

ITALY: SALVEMINI, TOSCANINI, BORGESE, VENTURI, etc.

FRENCH RESISTANCE
INDIA—EAST-WEST

ANGNA ENTER JOURNAL
PHOTOGRAPHS—STORIES

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS DIARY
LOUIS SULLIVAN: DEMOCRACY

Editor: DOROTHY NORMAN
Assistant Editor: MARY LESCAZE

Order Direct from TWICE A YEAR PRESS, 509 Madison Avenue, New York City
(Or from any Bookstore)

faith. That such an age had never existed made no difference—they would restore it. They needed for this great spiritual undertaking a new country, economic independence and stability, and a body politic of their own devising. They moved toward this goal slowly and painfully, making all the blunders and self-defeating errors of men divided in their minds. After years of the most hysterical quarreling and religious scandals among themselves, political ruses and stratagems never quite successful, a long drama of cross-purposes, cheats, double-dealings, ineptitudes, and false starts in their dealings with the merchant adventurers who were trying to make of them a profitable commercial enterprise, a company of 102 men, women, and a preposterous number of children set sail on the Mayflower in September, 1620.

Nobody had enough money or clothes or bedding or supplies of any sort. The Pilgrims, having been farmers or artisans, had decided to become fishermen, but they did not bring enough fishing gear even to supply fish during their periods of starvation. The farmers had not brought any agricultural implements to speak of, and had forgotten the first year's supply of seed corn. The artisans had not proper tools of their trades. The saltmaker on whom they depended for salt to cure the fish they were going to catch without any tackle couldn't, after all, make salt. He had only said he could. I have mentioned the large number of children. It may occur to more than one reader as he follows Mr. Willison through the almost unbelievable series of disasters that follow that the children might have managed things better.

Not all the Voyagers were Saints by a long shot, and that made trouble. Nearly half of them belonged to the category known to the Fathers as Strangers. These were for the most part well-meaning, fairly well-behaved persons who had been christened in the Church of England and like any decent churchman had never given the matter another thought. Even in mid-voyage the Saints began harassing and oppressing them into the Holy Discipline. The struggle was to go on for years, and Mr. Willison follows every step of it to the bitter end. For example, take the threatened mutiny on board the Mayflower just on the point of landing. Bradford tiptoes over this in his account, but Mr. Willison ferrets out the names and histories of the malcontents, and places the incident in its proper relation to the celebrated covenant drawn up by the Separatists and signed by all or nearly all on board. This agreement has been romantically described as the first charter of American freedom, which it was not, nor was ever meant to be. It was an instrument designed to bind to obedience the dissenting classes, represented by indentured servants, hired men, and a few of the more respectable Strangers who showed fight at the last uneasy moment.

Mr. Willison quotes from the records with splendid effect, turning on, now and then, in the midst of his own easy colloquial prose that noble Elizabethan English in which some very paltry aims and dubious sentiments and questionable motives were disguised in phrases that lift the heart in a momentary and largely misguided impulse of belief and sympathy. As for rebuke and fault-finding, downright slanging, there was never a better language for it. Everybody who could write at all had it at pen's point; they were as "IS America becoming an armed pirate like Germany? Have we lost all our illusions?" These are some of the questions asked by the soldier hero in this new novel by JOHN DOS PASSOS.

Here is all the blood, sweat and agony of the great war monstrosities, as well as the sweetness of human liberty.

FIRST ENCOUNTER

By JOHN DOS PASSOS

Just Published $2.00

AT YOUR BOOKSTORE, OR ORDER DIRECT

PHILOSOPHICAL LIBRARY, Publishers
15 E. 40th St., Dept. N N. Y. 16, N. Y.

Please send me...... .copies of FIRST ENCOUNTER, by John Dos Passos, at $2.00 per copy. Enclosed are $.........

NAME........ ....

ADDRESS...........................

H. G. WELLS—
Prophet of
the Atomic Bomb

Read his latest book:

"CRUX ANSATA — An Indictment of the Roman Catholic Church"

An historical summary of the Catholic Church's political intrigues leading to its tie-up with the Nazi-Fascist-Shinto Axis.

Cloth Binding $1.75 Paper-covered $1.25

Also get a copy of

"BEHIND THE DICTATORS" by L. H. Lehmann

A fully documented analysis of Vatican-Fascist collaboration.

Cloth Binding $1.75 Paper-covered $1.00

COMBINATION OFFERS
Both Cloth Bound Books $3.00
Both Paper Bound Books $2.00

New Pamphlet

"VATICAN POLICY IN THE SECOND WORLD WAR"

48 pages of Documented Facts 25c

Free to those who return this ad with their order for the above books

Order From:

AGORA PUBLISHING CO., Dept. O-51
229 WEST 48TH STREET NEW YORK 19, N. Y.

loquacious as the Greeks and as censorious as Puritans, and it makes wonderful reading.

With all this admirable work, done with such human tenderness and natural good humor, with all the virtues of the book as history, Mr. Willison has succeeded brilliantly in every detail but one: he has not been able to make his Pilgrims attractive, either as saints or sinners. But if God Himself could not do this, or at least did not choose to do so, our historian may well be content with his achievement and his readers with him. For myself, they are no forefathers of mine, and I still feel about them as the Dutch did, and large numbers of their fellow-Englishmen, and most of their contemporaries in other regions who shared the furious labors of settling this country and founding this nation. Their virtues are simply not great enough to overbalance their disturbing lack of charm. And I wish I might never have to hear again that they brought the idea of political and religious freedom to this country. It got in in spite of them; and has had rough going ever since, which is the fault of all of us. KATHERINE ANNE PORTER

BRIEFER COMMENT

Virginia Woolf's Fiction

SO MUCH OF JOAN BENNETT'S study, "Virginia Woolf: Her Art as a Novelist" (Harcourt, Brace, $2), consists of long quotations that the jacket candidly declares that "as an anthology of Virginia Woolf this book has its special pleasures," a sentence which illustrates a happy ability to find a silver lining. Indeed, Mrs. Bennett forces one to reflect upon how frequently the weak critic makes quotation a substitute for and escape from critical analysis. If one is prepared to wade through large blocks of Mrs. Woolf's prose which are better encountered in her novels, and if one is patient enough to drag one's mind through countless trite formulations—"the experience of love, like the experience of death, is shown in Virginia Woolf's novels as part of the pattern of human life"—then it is possible to come upon a few just observations.

In general, however, though Miss Bennett has chapters dealing with such matters as character, form, and values she makes little use of the important critical means: the generalization of the recurrent preoccupations of an author, the definition and evaluation of the work through comparison with other authors, and above all the employment of a sense of time, place, and society. Mrs. Woolf's rejection of the realism of Arnold Bennett and H. G. Wells, her obsessed concern with being a woman, the over-literary and over-lyrical quality of her style, and the extent to which she made the soliloquy the center of her work—these are matters of which one is merely reminded by Mrs. Bennett's book. One is also reminded of Virginia Woolf herself, for the quotations as such suggest the image of some marvelous soprano who from the darkness of old phonograph records sings passionately and pathetically that life is beautiful, noble, and tragic, that no one knows anyone, and that we are all forever lost. DELMORE SCHWARTZ

Pictures and Prattle

ALMOST THE SOLE MERIT of Sidney Janis's "Abstract and Surrealist Art in America" (Reynal and Hitchcock, $6.50) is that it prints the names and reproduces, among other things, the paintings of several advanced artists whose work deserves to be better known. Its text, however, is lamentable. This compost of exalted prattle ("New realities are symbolized which transcend commonplace representation; the secret life of the object; the dynamics of an expanding universe; etc., etc.") and irresponsible pronouncement ("Science is the open sesame of twentieth-century art, and artists have entered where angels fear to tread") is not new. A good deal of French writing about art since Faure exhibits it. But only lately, with the migrations of the surrealists and the expatriates, has it begun to show in English writing. Not that we don't have our own brand of flapdoodle, but it has been so closely associated with the rejection of modern art that it has long since lost its credit. The danger in rhetoric of Mr. Janis's sort (compare the art dealers on holiday who used to fill the text pages of the Cahiers d'Art) is that it sounds up to date and comes packaged with reproductions of Picasso and Mondrian.

There is no use quibbling: art writing has a bad name at present, and rightly. In no other field—except politics and perhaps music—can one get away with such hokum in print. The reason is obvious. There has not yet matured a body of good taste within the art world that could call to account statements made in public about art. If such a control were present, the patient work Mr. Janis has put in as a collector would not have been frustrated, for the purposes of this book, by audacities of language and sense committed simply because the license for them was found in contemporary practice. CLEMENT GREENBERG

From the Amoeba to G. M.

IN THE COURSE of a year I plow through a great deal of propaganda for private enterprise. It is business seldom alloyed with pleasure, for few of the authors combine sincerity with ability to write. One of the exceptions, with whom hitherto I have been able to enjoy disagreeing, is James Truslow Adams, and it is with real regret that I have to report that his latest book, "Big Business in a Democracy" (Scribner's, $2.75), is a badly bungled job. It is poorly organized, it rambles, it repeats itself ad nauseam, it indulges in cheap sneers at opponents, and it abounds in personal anecdotes which often serve to tangle the threads of argument rather than draw them together.

The trouble, perhaps, is that Mr. Adams has bitten off more than he can chew and allowed himself no pause for digestion. He sets out to prove that big business in America today is not only essentially different from big business anywhere else at any time but is the very web and woof of American democracy. This is an idea which, as he says, must be viewed in perspective, and in order to get the right angle on it he goes back a billion and a half years to the beginnings of geological time. From this vantage-point he whirls through history, tracing social evolution from the amoeba to the highest form of business life—General Motors—to whose glories nearly half his book is devoted.

This biggest of big businesses, we learn, is a truly democratic, public-spirited organization. Its executives, all recruited from the ranks, labor ceaselessly to provide the community with more for less. Its labor relations were exceptionally smooth, despite its anti-union policy, until the "notorious" Wagner act encouraged agitators to invent grievances for its employees. During the war, like most other American businesses, it has performed prodigies of production with no thought of profit. If this statement were true—a recent War Production Board report showing that 1944 industrial profits exceeded those of 1929 appears to contradict it—it might seem to conflict with Mr. Adams's belief that the only effective incentive to effort is the hope of gain.

Admittedly, General Motors, once the government had overcome its reluctance to abandon normal business, made an impressive record in war production. But when Mr. Adams harps on the technical achievements of this and other big businesses he misses the point made by the progressive economists he despises. The charge against private enterprise is not that it falls down as a producer but that it has failed to evolve a system for continuously distributing its product and, as a result, is in perpetual danger of choking itself to death. This aspect of the "free-enterprise system" cannot be dismissed, as Mr. Adams dismisses it, with a contemptuous reference to "new thinkers."

KEITH HUTCHISON

Dr. Merriam Sums Up

THE DEAN OF AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENTISTS, Charles E. Merriam, has gathered together the fruits of a life work in "Systematic Politics" (Chicago, $3.75). Every problem of government is fruitfully discussed, and every perplexing issue is illumined by a mind which is informed not only by a lifetime of study in the academic disciplines but by long experience in practical affairs of government.

A strongly optimistic note runs through the whole study. Professor Merriam declares: "I am assuming the infinite perfectibility of man. I am assuming the validity of the continuing creative evolution of mankind in the direction of higher levels." Purely deterministic theories of historical development are rejected for more voluntaristic conceptions of human progress: "Governmental processes are not merely wormlike squirmings in which men are enslimed without gains or goals but are parts of a process of transition from darkness to light, from slavery to freedom, from drift to mastery."

Dr. Merriam is certain that since "our expanded knowledge of the nature of human personality, of the habitat of man, the characteristics of population, etc., is far more extensive and intensive than was available in the days of Aristotle, Bodin, and Montesquieu," we must therefore be "in far better position to appraise and utilize the personal, geographic, ethnic, economic, and social factors establishing the needs and conditions of political association and human progress." And he closes his study with the hopeful words: "The greatest of all revolutions in the whole history of mankind is the acceptance of creative evolution as the proper role of man, for this will eventually transform the spirit and

"A novel in the heroic tradition . . . the finest fiction we have had in many months."

—Harry Hansen, N. Y. World-Telegram

THE WHITE TOWER

by James Ramsey Ullman

"A rousing, spectacular adventure story . . . wild and free and genuinely thrilling . . . Agonizingly real, breathlessly immediate, chilling in its suspense, The White Tower is grand reading."—Orville Prescott, N. Y. Times. $3.00

519,000 COPIES IN PRINT

A Book-of-the-Month Club Selection

At all bookstores

J. B. LIPPINCOTT COMPANY
Philadelphia New York

the institutions of education, of industry, and of government, opening a broad way to the realization of the finest and highest values of human life."

Within the framework of this optimistic appraisal of the course of human history the book abounds in shrewd analyses of detailed political problems and illuminating discussions of general principles. But is the framework adequate in a day when we are not at all sure that we have the political instruments with which to prevent the atomic bomb from becoming the means of our mutual annihilation? Is this optimism warranted in an age in which the experience of two world wars has not yet given us the resources to establish the kind of world order which will prevent such wars?

One reads such a great work with gratitude for all the wealth of wisdom which enters the discussion of detailed problems but with a sense that the task of establishing a genuine community within the framework of a technical civilization is more difficult and the road toward the goal more tortuous than the author assumes. REINHOLD NIEBUHR

VERSE CHRONICLE

Lewis and MacNeice

C. DAY LEWIS is at heart the most conservative of the poets who used to make up what was called the Auden circle. Beneath the left-wing politics, the Freudian imagery, and the "sprung" rhythms of his verse is an instinctive faith in conscience, courage, and the English countryside. He is in fact very close to such poets of his race as Masefield and Tennyson; and we may live to see him the Laureate yet. We shall, however, probably never see him turn into a poet of the first order. There is in him too little of that flair for ambiguity and contradiction which seems to be the prerequisite for great poetry in this furiously complicated age. No figures of doubt ever haunted his political verse as the sinister Airmen and Healers once did that of Auden. And though his recent poems are full of a new anxiety, it is the plain, untranscendental anxiety of a disappointed radical who has not, like Auden, read Kierkegaard.

But Lewis's traditional and single-hearted idealism is also his strength in the degree that he is content to recognize it and write by it. It is certainly very much in evidence in "Short Is the Time" (Oxford, $2.25); and perhaps that explains why there is in this new volume less of the empty exuberance, the pretense and pastiche, that weakened so much of Lewis's earlier work. The poetry in "Short Is the Time" seems to acknowledge that since it cannot be great it has to be good. Much of it is exceedingly well written, and even though the effectiveness of the poems is more in the part than in the whole, they testify to an observant and cultivated mind. Indeed, The Nabara, a narrative based on a heroic incident of the Spanish civil war, is probably Lewis's best long poem to date. Remembering the tragic confusion of Spanish politics, one has to suspend a lot of disbeliefs in order to accept fully Lewis's enthusiasm for the do-and-die spirit of his protagonists; one can only say that somehow he does make you accept it.

> Slowly they nosed ahead, while under the chill North-Wester
> Nervous the sea crawled and twitched like the skin of a beast
> That dreams of the chase, the kill, the blood-beslavered feast:
> They, too, the light-hearted sailors, dreamed of a fine fiesta,
> Flags and their children waving, when they won home from the east.

Lewis is here writing—one would guess consciously—in the English epic tradition which produced The Revenge, The Battle of Agincourt, and Chevy Chase. Undoubtedly that is one reason why The Nabara is so much more the real thing than Robert Nathan's "Dunkirk" and other writings by the Homers of our American Saturday Review of Literature, whose sole tradition is Hollywood.

Less ambitious than C. Day Lewis, Louis MacNeice has usually seemed the surer artist. Witty, elegant, and a little diffident, MacNeice writes verse so ingeniously musical that it succeeds despite a certain poverty of thought and energy. Yet the poems in his most recent book, "Springboard" (Random House, $1.75), are certainly disappointing. They seem rather tired and dispirited, as London is said to be after five years of war. The best things in the book are two crazy lyrics, Swing-Song and Nuts in May, which are almost as good as the wonderful Bagpipe Music of a few years ago. For the rest, MacNeice seems to be writing just in order to keep his hand in. But in a curious poem called The Kingdom there is evidence that he is experimenting with a sort of home-made and secular mystique of personality. He makes clear that for him liberalism is exhausted and religion impossible; yet there remains the power of individuality, of living one's own life.

> Under the surface of flux and of fear there is an underground movement,
> Under the crust of bureaucracy, quiet behind the postures,
> Unconscious but palpably there—the Kingdom of individuals.

These are the rather flat opening lines of The Kingdom; the body of the poem undertakes the highly ticklish job of describing some of the people who compose this conspiracy. Alas, as MacNeice portrays them they seem more quaint than fine, not so much individuals as "characters."

> Take this old man with the soldierly straight back
> Dressed in tweeds like a squire but he has not a squire's presumption,
> His hands are gentle with wild flowers, his memory
> Latticed with dialect and anecdotes
> And wisps of nature poetry; he is of the Kingdom,
> A country-lover and very English . . .

Can MacNeice have been reading "You Can't Take It with You"? Apparently what qualifies a man for membership in the Kingdom is that he should simply be "different" in a funny sort of way—rather an unlikely idea on which to base a fairly long and comparatively solemn poem. And the dimness and foolishness of the whole conception are reflected in language that is strangely without nerve or color. "Latticed" is clever, but does it really help?

F. W. DUPEE

FICTION IN REVIEW

Of Husbands and Wives

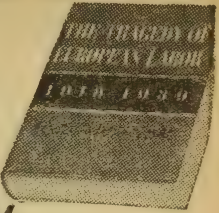
LAST week, in writing about André Maurois's "Woman Without Love," I spoke of certain French attitudes toward marriage which seemed to me to be quite retrograde compared to current American attitudes. Now the appearance of Sinclair Lewis's "Cass Timberlane" (Random House, $2.75) brings me again to the marital subject. Just as each of Mr. Lewis's novels is about something—about medicine, or religion, or hotel-keeping, or the theater, or philanthropy—"Cass Timberlane" is about husbands and wives. Divided between the story of the courtship and marriage of Cass and Jinny Timberlane and an anatomy of married life as practiced by a great many other couples in Grand Republic, Minnesota, it is Mr. Lewis's attempt to investigate marriage as he has already investigated other arts or professions, as on a parity with, say, medicine or acting.

Of course we are always as quick to resist generalizations about ourselves as we are to make generalizations about others, and there may therefore be a touch of prejudice in my repudiation of Mr. Lewis's picture of American marriage when I was so ready to offer my own anatomy of French marriage on the basis of Mr. Maurois's novel. But on the other hand, it was less the purposeful substance of Mr. Maurois's novel than its accidental revelations that struck me as meaningful; and on the level of implicit attitudes "Cass Timberlane" is a curiously unrevealing book. Especially in its subsidiary chapters, in what Mr. Lewis calls "an assemblage of husbands and wives," it is chiefly a restatement of familiar American sentimentalities and cynicisms about marriage. Whereas in books like "Main Street" and "Babbitt" it was Mr. Lewis's special gift to be able to explore the social value of habitual manners and attitudes of which we had hitherto been scarcely aware, in "Cass Timberlane" he deals almost entirely in observations that have been part of our cliché-thinking about love and marriage for many a year.

And obviously, while the clichés of a society may grow out of its implicit attitudes, the two are not to be confused. That there is at least a considerable time-lag before an even widespread cultural assumption receives general expression we can see illustrated, from Mr. Lewis's own work, by the history in our society of the Arrowsmith ideal of marriage. Even when "Arrowsmith" was published, in 1925, no one questioned the validity to American life of the relationship of Leora and Martin; and with the passing years this Arrowsmith pattern of marriage has surely become more and more our ideal. But our popular talk about marriage—by which I mean our marital jokes and the easy, unthoughtful pictures of marriage in our popular arts—has not yet caught up with this development.

Certainly, compared to the Arrowsmiths, the Timberlanes are significantly out of date. Instead of the relatively mature and tender and loyal Leora, Mr. Lewis gives us a Jinny who is most unfashionably infantile for twenty-three or twenty-four, and whose marital manners are as outmoded as they are tartish. Or instead of the firm and self-respecting Martin, we are given Cass Timberlane, who, despite being forty-one

To understand the dangers that beset the British Labor Party



Read

The Tragedy of European Labor 1918-1939

By ADOLF STURMTHAL

"The best account of labor history during the great inter-war crisis that has yet appeared."—The Nation

"...calmly drawn, judiciously weighed, based upon reliable facts, and generally valuable."—Journal of the American Statistical Association

At all bookstores • $3.50

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY PRESS
Morningside Heights • New York 27

You've heard about it
You've read about it but here you get, for the first time,
HENRY MORGENTHAU, Jr's
complete plan for Germany

Germany is Our Problem

"No book since Mein Kampf has offered the American people information so important to their survival as Henry Morgenthau's GERMANY IS OUR PROBLEM. If we had read and understood Hitler's doctrine in time we might have avoided the second World War. If we read and profit by Mr. Morgenthau's warning we should be able to prevent the third World War for which we know preparations have already begun."
—N. Y. Times Book Review

At all bookstores • $2.00

HARPER & BROTHERS

years old and vested with the dignity of a judgeship, a Congressional past, and a divorce, is quite incredibly soft-headed in his devotion to such a silly girl. No doubt there was something intended to be sweet in Cass's moon-calf adoration of Jinny, and something intended to be fortifying in the spectacle, in this day and age, of so much male chivalry and self-abnegation as Mr. Lewis imputes to his hero. But for one reader the Timberlane love story was only an embarrassment when it wasn't an irritation.

I do not know whether the Cass and Jinny story was meant to be read against the background of Mr. Lewis's marital survey or whether Mr. Lewis's tour through the lives —chiefly the bedrooms—of the good citizens of Grand Republic was meant to be read against the background of the Timberlanes. That is, I am uncertain whether the marriage of the Timberlanes is an example or an exception. Taking these subsidiary chapters alone, however, without their reference to the story of the Timberlanes, they are as depressing when they disclose their occasional happy union as when they weight the melancholic scales. For even in Mr. Lewis's picture of a happy marriage there is no sense of the day-by-day dialectic of two complicated human beings; there is only the sense of some quaint accident of chemistry. The planning together of a marriage, the setting up of the family with a shared moral, social, and economic responsibility, is nowhere suggested by Mr. Lewis's husbands and wives; yet it is as much in the failure of joint hope as in the failure of individual hope that a good part of the tragedy of marriage resides. This is not to dispute Mr. Lewis's observation of some of the common marital pitfalls—an unmatched sexuality, an unmatched ambition, or any other of the unadjustable discrepancies of the human temperament. It is simply to question Mr. Lewis's estimate of marriage as the sum only of its most sensational personal frustrations or satisfactions.

But I suppose it is not alone an approach to a social institution that is involved here, but an approach to people; even the bird's-eye-view method that Mr. Lewis employs in these short subsidiary chapters of "Cass Timberlane" would suggest a low human tolerance. The compression of the whole span or essence of a life into so brief a compass, or a view of life from the distance of complete non-participation on the part of the author, always seems to me to evoke the chill air of an obituary notice. John Dos Passos, for instance, uses both these methods—the method of over-compression, in his interspersed biographies; and the method of non-participation, in the treatment of the characters whom he follows even through several volumes—and they are what produce, I think, the strangely mortuary tone of his novels; because Mr. Dos Passos can give so little affection to the people in his books, we ourselves can give little affection to his books, however much we may admire and respect their intention. Well, no one can fall more in love with his characters than Mr. Lewis; but, too, Mr. Lewis has never conceived a character who was entirely immune to his satire. There is a lack of true human affection in his novels similar to the lack of affection in Mr. Dos Passos's novels. The victim, so to speak, of his own divided heart, Mr. Lewis cannot help victimizing his fictional creations—and if not by satire, then by robbing them of some of their due share of life.

DIANA TRILLING

MOTION PICTURES

Manhattan
ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST.
86th ST.
58th ST.
near Lex.
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENT
RIVERSIDE
23rd ST.
Bronx
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL
Westchester
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

RKO NOW

"Amusing . . . Diverting Comedy"—Herald Tribune

BARBARA STANWYCK · DENNIS MORGAN
'Christmas in Connecticut'
with SYDNEY GREENSTREET
—and—
"Epic Story of the Victory of the Allied Forces"
—New York Times
GEN. DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER'S
'The True Glory'

Brooklyn
BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT REPUBLIC
TILYOU
Coney Island
Queens
ALDEN
Jamaica
Keith's
FLUSHING
Keith's
RICH. HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway

"An American army officer's struggle to win a fascist-haunted Italian town to a love of democracy." —PM.

JOHN HERSHEY'S
PULITZER PRIZE NOVEL
'A BELL for ADANO'
STARRING
GENE TIERNEY · JOHN HODIAK · WILLIAM BENDIX
—PLUS—
'SWINGING ON A RAINBOW' Brad TAYLOR Jane FRAZEE

Paramount Presents
ED GARDNER'S
"DUFFY'S TAVERN"
FEATURING
32 HOLLYWOOD STARS

IN PERSON
THE ANDREWS SISTERS
Featuring
Tim Herbert
Vic Shoen
And His Recording Orchestra
Foy Willing's
Riders of the Purple Sage
Pig-Meat Alamo
Markham

COOL PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

"The most exciting picture ever! . . . Louis Sobol
20th Century-Fox presents
THE HOUSE ON 92ND STREET
Plus a star-studded stage show
Monte Proser's COPACABANA REVUE
ROSARIO and ANTONIO
Now Playing ROXY 7th Ave. at 50th St.

"A HUMDINGER"—Walter Winchell
ARTKINO presents
GIRL No. 217
Produced in the U. S. S. R.
DOORS OPEN 8:45 A. M.
STANLEY
7th AVE., Bet. 42d & 41st STS.

MOTION PICTURES

"A great film . . . I cannot suggest my regard for it without using such words as veneration and love."—Agee, Nation.

LESTER COWAN presents

ERNIE PYLE'S

"STORY OF

G.I. JOE"

STARRING

BURGESS MEREDITH as ERNIE PYLE

WITH

Robert Mitchum as The Captain

Freddie Steele as The Sergeant

Wally Cassell as The Private

NOW—BOTH THEATRES

BRANT'S GLOBE
BROADWAY AT 46th STREET
POPULAR PRICES
Continuous Performances

BRANT'S GOTHAM
BROADWAY AT 47th STREET
ALL SEATS RESERVED
2 Shows Daily: 2:45 & 8:45 P.M.
3 Shows Sats., Suns. & Holidays

TRAVELOGUES

JULIEN BRYAN

presents

SOUTH AMERICA

All Motion Pictures in Color

CARNEGIE HALL NEW YORK CITY 5 SUN. MATS at 5:30		ACADEMY of MUSIC PHILADELPHIA, PA. 5 FRI. EVGS at 8:30
NOV. 4	PERU	OCT. 26
NOV. 11	CHILE	NOV. 2
NOV. 18	BOLIVIA	NOV. 16
NOV. 25	PARAGUAY	NOV. 23
DEC. 2	COLOMBIA	NOV. 30

Series: $7.20, $6.00, $4.80, $3.60 Incl. Tax
Single: $1.80, $1.50, $1.20, 90c Incl. tax

Series: $5.05 & $4.05
Single: $1.30 & $1.00

STAGE PLAYS

"DESERVES ITS GREAT SUCCESS!"—Nichols, Times

Rodgers and Hammerstein present

MADY CHRISTIANS • OSCAR HOMOLKA

in JOHN VAN DRUTEN'S

I REMEMBER MAMA

from Kathryn Forbes' "Mama's Bank Account"

with JOHN TETZEL • ADRIENNE GESSNER • RICHARD BISHOP

MUSIC BOX 45th Street, West of Broadway. Phone: Circle 6-4636
Eves. 8:35 Sharp. Mats. Thurs. and Sat. 2:35 Sharp

MICHAEL TODD Presents

UP IN CENTRAL PARK

Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS

Lyrics by DOROTHY FIELDS

Music by SIGMUND ROMBERG

BROADWAY THEATRE, Broadway at 53rd Street. Matinees: WED. & SAT.

MOTION PICTURE

"Delightful divertissement." . . .
—N. Y. Times

NOEL COWARD'S

naughtiest comedy

'Blithe Spirit'

in Blushing Technicolor

WITH

CONSTANCE CUMMINGS

REX HARRISON

KAY HAMMOND

now at the

WINTER GARDEN

BROADWAY AT FIFTIETH STREET

MUSIC—DANCE

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE—NOW to NOV. 6

S. HUROK presents

BALLET THEATRE

THE GREATEST IN

RUSSIAN BALLET

WITH

Alicia Markova • Anton Dolin

Eglevsky • Kaye • Laing

Alonso • Kriza • Chase • Reed

Evenings 8:30 (Incl. Sun.), $1.20-$4.80. Mat. Sat. & Sun., $1.20 to $3.60

2,000 SEATS $1 to $1.50 (PLUS TAX) AT ALL PERF.

N.Y. CITY CENTER OPERA COMPANY

FALL SEASON TO OCT. 28 Laszlo Halasz Artistic and Musical Dir.

THE BARTERED BRIDE • LA TRAVIATA • LA BOHEME • GYPSY BARON • MANON LESCAUT • CAVALLERIA & PAGLIACCI • FAUST

SEATS NOW— Matinees and Evenings: Entire Orchestra, $2.40; 1st Balcony, $2.40, $1.80; 2nd Balcony, $1.20, 90¢; Tax included.

N. Y. CITY CENTER, 131 WEST FIFTY-FIFTH STREET
MAYOR LA GUARDIA, President

Monday Eve. Symphonies at 8:30

N.Y. CITY SYMPHONY

LEONARD BERNSTEIN

TICKETS at Box Office . . . 90c — $1.80. Limited Number of Subscriptions open. Entire series, $9.00 to $24.00, tax included.

NEW YORK CITY CENTER 131 WEST 55th STREET
F. H. LaGUARDIA, President

"PARTISAN REVIEW is at the present time the only first-rate literary magazine in America." — EDMUND WILSON

In the Fall 1945 issue of

PARTISAN REVIEW

THE OTHER MARGARET
(a long story) by
LIONEL TRILLING

SIGMUND FREUD
Dostoevsky and Parricide

KATHERINE ANNE PORTER
The High Sea

RANDALL JARRELL
The Stages of W. H. Auden's Ideology

ANDREWS WANNING
F. Scott Fitzgerald and his Brethren

HANNAH ARENDT
Parties, Movements and Classes

ISAAC ROSENFELD
The Forest and the Trees

POEMS: Elizabeth Bishop, Jon Beck Shank, Emma Swan

FROM THE CAPITALS OF EUROPE

London Letter: George Orwell
Paris Letter: H. J. Kaplan
Rome Letter: Moses Brown

PARTISAN REVIEW
45 Astor Place, New York 3, N. Y.

I enclose ☐ $2.00 for one year
☐ $3.00 for two years subscription to Partisan Review beginning with .... issue.

NAME..............................
ADDRESS..............................
....
CITY..............................
ZONE.................... STATE..........

Drama

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

TWO new melodramas—each pretty good in its way—compose the subject of this week's report. One of them is provided with a moral for the moment and the other one isn't, but the difference between them is not so great as might be supposed.

"The Ryan Girl" (Plymouth Theater) is the one without any social significance. Its author is Edmund Goulding, dimly remembered on Broadway for "Dancing Mothers" and more recently active in Hollywood. He has dug up the good old plot about a mother's sacrifice for a son who does not even know that she is in any way related to him, and then modernized that plot so completely that most spectators will probably never be reminded how many of the old-fashioned "well-made" plays were built upon it. This time the son is a returned hero who, so we learn, had been given away in infancy to a female pal of his chorus-girl mother. His father, a rather stupid minor gangster more recently resident in South America in order to escape a murder charge, gets the idea that if he were to turn up in New York and establish his claim, no patriotic jury would convict the father of so great a hero. He comes, tells the boy's mother (who still loves both father and son) what his scheme is, and it is up to her to find a way out. The very captious may complain that the play does not really have much action, that once the situation has been stated the playwright is compelled merely to mark time as interestingly as he can until the rather simple and not wholly unpredictable solution is reached. The fact remains, however, that "The Ryan Girl" is, on its own level, a very good show. Thanks in considerable part to a lively if not very subtle performance by June Havoc, a very good performance by Edmund Lowe as the gangster, and a superb one by Una O'Connor as the faithful old servant, "The Ryan Girl" will probably have a long stay at the Plymouth.

Now Mr. Goulding's plot is what I suppose can best be described as an artificial one. That does not mean that events like those he imagines could not happen; it does mean that they could be set in motion only by a series of unlikely coincidences, and that since similar things happen far more frequently on the stage than they do in life, his play can hardly be considered a discussion of any pressing contemporary problem. The Messrs. d'Usseau and Gow, whose most recent previous play was "Tomorrow the World" and who now turn up with "Deep Are the Roots" (Fulton Theater), do not go in for that sort of thing. Casting about for another current topic, they do not have to look very far to discover the race problem in the South. Their returned hero is a Negro, and so they start with a natural rather than an artificial situation. Few returned heroes have murderers hidden in their background; a considerable number are black. No remarkable series of coincidences is necessary to set the plot in motion. Negro soldiers constitute a problem, as the sons of murderers do not.

To many people, no doubt, it will seem that little more need be said concerning the respective merits of the two plays. Obviously "The Ryan Girl" is largely theatrical claptrap while "Deep Are the Roots" is, they will say, serious drama performing an important social function. But the matter is not really so simple as that. Having started with what I call a natural situation, the authors of "Deep Are the Roots" are faced with two questions. First, have they anything to say that has not already been said a good many times before? Second, just how much artificiality are they going to introduce in order to keep their play moving on the level of popular theatrical entertainment?

The first of these questions they answer honestly if not brilliantly. They haven't much new to say, but they say it in an intelligent and straightforward manner, even though they sometimes sound less like men who have observed life in the deep South than like well-intentioned students of that abstraction called race prejudice. At least, however, they are trying to be reasonable, and they are not intolerably self-righteous. For their second problem they have found a less happy solution, and having started with a natural situation, they introduce more and more artificial elements in order to achieve melodramatic effects. Perhaps the best way to explain what I mean is to cite the fact that their climax is precipitated when it is discovered that the younger daughter of the old "white-supremacy" Senator is in love with the Negro soldier and, indeed, offers to marry him. In the end the authors themselves get around to admitting that the right of a Negro to marry a white woman is not at the moment one of the rights which it is most important to him to win. But that is not all. The love complication is not a natural development of the natural situation. For reasons that a psychologist could no doubt explain easily enough, even liberal young girls brought up in the traditional Southern fashion do not often fall in love with Negroes. The situation which presupposes that one of them has done just that is only one degree less artificial than that which presupposes a great hero with a murderer for father. And artificiality was introduced into "Deep Are the Roots" for the same reason that Mr. Goulding cooked up his plot—because it makes possible a bang-up theatrical crisis.

"Deep Are the Roots," like "The Ryan Girl," is essentially a melodrama and will also probably enjoy a long as well as a not undeserved run. Possibly it will "do good." Possibly it is just as well to have our attention frequently called to such subjects even in melodramas. But there is no use calling a play something it isn't. As between "The Ryan Girl" and "Deep Are the Roots" you pay your money and you take your choice. Fundamentally both are "good theater" in the limited sense of that term.

Films

JAMES AGEE

"MILDRED PIERCE." Nasty, gratifying version of the James Cain novel about suburban grass-widowhood and the power of the native passion for money and all that money can buy. Attempt made to sell Mildred as noble when she is merely idiotic or at best pathetic; but constant, virulent, lambent attention to money and its effects, and more authentic suggestions of sex than one hopes to see in American films. Excellent work by Joan Crawford, Jack Carson, Zachary Scott, and a little girl whose name I can't find who is as good an embodiment of all that is most terrifying about native contemporary adolescence as I ever hope to see. John McManus of PM and doubtless many others regard the film as a bad advertisement for this country abroad. As movies go, it is one of the few anywhere near honest ones, if that is of any importance; and should be signally helpful in holding down immigration to the kind of people we appear to want—people like the immeasurably swinish German family in "Girl Number 217."

"Girl Number 217." Russian story of

Princeton
UNIVERSITY PRESS

SOVIET FAR EASTERN POLICY (1931-1945)

By HARRIET L. MOORE

How the Pacific war looked to the Soviet peoples—from the Japanese invasion of Manchuria to Russia's declaration of war against Japan and the Soviet-Chinese treaty—based on official sources.

Including the full text of key diplomatic documents and important Soviet statements at critical moments in recent Far Eastern history. Sponsored by the International Secretariat of the Institute of Pacific Relations. 300 pages, $2.50

RUSSO-POLISH RELATIONS

By S. KONOVALOV

Incorporating the work of SIR JOHN MAYNARD

Internationally acclaimed for its fair and authoritative summary of one of the thorniest problems in European history—the 600 years of bitterness between Russia and Poland.

CHICAGO SUN: "Eminently clear-cut and objective."

LONDON TIMES: "Admirably informed."

DAILY WORKER (British): "Wholly impartial. Should be placed in the hands of everyone concerned in this question."

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR: "Moderate, dispassionate, and reasonable."

Including selections from the Curzon report and the complete text of the Yalta declaration on Polish sovereignty.

Maps and index, $1.50

THE ROAD TO TEHERAN

THE STORY OF RUSSIA AND AMERICA (1781-1943)

By FOSTER RHEA DULLES

N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE BOOK REVIEW: "Unreservedly recommended."

JOSEPH E. DAVIES: "Splendid . . . objective, scholarly, and fair."

PEARL S. BUCK: "A valuable book . . . presented without bias or whimsy." $2.50

AT YOUR BOOKSTORE
PRINCETON UNIVERSITY PRESS

a German family and its war-time slave. Insists, infuriatingly, that these are average Germans, implying—finally even stating—that all Germans are equally bestial and guilty. They are not average anything, but they are intelligent, powerful caricatures of the worst that can be expected of the petty bourgeois, anywhere (see above), even in Russia, where presumably they go by some other class name. Passionately acted and in general well conceived and well done; a little like Flaubert rewritten with hammer and sickle.

"The House on 92d Street." Semi-fictional telescoping of several FBI espionage jobs. Unconvincing brouhaha to the effect that this could not be released prior to Hiroshima. Convincing inadvertent suggestion that the FBI functions efficiently less through intelligence than through doggedness plus scientific equipment. Extensive and gratifying use of actual-spot shooting and re-enactment. Effective pseudo-naturalistic performances by Lydia St. Clair, Gene Lockhart, William Eythe, and others, none of whom, however, manage to suggest how spies, counterspies, and traitors who look and act like that are not identifiable to those interested at 500 paces. Unpersuasive, often skilled, generally enjoyable.

ISLAND PRESS COOPERATIVE

☐ See Here, Private Enterprise by H. Sabin Bagger: coated cover $1.50.

Not for people who prefer to learn about their own social structure from the birds and bees . . .

☐ British Labor and the Beveridge Plan by F. Scheu: coated cover $1.00, cloth $2.00.

"Masterly analysis of the program, its origin, progress and effect on the British public." The Deseret News.

☐ Revolution in India by Frances Gunther, coated cover $1.00, cloth $2.00.

"Impressive . . ." John Chamberlain
"Enlightening . . ." Dr. Lin Yutang
"Discriminating . . ." Walter Duranty
"Splendid . . ." Oswald G. Villard
"Hard-hitting . . ." Dr. K. Menninger
"Shocking . . ." Freda Utley
"T. N. T. . . ." T. A. Bisson

ip
ISLAND PRESS
470 West Twenty-fourth Street
New York 11, N. Y.

Books by Mail

We do our best to mail promptly and accurately to your order books reviewed and advertised in The Nation and elsewhere... anywhere the mail goes! No U. S. A. mailing charges. No c. o. d.'s.

DOWNTOWN BOOK BAZAAR
212 Broadway New York 7, N. Y.
(corner Fulton Street)

Records

B. H. HAGGIN

COLUMBIA'S October list offers Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, played by Milstein with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony under Bruno Walter (Set 577; $4.50). Milstein's performance of the solo part has the brilliance of his virtuosity and the straightforward phrasing of his sound musicianship, but also a tenseness and drive which, carried into the orchestral part, make this a high-powered performance of a lovely work that is not suited to such treatment. Its recorded sound is spacious and clear, but cold and dull, and with occasional buzzes. The old Columbia set with the Szigeti-Beecham performance is preferable.

Then there is the Suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Coq d'or," played by Mitropoulos with the Minneapolis Symphony (Set X-254; $2.50). It includes some of the most charming bits of the opera—the Prelude, the Lullaby, the Dance of the Queen and King Dodon, the Bridal Procession; and it gets one of the better Mitropoulos performances. The more prominent melodic and bass lines are reproduced with sharpness and cleanness of definition, the inner parts with less clarity, and the over-all sound without the warmth and glow it should have. Also there is a marked diminution of volume and brightness at the conclusion of the Procession. I would prefer the Victor set with the Goossens-Philharmonic performance.

And then there is Virgil Thomson's "Five Portraits," played by Thomson himself with the Philadelphia Orchestra (Set X-255; $2.50). For me the music makes no interesting sense in itself, and no point as musical portraiture in the instance where I know the man who is the subject. One can hear that a first-rate orchestra is playing well; but the cold, hard sound produced by the records isn't the sound of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

For the rest there are a number of recordings by opera-singers. The baritone Martial Singher sings a group of French arias (Set 578; $4.50): popular favorites like the Toreador's Song from "Carmen," the Drinking Song from Thomas's "Hamlet," the Vision fugitive from Massenet's "Hérodiade"; unfamiliar arias from Lully's "Amadis" and Grétry's "Richard Coeur de Lion"; Dapertutto's Scintille diamant from Offenbach's "Tales of Hoffman" and the Queen Mab ballad from Gounod's "Roméo et Juliette"; and Mephistopheles's Air, Serenade, and Song of the Flea from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." Some of these things are pleasant; the Berlioz excerpts are the only music of great consequence; and they are music which Singher does very well. His voice hasn't much sensuous beauty, and gets to be monotonous in its un-

Two Great Books You Must Own—

BELLE BOYD
CONFEDERATE SPY
By LOUIS A. SIGAUD

The girl who was adored by men, slandered by women, courier to "Stonewall" Jackson—daring, fetching, radiant, courageous—one of the great spys of history. An unforgettable true story of a woman whose life was stranger than fiction. PRICE $3.00

GAY NINETIES COOK BOOK

The finest receipts from the fabulous "Gay Nineties." Favorite dishes of Lillian Russell, "Diamond Jim" Brady and others. Etiquette for ladies and gentlemen, French words, profusely illustrated—a rare book for the bedside and kitchen. You will taste the gilded period of American life in every line.
PRICE $3.00

Ask for list of Xmas books
At every bookstore, or from

THE DIETZ PRESS, INC.
Publishers to the South
RICHMOND 19, VIRGINIA.

varying color; but his singing impresses one with its intelligence; and intelligence is a valuable asset in the performance of music that is so obviously the product of as sharp a mind as Berlioz's. The monotony comes partly from the fact that the recording places the voice prominently in the foreground and the orchestra very much in the background—though as a matter of fact the indistinct background is what these orchestral performances deserve. And the Berlioz pieces suffer greatly from this, since much of their musical life is in their orchestral parts and is not created by the nerveless, faintly heard playing of members of the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra under the direction Paul Breisach. The words of the arias are not provided, as they should be.

On a single disc (71697-D; $1) are the Song to the Evening Star and Wolfram's Entry from Wagner's "Tannhäuser"—well-sung by Herbert Janssen, but deadly dull to my ears. For the first Breisach provides another flabby accompaniment with members of the Metropolitan Orchestra; with the second one hears excellent playing by the Téatro Colon Orchestra under Roberto Kinsky. So with the set (582; $2.75) in which Lily Pons sings Caro nome from Verdi's "Rigoletto" and Charmant oiseau from David's "Perle du Brésil," along with Proch's Variations: the first has a poor accompaniment by an orchestra under Pietro Cimara; the second a better one by an orchestra under Maurice Abravanel. The two pieces obviously were recorded at different times: in the second Pons's voice has a brightness that is dulled in the first, presumably by recording; her singing also has more spirit and assurance and is without the tremolo that one hears in the first.

If you really want to understand the crisis confronting us in the Far East
read

Andrew Roth's
DILEMMA in JAPAN

"Razor-sharp insight into the real position of the Emperor system, the power of the militarists, the feudal landlords and industrialists . . . mandatory reading."—Cecil Brown. $2.00

Owen Lattimore's
SOLUTION in ASIA

". . . brilliantly illuminates the main question of Asia in our time."—Edgar Snow. $2.00

AN ATLANTIC MONTHLY PRESS BOOK

At all bookstores

LITTLE, BROWN & COMPANY

Special Class Room Rate

Only 25¢ monthly per student for orders of ten or more copies to be sent to one address.

Desk Copy Is Free!

ADDRESS YOUR ORDERS TO

THE Nation

20 VESEY STREET NEW YORK 7, N. Y.

BOOKS FOUND FREE!

WHAT BOOKS DO YOU WANT?

We quote lowest market prices. No charge for locating Hard-to-Find and Out-of-Print Books. All books. OLD or NEW, mailed POST-FREE.

SEARCHLIGHT BOOK NATION
22 East 17th Street, New York City

The
New Statesman and Nation
England's Leading Weekly Review
may now be obtained through
THE NATION
20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y.
●
Yearly subscription $6.50 including postage
SPECIMEN copy on request

TO ORDER ANY BOOK described or advertised in this issue

USE THIS COUPON! (Books sent postage free anywhere in U. S. and to members of the armed forces overseas.)

510 Phone orders in N.Y. City: CIrcle 6-1700, Ext. 50

To: Doubleday Book Shops,
Mail Order Department, 9 Rockefeller. Plaza, New York 20, N. Y.

Please send me the following books for which I enclose $..........;
(PRINT TITLES OF BOOKS WANTED) ....

....

Name ....

Address ....

City .... Zone No. (IF ANY) .... State ....

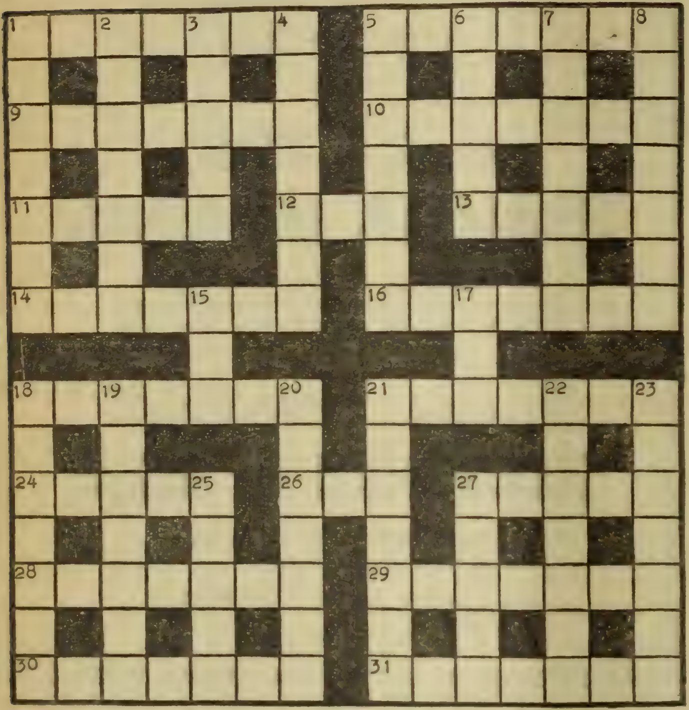
Crossword Puzzle No. 130

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 Originally a French peasant dance
5 Simple Susie tried to write an essay on one, but found she kept falling off
9 Supplying personnel is cardinal
10 They successfully invaded England
11 Vigorous
12 One test of a cigar
13 Scene of the first real battle of World War I
14 Not the kind that inhabits mud (two words, 4 and 3)
16 He advised us to hitch our wagon to a star
18 Men who go down to the sea in slips
21 More wild than the tiger-lily
24 Same again
26 Ethereal music
27 The brown variety and the Gospel was good fare, according to the Puritans
28 "He that complies against his will Is of his own ------- still"
29 The same way as U-boats go, with the help of depth bombs
30 Moscow citadel from which you get nothing back
31 Turner liked to paint these colorful spectacles

DOWN

1 Puts money on a horse that makes no effort to win
2 "What shall he have that killed the deer?"
3 Hoity's half-brother
4 Real gin (anag.)
5 To whose wailings Mr. Churchill likened the air raid siren's song
6 Might make a necklace, and might make a Christmas song
7 These jockeys hope to finish before they're off
8 Oriental in earnest
15 First lady
17 A cowardly missile—it hits you and runs
18 The cradle of the deep?
19 Small insectivorous birds
20 Irish river storied in song and verse
21 These Indian levees would have made Burr sad
22 Usually bad news when a submarine is this 23 Puts up with
25 Window which takes in the Loire
27 The bear in the famous beast-epic, Reynard the Fox

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 129

ACROSS:—1 ON TAP; 4 NOD; 6 CABIN; 9 SAM HILL; 10 LORELEI; 11 THEISM; 14 ROGERS; 15 TOURNEY; 16 CASK; 17 KEEP; 19 SKYLINE; 20 SLIP; 22 SWAN; 24 GYMNAST; 26 FRIARS; 27 SERIAL; 31 AMIABLE; 32 OILSKIN; 33 KELLY; 34 EVA; 35 ROYCE.

DOWN:—1 ONSET; 2 TAMPERS; 3 PRIEST; 4 NILE; 5 DULL; 6 CARBOY; 7 BELIEVE; 8 NAILS; 12 MONKEYS; 13 PRALINE; 14 REDNESS; 16 COS; 18 PEN; 21 INITIAL; 23 WHISKEY; 24 GRUBBY; 25 TELLER; 26 FRANK; 28 LANCE; 29 WERE; 30 YOGA.

CONTRIBUTORS

CYRIL CONNOLLY is editor of the London literary monthly Horizon and author of "Enemies of Promise" and "The Unquiet Grave."

KAY BOYLE is a well-known novelist and writer of short stories. Among her books are "Avalanche," "Primer for Combat," and "The Crazy Hunter."

RANDALL JARRELL, now in the air force, was formerly an instructor in English at the University of Texas. He is the author of a book of poems, "Blood for a Stranger." A new volume, "Little Friend, Little Friend," is to be published soon.

GEORGE GENZMER teaches English at Bard College.

KATHERINE ANNE PORTER is the author of "Flowering Judas," "Pale Horse, Pale Rider," and "The Leaning Tower."

DELMORE SCHWARTZ is the author of "Shenandoah," "In Dreams Begin Responsibilities," and "The Imitation of Life and Other Problems of Literary Criticism."

CLEMENT GREENBERG is The Nation's art critic.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR, a contributing editor of The Nation, is professor of Christian Ethics at Union Theological Seminary and author of "The Nature and Destiny of Man" and "The Children of Light and the Children of Darkness."

F. W. DUPEE teaches English at Bard College.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

RESORTS

INVITATION TO RELAX
Enjoy the serenity of Plum Point. Gorgeous countryside, roaring fireplace, delicious food — and fun.
Only 55 miles from New York
MAKE RESERVATIONS EARLY
PLUM POINT
"Year-Round Vacation Resort"
New Windsor, N.Y.
Tel: Newburgh 4270

ZINDOREST
PARK Monroe, New York
CLOSED FOR THE WINTER
Will Reopen in the Early Spring

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 161 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • OCTOBER 20, 1945 NUMBER 16

IN THIS ISSUE

EDITORIALS

Atomic Isolationism 389
The Shape of Things 390
How to Minimize Strikes 392
Bargaining with Britain 393

ARTICLES

The Marshall Report by Charles G. Bolté 394
Rhapsody in Black and Blue by Gates Ward 395
What Happened in Bavaria by Saul K. Padover 397
Have the Arabs a Case? by Eliahu Ben-Horin 399
Canada's Veterans Go Back to School by Leslie Roberts 401

POLITICAL WAR

The People's War Goes On by J. Alvarez del Vayo 403

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall 405
Jacksonian Democracy by Merle Curti 406
Briefer Comment 408
Drama by Joseph Wood Krutch 413
Dance by B. H. Haggin 413

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 415

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 131 by Jack Barrett 416

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor J. KING GORDON
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Editor Political War Section
J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates
LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS
CAREY MCWILLIAMS REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

Atomic Isolationism

THE discussion of atomic power has come down to earth. It is centered in the Johnson-May bill, which intrusts to the care of a nine-man commission the absolute control of the development of nuclear energy and related research activities. Since the commission would meet four times a year and be manned by dollar-a-year men, presumably with other business to attend to, the real authority is left in the hands of one full-time administrator. The possibilities of the abuse of this power are so great that Raymond Swing protested last Friday that "in the bill as now drawn control is vested in a way that might become a perfected fascist domination of our economic life. Certainly there is nothing in the bill to prevent it, there is everything to encourage it."

Just now the bill is being pushed with indecent haste through Senate and House. In the House Military Affairs Committee the hearings lasted only one day. With the exception of top administrators, not one of the important scientists who worked on the development of the bomb was called to testify. Apparently overawed by the War Department—which during a war gets into the habit of stepping out of the place assigned it in a free democracy—Representative May refused to reopen the hearings when urged to do so by Representative Helen Gahagan Douglas. But by the beginning of the week it was apparent that neither the general public nor the scientists were going to be stampeded into a decision that might determine the future destiny of our nation.

The Johnson-May bill sidesteps all the larger issues. There is no question of sharing the secret with others, of creating an international body to control the bomb, of consolidating a world organization to prevent a third world war, in which the bomb would be put to a fatal test. It discusses the issue of atomic power in such narrow terms of national security that we have very strong suspicions the bill came straight from the War Department to the desks of Senator Johnson and Representative May. For the War Department is apt to think in strategic categories that fail utterly to comprehend the world problem with which the achievement of nuclear fission has confronted us.

The argument behind the bill runs like this. The menace of atomic power is so great that its production must remain a closely guarded secret for as long as possible. The basic knowledge in the field of nuclear physics is of course widespread. But the specialized knowledge necessary to industrial production of bombs or power is still in our hands. It must remain there for as long as possible, and all research must be carefully controlled and directed so that when the secret is discovered by other nations we shall by that time be far ahead of them in perfecting the process, which now may be regarded as in a primitive state.

To this argument the plain man, with very little knowledge of nuclear physics but with a memory for events in the past year or two, asks how safe in fact shall he be against comparatively primitive missiles—say, bombs of the Hiroshima or Nagasaki variety—traveling at the speed of V-2's. For even primitive atomic bombs, it seems to him, can be classed as terminal weapons. It is here the military men are being either stupid or dishonest in speaking of counter-measures. It is perhaps for this reason that they are loath to have free testimony from the scientists who were responsible for the development of the bomb. Fortunately several groups of scientists have courageously spoken out, and it is vitally important that they and others be called to testify before the Committee on Military Affairs. The navy statement regarding counter-measures was at once challenged by the Atomic Scientists of Chicago. The main approach of the Johnson-May bill was called into question by a clear statement in favor of international control by Dr. Robert G. Wilson for the Association of Los Alamos Scientists. Dr. Wilson said:

> The fact that the atomic bomb represents such a concentrated form of destructive energy makes counter-measures against each of the large number of possible methods of delivery extremely difficult and uncertain. . . . One proposition is for this country to have more and bigger bombs than other countries. Merely having more bombs than other countries is not decisive if another country has enough bombs to demolish our cities and stores of weapons. The overwhelming advantage will lie with the aggressor, and our superiority might be lost in the first five minutes of a surprise attack.

The bill that is now being crowded through Congress with hysterical urgency provides a frail shield of national defense. Moreover, if the autocratic powers of the administrator are used as they may well be used, the free scientists of America are going to refuse to function within the strait-jacket into which they have been strapped. Most seriously of all, this measure, put forward as a domestic policy, actually represents the commitment of the United States to a particularly vicious form of isolationist foreign policy. We may pay lip service to the United Nations Organization, send our representatives to international conferences, but we hold in our own hand the power of life and death over the nations of the world. Such a policy would tend to emphasize rather than heal the rifts in international society today—particularly the rift between Russia and this country allied with Britain. The more firmly we insist upon unilateral control of the atomic bomb the more difficult it will be to persuade others that our faith in a world organization is genuine.

The Johnson-May bill ought to be thought of at best as a stop-gap measure to protect us from the misuse of this awful weapon until international controls have been devised to insure the safety of all peoples. But even regarding it as a stop-gap, it is important to take all the time necessary for hearings and Congressional discussion so that the most undemocratic, and potentially fascist, provisions of the present bill will be eliminated. Those who are placed in positions of authority under the act should also be those who regard international control as of paramount importance. The commission should be fully representative of the public, the scientists, and the armed services—and in the above order of precedence.

The valley of decision in which we find ourselves is in fact the valley of the shadow of death. Fortunately for us the war has shown that our nation has a creative imagination, a capacity for drastic choice, an aptitude for international co-operation in the presence of great danger and for the achievement of a high objective. They must be summoned to meet the present crisis, more menacing than any we faced during the war. A candid appraisal of our world today reveals just how difficult the achievement of international organization and the elimination of international distrust will be. Nor is it any wiser to repudiate the minor gains of San Francisco and sigh for world government than it is to accept the London breakdown as a final demonstration of the great powers' inability to reach basic agreement. We have to move toward world organization step by step, or, if you like, crisis by crisis. The important thing to realize is that whereas yesterday we had an era in which to reach our goal, today, by the longest stretch of the imagination, we have a few years.

The Shape of Things

A SPECTER IS HAUNTING THE IMPERIAL NATIONS, the specter of virile Asiatic nationalism. Under the jarring impact of war deep fissures have appeared in the onerous colonial system, fissures which the resurgent nationalist movements may broaden into a complete crack-up. It is no flight of rhetoric to say that one-fourth of mankind—the colonial peoples of Asia—are on the march under mature and effective leadership. These peoples have suffered deeply and learned much during the last five years. They learned first that their European masters were not only hopelessly incapable of defending them but also obdurately unwilling to let them defend themselves. Under Japanese occupation leftist anti-Japanese guerrillas emerged in all the colonies and acquired political and military skills and arms they do not hesitate to use against non-Japanese imperialists. During the same period, many of that fringe of nationalists who tried to use the Japanese as a blow-torch to cut through their colonial shackles had their hands badly burned. But they have not lost their hatred for the shackles. The growth and development of these movements in Burma, Indo-China, Indonesia, Malaya, and other colonial areas during the recent past are an exciting and important but little known part of contemporary history. It is of the greatest import that virtually all of these submerged countries have made substantial progress toward uniting disparate political, religious, and national groups on a common anti-imperialist and anti-feudal platform. These new liberation coalitions are not to be dissuaded by pontifical Dutch promises, high-blown French phrases, or involved British constitutional trickery. They will accept only substantial and constructive reforms looking to early independence.

*

ON SEPTEMBER 17, JUST FIVE DAYS BEFORE THE Foreign Ministers' Conference deadlocked on the question whether the procedure adopted did or did not violate the Potsdam agreement, a report by American economic advisers attached to the Office of Military Government was made available to Allied commanders in Berlin. The task set this group of "experts" by Brigadier General William F. Draper (in civilian life a member of the investment firm of Dillon, Read and Company, which financed many German industrial concerns in the twenties) was to determine how much industrial machinery would be available for reparations after a minimum standard of living had been provided for the Germans. The directive appears to have construed the Potsdam statement that this standard "should not exceed" the European average as meaning it should at least equal this average. At any rate it was on this basis that the experts found that German exports would have to be maintained at about the pre-war level in order to pay for needed imports of food. Moreover, they stated, half such exports would have to consist of machinery, chemicals, precision instruments, and optical goods—all products of industries with a high war potential. Moscow apparently saw in this report: (a) an attempt to reopen and weaken decisions reached at Potsdam; (b) a threat to Russian collection of reparations in western Germany; (c) a move by America and Britain to restore German industry. Consequently, it has been suggested by Leland Stowe and others, Molotov was instructed not to permit the slightest breach in the Potsdam agreement at London. Authoritative statements that the experts' report is not official policy but merely a basis for discussion may have modified Russian fears. What seems needed now is a joint examination by the four occupying powers of the meaning of the unfortunately obscure economic clauses of the Potsdam agreement. From that they might go on to discuss how to provide Germany, not with an average standard of living, but with the bare means of subsistence. As things are going, even that may seem a rather remote ideal a few months hence.

*

THE RESIGNATION OF PREMIER VOULGARIS OF Greece was inevitable, for he was no longer able to withstand the concerted opposition of republican and liberal groups. That opposition was based, first, upon the government's inability to solve the economic crisis which has been growing daily more acute since the resignation of Finance Minister Varvaressos some weeks ago; second, on its terroristic activities among the population as well as the scandalous use to which national services were being put. In a surprise move Voulgaris called elections for January 10. He offered no guaranties that the new electoral lists would be any more representative of the people than those previously announced. With faked registers and the general confusion which recent Greek political events have caused, the results of an early election could have been neither decisive nor indicative of the true national will. The republican parties announced their unanimous decision to boycott the polls. The government fell. Regent Damaskinos asked Themistocles Sophoulis, leader of the Liberal Party, to form a new government with the collaboration of the monarchists. Mr. Sophoulis failed because of the insistence of the monarchists upon the formation of another "service government," which would have offered no more democratic guaranties than did the Voulgaris regime. Now former Prime Minister Tsouderos has been asked to form a "government of personalities." Mr. Tsouderos is a man who has never been quite certain of his political convictions, swerving now toward republicanism and now toward the royalists. It is not likely that he will do better than his predecessors in handling a crisis which demands broad democratic reforms, both political and economic.

*

IN ARGENTINA THE REAL ISSUE IS PEOPLE against army, and until that is settled any democratic gains will be short-lived. Of course the arrest of Colonel Perón and the ousting of his closest collaborators from the government were good news. Perón's character has two sides: the rather frivolous Argentine officer, gallant and boastful, an easy target for cartoonists, and the hard-boiled adventurer who in South America jumps so readily from insignificance to leadership. His leadership had weak spots, chief among them his failure to win any important section of the population. Quite different from Hitler, who in his best years had the backing both of industrialists and of a large part of the workers, Perón never succeeded in convincing the reputable trade unions, while at the same time he antagonized the conservatives, who would otherwise have supported him, by his collaboration with the Axis. Nevertheless, he is not a man who can be casually dismissed. He has been trained in the fascist school, and his drive for power showed unquestionable audacity. By their cry, "We want his head," the crowds in Buenos Aires showed that they knew who was the real enemy; a mere figurehead like Farrell does not provoke such reactions. So it is some satisfaction to know that Perón is a prisoner aboard a warship. But the triumvirate, Farrell-Avalos-Vernengo Lima, which at the moment seems to control the situation, offers no guaranty that the battle for freedom has been won. Avalos is one more Argentine general, interested in maintaining the influence of the army rather than in promoting democracy. Admiral Vernengo Lima is the best of the three if only because he represents the navy, which in Argentina has always been loyal to the constitution and is decidedly pro-Ally. But it is neither from the army nor the navy that a restoration of democratic rule can be expected. The distinguished civilians invited to join the Cabinet were right in making the condition that power should be turned over to the Supreme Court. In Argentina the main problem is to end the interference of the officers' cliques which since 1930 have been dominating the politics of the country from their stronghold in the Campo de Mayo.

*

THE UNITED STATES HAS JUST WON A MAJOR war fought round the world. It performed what is often referred to as a miracle of production and delivery. It raised and put into action an army of millions. The country rose so brilliantly indeed to the call and needs of war as to set in motion the fear, among thoughtful people, that the triumphant military and nationalist point of view might constitute a threat to civil government and free institutions. To be sure, popular feeling against anyone who opposed this war was not kindly, and the papers now are full of pleas official and unofficial for bigger and better preparedness for "the next war": which means that the fear referred to above is not groundless, but which also makes it the more extraordinary that last week the nation's highest award, the Congressional Medal of Honor, was conferred on a conscientious objector. Private Desmond C. Doss, who refused to bear arms, was allowed to become a medical aide, and on various islands in the Pacific he performed such acts of self-abnegation and sheer courage that he became a legend in his outfit. His was an extraordinary case; other C. O.'s were stupidly and unfairly treated. But the fact that he should have received the country's highest honor is a small but happy sign that sanity, respect for the human being, and Sherman's definition of war have survived the intoxication of the greatest conflict in history.

*

THE TAX BILL ADOPTED BY THE HOUSE HAS apparently been drawn with an eye to the 1946 elections rather than to the economic welfare of the country. By increasing the exemption on the normal tax the bill will free several million taxpayers, and voters, of the necessity of paying any income tax at all in 1946. This, of course, is a sound move in so far as those affected are in the low-income brackets. But the House went against the Treasury's recommendations in granting very substantial tax relief to those with incomes of $100,000 and up by voting a blanket 10 per cent reduction on all tax bills. While no large number of votes is likely to be influenced by this special gift, it is obvious that considerable political pressure must have been exerted from some quarter to bring about an upset of the Treasury's recommendations. A gift package is also handed out to industry in the form of a 4 per cent reduction in the corporation surtax rate and a cut in the excess-profits tax from the present net of 85½ per cent to 60 per cent. As a sop to the little man—the 1946 voter—a minor levy, the $5 use tax on automobiles, was eliminated. Any reduction in taxes at a time when the inflationary danger still persists must be explained in political rather than economic terms. But a program which leaves the burdensome excise taxes practically untouched while granting relief in the amount of $450,000 to the man in the $5,000,000 income bracket invites a repetition of the disaster which followed the Mellon tax cuts in the 1920's.

*

THIS WEEK WE ANNOUNCE WITH PLEASURE A regular signed page by J. Alvarez del Vayo, who has so ably handled the Political War Section of The Nation. Both as journalist and political leader throughout his active life, Mr. del Vayo has had intimate experience of the course of European and world affairs. He represented Spain on the Council of the League of Nations, headed the League's Chaco Commission, served as his country's ambassador to Mexico, and as Foreign Minister during the Spanish struggle absorbed the full impact of the first major campaign of World War II. Under the title, The People's Front, our colleague will say what he pleases about men and affairs, writing from wherever events may take him. His first page will appear next week.

I. F. STONE HAS LEFT FOR PALESTINE

In the near future The Nation will publish his cabled dispatches on the critical Near Eastern situation.

How to Minimize Strikes

INDUSTRIAL unrest confronts the federal government with a dilemma: on the one hand, work stoppages—call them strikes or call them lockouts as you choose—tend to thwart vital domestic and even foreign policies of the nation; on the other hand settlement of industrial disputes by governmental decree must entail either methods of coercion intolerable to a democratic society or regulation of the economy to an extent incompatible with the free-enterprise system as it is commonly conceived. It can scarcely be doubted that reconversion will be retarded by the strikes now in progress and by those threatening to develop. Demobilization is made more difficult. Reemployment of veterans and war workers is impeded. In foreign affairs a pledge such as that made by Secretary Ickes for the shipment of American coal to prime the pump of European industry is rendered impossible of fulfilment; and the consequences in terms of instability and disorder abroad may be very grave indeed.

But what are the alternatives? Supporters of the Ball-Burton-Hatch bill would have us end labor disputes affecting the national interest through compulsory arbitration. One trouble with this is that wage disputes are not in any real sense arbitrable: there are simply no criteria in a free-enterprise system for determining what portion of a company's earnings should be paid out in wages and what portion in profits. An arbitrator can scarcely be other than arbitrary.

A second defect in this alternative is the plain fact that wage decisions unacceptable to workers cannot be enforced. We have seen enough of the rigmarole of plant seizure and subsequent defiance of the government to know that it settles nothing. Any attempt to mine coal with bayonets or produce automobiles with tommy guns would be an invitation to civil war. And not even the most reactionary of administrations democratically elected is likely to engage in such folly.

It proved feasible during the war, however, to settle most industrial disputes through conciliation or through what amounted to compulsory arbitration by the War Labor Board. This was because of labor's extraordinary adherence to its voluntarily tendered no-strike pledge and because WLB decisions were made in conformity with the Little Steel formula, which, whatever its demerits, at least afforded a clear national wage policy.

But today WLB is in dissolution and there is no longer any frame of reference for wage awards. The assertion of a definite wage-price policy by the government seems a prerequisite to any effective efforts toward the speedy settlement of labor disputes. In normal times—that is when production of consumer goods is relatively equal to demand—the wage-price relationship can be expected to adjust itself. But for the next six or nine months it is essential that the government lay down general principles to maintain economic stability.

Within the framework of such principles conciliation can be more effective and arbitration can be attempted. For effective conciliation we clearly need a greatly strengthened conciliation service in the Labor Department; this means among other things better salaries in order to attract conciliators of experience and high caliber. As to arbitration, the prescription offered by Senator McMahon seems a great deal more promising than that laid down by Messrs. Ball, Burton, and Hatch. An emergency Labor Board is better off without sanctions, which cannot in any case be made effectual. But, since compliance with its recommendations will depend in the last resort on the pressure of public opinion, it should be given power of subpoena so that it may ascertain the full facts in any dispute and insure publicity for them.

Admittedly this will merely minimize strikes and lockouts, not altogether prevent them. But occasional strikes are part of the price this society must pay for a free labor movement, and occasional lockouts are one of the penalties attached to a free-enterprise system. Competition and even conflict are inescapable expressions of the way in which America chooses to live.

Bargaining with Britain

WE CONGRATULATE the reporters who persuaded Assistant Secretary of State William L. Clayton to talk about the Anglo-American financial conference in Washington on the record instead of off it. Now at last we have something solid to supplement the leaks, hints, and rumors which have so far constituted the "news" about these vital negotiations. Let Mr. Clayton persevere in seeking publicity on this matter, braving the possibility of hostile reactions on Capitol Hill and elsewhere! We believe he understands what is needed to put Anglo-American economic relations on a sound basis, but if the present conference is to be crowned by success, a big job of public education will have to be done both here and in Britain. The atmosphere of secrecy that has prevailed for the past month plays into the hands of those who chant daily that Uncle Sam is about to have his pockets picked. In Britain lack of information is encouraging a kind of radical jingoism based on the fear that Britain is being asked to mortgage its political and economic liberties.

At the beginning of the conference Lord Keynes told the press that Britain was faced with two alternatives: it could attempt to emerge slowly from its current difficulties with as little outside help as possible, relying on autarchic mechanisms, such as exchange controls and barter assignments; or it could seek, with American aid, to restore international economic life on the liberal lines indicated by the Atlantic Charter. The second alternative, he made it plain, was the preference of the British government, but to make its adoption possible, American aid would have to be provided on conditions enabling Britain to carry on the trade on which its sheer existence depended.

In his statement on October 9 Mr. Clayton, in effect, indorsed this position. If, he said, the United States did not grant to Great Britain the help it needed to bridge its critical balance-of-payments problems of the next three years, it would be forced to adopt defensive measures which would divide the world into trade blocs of a highly competitive character. Nevertheless, he made it clear that financial aid must be part of a bargain offering "present and future benefits to the American people"; it was not proposed to justify it on sentimental grounds. Thus he indicated dismissal of the reported British plea for a grant of a "non-commercial loan," extended in recognition of Britain's greater material sacrifices and as compensation for the way in which it stripped itself of its external resources in order to hold the Axis at bay in 1940. Undoubtedly there are good moral arguments for this proposal, but it is wise to push it aside as politically unrealistic. Persuading Congress to approve even the hardest-headed business deal is going to be difficult enough.

What now appears to be jelling at the conference is a plan for a long-term open credit which will enable Britain to draw up to $5 billion. Interest and amortization, it is suggested, might be waived for the first three to five years, the period when the British shortage of dollars will be most acute. In return, it is indicated, Britain is being asked to make a composition with the holders of the British sterling debt, scaling down the total and freeing at least part for early conversion to dollars. This would give American business a chance to cash in on the urgent needs of countries like India for manufactured goods of all kinds. In addition, Britain will be expected to liquidate the sterling area and abandon the associated dollar pool as soon as possible, to undertake the gradual removal of exchange and import controls, and to modify, if not abolish, the Empire-preference system whereby the different members of the Empire charge each other lower duties and so discriminate against other countries.

It is to be noted that so far the discussion appears to have been concentrated on the smashing of those trade barriers favored by Britain. In their new-found enthusiasm for freedom of international commerce Americans tend to

> Compound for sins they are inclined to
> By damning those they have no mind to.

The United States is poorly placed to use those weapons of economic warfare whose renunciation by Britain it demands. A country with a favorable trade balance cannot often profit by barter deals, for they would normally involve scaling down exports or consenting to receive larger imports. Likewise, ownership of a large share of the world's gold and a strong ideological attachment to the gold standard rule out effective use by America of currency manipulation. But we have our own economic armaments, and the question arises whether we are prepared to give them up as readily as we are willing to crack down on those that are useless to us.

We cannot very well expect Britain to abandon the shelter which Empire preference affords to its manufacturers unless we in turn are ready to lower tariff rates which in many cases have the practical effect of an embargo. Under the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, passed last summer, the President now has power to make a move in this direction, but there has been no Washington whisper suggesting that lower American tariffs are to be part of the bargain with Britain. Another potent American trade weapon, which causes great damage to other countries, is the subsidy. For some years we have been subsidizing American shipping very handsomely, and a great deal of elaborate and expensive propaganda is now being put out to insure the continuation of this policy. Yet subsidized competition of this kind is a grave handicap to Britain and other countries which depend partly on shipping earnings to pay for imports. More recently we have begun to pay export subsidies to enable high-cost American farm products to compete abroad. This constitutes unfair competition to Canada and Australia, for instance; yet we urge that these countries forgo the advantages they now enjoy through Empire preference.

If the United States is sincere in promoting an international free-market policy, if it really hopes to reverse the universal trend to economic self-sufficiency, it must be prepared to set an example. We must grow up to ourselves as a world economic power and learn the facts of international economic life. The first of these is that one cannot have one's cake and eat it. If we want to sell we have got to buy; and if we want to sell and get our debts paid we must eventually buy more than we sell. Once these elementary principles have been grasped many of the difficulties of arranging a financial and economic agreement with Britain which would bring tremendous benefits to both parties will vanish.

The Marshall Report

BY CHARLES G. BOLTE

GENERAL MARSHALL'S report on the winning of the war in Europe and the Pacific is a magnificent and informative account of the last two years of war. For that reason it should be read by every American with pride and no little sense of awe. It is also a partisan plea for a national defense policy which seems on careful study peculiarly unsuited to provide any real measure of security in the atomic age. For that reason it should be read by every American with caution and great reserve.

General Marshall's historical survey of the actual fighting occupies about two-thirds of the book. Most of the next third is taken up with a summary of occupational policies, our weapons, and our troops. Finally there is a presentation of the Chief of Staff's views on the measures that should be taken for our common defense.

It is the historical section which is the most impressive. Throughout, it displays the clarity of mind, the grasp of essentials, the intellectual integrity, and the generosity of vision which have so distinguished General Marshall and assured his place in history as one of the very greatest American soldiers. The report begins with the flat statement that "this nation can take little credit for its part in staving off disaster" in the early years of the war, and adds: "It is certain that the refusal of the British and Russian peoples to accept what appeared to be inevitable defeat was the great factor in the salvage of our civilization." This same realistic appreciation of facts, no matter whose nationalistic sensibilities may be wounded, marks the greater part of the historical survey. Marshall never claims too much and toward the end of the book, when he reveals how completely our man-power was absorbed in warmaking, he says: "Even with two-thirds of the German army engaged in Russia, it took every man the nation saw fit to mobilize to do our part of the job in Europe and at the same time keep the Japanese enemy under control in the Pacific. What would have been the result had the Red Army been defeated and the British Isles invaded we can only guess. The possibility is rather terrifying."

His estimate of the mistakes made by our enemies is particularly interesting, and reveals time and again how close we were to defeat. It is apparent from the reports that our whole war was won by a series of calculated risks which paid off; one can feel only admiration for the planners who operated with such a narrow margin of safety.

Having told how we won the war, General Marshall explains how we shall win the next one. We cannot expect proposals for achieving peace to come from the Chief of Staff. His job is to be a pessimist: to assume the worst and to prepare against it. Marshall says that atomic energy can destroy man. To atomic energy he adds new developments in other fields—aircraft, rockets, and electronics. He quotes from a special report prepared by General Arnold which describes only the weapons already in existence, not their future possibilities; he adds, "The developments of the war have been so incredible that the wildest imagination will not project us far from the target in estimating the future."

Yet what is his answer? Universal military training, with a trained reserve of four million men, so that "we can move armies of men into the enemy's bases of operations and seize the sites from which he launches his attacks." He urges military preparedness, with which there can be no argument; but having already demonstrated that this nation could not have won the recent war without the intercession of its allies and the mistakes of its enemies, he urges that "this nation be prepared to defend its interest against any nation or combination of nations." Having said that only 20 per cent of our armed forces was in the infantry, he asks for a civilian reserve of four million. Having explained that the next war will be fought with rockets or long-range aircraft delivering atomic explosives, he proposes a civilian reserve which will take a year to muster fully and which is to be moved "into the enemy's bases of operation."

He goes so far as to impute "ulterior motives" to those who oppose universal military training. We submit that his own report is the strongest argument against the proposal. It can only be assumed that the proposal stems inevitably from the two psychological failures of most professional minds—the tendency to go into the future armed with the decisive factors of the past and the tendency to support measures by which one makes one's bread and butter. It cannot be assumed that a mind so embracing as General Marshall's is incapable of understanding implications of atomic energy; it must be assumed that that mind rejects the implications because the consequence of accepting them would be to undercut the ground on which the professional thinking of years has been based.

This is not an attack on the professional minds which have fashioned our victory and must fashion our future defense. It is simply another way of saying that war is too important to be left to the generals, of pleading that the scientists and the civil authorities be given control over our main defense policies. General Marshall himself provides the answer to our central problem when he says that the recent war was "only a prelude of what can be expected so long as there are nations on earth capable of waging total war." So long as there are nations with unbridled sovereignty ranged against one another, total war is possible. So long as total war is possible, the generals must devise means of defense. But the least we can ask is that they devise means which are appropriate to the atomic age, not to the gunpowder age.

Rhapsody in Black and Blue

BY GATES WARD

(An employee of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer now on strike)

Hollywood, October 11

A FOURTH of Hollywood's 30,000 motion-picture-studio employees have been locked out since March 12 in a dispute over a single issue—the right of employees to belong to unions of their own choice. For seven months the 7,500 men and women involved have peacefully picketed the nine major studios by day and local theaters by night, generally in groups of ten to a hundred. Save for a few clashes between individuals there has been no violence; the picket lines have been gay and good-humored, pretty girls in the white-collar unions marching with young men from the crafts.

On Monday, October 8, the situation had changed. At six o'clock in the morning nearly a thousand pickets formed a peaceful line at the Warner studio in suburban Burbank. At once two hundred goons engaged by I. A. T. S. E. (International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees), a notorious company-sponsored A. F. of L. organization, came toward them, swinging chains, clubs, and other weapons. Behind the goons came about four hundred non-strikers, mainly scabs from rump-chartered I. A. T. S. E. unions. The unarmed pickets fell bleeding in the street, but the line held until two hundred suburban police and deputy sheriffs rushed out from the studio and used their clubs recklessly. Then the line parted, letting in the strike-breakers and a few dozen employees from uninvolved unions. Hundreds of other workers, including many I. A. T. S. E. members, refused to cross the picket line. From the safety of a sound-stage roof, studio executives watched the bloody battle and by loud speakers invited reluctant workers to come inside.

The violence had begun at Warner's the previous Friday, when strike-breakers vainly tried to run down the pickets in automobiles, and company cops, aided by the Los Angeles and suburban police, sought to break up the line with fire hoses and with tear-gas bombs thrown from the studio roofs. About seventy pickets were injured—a dozen seriously—in the two days of rioting instigated by the studio, I. A. T. S. E., and the law-enforcement agencies. The strike leaders—but no studio chiefs—were arrested, charged with inciting to riot. A number of pickets were arrested for carrying concealed weapons, which they had picked up or seized from goons, but so far as is known no thugs were arrested. However, their weapons were unconcealed.

At the height of Monday's battle four police officers walked off the job in disgust when they saw what they had been sent to do, and joined the pickets. When it was announced on Monday night that Warner's, supported by other major studios, would meet the pickets in a showdown battle on Tuesday, such a wave of protest swept the community that hundreds of respectable citizens—doctors, lawyers, business men, housewives, even some I. A. T. S. E. members—rushed to join the picket line at dawn. Nothing happened. Warner's apparently had had enough. Not an employee crossed the picket line.

On Tuesday the producers visited Sheriff Biscailuz. The strikers' original plan was to move the mass picket line to each studio in turn, but when Warner's reacted violently to its first appearance, they decided to keep it there until the violence subsided. On Wednesday morning as about four hundred pickets, a third of them women, almost all of them locked-out employees from Warner's and other studios, were circling peacefully before Warner's main gate, two hundred deputy sheriffs advanced on them carrying tear-gas bombs and machine-guns. They forced the pickets to put up their hands and then marched them into the studio, where they held them for several hours, refusing to let them see lawyers and even denying them toilet facilities. Finally all the pickets were taken to the Burbank jail and held on $500 bail each, on the charge of illegal assembly and rioting. Many, including a number of women, refused to accept freedom on bail. I saw all this and can state that there was no violence of any kind by the pickets. On Thursday ten thousand A. F. of L. Lockheed workers joined the picket line, twenty-five hundred at 6 a. m. and the others in later shifts.

These mass demonstrations by the strikers were the result of the long run-around they had been given by the producers and of the Washington NLRB's mysterious delay in rendering a decision in the dispute.

Hollywood is completely organized now, from office workers to directors, in some thirty-four A. F. of L. and ten independent unions. And of course there is the Association of Motion Picture Producers. Engaged in the present strike are fourteen A. F. of L. locals and an independent extras' union. Nine are craft locals—the painters, molders, carpenters, machinists, electricians, janitors, blacksmiths, plumbers, sheet-metal workers; and five are white-collar and technical workers' unions—the cartoonists, office employees, publicists, story analysts, and the key union of the strike, Local 1421, of set designers, decorators, and illustrators. The producer-backed I. A. T. S. E. has twelve regular locals, among which are the progressive, sympathetic camera men, film technicians, sound men, and costumers. Controlled by dictatorial top leaders, they have been unable to avoid their misuse in the present conflict.

Equity has taken no stand in the strike, but it would have been won over long ago if the Screen Actors' Guild, which escaped I. A. T. S. E. seizure only after a bitter fight a few years ago, would support it. Despite a substantial progressive element, the guild is under reactionary leaders and as a union has taken a neutral, hands-off stand. Its president is George Murphy, a conservative Republican, and its treasurer is Russell Hicks, who knocked a girl picket down with a blow to the nose in Monday's battle. The equally powerful Writers' Guild, unaffiliated but progressive, vigorously supports the strikers but has been prevented from joining them by its peculiar contractual relations with the producers. Even so, the producers have been severely handicapped; insufficient and incompetent replacements have caused serious delays and the cancelation of many scheduled productions, at a cost of millions of dollars. Some five hundred I. A. T. S. E. scabs are sleeping in the Warner studio. But no pictures are being made because the rebellious I. A. T. S. E. camera men refuse to cross the picket line. The picketing of local theaters has brought a 25 per cent drop in box-office receipts, and theater owners are privately begging the producers to settle the strike. Most of the independent producers privately or openly favor the strikers and have long been trying to persuade the major producers to settle.

The present strike is the climax of the all-out, ten-year-old effort of certain producers, a powerful minority in the A. M. P. P., to put all studio labor under the control of a company-dominated labor organization that was set up in Hollywood by two racketeers with the producers' help. In 1934 two Chicagoans with police records, George Browne and Willie Bioff, took over the International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees and with it control of the projectionists in picture theaters. In 1935 Bioff came to Hollywood and told the producers—so it was asserted in court—that he and Browne would close up the theaters unless they were paid off.

Not only did the producers start paying off, but in January, 1936, through the Hays Office, they gave to these crooks and their union a closed shop in the studios. At that time I. A. T. S. E. had only seventy-six members in Hollywood, but the producers ordered all their organized employees to join it or risk losing their jobs, and the membership rose to 12,000 in less than two years. Here was an obvious answer to the Wagner act and the rise of labor in the mid-thirties—an industry-wide organization controlled by the producers, who found it more convenient to make deals with dictatorial and crooked labor chiefs than to bargain with free unions.

Several studio locals resisted the producers' effort to herd them into I. A. T. S. E. until the pay-off scandal exploded and Bioff and Browne, together with an important producer, were sent to prison in 1941. A dozen or more free unions then seized the opportunity to form a progressive group called the Conference of Studio Unions (C. S. U.) with the purpose of protecting and promoting free unionism. This group made rapid progress in improving wage and working conditions, and in consequence a revolt broke out in the ranks of the twelve I. A. T. S. E. locals. It was smashed, however, by Richard Walsh, a vice-president of I. A. T. S. E. during the Browne-Bioff regime.

A truce reigned until October, 1943, when a small independent union of seventy-seven set decorators voted to join Local 1421, one of the C. S. U. unions, and to designate it as their bargaining agent. For almost a year the producers avoided official recognition of Local 1421 as the decorators' agent while actually treating it as such. Then the trap was sprung. In August, 1944, the producers suggested that, "merely as a formality," Local 1421 should be certified by the NLRB as the decorators' representative. Although this action was unnecessary, since the decorators had the right to join any union they chose, the local complied. Two weeks later, on the instigation of the producers, a I. A. T. S. E. local filed a cross-petition claiming exclusive jurisdiction over the decorators—although not a single decorator, as such, had ever been a member of an I. A. T. S. E. local. Of course, the NLRB could not hold an election to decide the claims of two rival A. F. of L. unions except upon the employers' petition. Instead of petitioning, the producers suddenly announced that they were "caught in the middle of a foolish quarrel between brother A. F. of L. unions."

Local 1421 withdrew its petition in disgust, for jurisdiction was not an issue, and gave the producers proof that it represented 100 per cent of the decorators by their own free choice. The producers flatly refused to recognize the local or to negotiate with it as the decorators' agent. In December the local filed a strike notice in accordance with the Smith-Connally act; in January, 1945, the producers having made no move to heal the breach, it voted overwhelmingly to strike. Now the WLB intervened, and in February its arbitrator awarded the decorators to Local 1421, pending final decision by the NLRB. The producers refused to obey the WLB order and filed a petition, at last, with the NLRB to resolve the "jurisdictional dispute." In March Local 1421 went out on strike.

The producers' plot was transparent. The war was still on, and the no-strike pledge was sacred. The producers thought they had the local over a barrel. If it was faithful to the no-strike pledge and refrained from striking, after having voted to strike, its integrity and strength as a union might be fatally compromised. If it struck—which was apparently what the producers wanted it to do—and was joined by other unions in the hated C. S. U., the producers hoped to see them all discredited through their violation of the no-strike pledge.

When the unions defied the producers' ultimatum to return to work by April 4, contracts were canceled and members fired. Richard Walsh ordered his men to take over the strikers' work, but they refused. When the producers announced that thousands of jobs were open to all comers, he issued rump charters wholesale for strike-breakers, declaring it was his duty to "keep out communism and keep the studios running in war time." Oddly, the heads of the A. F. of L. international failed to support the strike until the regional NLRB decided in June that it was legal and justified.

In August the C. I. O. came to the support of the strikers, "to help defeat company unionism, labor's menace in the post-war era," and began to help picket theaters in various large cities.

Although an NLRB election was held in May, the Washington board did not resolve the "jurisdictional" issue until Tuesday, October 9. It then decided in favor of the strikers. According to reliable reports the producers will defy the decision on the pretext that if they accept it, I. A. T. S. E. will strike. In any case, the strike may be hard to settle, for the local and its allied unions insist not only on recognition by the producers but also that machinery be set up to prevent and settle jurisdictional disputes and that all union contracts and jobs be restored as of the date the strike began. The situation is tense; the strike may last a long time.

What Happened in Bavaria

BY SAUL K. PADOVER

(Historian and political scientist; during the war a member of the army's Psychological Warfare Division)

MG intrusted the government of Bavaria to the ultra-reactionary Bayerische Volkspartei, a clerical party which had close ties with Nazis and militarists. Whether MG was aware of it or not, it is a historical fact that the B. V. P. was a compromised party. In 1933 it had voted for the Ermächtigungs Gesetz, the law which gave Hitler dictatorial powers. This may be one explanation why, under the American occupation, the B. V. P. was so acceptable to the Bavarian Nazis, militarists, Junkers, and monopolists, who flocked to its banner for protection.

In embracing the Nazis and other objectionable elements the B. V. P. leaders said that they were acting on the motto Liebet euere Feinde (Love your enemies). Since the B. V. P. had done nothing against the Hitlerite terror, had not raised its voice against mass slaughter and mass enslavement, there was grim irony in its sudden tenderness for the Nazis.

For MG to expect the B. V. P. leaders to take action against their political friends and business associates was, to speak mildly, the height of naivete. Bürgermeister Stadelmayr, the real ruler of Munich, is an example of clericalist-Nazi cooperation. An employee in a printing plant that worked for the city, he not only had friends and acquaintances among the Nazi politicians but was himself a member of the party. To Nazi colleagues he showed massive favors. As soon as MG made him mayor, he appointed Dr. Jobst, his Nazi predecessor's adjutant, as his own assistant. Since Jobst was not a simple Nazi but was known as a high national official in the party (Politischer Leiter in the Reichsleitung), anti-fascist citizens of Munich complained immediately. After three weeks in office Jobst was removed, but not by Stadelmayr, who protested that the man was "indispensable." The same thing happened when the Bürgermeister gave a job to Dr. Meister, an intimate of former President Weber, the leader of Munich's Nazis and a personal friend of Hitler. Meister, too, was "indispensable." On his personal staff Stadelmayr retained a number of loyal Nazis, among them Obergerichtsrat Dr. Vetter, Stadtdirektor Dr. Neff, and two secretaries, Frau Krafft and Fräulein Lieglein. The secretaries had access to all the confidential business in the mayor's office. When an official of the Free Germany Committee protested to Oberbürgermeister Scharnagl against Bürgermeister Stadelmayr's pro-Nazi policy, he was given a reply that had at least the merit of candor. "I," said Scharnagl, "do not participate in the fight against fascism. That I leave to the Americans."

The B. V. P. had, indeed, no objections to Nazi-fascism, and its municipal and provincial Bavarian administrations were filled with Hitlerites. According to one estimate, from 50 to 80 per cent of all city employees in Munich were party members. Once a Nazi was in office, it proved to be as difficult to dislodge him as it had been in Aachen. A number of known Nazis were dismissed after pressure had been exerted, but it will take an upheaval to clean them all out. Dr. Lange, the Minister of Economics in the provincial government, would recommend only high Nazis to important positions. Some of his candidates were arrested later by the American authorities, but for a long time he retained Dr. Graf, a prominent Nazi official (Leiter des Reichswirtschaftsamtes Nord Bayern), as his personal assistant.

Nazis also permeated the lower levels of the bureaucracy, where they were well placed to perpetuate Nazi methods and ideas. The whole police force of the suburb of Freising, for example, was Nazi. The head of the provincial Food and Agriculture Board, Rattenhuber, admitted that 90 per cent of his employees and coworkers were party members. He could not fire them, he said, because he did not see where the government would get the money to pay their pensions. Under this man the black market flourished openly. On the Sendlingertor Platz in Munich anyone could buy a loaf of bread for 24 marks, as against 24 pfennigs in the rationed shops, and a kilogram of meat for 200 marks ($20 at the official rate of exchange).

Perhaps the most influential among the non-policy-making employees were the interpreters. Since MG officers had no command of the German language, they had to rely upon their interpreters. Anti-fascist Germans who knew English reported that all the interpreters were unreliable and twisted meanings in their translations. One of them, Fräulein Schlagmann, had been a leader of a Nazi Frauenschaft and was a known anti-Semite. In this connection it is worth a passing mention that the secretary to an important American military organization in Bad Wiessee was the daughter of Dr. Frank, the former governor of Poland, now one of the top war criminals. Catholic and Jewish Poles who survived Dr. Frank's administration may be interested to know that Fräulein Frank was permitted to retain her home, in which was stored the loot her father had brought back from Poland.

In the vital matter of living quarters the B. V. P. policy of coddling the Nazis and the MG policy of not molesting them too much—unless they were pre-1933 members, and even then there were loopholes—was glaringly evident. The severe struggle for living accommodations was never resolved in favor of anti-Nazis. The greatest sufferers were the KZ's, Germans released from concentration camps. To their dismay they saw Nazis occupying their homes unmolested while they themselves were unable to find quarters. They were systematically cold-shouldered by the municipal administration. I quote two letters from KZ's:

Eugen Allmaier wrote to the Munich Red Cross:

> Since June 6, 1945, I have been trying to obtain an apartment from the municipal Housing Office, to which I have reported almost daily. . . . I am living with my wife and child in a small room in the apartment of my parents. . . .

> Since the beginning of May the pictures of Hitler have disappeared from the walls of the Housing Office, the Hitler salute is not used any longer, and the employees have removed the party badges from their lapels, but otherwise not much has changed. . . . If one does not have a special recommendation, one is sent away with the routine answer that nothing is to be had. I realize the extreme shortage of houses, but it is a well-known fact that many Nazi officials and party members are still occupying very large apartments. . . . Thus while I have to crowd my family into a tiny room, a childless party member and former deputy Ortsgruppenleiter continues to live in his three-and-a-half-room apartment across the street. . . .
>
> I know there are many people as urgently in need of apartments as I am, and with equal right. But I have the impression that at the Housing Office things are not as they should be. Many people to whom I have spoken share my impression.

Another KZ, Karl Feuerer, wrote:

> Four weeks ago, upon my return from the concentration camp where I had spent twelve years in lice-infested barracks, I requested an authorization from the Munich Housing Office to move into the apartment of former Nazi City Councilor Beck, who had fled the city. The request was rejected on the excuse that the apartment was not listed in the books. . . . Today I had occasion to see the authorization turning this apartment over to bombed-out Albert Debrau. . . . I encountered a similar experience in applying for the apartment of S. S. Sturmbannführer Major Frühwald, who had also fled. . . . I was told to return in two days. When I did return, they told me that the apartment was not listed in the books. However, on the day before, supposedly at the order of Bürgermeister Stadelmayr, the apartment had been given to a non-KZ man. Other cases like this have occurred and can be reported. There is no doubt that the Nazi trash still sit in the Housing Office and that the city government is not able to clean them out. If AMG will do nothing about this situation, the people will have to take action themselves.

The KZ's were not only without quarters but also without money, jobs, or clothes. B. V. P. politicians showed their generosity by raising charity collections. It is an ironic commentary on the whole situation that in a number of Bavarian towns—Mossach, Perlach, and Waldperlach—the money and food raised for the KZ's were spurlos versenkt; the donations simply vanished, probably into the maw of the ubiquitous black market. In Munich the authorities put up posters appealing to the wealthy Nazis to contribute old clothes to Hitler's victims. I do not know whether anybody's heart was touched, or who got the rags. I do know that the KZ's, treated like beggers, did not feel that under the American MG Bavaria was a particularly happy place for genuine anti-Nazis. I cannot refrain from quoting one more letter. It was written by a former inmate of Dachau, Dr. Karl Rüdrich, to the editor of the Münchener Zeitung.

After describing how well the American combat troops treated him and his comrades upon their liberation from Dachau, Dr. Rüdrich tells what happened when they reached Munich:

> The disappointment was great. We did not expect any special reception. We ex-KZ's are simple and modest. But we did expect adequate living quarters, food, and an elimination of red tape. We were weary. All of us were ailing. But everyone of us had to go through all the red tape to receive our forty marks and our ration points. My comrades were running around all day attempting to buy food or to obtain at least one shirt. Finally we were given billets at the Stielerschule. Liberated KZ's were in charge. They did what they could, but their facilities were limited. The city government had made no preparations. There were no washrooms or sinks. We had no towels, no messkits, no blankets. That was our convalescent home in Munich. It was not what we had fought for.
>
> Some of the city employees were helpful, others were uncooperative. The Nazi spirit has not disappeared. We cannot do anything. We are always told that the directives come from higher quarters—from the Americans. I found out that the Americans have shown real understanding when reasonable suggestions are made to them. They act like gentlemen, but they say we have to help ourselves, that we must learn to administer our own country. I remember my dead comrades. They died as martyrs for freedom. What is Munich doing for their survivors?

During the first weeks of their liberation KZ's, together with other anti-Nazis, drew up lists and descriptions of prominent Hitlerites and in the naive hope that action would be taken submitted them to the authorities, both American and German. Nothing much happened; occasionally some big Nazi would be arrested and then released. The true anti-Nazis did not know where to turn. These politically alert people, Germany's sole democratic potential, were given no encouragement and no assistance. It was difficult for them to retain any illusions when they saw Hitler's collaborators roam the city unmolested. Among the latter one may mention Karl Oberhuber, S. A. brigade leader, adjutant to the notorious Gauleiter Wagner, wearer of the coveted Nazi Golden Party badge; Colonel von Herrmann of the Volkssturm, an old party member who shouted, "Whoever refuses to join the Volkssturm will be hanged"; Herr Berchtold, member of the Reichstag and one of the original Nazis, with a party book number lower than that of Hitler himself (4 or 6); Professor Richard Klein, a friend of Hitler and member of his staff, designer of the Nazi insignia; Professor Pistor, rector of the Technische Hochschule, who was responsible for the complete Nazification of that institution. These men continued their tranquil existence after the Führer's downfall.

Anti-Nazi Bavarians were further dismayed when they saw high police posts in the hands of the sworn enemies of the German people—militarists and former officers of the German General Staff. The police president of Munich was not the Social Democratic candidate, Freiherr von Godin, who had given the command to fire on the Hitler rebels in 1923, but Colonel von Seisser, a General Staff officer who had collaborated with Hitler and signed the proclamation in 1923 declaring an end to the "criminal" German Republic. That proclamation, which acquired such terrible significance later, read: "Proclamation to the German People! The government of the November criminals today is declared dismissed. A provisional German National Government has been set up. It consists of General Ludendorff, Adolf Hitler, General von Lossow, Colonel von Seisser." Colonel von Seisser's colleagues in the police were other former General Staff officers—General Pirner, General Ranner, Colonel Kimpfmüller, and Colonel Lorneck. It is incredible that MG should have tolerated such men even for an hour.

Anti-Nazis shrugged their shoulders in helpless rage. As in Aachen, they repeated the bitter jest, "Too bad you're not a Nazi; if you were, you'd get ahead." After months of American occupation they saw that the swastikas and Nazi street names were not obliterated. Of course, they themselves should have taken the initiative in removing street signs commemorating Nazi heroes—Horst Wessel Platz, Schlageter Platz, Hans Schemm Strasse—but Germans, even anti-fascist Germans, are not made that way.

The democratic elements in Munich believed that MG cooperated with the B. V. P. and tolerated Nazi and militarists out of fear of bolshevism. German Communists employed in the administration kept their party affiliation a secret and were in constant fear of being denounced by Nazis; in at least one instance a Communist was thrown out and his Nazi denouncer, a party member since 1933, retained. "I know these anti-fascists," an MG major shouted at another American officer who proposed a Communist as a reliable person; "they are all bandits."

Until General Eisenhower kicked out the whole Bavarian administration, Bavarian anti-Nazis had no reason to believe that Americans were not hypocrites when they talked about "democracy." Some of their comments illustrate the extent of their disillusionment: "The Americans speak nicely of democracy on the radio, but actually they have no intention of reeducating for democracy or of establishing political democracy"; "The workers are saying, 'The Americans have come, but the swindle is just the same. The Nazis are still here and push us around as much as ever.'"

Since he acted as he did, General Eisenhower must have had full information about the situation, of which I have only related a few details. His liquidation of the B. V. P. government was the only step that was possible and proper under the circumstances, but I am skeptical about its lasting effectiveness. In the first place, it is a tragic fact that the democratic groups in Germany are not large enough or strong enough or experienced enough to carry through the necessary purges and to undertake a fundamental program of reconstruction. They will need help, and I do not see where they will get it. In the second place, MG, as constituted at present, will not be found useful. It is one thing for a sincere anti-Nazi like General Eisenhower to issue orders in Berlin; it is another thing to make his subordinates in the municipalities carry them out effectively. I am afraid that Wilhelm Högner, the Social Democratic Minister President of Bavaria, will have hard going.

[This is the fourth of a series of articles on Military Government in Germany. In a final article Mr. Padover will discuss the only alternative for MG.]

Have the Arabs a Case?

BY ELIAHU BEN-HORIN

(For sixteen years a newspaper editor in Palestine; author of "The Middle East, Crossroads of History")

FROM the headquarters of the Arab League in Cairo resolutions, protests, proclamations, and demands are issuing in an almost endless stream. The League is pugnacious, the League is indignant, the League is eloquent; it has something to say about every problem of the Middle East, whether it be Palestine and the Jews, Lebanon and the French, or Tripolitania and the Russians. From farther east, like a distant and invariable echo, sounds the seconding voice of King Ibn Saud, who does not hesitate to threaten the Jews of Palestine, and if need be the entire Western world, with violence should the Palestinian issue be resolved in favor of the Jewish people.

From the new Labor Cabinet in London comes still another echo—the voice of British statesmen and of the British press citing Arab opposition to a Jewish Palestine as the one insurmountable obstacle preventing them from doing the right thing by the Jews. This "Arab argument" has been so thoroughly propagated that even President Truman, speaking of Palestine, finds it necessary to say that he would be unwilling to dispatch an army of 500,000 Americans to the Near East to fight the Arab revolt which might break out if the pledges to the Jewish people are fulfilled.

The idea of a herculean pan-Arabic force in the Middle East ready to rise in a jihad is about the most ludicrous politico-military chimera heard of in many years. Two battalions of British troops suppressed the pro-Axis military putsch of the Rashid Ali Bag Gailani government in Iraq in 1941, though it had the backing of the then all-powerful Axis. The ill-armed and ill-trained armies of Egypt and Iraq, the camel riders of Saudi Arabia, and the horsemen of Transjordania, picturesque as they are, would be an ineffective force in these days of mechanized warfare.

Before we drift too far in this misrepresentation of the military strength and unity of purpose of the Arab peoples, it seems pertinent to look closely at Middle Eastern realities and to discover precisely what call these Arab chieftains have on the democracies. Indeed, do the Arabs have a case, and what is it?

As long as the war continued, we knew clearly who was with us and who against us, who fought for civilization and who staked their future on Hitler's victory. Where the Arabs stood was no secret. When the Nazi Wehrmacht rolled across Europe, Arab soldiers in German uniforms with the inscription "Free Arabia" on their sleeves were among the conquering heroes of the Third Reich. Remnants of this Arab Legion now cool their heels in Camp Opelika, Alabama. Special Moslem divisions of the Waffen-S. S. fought the Yugoslav partisans. A red fez decorated with the insignia of a scimitar grasped in a fist flanked by swastikas was worn with their gray-green uniforms.

Amin el Husseini, the ex-Mufti of Jerusalem, and other Arab leaders appealed in the name of Allah to the Arab Middle East to join hands with Hitler, who was described by them as "the direct descendant of the Prophet." If the risk was too great for an overt alliance they prayed for an Axis victory. Paeans of thanksgiving rose from the mosques of Syria and Palestine when Rommel took North Africa. Not only was there a pro-Axis revolt in Iraq, but Egypt refused to lift a finger in its own defense, even when Rommel's legions invaded Egyptian territory. An Egyptian statesman carrying the plans of the British High Command in his pocket was seized by the British on the very eve of his escape to Rommel's headquarters. Ibn Saud and King Yahya of Yemen sat comfortably on the fence all through the war, waiting to see which way to jump. In Syria and Lebanon the Arabs were so delighted by Axis victories that they chanted happily, "No more mister, no more monsieur, only Allah in heaven, only Hitler on earth."

Faisal Ibn Abdul Aziz
Viceroy of the Hejaz and Foreign Minister of Saudi Arabia

If all this is forgotten, the Arabs are still providing us with abundant evidence of their political and moral orientation. There was no need to prompt the French, the Norwegians, the Italians, the Yugoslavs to bring their traitors to trial and punishment. But the Arabs are not only unwilling to try the pro-Axis collaborationists in their midst; they are actually demanding that Amin el Husseini himself, who is now held in France as a war criminal—on the demand of the Yugoslav government—be absolved of all blame and released. These demands by the Arab League and other Arab political associations are understandable. In their eyes the Mufti is simply not a traitor. Pétain, Laval, Quisling, Degrelle, Joyce may be branded traitors by their own people, but according to the political and moral standards of Pan-Arabia, Amin el Husseini, once Hitler's official adviser on Arab affairs, is a national hero, whose only mistake was that he backed the losing horse.

Arab social philosophy and the existing forms of Arab society are in harmony with the Nazi-Fascist system rather than with our democratic ideas. For hundreds of years Arabia withstood the civilizing influence of the West. Even when Ataturk performed his miracle of a revolution in Turkey, westernizing that backward land of Islam, his modern ideas never penetrated into the Arab domains. There the reactionary clergy, the polygamist effendi, and the feudal kings, emirs, and sheiks continued to rule supreme over an impoverished, illiterate, and disease-ridden populace.

The fabulous oil riches of the Middle East attracted Western capital. Hundreds of millions of dollars were invested in the development of oil fields, in the construction of refineries and pipe lines, and in royalties to the various Arab governments. Did this flow of capital into Arabia benefit the masses of the people—raise living standards or improve social conditions?

Iraq provides the answer. Unlike the concessions in Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, which are still in their infancy, the Iraq concession, granted twenty years ago to British-American-French-Dutch interests, has been in operation for many years. About $85,000,000 was paid to the Iraqi government in oil royalties, gratuities, educational grants, and non-interest-bearing loans. This may not impress Americans as a large sum, but for a country of Iraq's size and population (3,500,000 inhabitants), and of Iraq's poverty, it is tremendous. Where did this money go? It disappeared into the pockets of the ruling clique, leaving no beneficial effects on either state expenditure or the living conditions of the masses. Here is how an Arab newspaper in Bagdad, the Saut-el-ahali (the Voice of the People), described life in Iraq in 1944:

> It is clear that 90 per cent of the entire population of Iraq live on a subhuman level. They are condemned to a life of starvation and exposed to the ravages of epidemics without benefit of any medical assistance. And these intolerable, primitive conditions exist in the twentieth century among our own Iraqi people, who sweat and toil to make the soil yield riches which are then entirely consumed by others. . . . The government has done nothing either to mitigate the distress or to combat its causes.

Elaborating the subject, the paper divided the population of Iraq into four groups: (1) 2 per cent of the population, who control the entire wealth of the nation and its means of production; (2) 8 per cent, who form a poor middle class and hardly earn a living; (3) 75 per cent, who are chronically undernourished, live in appalling conditions, and are easy prey to every kind of sickness; (4) 15 per cent, who are completely destitute. The death rate in Iraq is high and the birth rate is low, resulting in a natural increase of no more than five per thousand. At least two million persons —more than 50 per cent of the population—are infected with malaria, and there is a high incidence of tuberculosis. Ninety per cent of the people are still illiterate.

The Iraqi government could have achieved much for its people at home, but instead it fought the Jews in Palestine and the French in Syria, promoted Pan-Arabism in Cairo, and made grandstand plays in San Francisco and Washington. And Iraq is not unique: its description applies to every Arab land in the Middle East. The last remnants of a feudal society in the world fight bitterly against any democratic or civilizing innovation. Yet in our desire to woo the Arab kings we have showered on them every kind of favor, political and material. They were admitted on the bandwagon of the United Nations when the war was virtually over. Lend-lease was supplied to them, together with military missions to train their desert armies in modern warfare. Today pan-Arabic aspirations are bolstered by both the British and the American government. President Truman even went so far—on whose advice, one wonders—as to present Prince Abdul Ilah, the Regent of Iraq, with the medal of the Legion of Merit for his services during the war.

History sadly repeats itself. After the last war it was principally Great Britain which encouraged the pan-Arabic aspirations of King Hussein of Hejaz. Not that Britain believed in the possibility of any comprehensive unity in Arabia; on the contrary, every British expert on Arab affairs said that unity in Arabia was a phantom. Lawrence of Arabia wrote, "When people talk of Arab confederations or empires, they talk fantastically." Gertrude Bell denied the very existence of an Arab nation. As recently as September 26, 1945, a special correspondent of the London Times in the Middle East reported: "The difference in political, religious, and economic structure between, say, the Lebanon and Saudi Arabia is much more pronounced than between, say, Germany and France. Tribal, religious, and dynastic antagonisms are more embittered and fanatical in the Oriental than in the European world, and so far the Arab League has been more occupied with traditional eloquence than with the elaboration of constructive programs." And, "Just now the main, if not the only unifying force in the League is an ingrained and traditional xenophobia, directed, according to circumstances, against the French, the British, or the Jews."

The British encouraged King Hussein in his dreams of grandeur because they wanted above all to assure their complete domination over the Middle East, so vitally important to the maintenance of the Empire. Since then, dynastic changes have occurred in the Arab domains. King Hussein lost his kingdom to Ibn Saud and died in exile, a broken and disillusioned man. New chieftains have risen to power. But no social or economic changes of consequence have taken place. Indeed, the Arab-Jewish conflict is no less social than nationalistic in its nature. Numerous signs of an Arab-Jewish rapprochement were noted in the past. This, however, is what the reactionary effendis fear most, for they are bent on preserving their vested interests. The Mufti's clique killed numerous Arabs whose only sin was that they regarded sympathetically the social-economic progress brought to Palestine by Jewish-Zionist enterprise. Arabia remains as closed as ever to the march of civilization.

All this makes it clear that the Arabs have no case. Neither their attitude during the war nor the form of society they represent can possibly appeal to Labor Britain or democratic America. Yet the improbable and illogical seems to be happening. The rulers of both Britain and the United States seem to be so determined on a pro-Arab orientation in the Middle East that they would rather bear the odium of betraying the Jewish people and of backing reactionary Moslem potentates at this decisive stage in shaping the future world than risk the displeasure of the Arab cliques. What is behind it all?

The usual answer is oil. By now everyone is aware of its unparalleled abundance in the Middle East. But if oil is an important factor in the "Arab case," there is much more to it than that. The Jewish-Arab controversy in Palestine cuts across the most vital issues of world strategy. The major political, economic, and strategic plans of the British-American alliance on the one hand and of Soviet Russia on the other are part and parcel of it. Once again the Middle East, which has figured so prominently in every world conflagration, becomes the bone of contention in the great powers' jockeying for positions and influence.

Canada's Veterans Go Back to School

BY LESLIE ROBERTS

(Canadian journalist; author of "Canada's War in the Air" and "We Must Be Free"; coauthor with George F. Beurling of "Malta Spitfire")

Montreal, October 10

THE Canadian veterans' program and the G. I. Bill of Rights are based on fundamentally different social concepts. The American plan offers short-term assistance to the individual in getting back to normalcy; the Canadian is conceived as a long-term investment in the individual as a national asset. While it offers financial help and expert advice to the veteran who wants to buy a farm or establish a business, the backbone of the Canadian program is education. The official veterans' handbook says:

> The leaders of Canada in the future must come in large measure from those young Canadians who volunteered for active service in this war. This is a principle which the Dominion has recognized in setting up its plans, . . . with the result that full opportunity to resume education is given to the young ex-service man or woman whose ambition to go to university was interrupted by the war. . . .
>
> All qualified for university admission at time of enlistment, or who can qualify within fifteen months after discharge, may receive this opportunity.

Technically the opportunity consists of the right to go to school and college for a period of time equal to the individual's length of service, the government paying all tuition and making monthly maintenance grants of $60 to single and $80 to married students, plus extra money if there are children. Actually the government will extend the period of training for the brilliant student whose service time is not sufficient to enable him to complete his studies. "The government is of the opinion," says the handbook, "that the opportunity to go through to a degree should be available to the outstanding student."

The service men, for their part, are taking full advantage of the opportunity. More than 300,000 out of a total enlistment of approximately 750,000—as compared with 100,000 out of 600,000 after World War I—are eligible for university training. Today, with the bulk of the army still in Europe, every campus between the oceans is alive with young veterans. Toronto University is reported to have taken over a former war plant and cleared out the machinery to make room for desks. Similar preparations are being made at Montreal. In its first check-up Ottawa estimated it had received 40,000 applications. To date, according to Colonel Wilfrid Bovey, chairman of the Royal Commission on Veterans' Qualifications, 90,000 young men and women have signified their desire to go to college. The problem is where to put them all and at the same time find room for the usual crop from the high schools. Some universities are trying to meet the problem by raising their entrance requirements for civilians.

Stanley Frank, in the Saturday Evening Post of August 18, reported that most American soldiers are not interested in going to school: they want jobs, he said. On the other hand, Canadian veterans' advisers report that many men who come to them decline immediate employment opportunities in favor of more education. Why should their attitude be so different?

Tens of thousands of young Canadians went to the armed forces directly from high school or early in their university careers; tens of thousands more enlisted from extremely junior positions in the business world. Among both groups the realization that they are not equipped for any but low-paid jobs is discernible. But the same is true of the younger men in the American army. The difference in attitude is due to the difference between the government plans.

While there is no great difference in maintenance grants, Canada's being only slighter higher, the Canadian scheme covers all educational expenses; the G. I. Bill of Rights allows only $500 a year for tuition and textbooks. The G. I.'s time in school can in no case be longer than his period of service; the Canadian—whose service on the average is likely to be longer, simply because Canada has been at war since September, 1939—knows that if he does well his training will not be cut short.

In my opinion, however, none of these factors really give the key to the current rush for higher education by Canadian veterans. The Dominion's soldiers, sailors, and airmen have been conditioned for this program virtually since the day of enlistment. From 1939 on education has played a large part in the Canadian service man's life. Under the aegis of the Canadian Legion Educational Services all manner of courses were opened by the time the first troops began to move overseas early in 1940. During the long pre-invasion wait in Britain a greatly enlarged curriculum was offered, partly, no doubt, to keep the men busy and fend off the occupational ailment sometimes called cafard. Later, thousands of young men and women were actually pursuing university courses in combat areas, tucking textbooks into the pockets of their battle dress and writing examination papers in their spare hours out of the line.

You can get some idea of the scope of this service from a few figures. More than 2,000,000 textbooks proper were distributed in the armed forces, plus more than 500,000 other books dealing with post-war problems and more than 100,000 listed under the general head of "directed reading." I have seen these services in operation overseas—on the Continent, at bomber stations in Britain, and in naval establishments—and I can testify that Canada's young men and women were having the advantages of education put before them, and put before them attractively, day in and day out through the war years. This, I believe, is the clue to the Canadian veterans' attitude.

The educational program is not limited to veterans who want to go to college. From one end of Canada to the other every type of vocational school is in full swing, training men and women in subjects ranging from commercial art to stationary engineering. A few days ago I visited an art school conducted by one of the Dominion's outstanding commercial illustrators. In its classes more than a hundred young men, recently returned from the battlefields of Europe, were bent over drawing boards or listening to lectures.

I asked the director how many of his students would make the grade.

"You'd be surprised," he answered. "The majority of those you see here will find a place somewhere. There isn't a man in the school who's just here for the ride. Primarily they're all here because they like it. And, brother, how they work!"

The system of selection at this training school is the same that is used throughout the vocational-training structure. When the soldier is discharged he discusses his future with a veterans' adviser or with the civilian committee in his home town. If he wants to study commercial art he is sent to see a teacher in that field; after their conference the teacher may recommend him for art schooling on probation to see how he gets along; he may advise him to drop the idea and try something else for which he has more aptitude; or he may welcome him to his classes with open arms, realizing that here is a person with talent who might never have had an opportunity to go to art school but for the war and the Veterans' Program. In the case of the boy or girl who after a few weeks on probation seems to be headed for nowhere, teacher and pupil sit down and talk it over. Perhaps they have another try; perhaps the teacher persuades the pupil to try something else. If so, the student goes back to the veterans' adviser for further talks, and may either take training in another field or get a job and come back later. What Canada is trying to do is to fit square pegs into square holes, to help the veteran become what he wants to be, provided he can acquire the skill. The idea behind it all is that the country needs trained men and women. Each case is an individual case and is treated as such.

Throughout the country all manner of patriotic people are collaborating with the government in working out the plan: civilian committees in small towns, the Canadian Legion, the labor unions, the Rotary clubs, pretty nearly everybody who has an organization. Sometimes, I suspect, the veterans' advisers—who are government people—wish all these well-intentioned bodies would stay at home and attend to their knitting, and no doubt they do get into officialdom's hair at times. But that is what the government says it wants, a vital interest in the veterans' future on the part of every man and woman of good-will. The tide is high now, and the hope is that it will remain high until the job is finished, which will not be this year or next. Ian MacKenzie, Minister of Veterans' Affairs, says the program will not reach its peak for at least another year, if then.

To call Canada's program a method of discharging a debt to the fighting men would be to misunderstand the concept on which it is based. Cynics may call it a politicians' concept, but they would be wise to remember that although the plan was devised by politicians it is actually an expression of the nation's will, as witness the support given it by all parties in Parliament and by the country itself during the subsequent general election. It is one of the greatest social experiments ever conducted in the Americas.

POLITICAL WAR EDITED BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

The People's War Goes On

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

IT IS with mingled feelings of satisfaction and regret that I announce the end of the Political War Section. When this section was started, on September 26, 1942, I wrote:

> Our purpose is very simple. We intend to underline the revolutionary character of the war and help develop a political strategy through which the democratic elements in all countries may overcome the forces of reaction and capitulation, and free the peoples of the world from the tragic conflict of fighting under colors not their own.
>
> The section will be a weapon in this political war. It will be turned against the confusions and hesitations of democratic policy as well as against the horrors of Axis rule; against the Quislings who do Hitler's bidding in Oslo and Brussels and Vichy, but also against the potential Quislings concealed in Washington and London and Buenos Aires.

The central political idea of the section has been that World War II was started by fascism; that it had to be fought as a war against fascism; and that it would not be won until the last vestige of fascism was wiped off the earth. Looking back through the issues of The Nation, I am satisfied that the Political War Section has remained faithful to its purpose. In spite of the difficulty of combining unreserved support of the military conduct of the war with bold criticism of the way in which the war was being waged on the political front, I believe that its aims have been well served.

I take justified pride in a number of "scoops" which appeared in these pages. Ralph Bates wrote the first full account to appear in the American press of the Yugoslav partisan movement headed by Marshal Tito, at a time when most American liberals were still describing Mihailovich as the hero of the Balkan resistance. Later Bogdan Raditsa amplified this story in a special issue devoted to the intrigues of the reactionary opposition to Tito. From Joseph Kessel came the first dramatic recital by a writer close to the underground of the great epic of French resistance which was later to thrill the world. From the very outset we led an unrelenting fight for support of and later recognition of De Gaulle. We exposed the various forms which Darlanism took as well as the intrigues of Allied diplomacy. And we were the first to publish the full program of the De Gaulle government, long before it returned to France, in a series of articles by the former Minister Jules Moch, now a member of the French Provisional Assembly.

The alarm about Argentina was sounded by Manuel Seoane and Felix Cernuschi when the general tendency both in the State Department and in the press was still to minimize the gravity of Nazi penetration in South America, and to misinterpret the meaning of the military coup which overthrew the Castillo government. In the early summer of 1943 Gaetano Salvemini, in a series of remarkable articles, urged the Allied powers to seize the opportunity which was still open to them of pursuing a genuinely democratic policy in Italy. Basil Vlavianos, writing in the Political War Section, was one of the first to expose Britain's reactionary intrigues in Greece, and his reports were later emphasized and amplified by first-hand accounts from such able correspondents as Constantine Poulos and Philip Jordan. As for Spain, the first call for unity among the Republican exiles by Dr. Juan Negrín was published on October 17, 1942.

On the basis of first-hand information Pacificus and other writers revealed, months before Japan's defeat, the dangers of the occupation policy which American authorities were then shaping for Japan; today that policy is the subject of heated controversy in the American press. Under the pen name of Argus, the distinguished exiled German writer and editor Leopold Schwarzschild contributed a weekly column, Behind the Enemy Line, which was considered by Nation readers and by informed government officials one of the best commentaries available on Nazi methods of political warfare. We also printed a number of studies on post-war problems by Fritz Sternberg. And in one of the last insertions of the Political War Section, on July 28, E. H. Jacoby and Captain X gave a picture of conditions in the Philippines which revealed for the first time the methods used by the American military control under General MacArthur.

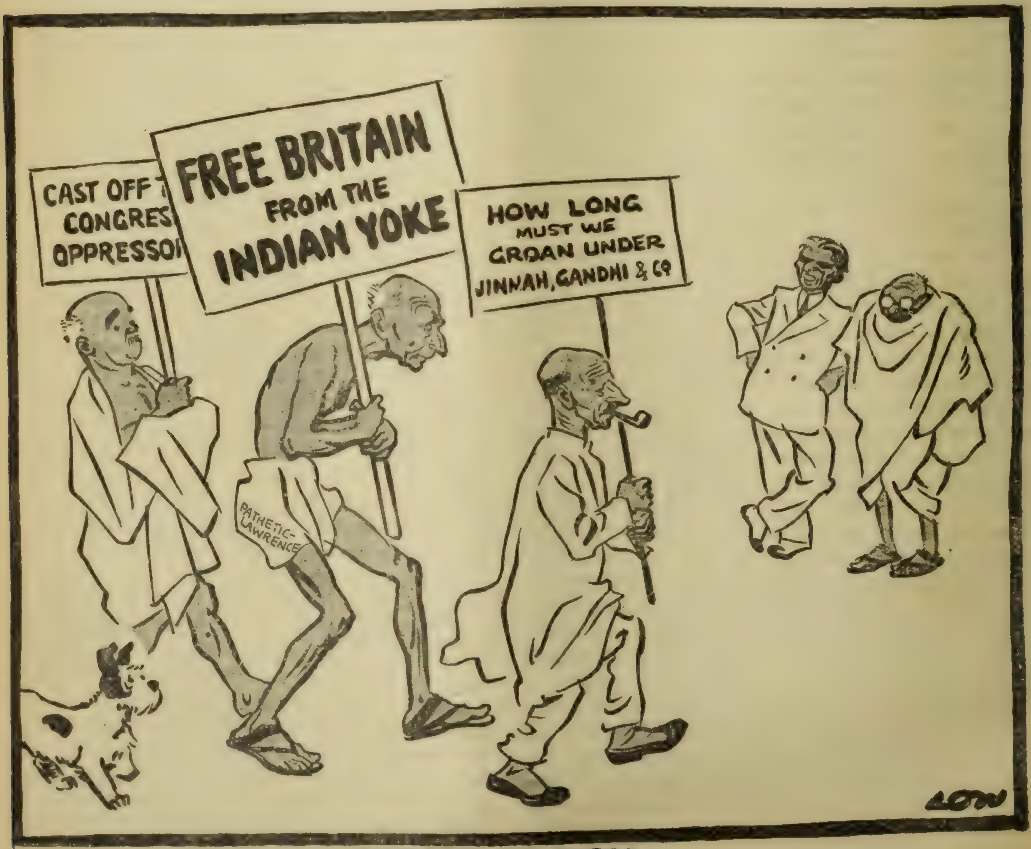
As editor of the Political War Section I have consistently maintained (1) that the Europe which was emerging from the war was going left (even though some of the most capable foreign correspondents returned from Europe with a contrary impression); (2) that the kind of political warfare being waged by the Allies must inevitably lead to profound disagreements among the United Nations, especially among the big powers, and render still more difficult the tremendous task of building the peace; (3) that there could be no possible deal with fascism—unless one fought fascism as one fights an invasion of plague-bearing rats, destroying every single source of infection, fascism would return, in two years, in five years, in ten years, to plunge the world into a third world war so terrible in its destructiveness that it must exclude even the remote possibility of a fourth.

I am of course gratified that the section's analysis of the world situation was so accurate. At the same time I must regret that many of the fears expressed here have been confirmed. The big nations are today as much engrossed in power politics as they were after the First World War and on the eve of the Second. Titular heads of ministries have changed, but the world's chancelleries are still staffed with the same sort of officials that welcomed the treason of Munich as a guaranty of peace, and they still continue to function in the same spirit of appeasement. Old-time diplomats maneuver to clear the path for a king in Spain and in Greece and in Yugoslavia and in Italy, despite the sober warning of republicans that they will oppose the return of these obsolete monarchies by force if necessary. Too many labor leaders, liberals, and progressives are talking and acting as if there had been no war, as if they understood nothing of the events of the past twenty-five years, as if they were incapable of learning the imperative lesson of unity. Worst of all, many people who decide policy continue to regard fascism with the same tragic lack of comprehension that precipitated this war.

It was an irresponsible general who found the issue between Nazis and anti-Nazis analogous to a "Democratic and Republican election fight." But generals are merely less careful in their pronouncements than diplomats, and many persons in high places in the Allied governments undoubtedly share Patton's view.

Events have justified our fears that the failure of the Allies to promote real democracy in the occupied countries could only lead to a dangerous neo-isolationism in America, a tendency to assume a position of complete detachment from the problems of Europe. Instead of asking themselves very honestly whether the failure of the Allied occupation policy does not stem from the lack of a clear-cut anti-fascist line, some people here are adopting a "to hell with all of you" attitude toward the people of Europe. This attitude was clearly brought out in an article in the book section of the New York Herald Tribune two weeks ago by John Chabot Smith, until recently the Herald Tribune's correspondent in Italy. Reviewing "Italy in the Coming World" by Don Luigi Sturzo, the Italian Catholic leader, Mr. Smith referred to the feeling "not infrequently expressed" by Allied officers and G. I.'s over there: "Let's give this place back to the Italians and forget about it." In 1943 at the start of the invasion of Europe we used to hear that America would be the decisive factor in shaping the world to come. Now, in the face of popular demonstrations of anti-fascist feeling, the Americans tend to damn the whole Italian people—especially the men of the resistance—as "a dirty lot," "lazy loafers," "anarchists," and turn hopeful eyes toward the "well-behaved," "orderly," "clean," "well-disciplined" Germans. What else could one expect when their military and political leaders have never made a sharp distinction between fascists and anti-fascists?

The situation I have sketched here today would seem to indicate the necessity of continuing rather than ending the Political War Section. But now that the military fight is won, the political war remains as the chief preoccupation of The Nation as a whole and no separate section is called for. I shall continue, however, to deal with this central theme in a regular signed page to be called The People's Front. It will begin in next week's issue.



CAST OFF T
CONGRES
OPPRESSO
FREE BRITAIN FROM THE INDIAN YOKE
HOW LONG MUST WE GROAN UNDER JINNAH, GANDHI & Co
PATHETIC-LAWRENCE
LOW

UNREST IN INDIA

BOOKS and the ARTS

NOTES BY THE WAY

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

"THE UNQUIET GRAVE" by Cyril Connolly has just been published in this country (Harper, $2.50). I discussed it more than once last spring when the English edition came into my hands. Subtitled "A Word Cycle by Palinurus," it is a bitter yet refreshing bouquet in which Mr. Connolly's own perceptive, irreverent, and "self-dismantling" comments on the quality and meaning of life are mingled with the wit and wisdom of the writers he most admires. It is one of those books which disturb and incite the mind, and I happen to feel that that is one of the primary functions of a book. But it is a function not often exercised in a period when culture itself tends to be regarded as merely another physical comfort which goes by the name of "entertainment."

A measure of this tendency, and incidentally a crude but to me sure indication of the force of Mr. Connolly's book, is the degree to which it irritated Orville Prescott, who reviews books in the daily New York Times. Mr. Prescott gets irritated only when something unusual turns up. Most of the time the books he has to cope with are mediocre enough or conventional enough to make him amiable and calm and even, at times, playful. But last spring, for instance, when Marguerite Young published "Angel in the Forest," which is perhaps the best book of 1945 and certainly the product of a first-rate talent, Mr. Prescott acted like a traffic cop confronted by a murder.

His reactions to "The Unquiet Grave" were of the same flustered order. He could not help admitting that Mr. Connolly is talented and learned, that there are "bright shafts of truth" and "penetrating passages" in the book which kept him from throwing it into the fire just when the impulse was becoming irresistible. He even went so far as to say that "there is something of his uncertainty and despair in all of us." But his general, and injured, feeling was that Mr. Connolly's whole purpose was to shock not only the bourgeoisie but Orville Prescott in person. And he was so outraged by Mr. Connolly's unembarrassed self-examination, by his "decadence" and his "pessimism," that I found myself wondering if Orville Prescott isn't really Oliver Allston.

Since he could not quite dismiss the book, Mr. Prescott hit back by calling Mr. Connolly "fat." And he may or may not have been responsible for an accompanying photograph which reinforced this childish attempt at insult. On the jacket of the book is a photograph of the author lying back in an arm chair. He does not, to be sure, appear sylph-like; neither does he appear to be, as Mr. Prescott implies, disgustingly fat. But this effect was achieved by the simple and distorting device of carving the head and shoulders out of the photograph of a man in a reclining position and presenting the result as if it were the portrait of a man sitting upright. It is a very mean trick, intentional or not.

I do not know how much Mr. Connolly weighs, but aside from the fact that obesity has not hitherto figured as an indication of literary merit, I don't see how anyone could use it as a weapon with which to attack a man who himself confesses, ruefully, that he is overweight and who nevertheless has the agility and wit to say that "imprisoned in every fat man a thin one is wildly signaling to be let out."

It should be mentioned, by the way, that one of Mr. Prescott's most violent reproaches against Mr. Connolly is that he "quotes many French authors in the original French without providing translations." That complaint, I think, rounds out the picture of Mr. Prescott as critic. He obviously weighs very little.

STRANGE THINGS ARE HAPPENING these days. I can remember when a liberal, almost by definition, was a person who looked upon the Hays Office and its invisible censorship as a threat to life and letters, the leading repository of philistinism, the first defense of hypocrisy, and the coldframe of chauvinism. Last week I picked up a copy of PM, a liberal newspaper, and found a review of the film "Mildred Pierce" which said in effect that it should not be allowed because it would give foreigners a bad impression of America. The review, by John McManus, was headed by an unctuous statement by Eric Johnston which was a faithful rendition of the Hays line. After all, for $150,000 a year Mr. Johnston could hardly do less than maintain the low traditions of his office. "American motion pictures," it read, "are, and they must continue to be, America's greatest salesmen. . . . I learned from personal experience that in many countries the only America the people know is the America of the motion picture. We intend always to keep this in mind."

It was bad enough to find this crass nonsense raised to the status of Bible truth. But in the review itself Mr. McManus out-Johnstoned Johnston. Read, and ponder, these two paragraphs:

> The surface details will be disarmingly familiar. There is a neat, California stucco home, nesting pleasantly with many others just like it in its palmy block. Shiny, modern automobiles cluster the boulevards. . . . These are the staples of Southern California life, for which, as Eric Johnston implies, people all over the world know us and undoubtedly envy us.
>
> But what of the people with whom James M. Cain and Warner Brothers (with their pledge of combining good movie making with good citizenship) populate these characteristic settings—are they Americans?

Apparently Mr. McManus thinks it will be "good for" people all over the world to envy us. Apparently he approves of the California stucco version of American life which Hollywood and the Hays Office have conspired to jam down our throats these many years. Apparently it doesn't matter whether or not "Mildred Pierce" has anything to do with the truth

"The sanest, most practical statement of our national educational problems that I have yet seen."
—CLAUDE FUESS

General Education in a Free Society

THE REPORT OF THE HARVARD COMMITTEE

Introduction by JAMES BRYANT CONANT

"As exhaustive an analysis within its lesser scope, as that of Thomas Aquinas in the Summa Theologica . . . the reading of this report is a stimulating experience, and provocative far beyond the confines of formal education."—Hiram Haydn, N. Y. Herald Tribune Book Review

"No other survey has scrutinized the educational field more comprehensively or related it so closely to the nation's welfare."—Time

". . . a blueprint for post-war education that can give breadth and unity, depth and meaning, to the heterogeneous programs now offered by the schools and colleges of America."—Benjamin Fine, N. Y. Times

7th PRINTING
At all bookstores
$2.00

HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS
Cambridge 38 Mass.

about the Americans it deals with. And apparently Mr. McManus doesn't object to censorship as long as it is called "a pledge of combining, etc."

In another paragraph Mr. McManus tosses off in passing the smug observation that "all Hollywood movies are well played and directed." And in his last paragraphs he lets himself go in an extraordinary outburst of crude demagogy and cruder prose. He can't help his prose, but somebody ought to tell him, before he disappears over the horizon in his shiny new Liberal Imperial Racer, that foreigners are almost as bright as Americans and often fail in their duty to envy California stucco; and that one way of getting overt censorship in this country is to ask for it.

WORDSWORTH said that poetry is emotion remembered in tranquillity. Norman Corwin's "On a Note of Triumph," composed in advance to celebrate V-E Day, might be described as emotion anticipated in a hubbub. That may be one reason why it isn't poetry.

WISDOM OF THE AGES: "My mother told me," said the man behind the soda fountain, "that if I didn't retire by forty I'd work till I was ninety."

Jacksonian Democracy

THE AGE OF JACKSON. By Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr. Little, Brown and Company. $5.

THIS book is a triumph of historical scholarship, analysis, and interpretation. It is richly documented. Its author has examined with profit a wealth of manuscript material, public records, the writings of major figures in our national history, and out-of-the-way pamphlets and books of obscure figures who prove to be not so minor after all. This abundant labor throws much new light on a host of Americans, well-known and less well-known, who come to life in remarkable portraits that are both brilliant and sensitive. We learn a good deal that is new about the Jacksonian era, its relation to the Jeffersonian age it succeeded and to the periods that have followed. The book is admirably written in athletic, graphic prose, relieved by passages that are moving and tender but never sentimental. It succeeds as books rarely do in making a major contribution to history as a social science and in exemplifying the best canons of history as a branch of literature.

It is impossible in a few words to do anything like justice to Mr. Schlesinger's analysis of the crisis which the American heritage of equal opportunity first encountered in the rising industrial community a hundred years ago; to the far more important role played by urban workers in that crisis than we have assumed; to the significant part of the intellectuals; and to the relationships between the larger theory of Jacksonian democracy and law, religion, literature, economics, and politics. It is clear that the frontier was a less weighty factor in the rise and career of Jacksonian democracy than has been commonly supposed. It is also clear that class conflicts figured more substantially in American development than most Americans have been wont to think. It is no less apparent that the key to an understanding of what was accomplished

WHY DOES BRITAIN want us to be as prosperous as possible and free from periodic depressions?

And WHAT WILL AMERICA do about it?

A liberal economist gives us the answers in this first-hand study of British and American economic policy. These are the economic facts of life a maturing America must face.

If Anglo-American cooperation is to last, economic policy must be a part of it. But there is grave danger that we shall drift apart in our ways of making a living, that rival trading blocs will be set up and world peace destroyed. George Soule's book makes clear what Britain wants above all else: an America as prosperous as possible; an America free from periodic depressions. He reveals the fear of America that influences England's policies: he analyzes the social planning which England has already done and hopes America will do also. Thus, his penetrating and objective study is a revelation of the problems which face each country and a keynote for the economic era now opening. $2.75

BY GEORGE SOULE

America's Stake in Britain's Future

THE VIKING PRESS

At all booksellers

MONEY-SAVING MAGAZINE COMBINATIONS

For Your Convenience

THE Nation

☐ with Harpers Magazine . . $6.50
You Save $2.50

☐ with Consumers Union . . $7.00
You Save $1.50

☐ with Harpers Magazine and Consumers Union . $9.00
You Save $3.50

☐ with Free World $7.50
You Save $1.50

☐ with Saturday Review . . $8.50
You Save $1.50

All club combinations listed are for one year, and may be mailed to different individuals and addresses.

THE NATION by itself

☐ One Year $5 ☐ Two Years $8 ☐ Three Years $11

☐ Servicemen's Rate $3 a Year

Canadian and Foreign Postage $1 a year extra

★

SPECIAL NOTICE TO READERS

To Subscribers:

Nation subscribers should give us at least three weeks' notice of a change of address, indicating the old as well as the new address.

Please cooperate by renewing your current subscription on receipt of the first notice of expiration.

To Newsstand Readers:

The only certain way of getting The Nation regularly is to enter a subscription. By doing so you will not only insure prompt receipt of your copy, but you will make a considerable saving in money over the newsstand price.

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

I want to subscribe to The Nation, or the following Nation magazine combinations as listed below:

☐ Remittance enclosed. ☐ Bill me.

NAME
STREET
CITY ZONE STATE
10-20-45

and what was not accomplished is to be found neither in the approach of the thoroughgoing economic determinists nor in that of the exponents of the autonomy of absolute moral values nor in the defensive emphasis of certain historical champions of the reform impulse on the one hand and of pro-agrarian apologists for the slave interest on the other. The key is rather to be found in movements of economic interest, fluctuating between antagonisms and alliances; in the structure of power; and in the dynamic role of values and ideas, all in a shifting, subtle interdependency.

Mr. Schlesinger, the son of Professor Schlesinger of Harvard, has not only written a first-rate and eminently readable book for scholars: he has at the same time produced a book which American liberals should welcome for the light it throws on the past, present, and future of democracy. Mr. Schlesinger, in a greater measure than is common among historians, writes with an eye on our time and on tomorrow. He is of course thoroughly aware that the tensions and struggles of the Jacksonian era were far simpler than those of today. Yet he succeeds in writing a history which is a useful instrument for understanding the conflicts in American life today and, perhaps, for directing them toward peaceful, intelligent, and democratic solutions. His underlying assumptions and values are those of the relativist rather than the absolutist, of the actualist rather than the theorist. He lets us appreciate in new and fresh ways the moods, resources, methods, and values of the democratic process of trial and error, compromise, tolerance, and proximate rather than complete solutions of social and economic tensions. His contribution toward an understanding of the stubborn and difficult problems of means, of the uses and abuses of the flexible approach toward tactics and strategy, is especially notable. Not only can weary and bewildered liberals learn much from the pages of "The Age of Jackson"; they should find their faith in democracy as an instrument for action today renewed, deepened, and extended. MERLE CURTI

BRIEFER COMMENT

Primers for Adults

BRITAIN IN WAR TIME took to reading as never before. Nor was this just a form of escapism. Blacked out, the people sought intellectual light, and books on history and current political and social problems vied in popularity with detective stories. Plagued as they were by the paper shortage, British publishers did their best to cater to this new thirst for knowledge. Many new series of short primers, designed to convey information in a concise, popular, but not condescending manner, appeared in the bookshops.

The British Survey Handbooks edited by John Eppstein (Macmillan, $1 each) are examples of this development. Number 4, "Hungary," and Number 5, "Denmark," manage to compress into less than 100 pages a great many facts about the history, geography, politics, and economic life of the countries with which they deal. They are written clearly but without much distinction of style. Generally the tone is severely objective, though in describing the Hungarian regime the author of the Hungarian volume tends, perhaps, to give the devil more than his due. Both books devote a considerable proportion of their space to the war years, bringing their story down to the end of 1944. Thus in the Danish volume there is an excellent account of the resistance movement, whose remarkable campaign against the Nazi invaders reached a carefully planned climax on D-Day.

KEITH HUTCHISON

Mr. Nathan Carries On

THE THIRD ANNUAL VOLUME of George Jean Nathan's "The Theater Book of the Year" (Knopf, $3) follows the pattern previously laid down by the author, who is without question one of the most indefatigable playgoers, as well as one of the most unflagging commentators, the world has ever known. Again he sets down for every play produced in New York during the season of 1944-45 the author, cast, date of production, and length of run, thus providing a chronicle to which future historians as well as present-day readers can turn. Again, also, he then adds his own critical estimate of the play, together with whatever bits of theatrical history, scraps of gossip, wisecracks, purple patches of indignation, and assorted obiter dicta occur to him. Probably no one else in America remembers in detail so many plays and just what happens in each of them; certainly no one has firmer opinions concerning them all or tosses these opinions about more debonairly. One never knows what one is going to find or where one is going to find it, and Mr. Nathan, being an odd cross between the encyclopedist and the boulevardier, does his best to offend all earnest souls. But those who are not distressed by flippancy of manner will discover in time that there is probably more good sound sense about the contemporary theater per page of his writing than will be found in any other commentator who concerns himself with it.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Stef, Kenning, Drapa

IF YOU DO NOT KNOW what a stef is, or a kenning, or a drápa; if you never heard of Bragi Boddason the Old, or Thiódólf of Hvin, or Einar Helgason, among others, you can now find out by examining "The Skalds: A Selection of Their Poems," with an Introduction and Notes by Lee M. Hollander, which was published for the American-Scandinavian Foundation by the Princeton University Press ($2.75). Primarily, and seriously, intended for the student of Old Norse, this book contains matter of interest to the general reader, especially if he has an ear and a passion for metrics. A thousand years ago the Skalds were, not writing, but at least sitting up nights composing, in a highly traditionalized style, verses which they never put down but which, thanks to their own memorable qualities and the industry of Snorri Sturluson, we can enjoy a millennium, more or less, after their date of issue. Courtiers but not sycophants, more subservient to the complicated rules of their art than to the caprice of their kings, analphabetes yet devoted to Gongoresque preciosities—curious fellows, indeed, these Skalds, interesting and rugged. The story of Egil Skallagrimsson, "who combined the man of action with the poet," is particularly moving.

ROLFE HUMPHRIES

Announcing the First Issue of

COMMENTARY

A MONTHLY MAGAZINE ON JEWISH PROBLEMS AND WORLD AFFAIRS

"In the search for light on Jewish problems and on the basic issues of peace and freedom and human destiny which challenge all mankind, COMMENTARY hopes to be of service. It goes without saying that the best magazine in the world will not solve our problems. But we have faith that a good magazine can help—by fairness, by searching out the truth, by bringing to bear upon our problems the resources of science, philosophy, religions, and the arts, by seeking out authentic voices and giving them open-house in which to be heard . . ." Elliot E. Cohen, Editor.

NOVEMBER CONTENTS

The Spiritual Reconstruction of European Jewry Salo Baron

American Fuehrer in Rehearsal James Rorty

Next Steps After the Charter Percy E. Corbett

A Civilization Within a Civilization? Mordecai Grossman

The Decline of the Theatre Louis Kronenberger

A Prayer for Dew—A Story Paul Goodman

The Statue of Liberty Finds Its Poet Hertha Pauli

The British General Election George Orwell

These unique regular departments: The Month in History, by Sidney Hertzberg; The Study of Man, by Sidney Hook, Ben. B. Seligman, Nathan Glazer; The Cedars of Lebanon.

Book Reviews by: RANDALL JARRELL, ISRAEL KNOX, THEODOR GASTER, HAROLD ROSENBERG, KURT LIST, ALFRED WERNER, MARY McCARTHY.

COMMENTARY is a new monthly magazine of 100 pages, incorporating the Contemporary Jewish Record and published by the American Jewish Committee.

COMMENTARY • 425 Fourth Avenue • New York 16

Please enter my subscription for one year at $4.

☐ Check enclosed ☐ Bill me

Name ....

Address ....

City .... Zone .... State.......

"He Rode with Jeb Stuart"

WILLIAM WILLIS BLACKFORD enlisted in the First Virginia Cavalry before the Battle of Bull Run. From then until Appomattox he missed only one major campaign of the Army of Northern Virginia, and then he was on sick leave. As adjutant to Jeb Stuart, he was closely associated with that dashing cavalryman until, three months before Stuart's death, Blackford was transferred to the engineers.

Some twenty years later Blackford wrote his memoirs of the war. For more than half a century the manuscript was kept by his family, and was known to only a few scholars. It is now published for the first time—"War Years with Jeb Stuart" (Scribner's, $3). In it the reader will find the only adequate contemporary account of service in the Confederate engineer troops; perhaps the best, and certainly one of the three best, contemporary accounts of the military career of Jeb Stuart; observations about Von Borcke, Pelham, Mosby, Geary, and a host of other Confederate leaders; and, above all, a book which is both charmingly written and unusually accurate. RALPH ADAMS BROWN

Argument for Conscription

"UNIVERSAL TRAINING," by Colonel Edward A. Fitzpatrick, A. U. S. (Whittlesey House, $3), is a useful, in the main objective discussion of its controversial subject. The president of Mount Mary College has, with calm clarity, presented his point of view—for universal military training—undisguised by any sociological or educational sugar-coating. This Catholic educator frankly joins hands with the conservative army and the New Dealer Harry Hopkins (vide the American Magazine, March, 1945) in saying that in the absence of an effective world organization military necessity and national defense require a larger army (and navy) than we have ever had before; that voluntary enlistment will not suffice because it has never been equal to the task in the past; that, therefore, the best way to achieve the necessary military protection is through a year of true military training for practically all eighteen-year-old boys.

The argument of the book suffers on four counts: (1) it was written before the atomic bomb necessarily changed strategic and even tactical preparations for warfare; (2) it does not examine the possibility for a shared world defense system, which presumably the United Nations Organization is to establish, or the effect of this on national military needs; (3) by citing historical examples of failure in the army volunteer system it illogically argues that all volunteer systems are doomed—ignoring various proposals put forward for a volunteer system by G. I.'s (not brass hats!) in this war, and the comparative ease and success of the volunteer system always used by the navy until the Presidential Order of December 5, 1943, stopped all such enlistments; (4) it neatly skirts the issue of whether one year of active training is really adequate even under present concepts. Evidence has already been offered to the contrary, particularly in the more skilled technologies of warfare. In this same connection, in speaking of the "reserve forces" after the year of training it overlooks completely the factor of technological obsolescence and its effects on evaluating a "trained" reserve.

Despite these criticisms Colonel Fitzpatrick's volume is certainly the best presentation thus far of "one side" of the argument. FRANK N. TRAGER

Next Week in The Nation

LEON HENDERSON

will review

"Germany Is Our Problem"

By HENRY MORGENTHAU, JR.

Underseas Men

"IF YOU'RE GOING to set down the story of the submarines," a veteran officer of the "silent service" advised Robert J. Casey, "you must first set down the story of the man inside the submarine. . . . He is not yet the forgotten man of the United States military services because he has never yet been known." Mr. Casey has done his best—and it is a good best—to make amends to the submariner. "Battle Below" (Bobbs-Merrill, $3.50) touches briskly and brightly on the curious history of the submarine service, its own Bunyanesque lore and terminology, and the large store of specific deeds of derring-do in the war which it helped so largely to win. The monotony, the claustrophobia, and the numbness—sometimes nausea—that afflict a crew under prolonged depth-charge bombardment emerge from Mr. Casey's lucid reporting, as well as the camaraderie and courage of men who without even seeing their target—and few of them do—fight a mechanical war and die secretly and without glory. Two other books, "Silversides" by Robert Trumbull (Holt, $2.50) and "U. S. S. Seawolf" by Gerold Frank and James D. Horan, with J. M. Eckberg (Putnam's, $2.75), add to the laurels belatedly being heaped on the underseas men. Concerned with the sagas of individual ships, they are neither as broad in scope as Mr. Casey's volume nor as lively. R. B.

The Lesson of 1919

THE STORY OF AMERICA'S REJECTION of the League of Nations and withdrawal into its shell of isolationism has been told many times but never as clearly and effectively as by Alan Cranston in "The Killing of the Peace" (Viking, $2.50). It is largely the story of the incredible vanity and skill in political manipulation of one man—Henry Cabot Lodge. For in 1919 as in 1945 American public opinion was overwhelmingly in favor of participation in a world organization to preserve the peace. Lodge himself had spoken in support of such an organization in 1916, and the leaders of both parties were strongly committed to it. But Lodge hated Wilson, and he was determined that the Senate should play an active and not a passive role in treaty making. These two considerations impelled him to try to destroy whatever Wilson sought to create. By insisting on a perfect League that would make it impossible for other countries to pursue selfish or nationalistic interests and, at the same time, on safeguards for America's special interests, he bedeviled Wilson into making impossible compromises which he immediately attacked on principle. When the treaty finally reached the Senate, he fought not against the League but against this and that detail in the proposed organization until the Senate and the public at large were completely confused over the issues. Then, by exploiting partisanship to the utmost, he succeeded in forcing through a series of amendments that made the League unpalatable to foe and friend alike.

Although many of these pitfalls have been avoided in steering the charter of the World Security Organization through the Senate without serious opposition, there are still lessons to be gained from this record that are applicable in 1945. The recent Foreign Ministers' Conference in London illustrates the difficulties of adjustment and accommodation that have to be made among the powers before we can get a satisfactory peace. The Paris Peace Conference went through the same difficult stage, but Wilson faced the added problem of constant pressure from home. This book will have served its purpose if it helps to persuade Americans to grant our representatives at the peace table a free hand so that they may base their actions on the interests of the world as a whole without restraints imposed by domestic partisanship. MAXWELL S. STEWART

To the North

THE MIGRATIONS OF NEGROES from the South to Northern cities have been the subject of numerous scientific social studies. But it has remained for Arna Bontemps and Jack Conroy in "They Seek a City" (Doubleday, Doran, $2.75) to describe the dramatic aspects of these movements in terms of the personal experiences of the pioneers. Beginning with the story of Du Sable, the French Negro who built his hut at the mouth of the Chicago River in 1779, the authors trace the colorful careers of Negroes, both slave and free, who sought freedom in the West, and more particularly in the Midwest. In these pages one will meet John Jones, a free Negro of North Carolina, who amassed a fortune in Chicago and was a friend of John Brown. Here one will find the dramatic story of "Pap" Singleton and the "Exodusters" whom he led to Kansas. There is an especially colorful account of prominent leaders, such as Frederick Douglass, and of others who later became prominent, such as Paul Lawrence Dunbar, the poet, and Will Marion Cook, the composer, who met at the World's Fair in Chicago in 1893. There are the stories of the black troubadours who gave America the blues, and the romantic story of Adah Menken, the mulatto from New Orleans, who became the mistress of Dumas père. The accounts of the early attempts of the Negro to gain a foothold in Northern industries around the opening of the century and of the violence which resulted will enable the reader to view in proper perspective the present situation of the Negro in the North. When the authors come to the mass migrations beginning with the First World War, their account loses much of its drama because individuals do not stand out. Here the story is more concerned with issues and problems. Nevertheless, the book is unique and should be read by anyone who would gain a knowledge of the human meaning of the northward migrations. E. FRANKLIN FRAZIER

SUMNER WELLES writes:
"The publication of this most valuable book comes at a singularly opportune moment. . . . I am confident that its contents afford much-needed enlightenment to public opinion in the United States."

ITALY
AND THE COMING WORLD
By
DON LUIGI STURZO

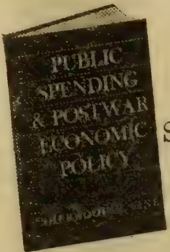
Introduction by SUMNER WELLES. A great Christian-Democrat philosophic priest and publicist covers such intricate questions as: Will the problems of the world's present headaches be satisfactorily solved? Will lasting peace be the birthright of every man?

At your bookseller's • 320 pages. $3.50

ROY PUBLISHERS
25 W. 45th St., New York 19, N.Y.

"Recommended for careful study"
—Christian Century

Public Spending and Post-war Economic Policy



By
SHERWOOD M. FINE

"Economists will be amply rewarded by a careful perusal of this book. The author demonstrates a genuine capacity for penetrating and original economic analysis."—New York Times. ". . . well documented . . . and thought-provoking."—American Political Science Review.

At all bookstores • $2.50

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY PRESS
Morningside Heights • New York 27

MOTION PICTURES

"A great film . . . I cannot suggest my regard for it without using such words as veneration and love."
—Agee, Nation

LESTER COWAN presents

ERNIE PYLE'S "STORY OF

G.I. JOE"

Starring BURGESS MEREDITH as Ernie Pyle

Now playing at 2 Theatres

Brandt's GLOBE
BROADWAY AT 46th STREET
Popular Prices

Brandt's GOTHAM
BROADWAY AT 47th STREET
All Seats Reserved

"Delightful divertissement." . . .
—N. Y. Times

NOEL COWARD'S
naughtiest comedy

"BLITHE SPIRIT"

in Blushing Technicolor
WITH

CONSTANCE CUMMINGS • REX HARRISON • KAY HAMMOND

now at the
WINTER GARDEN
BROADWAY AT 50th STREET

Paramount Presents
ED GARDNER'S
"DUFFY'S TAVERN"
FEATURING
32 HOLLYWOOD STARS

IN PERSON
THE ANDREWS SISTERS
Featuring
Tim Herbert
Vic Shoen
And His Recording Orchestra
Foy Willing's
Riders of the Purple Sage
Pig-Meat Alamo
Markham

COOL PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

STAGE PLAYS

"DESERVES ITS GREAT SUCCESS!"—Nichols, Times
Rodgers and Hammerstein present
MADY CHRISTIANS • OSCAR HOMOLKA
in JOHN VAN DRUTEN'S
I REMEMBER MAMA
from Kathryn Forbes' "Mama's Bank Account"
with JOHN TETZEL • ADRIENNE GESSNER • RICHARD BISHOP
MUSIC BOX 45th Street, West of Broadway. Phone: Circle 6-4636
Eves. 8:35 Sharp. Mats. Thurs. and Sat. 2:35 Sharp

MICHAEL TODD Presents
UP IN CENTRAL PARK
Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS
Lyrics by DOROTHY FIELDS
Music by SIGMUND ROMBERG
BROADWAY THEATRE, Broadway at 53rd Street. Matinees: WED. & SAT.

MOTION PICTURES

NOW RKO

BROOKLYN & QUEENS
ALDEN Jamaica
BUSHWICK
DYKER
Keith's FLUSHING
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
Keith's RICHMOND HILL
STRAND Far Rockaway
TILYOU

"Amusing . . . Diverting Comedy"—Herald Tribune
BARBARA STANWYCK • DENNIS MORGAN
'Christmas in Connecticut'
with SYDNEY GREENSTREET
—and—
"Epic Story of the Victory of the Allied Forces"
—New York Times
GEN. DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER'S
'The True Glory'

MUSIC—DANCE

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE—NOW to NOV. 6
S. HUROK presents
BALLET THEATRE
THE GREATEST IN RUSSIAN BALLET
WITH Alicia Markova • Anton Dolin
Eglevsky • Kaye • Laing
Alonso • Kriza • Chase • Reed
Evenings 8:30 (incl. Sun.), $1.20-$4.80. Mat. Sat. & Sun., $1.20 to $3.60
2,000 SEATS $1 to $1.50 (PLUS TAX) AT ALL PERF.

BERNARD R. LA BERGE presents
MISCHA ELMAN
LEOPOLD MITTMAN at the Steinway
Recital Mgt. Ray Halmans
CARNEGIE HALL, Wednesday Evening, October 24, at 8:30

N.Y. CITY CENTER OPERA COMPANY
FALL SEASON TO OCT. 28 Laszlo Halasz Artistic and Musical Dir.
THE BARTERED BRIDE • LA TRAVIATA • LA BOHEME • GYPSY BARON • MANON LESCAUT • CAVALLERIA & PAGLIACCI • FAUST
SEATS NOW— Matinees and Evenings: Entire Orchestra, $2.40; 1st Balcony, $2.40, $1.80; 2nd Balcony, $1.20, 90¢; Tax included.
N. Y. CITY CENTER, 131 WEST FIFTY-FIFTH STREET MAYOR LA GUARDIA, President

Monday Eve. Symphonies at 8:30
N.Y. CITY SYMPHONY LEONARD BERNSTEIN
TICKETS at Box Office . . . 90¢ — $1.80, tax included.
NEW YORK CITY CENTER 131 WEST 55th STREET F. H. LaGUARDIA, President

The New Statesman and Nation
England's Leading Weekly Review
may now be obtained through
THE NATION
20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.
Yearly subscription $6.50 including postage
SPECIMEN copy on request

Drama

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MARGARET WEBSTER, as everyone knows, is a director who has made Shakespeare pay off on Broadway. Undoubtedly, however, she has got very tired of hearing grudging critics complain that the bard's poetry tended to get lost in the shuffle, and that fact may have inclined her to tackle with enthusiasm a dramatization of a novel by a man who boasted that he did not have any. "Therese" (Biltmore Theater) is based on Zola's somewhat dubious classic "Thérèse Raquin," and if I may rely on a memory now some thirty years stale, it captures pretty completely the air and tone of that ancient shocker, which means that despite a certain ponderous and dogged obviousness it is interesting and effective.

The story it tells is a story of violence as brutal as the violence of "Macbeth" but with all the poetry left out, and left out, that is to say, not only of the language but of the whole characterization, motivation, and interpretation as well. "Sordid" was the descriptive adjective preferred by Zola's contemporary detractors, but to our somewhat tougher generation that seems almost too positive a word, and "prosaic" will possibly serve.

Therese, in the novel, was a commonplace, lower-middle-class woman who conceived an ordinary passion for a rather ordinary man, helped to murder her husband in order to marry the lover, and then discovered that Banquo's ghost was always seated at the feast of love. It was not, goodness knows, that she or her paramour had a very sensitive soul. It requires the most tangible and obvious reminders of the dead husband to bring on their desperation, and even so they do not finally confess to the police until the devoted and now paralyzed mother of the dead man spells out with dominoes the truth she has long known.

In one sense nothing could be more moral. Murder, says the "scientific" novelist, will out. The most thick-skinned and egotistical of killers will feel a sense of guilt. But in another sense Zola's detractors were right. There is something fundamentally immoral in so coarse-grained a picture of human life and human character. Such a work cannot possibly be very profoundly moving. On the other hand, it cannot, if well executed in its own terms, very well help being at least as interesting as a good reporter's account of such a police-court drama.

Miss Webster succeeds very well indeed, and she succeeds, I think, because she makes no attempt to subtilize a tale for which she manages to invent a theatrical style that is a satisfactory equivalent of Zola's heavy-handed effectiveness. Everything is brutally obvious, no point could possibly be missed, and nothing is merely implied. One result is that almost any kind of audience anywhere could understand and, to some extent, be interested in the events taking place.

On the program Eva Le Gallienne, Victor Jory, and Dame May Whitty are starred with equal prominence. Actually, however, though the first two players give satisfactory performances of a theatrically competent but undistinguished sort, Dame May gives an astonishing demonstration of virtuosity, which, nevertheless, and difficult though it may be to believe, is kept sufficiently near the general style of the whole production so that she does not destroy the effect by shining out too conspicuously. Undoubtedly her performance is going to be much and deservedly praised; and for that very reason it is perhaps worth while not to let it go at that but to define the character of her achievement a little more closely.

She plays, of course, the mother who must first learn that her beloved weakling of a son is dead, must then overhear the self-reproaches of the guilty pair, be stricken at that moment with apoplexy, and, finally, after helplessly watching the murderers for a long time, regain just power enough to spell out her accusation. Obviously this is a tall order, but, for all that, not one which requires the highest gifts of subtlety or imagination. Any one of the big scenes is the sort of thing which a student in a dramatic school might be given as a problem, and Dame May solves each problem as superbly as a competent instructor in such a school might solve it. Here is a demonstration of pure naturalism at its most accomplished. Everything is done without strain and with just that special sort of under-emphasis which even the least perceptive spectator is bound to recognize as purposeful under-emphasis rather than ineffectualness. In other words, the proper execution of the part calls for a veteran, and it is as a very capable veteran that Dame May plays it.

Dance

B. H. HAGGIN

BALANCHINE'S ballets are like Mozart's piano concertos: the creative mind and imagination and personality, the language and style in which these express themselves, are always the same; the completed forms are constantly new and fascinating. This is true of "Concerto Barocco," Balanchine's classic ballet to the three movements of Bach's D minor Concerto for two violins, which the Monte Carlo Ballet Russe has added to its repertory. The two Allegros lead to and away from an Andante in which the familiar Balanchine materials are used in a sequence of dance-movement that is one of the most excitingly, overwhelmingly beautiful things I have seen done on a stage. It is danced with more fluency by Marie-Jeanne than by Ruthanna Boris; but both are excellent in the Allegros; and the intricacies of the work are executed with precision and grace by the little group of dancers that Balanchine has trained so well. One flaw in the production must be noted: when first produced by Lincoln Kirstein for the South American tour of his American Ballet the work had scenery and costumes that did not carry out Eugene Berman's designs to his satisfaction and that he did not want used now; and the Monte Carlo management's way of dealing with this situation has been to have the work danced in practice-tights against a blue backdrop. A better way would have been to have Berman's designs carried out to his satisfaction.

"Concerto Barocco" has been added to the five Balanchine masterpieces that the Monte Carlo offered last year. Certain of these have not been affected by the changes in the company's personnel, but others have been harmed. The "Grand Adagio" (called "Pas de Deux" last year) danced by Danilova and Franklin, and "Danses Concertantes," also with Danilova and Franklin, are as brilliant as they were; and not only is Tallchief excellent in Moylan's place in "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," but the comedy has been elaborated and perfected and the piece moves with a smoothness and continuity it did not have last year. But "Ballet Imperial" is badly blurred by Krassovska's lack of the precision, sharpness, and clarity, and even the technical security of Moylan's dancing. And though most of "Mozartiana"—with

How many of these do you own?

If you look under your car, you'll probably find a couple of gadgets something like this one.

They're shock absorbers.

They take the sting out of sudden bumps and jolts. They make a rough road smoother.

And if you're wise, somewhere in your desk, or bureau drawer, or safe deposit box, you have a lot more shock absorbers. Paper ones. War Bonds.

If, in the days to come, bad luck strikes at you through illness, accident, or loss of job, your War Bonds can soften the blow.

If there are some financial rough spots in the road ahead, your War Bonds can help smooth them out for you.

Buy all the War Bonds you can. Hang on to them. Because it's such good sense, and because there's a bitter, bloody, deadly war still on.

BUY ALL THE BONDS YOU CAN
KEEP ALL THE BONDS YOU BUY

Space contributed by

THE NATION

This is an official U.S. Treasury advertisement—prepared under auspices of Treasury Department and War Advertising Council

Danilova, Franklin, Etheridge, Tallchief, and the small ensemble—remains "as fresh and glistening as creation itself," Lazovsky's opening Gigue is knocked completely out of shape by Lompakos, who does it now without Lazovsky's sense of rhythm, his ease and elegance based on technical mastery. One realizes from this how ballets change after their first performances by the dancers for whom they have been created: if that much can happen to the Gigue from one season to the next with Balanchine on hand to watch over it, imagine what has happened to the ballets which have been passed from dancer to dancer, company to company, for ten or twenty or fifty years.

In these new works the Monte Carlo offers one group of the greatest things one can see in ballet; and another group is the performances of old classics in which Danilova appears: the company's beautiful performance of "Coppelia," which she makes enchanting; the performances of "The Nutcracker" and "Swan Lake" (not given in the recent New York season), which, when she appears in them, she enriches with an art that grows ever more wonderful—this developing art being what age gives her while it takes away mere stamina. It is the same thing as has happened in the singing of Lotte Lehmann; and this suggests a further analogy: Danilova's classic dancing is, in relation to Markova's, as Lehmann's Lieder-singing is in relation to Elisabeth Schumann's. That is, the line that is so pure in Markova's "Swan Lake" or "Nutcracker" performance is suffused with personal warmth and radiance and graciousness in Danilova's.

And still another musical analogy suggests itself. In addition to the expressive force, the poignancy, the loveliness, and everything else that makes a work of Mozart wonderful, there are the ways the things happen, the ways they come into existence, the precise way, for example, a woodwind adds itself to strings at a certain point. These are the unobtrusive, effortless, inevitable manifestations of extraordinary human powers; and under the impact of their succession it is sometimes difficult to keep from crying out in excitement and delight. The same thing is true of the succession of movements in the Andante of Balanchine's "Concerto Barocco." And it is true of the succession of movements in Danilova's "Nutcracker" performance.

In this connection there is something to say about Franklin as Danilova's partner in classic ballets. He has developed into a highly accomplished classic dancer, with this unusual and engaging additional characteristic—that the movements which an Eglevsky or a Youskevitch executes with nobility or grandeur Franklin executes with his own happiness and sweetness.

All these, with "Rodeo," which has Franklin back in the cast, are the good things the Monte Carlo offers. The poor things I will speak of next time.

As for Ballet Theater—impresarios consider press criticism only another form of publicity, and press tickets its painful cost (they appear to believe that they are going to be able to take it all with them); and Ballet Theater's management hit on the idea of restricting its Nation publicity—and press tickets—to the new productions while The Nation has the idea that its readers, like those of the Times and the Herald Tribune, should also receive a report on performances of important older works. The result: impasse and no report.

CONTRIBUTORS

MERLE CURTI, professor of history at the University of Wisconsin, is the author of "The Growth of American Thought" and "Peace or War—the American Struggle."

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH, The Nation's drama critic, is Brander Matthews Professor of Literature at Columbia University. In addition to the recently published "Samuel Johnson," he is the author of "The American Drama Since 1918" and "Comedy and Conscience After the Restoration."

ROLFE HUMPHRIES has published three volumes of verse—"Europa and Other Poems," "Out of the Jewel," and "The Summer Landscape"—translated García Lorca's poems, and edited the anthology "And Spain Sings."

FRANK N. TRAGER served as an army psychologist for thirty months. He wrote Some Don't Wear the Purple Heart in The Nation of October 6 and Conscription or Enlistment? in the issue of July 14.

MAXWELL S. STEWART, an associate editor of The Nation, is the author of "Building for Peace at Home and Abroad" and "War-Time China."

E. FRANKLIN FRAZIER, head of the Department of Sociology at Howard University, is the author of "The Negro Family in the United States."

Letters to the Editors

Self-propulsive Housing

Dear Sirs: Several bills are pending in Congress to stimulate research and invention. Radar and the atom bomb have dramatized the scientific use of the human imagination for destructive purposes, and statistics show that inventors are dwindling in numbers at a rapid pace. Why not research and invention to assist in full employment? It sounds reasonable, but there's a catch.

Full employment can be maintained only by satisfying mass needs. However "marvelous" an invention may be, it has little effect on mass employment so long as it can satisfy only or largely class needs. The airplane and any number of other products of applied science require heavy subsidies to be of even limited class use. Whether or not we achieve peace-time full employment will depend on the extent to which inventors are permitted to change mass tastes in the fields of our greatest investment—housing and motor vehicles. So long as design in the old aristocratic and handicraft traditions of conspicuous display dominates both fields, so long as emphasis is placed on styling instead of on consumer availability, we shall not have full employment.

Take motor vehicles. For more than a decade prior to Pearl Harbor the sales of motor vehicles hugged a dead level. Ninety-five per cent of research and inventive emphasis went into cutting production costs and into glitter and gadgets which would keep the consumer paying more for a constantly cheapened product. The cost of labor and material used for building a good motor car dropped to $250; but the consumer paid four to five times that amount, plus carrying charges, to enjoy a product useful only in motion, which averaged 2 per cent of the car's life. The average American could own a car useless 98 per cent of the time only at fourth to tenth hand. Let research and invention achieve a wholly new and superior kind of motor car, useful all the time, and the automobile makers will go right on building the old kind of car cheaper and cheaper while styling it to sell for more and more.

Take housing. A land mortgage used to be the most "gilt-edged" of investments. But while technology was forging swiftly ahead in other fields, public taste in housing was encouraged to remain in the old handicraft ruts good for landowners, money-lenders, handicraftsmen, and brick salesmen. In consequence, mortgages became such risky investments that the government had to step in and insure them, blind to the fact that this automatically would discourage innovation completely and swing dwelling design farther out of step with the imperatives of a power age.

Full peace-time employment leans on mass consumption. Mass consumption is not possible under any system so long as design emphasis is on the "exclusive" and is unrelated to existing income levels. Mass consumption is not possible for a world tooled for propulsion but taught to yearn for a brick anchorage. Mass consumption is not possible without doubling mass leisure. We shall keep machines busy only as ingenuity and design are encouraged to implement mass leisure and to change mass tastes radically. We shall keep machines busy only as we realize that the multiplication of energy by mechanical means multiplies the motion about us and that we might better adjust ourselves to a mobile environment and shelter our mobility. Here is the real research job facing our generation. Before atomic energy vastly increases the motion in our environment, can we learn to give up domestic tastes better suited to sponges than to mechanics?

Obviously self-propulsive housing will not have to go underground. It will be proof against the atom bomb by means of diffusion during war time over an area so great that no bomb could destroy more than a few units at a time. It will be somewhat ironic to see planners clearing our slums and rebuilding them with public savings when one single atom bomb can wipe out several square miles and the savings of a generation in an instant. Unfortunately innovation is usually over the dead bodies of bankers, and in America the power of bankers still dictates the stylized outer shell and the withered kernel of design. CORWIN WILSON

Flint, Mich., August 22

Lewisohn, Freud, and Trilling

Dear Sirs: In his review The Problem of Influence, in The Nation of September 8, Lionel Trilling is guilty of a factual error with important implications. He describes the old days of Greenwich Village as a time when, among other things, "Ludwig Lewisohn warped Freud to the interests of Zionism." Miss Kirchwey and Dr. Krutch, at least, will remember that when I lived on Jane Street and was a member of The Nation's editorial staff I had not declared myself a Zionist. Nor had I professed any special acquaintance with the teachings of Freud, to which I was introduced much later by Sigmund Freud himself, who honored me with his friendship because he liked my writings. It was during the thirties and forties that I wrote the Zionist books which are read wherever Jews live; today I edit the New Palestine with its circulation of 140,000. But it takes no deep analysis, only the simplest moral reflection, to understand why Jews of Mr. Trilling's temper seek always to thrust their people's destiny and their people's cause into some remote and trivial limbo.

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

Washington, D. C., September 12

Dear Sirs: I am sorry if I was misleading about the precise date of Mr. Lewisohn's becoming a Zionist. The sentence that Mr. Lewisohn objects to was intended to refer to his inaccurate and doctrinaire use of Freudian ideas to support his Jewish position in general, and I used the word Zionism in, as it were, extension. I had particularly in mind the novel "The Island Within," published in 1928, with its psychoanalytical explanation of why the Jewish hero must leave his Gentile wife and return to the

LANGUAGE IS POWER

. . . Forge ahead, win special assignments, promotion, better job in global peace time opportunities through ability to speak a foreign language.

MASTER A NEW LANGUAGE quickly, easily, correctly by LINGUAPHONE

The world-famous Linguaphone Conversational Method brings voices of native teachers INTO YOUR OWN HOME. You learn the new language by LISTENING. It's amazingly simple; thousands have succeeded. ◆ ◆ 29 LANGUAGES

Send for Free book, Call for Free demonstration

LINGUAPHONE INSTITUTE

81 RCA Bldg., New York 20 • Circle 7-0830

BOOKS FOUND FREE/0c

WHAT BOOKS DO YOU WANT?

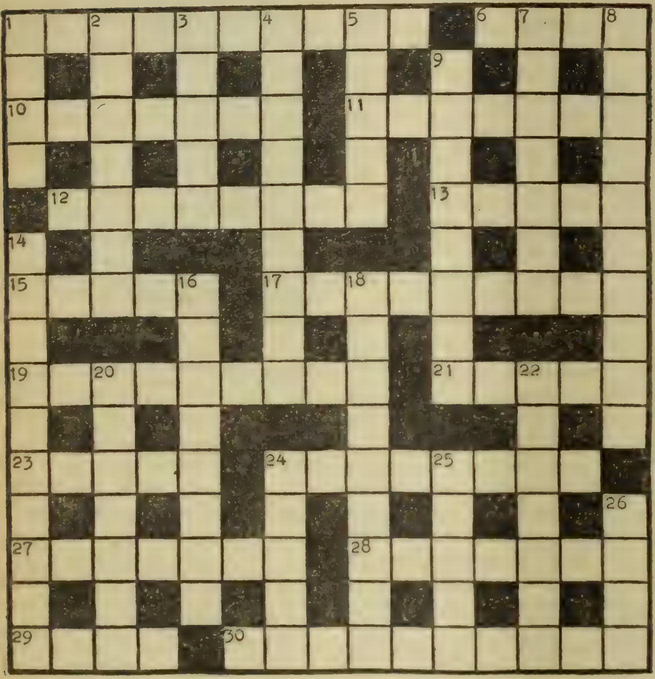
We quote lowest market prices. No charge for locating Hard-to-Find and Out-of-Print Books. All books. OLD or NEW, mailed POST-FREE.

SEARCHLIGHT BOOK NATION

22 East 17th Street, New York City

Crossword Puzzle No. 131

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 The only legal game of dice
6 Not exclusively mine
10 It's obvious that the dunce is not bright in the head
11 Samuel Pepys, for example
12 More substantial than a straw to a drowning man
13 Warble
15 Largest musical instrument
17 England's Poet Laureate
19 Curiosities (hyphen, 4-1-4)
21 This grease is non-existent
23 Feathered and non-feathered biped's burst into these 24 They help circus artistes to give sparkling performances
27 Imprisons
28 A delightful place, according to the Greeks
29 Feature about which Cyrano de Bergerac was rather sensitive 30 Eggs at Rome (anag.)

DOWN

1 "A demd, damp, moist, unpleasant ---- !"
2 Naming one's profession?
3 "But she is in her -----, and oh, The difference to me"
4 Time of year when the fairies dance
5 Queerly
7 Put to profitable use
8 Most of us prefer to settle up before we do this (two words, 6 and 4)
9 Hypocritical priest in Moliere's comedy of the same name
14 Burning which may be slow or spontaneous
16 A famous floating menagerie (two words, 5 and 3)
18 The Lord's Supper
20 Sets alight
22 It fairly buzzes with industry
24 A Kid in Western literature
25 Mussolini's quondam "mouthpiece"
26 The Crossword birds par excellence

* * *

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 130

ACROSS:—1 GAVOTTE; 5 BICYCLE; 9 MANNING; 10 NORMANS; 11 LUSTY; 12 ASH; 13 LIEGE; 14 SAND EEL; 16 EMERSON; 18 BATHERS; 21 DOGROSE; 24 DITTO; 26 AIR; 27 BREAD; 28 OPINION; 29 ASUNDER; 30 KREMLIN; 31 SUNSETS.

DOWN:—1 GAMBLES; 2 VENISON; 3 TOITY; 4 ENGRAIL; 5 BANSHEE; 6 CORAL; 7 CHASERS; 8 EASTERN; 15 EVE; 17 EGG; 18 BEDROCK; 19 TITMICE; 20 SHANNON; 21 DURBARS; 22 OVERDUE; 23 ENDURES; 25 ORIEL; 27 BRUIN.

Jewish fold. I do not remember whether or not this novel issues in an explicit political Zionism; even if it does not, it is obviously the prolegomenon to Mr. Lewisohn's later position. Whether the old Greenwich Village days still existed in 1928 or must be dated by Mr. Lewisohn's residence in Jane Street, I leave to the historians. Perhaps here the difference between Mr. Lewisohn and myself is like that of the disputants in Joe Cook's vaudeville act—one of them, it turned out, meant the old Polo Grounds while the other meant the old old Polo Grounds.

As for my temper as a Jew, Mr. Lewisohn knows nothing about it except that I do not admire his books—but I am sure that I do not have to deal with Mr. Lewisohn's strange supposition that any adverse comment on Mr. Lewisohn's art and thought is a malign effort to thwart the destiny and cause of the Jews.

LIONEL TRILLING

New York, September 25

The Hare System for Japan

Dear Sirs: Mr. Salisbury's article The Zaibatsu as War Makers together with T. A. Bisson's What Program for Japan? in your issue of July 14 suggested an effective way to handle Japan. The editorial Occupying Japan of August 25 confirmed it. It hinges entirely on the adoption by Japan, and Korea when given an independent status, of the same electoral system that has proved so successful in Eire — the Hare system of proportional representation in multi-member constituencies.

Such an electoral system could be worked out and an election held within the next two or three years. If the first elections were supervised by the occupation armies to insure freedom from intimidation, the resulting democratic parliament and government would immediately free Japan from the oligarchic control which has been its curse. From that time on occupation forces could be nominal, and treaties would be honored. The Nation's list of suggested experts on Japan is good. Mr. Bisson's name would be a helpful addition.

The American expert on electoral systems, particularly the Hare system of proportional representation used in New York City, Cincinnati, Eire, and some parts of Canada, is George H. Hallett, Jr., secretary of the Citizens' Union, New York City. Arrangements might be made with Mr. Hallet to organize such an electoral system for Japan and Korea.

WILSON M. SOUTHAM

Ottawa, Canada, August 31

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 161 | NEW YORK · SATURDAY · OCTOBER 27, 1945 | NUMBER 17

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 417

EDITORIALS

A New Three-Power Conference 420
Victory for a Racket 421

ARTICLES

Revolt in Asia—I. Indo-China by Andrew Roth 422
Palestine and Grand Strategy by Eliahu Ben-Horin 424
In the Wind 425
On Criticizing the Vatican by Lawrence Fernsworth 426
America's Homesick Army by Joseph Freeman 427
Brittany Goes to the Polls by Ida Treat 429
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison 431
The People's Front by J. Alvarez del Vayo 432

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Morgenthau's Plan for Germany by Leon Henderson 433
Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall 434
The Voice of Liberal Japan by Tsuyoshi Matsumoto 436
Briefer Comment 438
Films by James Agee 441
Drama by Joseph Wood Krutch 441
Dance by B. H. Haggin 442
LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 443
CROSSWORD PUZZLE NO. 132 by Jack Barrett 444

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor J. KING GORDON
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

European Editor: J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates
LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL
JONATHAN DANIELS
CAREY MCWILLIAMS
REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

IF THIS COUNTRY IS SAVED FROM DESTRUCTION in some not-too-remote future much credit must go to the very scientists who produced the atomic bomb. Last week in Washington, before several Congressional committees dealing with atomic control, they revealed the actualities of a scientific advance more fateful in the affairs of man than the coming of steam. They also displayed a depth of political and international understanding matched by few elected Representatives—least of all, alas, by the President himself. All agreed there was no defense against the atomic bomb. All agreed there could be no substitute for international control. The majority felt that the May-Johnson bill would commit this country to a disastrous foreign policy which would negate any efforts by our statesmen to create a world organization and would in fact result in an atomic bomb race leading to certain death for millions of Americans and the destruction of our major cities. The testimony of the scientists, terrible though it is, has paradoxically dispelled much of the hysteria born of ignorance that has prevailed since the Hiroshima bombing. For Americans can be counted on to act sanely and responsibly when they "know the facts." There must be the fullest opportunity given for free discussion of atomic control—in Washington hearings, in the press, on the air, in local assemblies. "After all," as Professor Harold C. Urey, Nobel Prize winner, said last Sunday, "it is the people of the United States who face destruction and death and should have the privilege of making their decisions." The immediate issue before responsible Americans is reopening the May-Johnson bill hearings before the House military Affairs Committee and keeping them open until every American with something to say on the control of atomic energy has had his chance to testify. Wires should be sent to Representative Andrew J. May, House of Representatives, and a copy to John W. Snyder, care of The White House.

*

THE FRENCH GENERAL ELECTION CONFIRMS THE power and popularity of General de Gaulle but reveals greater support for the Communists, who are in opposition to most of his policies, than had been suspected. At the recent cantonal elections the Socialists scored heavily, with the Radical Socialists getting the second largest number of places and the Communists a long way behind both. In the new Assembly, however, the Communists will be the largest party, with the Socialists and the Popular Republican Movement, the Catholic democratic party born of the resistance, running neck and neck close behind them. The Radical Socialist Party, so long the balancing force in French politics, has collapsed. From the incomplete figures available as we go to press it appears that the Socialists and the P. R. M. in alliance may be able to command a rather precarious majority in the Assembly to support a provisional government headed by De Gaulle. In any case such a government should be fairly sure of tenure during the seven months' life of the Assembly. This follows from the voting on the two questions put to the electorate: (1) Shall the Assembly be empowered to write a new constitution? (2) Shall its tenure and authority over the provisional government be limited so that it can overthrow the government only by a two-thirds' majority vote confirmed after a three-day breathing spell? An overwhelming majority voted "yes" on the first question, and on the second the "yesses" outnumbered the "noes" by nearly two to one. This constitutes a strong vote of confidence in De Gaulle, who appealed for such answers.

*

THE WAR CRIMINALS FACING TRIAL IN Nürnberg have already been condemned by the opinion of the world. Their crimes were public, and the results are evident in a continent laid waste, in the still uncounted millions of dead, and in the profound corruption of the political life of the peoples. No court procedure was needed to convict these men, no new proof required to convince the world that Göring, Streicher, and their accomplices deserve punishment. For this reason the trial, even in advance, has taken on a curious air of unreality. It is a political act, justified and overdue, wrapped up in an elaboration of judicial procedure that seems to a lay observer somewhat farcical. The Nazi leaders could have been disposed of, it would seem, by the joint decision of the Allied powers without all these expensive and legally questionable formalities. The banishment of Napoleon offered precedent if any were needed. But the trials are under way, and one can hope that they will serve to dramatize and recall to the flagging memories of people who already are beginning to forget, the details of the organized terror under which Hitler and his party attempted to bring the civilized world. We hope the procedure will be rapid, decisive, and free from the sort of pettifogging detail that in other political trials—notably the sedition cases in Washington during the war—has so completely obscured the issue and prevented a clear judgment. The Nürnberg court is a political court with a political job to perform. If it allows the trial to degenerate into legalistic maneuvering and quibbling, its only value will have been thrown away.

*

THE TAX BILL AS REPORTED BY THE SENATE Finance Committee is slightly better than the unsatisfactory House bill. Although the Senate committee voted an unwarranted bonus to a number of our largest and wealthiest corporations by eliminating, instead of modifying, the excess-profits tax, it offset this action in part by restoring the 4 per cent which the House cut from the corporation tax. The cut in the individual surtax rate was set at 3 per cent instead of the 4 per cent as of the House bill, and the House's proposal for a guaranteed cut of at least 10 per cent in each individual's tax bill was rejected. The latter provision was replaced by a straight 5 per cent cut superimposed upon the other reductions. The net effect of these changes is to give the taxpayers in the middle brackets a somewhat greater reduction than provided by the House Bill while avoiding the outrageous rebates which the House granted to the very wealthy. Even with improvements, however, the measure remains substantially a rich man's tax bill.

*

GENERAL MACARTHUR HAS COME THROUGH WITH flying colors against the first real challenge to his authority by the Japanese Cabinet. The showdown came, as had been widely predicted, over an Allied attempt to break the power of the great financial-industrial monopolies that played a basic role in the development of Japanese militarism. Japan's new "liberal" Cabinet not only balked at the enforcement of an Allied order calling for the elimination of the Zaibatsu control over Japanese economic life but endeavored, through Foreign Minister Yoshida, to defend the monopolies as essential to the restoration of normal economic activity. In an effort to forestall drastic Allied action several of the Zaibutsu institutions initiated a voluntary reorganization designed to conceal their monopolistic character. The Yasuda and Sumitomo families, for example, promised to dissolve the key holding companies through which they dominated their industrial empires, and to retire personally from all executive positions in the affiliated companies. They have shown no inclination, however, to divest themselves of the ownership of their huge family holdings. The even more powerful Mitsui and Mitsubishi families refused to yield control over their vast industrial domains on the ground that such action would "invite confusion and disorder in economic circles." The most that they were willing to do was to sell some shares in their holdings so as to remove the "impression" that their companies are under complete family control. Colonel Kramer, chief of the economic and scientific section of Allied Headquarters, has assured us that the financial grip of the Zaibatsu will be broken by the end of the year, and it looks as if he really means it.

*

PRESIDENT TRUMAN'S DECISION TO RETAIN General Patrick J. Hurley as ambassador to China casts an unexpected shadow over the improved prospects for Chinese unity. From the time he engineered the recall of Stilwell as commander of the China-Burma-India theater General Hurley has been regarded with suspicion by progressive groups in China. The Chinese Communists have distrusted him because of his high-pressure tactics in attempting to force a settlement with Chungking on Kuomintang terms. And the moderates of the Democratic Federation have complained that he ignored them completely in his apparent desire to strengthen Chiang Kai-shek's regime. General Hurley is largely responsible for the dispatch of American troops to Peiping and Tientsin, where their chief function has been that of preventing the resistance forces from accepting the Japanese surrender. He also must be held accountable for the use of American planes and personnel to ferry Kuomintang troops into North China. Hurley's return will undoubtedly accentuate the current rift between the War Department and the State Department over our Chinese policy. The groups within the State Department counseling moderation in our support of the Kuomintang have been considerably strengthened recently by departmental changes and promotions. But Hurley has preferred to run his show without State Department advice in the past; and unless popular pressure forces his resignation he will doubtless continue his high-handed role, regardless of the cost in American lives and prestige.

*

COMMENTING ON THE ARGENTINE CRISIS LAST week, we said that Colonel Perón "is not a man who can be casually dismissed." But none the less we were surprised by his return to power within forty-four hours after his ouster. Perón's lightning coup was due to two factors: first, the incredible naivete of the opposition, which, though it had built up an effective organization in recent months, the Comisión de Coordinación Democrática, let a great opportunity slip through its fingers by abandoning its fighting position as soon as Perón had left the Cabinet. Had the forces of the opposition remained on the alert, in the streets, until a Cabinet they could trust had been formed, it would have been extremely difficult, if not impossible, for Perón to regain control so swiftly. Second, Perón succeeded in dominating some of the unions through a gang of bogus "labor leaders" whom he bribed and to whom he gave unlimited authority during the twenty-two months he served as Minister of Labor. We repeat that the reputable trade unions never fell for Perón's propaganda, but it is undeniably true that thousands of unskilled and non-political workers were won over by leaders who knew how to exploit, to the dictator's advantage, the widespread dissatisfaction with the economic and social conditions which prevail throughout South America. One has only to read the list of the new ministers to realize that they are all hand-picked Perón men. Even Juan Isaac Cooke, the discredited Minister of Foreign Affairs, is back in his old post. The anti-Jewish demonstrations with which the "Perónistas" celebrated their victory underlined its fascist nature.

*

IN VENEZUELA THE SITUATION IS LESS CLEAR. Despite the coincidence in the timing of the coups, it would be wrong to assume that the government of President Romulo Bettancourt is another Perón or Bolivian dictatorship. The Cabinet includes men of unquestionably democratic conviction, and its first pronouncement on foreign affairs, to the effect that Venezuela would never establish diplomatic relations with Franco or Trujillo, is a good sign—although we must not forget that the Bolivian regime also severed relations with Spain. Not so promising was its more cautious statement about Argentina. Moreover, two generals who have announced their support of the regime, Celestino Hernandez, commander of Maracay, and Leon Jurado, Governor of Falcon State in western Venezuela, were long associated with the most despicable tyrant of Latin America, the super-killer Juan Vicente Gomez. If the new ministers and young officers, most of them educated abroad, who revolted against the Medina regime really want a progressive and socialist Venezuela, they will recall to service such able and sincere democrats as Rafael Vega, Minister of Education in the ousted Cabinet, who has taken refuge in the Mexican embassy in Caracas.

THAT THE DAUGHTERS OF THE AMERICAN Revolution have no respect for the egalitarian principles of their ancestors is not news. No one was surprised when they refused to rent their Washington auditorium, Constitution Hall, to the pianist Hazel Scott simply because Miss Scott is a Negro. Their rule that the hall shall be available to "white artists only," they said, conforms to the "prevailing custom" of the District of Columbia. A fine excuse for descendants of revolutionists! Better manners, if not greater intelligence, might theoretically have been expected of ladies who pride themselves on their blue blood, but actually there is nothing in the record of the D. A. R. to justify that expectation. Perhaps it is best not to appeal to their sensibilities. A more effective key to the doors of Constitution Hall is the effort of Representatives John M. Coffee, Emmanuel Celler, and Helen Gahagan Douglas to rescind the tax exemption which this exclusive club enjoys in its capacity as a public institution. It is fitting that the ladies' champion in this embarrassing situation is the unmannerly Representative John E. Rankin. That Mrs. Truman consented to take tea with them after their disgraceful behavior is regrettable. She missed an opportunity to reassert the principles of her ancestors and theirs by resigning from the D. A. R.

*

AT THE INTERNATIONAL CIVIL AVIATION Conference in Chicago nearly a year ago, Adolf A. Berle, Jr., called in ringing tones for freedom of competition in the air and successfully blocked proposals for a body to regulate international air traffic as the Civil Aeronautics Board regulates domestic American air lines. His stand was generally applauded by American aviation interests with the exception of Pan-American Airways, then still hoping to be appointed a "chosen instrument" with a sole franchise to carry the American flag on transocean routes. Despite this victory for free competition, however, an article in The Nation ventured to suggest that if public regulation were ruled out, private regulation would almost certainly be attempted. That prophecy is now well on the way to fulfilment. Meeting at Montreal, the International Air Transport Association, to which fifty-seven air lines of various nationalities have adhered, set up nine regional traffic "conferences" covering all international routes. These conferences are to determine policies, in so far as they can reach unanimous agreements, on a number of matters of common interest, with "tariffs, rates, and schedules" the first items on the list. Thus, following the example of the shipping industry, which has long employed "conferences" to bar "uneconomic competition," the air lines have turned their back on Mr. Berle's ideals. It was inevitable that they would, for air transport is a form of public utility the development of which by means of unlimited competition would surely result in unsafe and uneconomic practices. Since most of the air lines belonging to the I. A. T. A. are government-owned, the conference method adopted at Montreal may be regarded as a backdoor method of introducing the public regulation which the United States rejected at Chicago. To our way of thinking, however, it would be better if the oversight of international air traffic were entrusted openly to an international commission whose members could approach their task more judicially than airline executives.

A New Three-Power Conference

THE widely publicized results of a recent conference held in Dublin, New Hampshire, are rather indicative of the state of mind of the whole nation on the vexing international issues which confront us, particularly since the atomic bomb has given a new urgency to these issues.

The majority at this conference came to the conclusion that the atomic bomb had made the organization of the world as outlined in the United Nations Charter obsolete and irrelevant. It called for the creation of a world government with limited and sharply defined powers, which would, however, be adequate to guarantee the peace between nations. The majority did not indicate how we were to arrive at this desired end, from the position in which we now find ourselves. This position is that even the promise of limited efficacy which the United Nations Organization held out is imperiled by the mutual mistrust between the two great centers of power, the Russian and the Anglo-American, which were intended by the United Nations Charter to be the core of a system of world order.

The minority at the conference, which included the conference chairman, former Justice Roberts, and Clarence Streit, came to the conclusion that the best method of reaching the goal it professed to have in common with the majority was to create a "nuclear alliance" of nations and governments in which individual liberty was recognized. The minority proposed, in effect—and would have been more honest to propose explicitly—an anti-Russian alliance. How such an alliance would lead to the ultimate formation of a world government was not stated. Its most obvious and predictable consequence would be a war between Russia and the West. It could contribute to world peace only if the democratic alliance were powerful enough to cow the opposition into complete submission. That the formation of such a power lies in the realm of political possibilities was, indeed, the guiding assumption of the minority, despite the fact that history proves the hope of establishing such unchallengeable power to belong to the vainest of illusions.

Here, then, was a conference of representative Americans reaching two equally impossible conclusions: the conclusion of the minority had the demerit of being as irresponsible as it was impossible. The conference itself is of no particular importance, unless the two alternatives it elaborated should be—as we think they are—representative of the alternative conclusions too generally reached by American thought, seeking escape from the unhappy and tragic predicament of our present international situation. One may take a limited satisfaction in the fact that the minority at the conference stands for a small minority in the nation. There is, in other words, no general desire to sharpen the issues between ourselves and Russia and hasten the outbreak of a third world war. The majority of the nation, like the majority at tha conference, has a strong sense of responsibility in regard to this matter and is anxious to mitigate rather than aggravate the friction between Russia and the West.

But the majority of internationally minded people at the conference, as in the nation, try to jump out of the present situation to a world government. They do not tell us by what power or by what magic we are to make the jump. They rightly recognize that the United Nations Charter is not adequate for the preservation of a permanent peace. But they forget that many of its inadequacies are due to the lack of genuine trust between Russia and the West. They would now overcome these inadequacies by the creation of a world government. Let them tell us how they would persuade Russia on the one hand and the United States Senate on the other to accept the further abridgments of sovereignty which such a new charter would require. If they answer that they believe the fear of atomic warfare has given the nations a new and more powerful motive for the sacrifices required by a genuine system of world order, it is necessary to point out that the invention of the atomic bomb has also aggravated the mutual mistrust between Russia and the West; and that the immediate fears of a possible foe are politically more potent than the more distant fear of atomic destruction.

Whatever may be the long-range answer to the problem of the world's international anarchy, the short-range problem is how to achieve a psychological disarmament between ourselves and Russia. No long-range program which evades this short-range issue has any relevance. The reason why this issue is so urgent is that the kind of bargaining in which Russia and the West are now engaged aggravates the mistrust because the bargains are concerned with strategic issues which presuppose an ultimate conflict. This is why John Foster Dulles's optimistic estimate of the London Conference of Foreign Ministers was erroneous. We were feeling each other out, declared Mr. Dulles, and our failures must not be taken too seriously. But we were feeling each other out on basic strategic issues which presuppose a permanent lack of trust.

Thus America is rightly apprehensive about the increasing intransigence of Russia when any issue affecting Eastern Europe is raised. Russia wants no interference with its hegemony in Rumania and Hungary; and it threatens to undo the compromises of Yalta on Poland and Yugoslavia. Its interest in the Italian colonies is obviously strategic. Britain wants to preserve its lifeline in the Mediterranean, and Russia wants to be in a position to challenge that line.

But there is no hope of a solution if Americans assume that these Russian policies represent pure perversity or pure aggression. The first prerequisite of psychological disarmament between ourselves and Russia is recognition on our part that our strategic plans, as well as some past history, justify the fears of Russia, or at any rate give them plausibility. We are, in fact, involved in a vicious circle. The strategic plans of each side have nothing to do with permanent peace. They presuppose the instability of the peace. Our vast plans for bases in the Pacific islands are not prompted by fear of Japan; and Russia knows it. When we insisted during the war that the Jews must not press for a solution of the Palestinian settlement lest strategic plans for a pipe-line in the Near East be imperiled, Russia also knew that our general staff was thinking, not of the strategy of the war in which we were then engaged, but of the next war.

Unless we can make a fresh start and break this vicious circle, all our day-to-day bargaining will not help us. A fresh start should be made in a new three-power conference. Such a conference should address itself to the gravity of the total issue. The problem of the atomic bomb should not be its central concern but ought to be placed on the agenda. Each side would have to recognize that only through the sacrifice of particular and unilateral schemes of security can a genuine system of mutual trust be achieved. It is not at all certain that either side would make sufficient gestures of trust to accomplish the purpose of the conference, or that one side would respond to the honest gestures of the other. It is, in short, not at all certain that such a conference would succeed. But there are no alternative roads to peace.

Victory for a Racket

PEACE of a sort has returned to the New York docks, and the ships are once again being unloaded. Probably a few more skulls will be cracked by way of discipline, as "King" Ryan stamps out the revolt that almost dethroned him, but that will make little noise in the papers which published frenzied headlines about Harry Bridges capturing the waterfront.

The Communist issue, which the press seized upon so avidly, was a purely extraneous one injected into the dispute in its later stages. As every good waterfront reporter knows, the real cause of the strike was the totalitarian set-up of the International Longshoremen's Association, a trade-union scandal which has continued for a quarter-century without many New York editors getting excited about it. The boss of the I. L. A. for most of this period has been Joseph P. Ryan, who has contrived to get himself elected president for life at a salary of $20,000 a year. He runs the union, said to have no officially adopted constitution or proper procedure for elections, as a one-man show in which his word is law. Members of long standing declare that he has negotiated all contracts and "rammed them down our throats"; they say they have never seen a financial statement of the I. L. A. or of any of its sixty-five locals in the Port of New York area. There have been attempts to overthrow his rule but they have proved unhealthy for those participating in them. Critics of the boss are apt to be mysteriously beaten up; one leader of an insurgent movement in Brooklyn, Peter Panto, was murdered a few years ago—a still unsolved crime.

Even papers as eager to put a finger on a Communist plot as the New York World-Telegram admit that the I. L. A. strike started as a spontaneous rank-and-file movement to oust Ryan. Its occasion was a new contract which, while it included some improvements in wages and conditions, failed to provide for reforms in hiring and working practices which longshoremen considered of vital importance. Among demands strongly supported in the locals were limitation of sling cargo loads in the interests of safety, a guaranty of four hours' work per shift, and two "shape-ups" for hiring daily instead of three. Some reform of the "shape-up" system is long overdue. It involves gatherings of workers at the pierheads where the foremen pick their gangs. When there are more men than jobs—a frequent occurrence—there is every opportunity for favoritism, and, it is alleged, payment for jobs is a normal procedure. On the West Coast, after the I. L. A. was defeated by the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union, this system was abolished, and union hiring-halls were substituted. But both Ryan and the Shipping Association in New York cling to the old method; it makes for cheaper labor and gives a union boss more power over his members.

The New York strike for a better contract became a strike against the I. L. A. leadership when Ryan ordered the men back to work. Only after it had been in full swing for more than a week did the National Maritime Union intervene by offering something more than moral support. To the left-wing C. I. O. unions the situation was inviting, for they had old scores to settle with Ryan. The insurgents, inexperienced in organization and friendless, naturally accepted the help offered without bothering too much about the label. Actually, apart from sympathetic walkouts on a few ships, that help does not seem to have amounted to much more than advice and publicity and legal assistance. It would appear that after Harry Bridges arrived from San Francisco and surveyed the situation, he and the N. M. U. leaders decided that the time was not ripe for a showdown involving a large financial investment. That being so, there was not much they could do to prevent a collapse of the insurgent movement, once the strikers' slender individual resources were exhausted.

When hunger drove the men back to work, the majority of New York's papers hailed a victory over communism. Actually the end of the strike meant a triumph for a crude labor dictatorship—something that the press is ever ready to denounce in general terms. But when forced to choose sides the typical editor prefers the racketeer to the Communist.

At one point in the strike an opportunity to clean up the waterfront was offered by Mayor LaGuardia's proposal to hold an election for a new I. L. A. negotiating committee under neutral supervision. This plan received no newspaper support except from the New York Post and PM. The insurgents accepted the proposal, but Ryan scornfully rejected it, and the employers ignored it. They have got along too comfortably with Ryan all these years to risk a change. The cost of Ryanism is a known expense which can be charged to overhead; democratic leadership of the union might well prove more belligerent and costly.

Curiously enough, candidates in the current mayoralty campaign have not been vocal about a situation which is intimately connected with the vital interests and good name of New York City. Jonah J. Goldstein, the Republican-Fusion candidate, tried to make political capital of it by a statement that the strike was "fomented by the C. I. O." and constituted "a public scandal." He said nothing, however, about the scandal of Ryanism. On this subject General O'Dwyer, the Democratic–American Labor Party candidate, has also kept quiet. Enjoying the support of both Tammany Hall, where Ryan is said to have powerful friends, and the C. I. O., his discretion is understandable. We hope, however, that independent citizens will put some questions on this subject to the candidates, all of whom speak very eloquently about "cleaning up" the city. They couldn't do better than start on the waterfront, where the stench is long-standing and doesn't improve with age.

Revolt in Asia: I—Indo-China

BY ANDREW ROTH

(Author of the recently published "Dilemma in Japan"; an Intelligence officer in the navy during the war)

AS THE clock struck three in Saigon on Sunday morning, September 23, a grim and silent army of 300 men padded along the deserted streets. On their heads were berets, on their shoulders crosses of Lorraine roughly cut out of cloth, in their hands a fierce assortment of Bren guns, grenades, pistols, and rifles. The French had come back to Indo-China. By morning they had seized the chief public buildings, captured Dr. Thach, the Annamite Foreign Minister, and mopped up the ill-armed Annamite guards. Machine-guns were set up on street corners, and the banners proclaiming "Death Before French Oppression" were torn down.

This seizure of Saigon by a small band of British-armed French soldiers was the first major blow directed at the Republic of Viet Nam (Indo-China), which had been so proudly proclaimed by Indo-Chinese nationalists less than a month before. Within another month a large part of the French navy steamed into Indo-Chinese ports bringing crack French army units to prop up—with British help—France's tottering control of its "balcony on the Pacific."

Indo-China is worth a struggle. Its 275,000 square miles, more than a third larger than France, support 23,000,000 inhabitants. It is one of the world's leading rice granaries, a rich source of partially exploited raw materials, and an important market and outlet for capital. In 1939 Indo-China exported almost 25 per cent of the world's rice shipments, was the largest coal exporter in the Far East, and was the third largest producer of natural rubber.

The late President Roosevelt considered Indo-China the worst-governed colony in the Far East. He felt so strongly about the callousness, despotism, and incredible shortsightedness of French colonial policies that he wanted French rule to be superseded by an international mandate. There was plenty of evidence to support President Roosevelt's opinion. After seventy years of French rule only 11 per cent of the inhabitants are literate. Despite the colony's rich natural resources the people are compelled to work as indentured plantation laborers for 30 to 40 cents a day, plus primitive shelter and inadequate food. With this meager income they are expected to furnish a market for French goods; colonial policy bars both the importation of cheap competitive goods and the establishment of local industries. Incredible as it may seem, the colonial government controls both the opium and the alcohol monopoly and profits by its encouragement of the natives to poison themselves. The people of Indo-China have no say in these policies, for the government is entirely in the hands of the French and a handful of Indo-Chinese notables and men of wealth who have profited greatly by French rule. Over all hovers the monopolistic control of the Bank of Indo-China, whose directors have tried to sabotage every liberal measure and who proved to be the most ardent pro-German collaborationists in France.

RISE OF INSURGENT NATIONALISM

This head-on clash between French imperialism and the authentic political and economic needs of Indo-China has produced successive waves of insurgent nationalism. The decade preceding World War I became known as the "era of plots" because a new anti-French conspiracy was announced almost daily, and the Poulu Condore Penitentiary bulged with young Annamite nationalists. After the war the tempo of the nationalist movement was considerably stepped up. A hundred thousand Annamites had served in France as soldiers and workers during the war, and they returned to demand the political and economic conditions they had found there. The Indo-Chinese drew further inspiration from the Chinese nationalist revolution, which was marshaling its forces in nearby Canton. Young nationalists flocked to Canton to enrol in the Whampoa Academy, which under Chiang Kai-shek and the Communist Chou En-lai was training Kuomintang officers for the "northern expedition" that was to bring China under Kuomintang rule.

In Canton many young Indo-Chinese came under the influence of Nguyen Ai Quoc, who twenty years later—with his name changed to Ho Chin Minh—was to become the first Premier of the provisional Republic of Viet Nam. Nguyen Ai Quoc was born in 1892, the son of an Annamite official. Resenting the servility of the native officialdom to the French, he left home at the age of seventeen and worked his way around the world on a French ship, winding up in France. There, while sustaining his frail body by various kinds of work, he spent all of his spare time planning and working for Indo-Chinese independence. At the Paris Peace Conference he was a one-man lobby for Indo-China. Having accomplished nothing, he organized the Intercolonial Union of Colored Peoples and later founded a newspaper in which he denounced the abuses of French imperialism.

Nguyen discovered great sympathy for Indo-China among French leftists, especially among the Communists, whose strategy at the time emphasized the possibility of overthrowing capitalism in Europe through nationalist uprisings in the colonies. He attended the French Communist Congress at Tours in 1920 and in 1923 was sent to Moscow to study colonial problems. In 1926 he turned up in Canton, where he founded the Association of Revolutionary Annamite Youth and worked feverishly to turn out agitators and revolutionary literature to be smuggled back into Indo-China. In 1927 the decision of Chiang Kai-shek and the right wing of the Kuomintang to discard their Russian advisers and suppress their Communist collaborators forced Nguyen Ai Quoc to abandon his convenient Cantonese base and with Michael Borodin and prominent Chinese leftists to seek refuge in Russia. He left behind him some 250 trained and fervent nationalists.

In February, 1930, French colonial authorities and the French public were startled to learn that two companies of Tonkinese troops had mutinied at Yenbay and killed six of their officers. Simultaneously with the Yenbay uprising, groups of natives, most of them unarmed, gathered in widely separated regions to present grievances, and were shot down when they refused to disperse. Sporadic uprisings continued in every part of Indo-China all through the year. The terrorist Nationalist Annamite Party, made up largely of intellectuals, which led this premature and poorly organized outbreak, was virtually destroyed by the brutally repressive measures of the frightened colonial officials.

The victory of the French Popular Front in 1936 raised Indo-Chinese hopes. On assuming office in June, 1936, the Socialist Minister of Colonies, Marius Moutet, said: "The black peasants of the millet and peanut country, the yellow men of the rice fields, we place all of them on the same level of moral equality, social justice, and brotherhood as the workers and farmers of France." At first it looked as if he meant what he said. An authoritarian Governor General was replaced by a more liberal one; the sentences of 1,300 political prisoners were commuted; the publication of La Lutte, a native newspaper with Communist leanings, was permitted in Saigon.

But this did not satisfy the Indo-Chinese. A wave of strikes affecting coal mines, rubber plantations, and bus companies underlined the demand for better wages. When the French government sent a special delegate to investigate labor and social conditions, he was greeted at the dock by a crowd of Annamites cheering for the Popular Front but demanding freedom to organize trade unions, freedom of speech and assembly, and other basic reforms. These demands were ignored. Freedom of assembly and organization was never granted. And when agitation continued, Moutet wired the ultra-conservative colonial administrators he had left in office: "Persistent agitation under the pretext of organizing the masses . . . will compromise the liberal policy which the government has decided to inaugurate in a legal way and with respect for French authority. . . . French order must reign in Indo-China, as elsewhere." Six months after this promise of a more liberal policy a native was sentenced to three years of prison and three more of surveillance for reading an Annamite translation of a pamphlet by Léon Blum, then Premier of France!

IMPERIALISM VERSUS DEFENSE

As the tide of Japanese aggression neared Indo-China's shores after 1937, the question of the colony's defense came to the fore. Again a sharp cleavage developed between the interests of the people of the colony and the shortsighted imperialism of the French government. Indo-Chinese nationalists and a few enlightened French leaders like Georges Mandel, later murdered by the Nazis, and Alexander Varenne argued that because France was so far away and so taken up with problems of its own defense Indo-China would have to rely primarily on its own resources. They urged an industrialization program for the colony, the recruiting of a substantial Annamite army under Annamite officers, and a liberalization of French rule to counter Japan's "Asia for the Asiatics" propaganda and give the Indo-Chinese something to fight for. But French officials were apparently more afraid of losing their colonial privileges than of losing their colony. Their obdurately blind policies made it a foregone conclusion that Indo-China should fall like a ripe plum into Japanese hands. When Governor General Catroux tried to resist the Japanese, the Vichy government replaced him with Admiral Decoux. Admiral Decoux's instructions were to maintain the colonial structure at all costs. This suited the Japanese, and for five years Admiral Decoux and the French colonial administrators were Japanese tools, using force to keep the Indo-Chinese in line as they converted the colony's resources to the needs of the Japanese. Anti-fascist Frenchmen, unwilling to serve the Japanese, slipped out of the country to join De Gaulle's forces.

During the entire period of Japanese occupation there was a nationalist anti-Japanese movement which actively aided the cause of the United Nations, despite continual harassing by the colonial authorities. The first upsurge of resistance was in October-December, 1940, as the Japanese were tightening their grip. Twenty serious uprisings occurred in one week, and there were riots and demonstrations in seven districts. According to a Vichy communiqué, the suppression of this anti-Japanese movement required the use of French soldiers and sailors as well as the Indo-Chinese police. More than a thousand persons were arrested in the Saigon area alone.

FOR AN INDEPENDENT REPUBLIC

Out of this resistance grew the League for the Independence of Indo-China, formed in 1941, which included the Annam Nationalist Party, the New Annam Party, the Indo-Chinese Communist Party, the Association of Young Revolutionaries, and national associations of peasants, workers, women, youth, officers, and soldiers. In 1943 the league was broadened to take in anti-fascist French and Chinese—500,000 Chinese live in the colony. Its political program called for the election of a national assembly to draw up a constitution for a free Indo-China on the basis of adult suffrage, restoration of democratic liberties and rights, equal rights for women, the right of minorities to self-determination, the organization of a national army, the nationalization of banks belonging to fascists (meaning the Bank of Indo-China in particular), the development of native industry, agrarian reform, labor legislation, and an adequate educational system.

In January, 1944, the League announced that it believed "in the sanctity of the principles for which the world has shed and is shedding so much blood" and called for guerrilla activity on a large scale. Its peasant adherents, in increasing numbers, refused to pay taxes and withheld rice from the market. The Japanese and their Vichyite colonial assistants retaliated with massacres and mass arrests. In March, 1945, the Japanese established direct rule in Indo-China, working through Emperor Bao Dai; they feared that Admiral Decoux would doublecross them after France had been liberated and it was plain that the Axis was on the defensive. Decoux's regime surrendered without a struggle or took to flight, but not before they had murdered a number of political prisoners in Yonpai and Caobang. The league attempted to take advantage of this period of confusion to seize power but was prevented by the Japanese.

It was more successful in August, when the Japanese capitulated to the Allies. The nationalist groups then unified their forces, staged a number of powerful demonstrations, and secured the abdication of the very willing Emperor Bao Dai. On August 25 the independent Republic of Viet Nam was proclaimed, with none other than the Communist Ho Chin Minh, or Nguyen Ai Quoc, as Premier. At this point the Japanese were more tolerant of a movement certain to cause acute embarrassment to the victorious Allies. In recent weeks the nationalists have reeled back before British and French machine-guns, but the legitimate aspirations of the people of Indo-China cannot be permanently kept down by superior force. Unless the fires of nationalism are banked by substantial reforms, they may consume the rickety structure of the Far Eastern peace.

Palestine and Grand Strategy

BY ELIAHU BEN-HORIN

(For sixteen years a newspaper editor in Palestine; author of "The Middle East, Crossroads of History")

THE real reason for Great Britain's illogical and unjust Palestine policy is not the threat of pan-Arabic resistance to the development of a Zionist state but considerations of grand strategy. Soviet Russia's expansionist tendencies in the Middle East are the major factor in the shaping of both British and American Middle Eastern policy. The foreign offices of the Western democracies have no fear of Pan-Arabia, but they do fear a Soviet-Arabian rapprochement. Is the threat of an alliance between the Soviets and the Arabian effendi real, or is it just another bogy?

One of the most damaging mistakes of Jewish leaders has been their tendency to present the Palestine problem solely as a quarrel between Jews and Arabs. Nothing could be farther from the mark. There is scarcely an issue of major importance to the great powers in which Palestine does not figure, whether it be the future of world communications, trade expansion, sea power versus land power, the balance of power between East and West, or the destiny of the British Empire. The present British Cabinet, like its predecessors, measures the situation with one question in mind: in the world of today, with its swiftly changing conditions and its completely altered balance of power, what policy will best assure British control of the Middle East? Only a Cabinet prepared to liquidate the Empire and transform Britain into a third-rate power could approach Middle Eastern problems with any other yardstick.

The crucial strategic-geographic importance of the Middle East to a maritime and trading empire like Great Britain is of course axiomatic. What seems to escape notice is Palestine's special position in the picture. More than any other land little Palestine constitutes a link between the continents of Europe, Africa, and Asia. It has a long coastline on the eastern Mediterranean. It lies on the northern bank of the Suez Canal. It is the natural outlet for the oil of Arabia. Loss of Palestine would be a deadly blow to Britain.

Washington, as well as London, is acutely aware of these geo-political realities. This country has only lately acquired a world outlook, but it has already come to realize that it cannot afford to neglect the Middle East. It has a very lively interest in Middle Eastern oil, and this interest means that it needs air and naval bases in the region. In the event of war formal ownership of Arabian oil would be of little avail; the important thing would be its accessibility. To operate concessions in peace and to maintain their accessibility in war, the United States must have outposts of military power on the scene. They are the prize America hopes to obtain through its close alliance with Britain.

The American University in Beirut, the colleges in Cairo and Istanbul, the American missions, numerous archaeological expeditions, and various trading and mining enterprises bear witness to America's long-standing interest in the Middle East. However, through the years, America has been a guest there, and not always a welcome one. Now, for the first time, Great Britain regards the United States as a desirable partner. It would be naive to think that American oil companies acquired concessions in Arabia against the will of Great Britain, which is, after all, supreme there. Nor was Britain's compliance an act of altruism. At a time when Soviet Russia's ambitions in the Mediterranean and Persian Gulf have become unmistakably clear, Britain wants the United States to share the political and military responsibility for one of the most troublesome spots on the earth. If John Bull must sooner or later encounter the Russian bear in the Arabian desert, he prefers not to have it a tête-à-tête.

Every effort made by Great Britain and the United States to form a counterbalance in Europe against the excessive might of Russia has failed. Both Western countries have been forced to acknowledge Soviet supremacy on the Continent. A desperate Britain has therefore fallen back on the old formula of sea power versus land power, with air power viewed as an appendix of sea power. This is the true basis of the British-American alliance—to keep the Russian colossus within the boundaries of a land-locked empire. In this strategy the Middle East assumes new importance, for the future balance of power will be determined at the Straits, in the eastern Mediterranean, and in the Persian Gulf.

The Jewish-Arab Palestine controversy must be examined in this perspective. British love for the Arabs or dislike of the Jews does not enter into the question. The British know precisely where they stand so far as the Arabs are concerned. They can permit the Arabs their delusions of grandeur. No harm is done. The British know that no such thing as a united Arabia exists or is likely to arise, and that the petty kings and sheiks can be managed or bought in the future as they have been in the past.

But the United States, new at this game of colonial imperialism, apparently takes what it sees and hears at face value. Emissaries of American oil companies, naive young men from the War Department and the OWI, even State Department officials have been bluffed by the shrewd Moslem potentates. They have returned from their missions to the Middle East with alarming reports of a probable Soviet-Arab alliance through which Russia would emerge dominant in the entire area. The only way to ward off this catastrophe, they report, is to forget the pledges to the Jewish people and the demands of justice and to placate the Arabs.

King Ibn Saud and other Arab politicians must have smiled in their beards when they sold this bill of goods to the Americans. If the Arab rulers have any say in the matter, the Soviets will not penetrate far into the Middle East. They may not be learned gentlemen, but they do know that where Soviet Russia enters, political reaction and social-economic backwardness go out. There is nothing the Arab barons dread more than Soviet influence in their domains.

At the same time they dislike Great Britain, with its insistence on military and political control behind the façade of native independence, and they are also eager to get rid of French domination. The United States thus emerges as a favorite foreign power. It is the only great power which offers large oil royalties, trading advantages, and cultural opportunities without asking anything important in return. This pro-American orientation of the Arabs can be counted upon to continue as long as America remains the richest and the least imperialistic power in sight. If the situation changed, Arab "loyalties" would change overnight. (In the 1930's, when the Arabs felt that Nazi Germany was growing stronger than Great Britain, they became definitely pro-German.) Should America or the American-British alliance suffer an eclipse, the most violent anti-Jewish attitude in Palestine would not enable us to retain Arab friendship.

My point is that Britain and the United States do not have to trade Jewish blood and Jewish suffering for Arab oil and sympathies; that fear of an Arab-Soviet alliance is fantastic. Moreover, if the Western democracies were looking for a way to increase the propaganda appeal of Soviet policies and to weaken their own moral standing, they could find no surer method than taking an anti-Jewish stand on Palestine. The conviction is spreading in a great many quarters that the Soviet Union is the true bearer of progressive ideas, and that Britain—now joined by America—upholds diehard conservatism and reaction. British-American support of the Arab kings and effendis and obstruction of Jewish aspirations in Palestine reinforces the conviction.

That Moscow is fully alive to the situation is shown by its radical change of attitude toward Zionism in the last two or three years. For nearly a quarter of a century Zionism was outlawed in Soviet Russia, and Zionists were severely persecuted. Now Soviet Jewry has been permitted to acknowledge its fraternal ties with the Jewish people. Ivan Maisky was sent on an official, and sympathetic, mission to Palestine, to survey the possibilities for further Jewish immigration. And on several occasions Soviet delegates to international conferences have voted for pro-Zionist resolutions.

Stalin, with his usual astuteness, apparently has a better understanding than British and American statesmen of the true relationship of the Zionist enterprise in Palestine to the whole politico-economic and strategic situation in the Middle East. He realizes the improbability of a Soviet-Arab alliance and sees that a pro-Jewish attitude in the Middle East would be valuable moral propaganda for Soviet Russia.

With tension mounting in Palestine, Britain and America must make a fateful choice. Either they must persevere in a course which encourages political, economic, and social reaction and the spread of xenophobia, which ignores the frightful Jewish tragedy as well as the solemn pledges given the Jews, and which compromises democracy in the eyes of the world, or they must adopt a new policy which will be progressive and just and also thoroughly sound from the point of view of grand strategy and international peace.

In the Wind

NOMENCLATURE: A new bridge will soon cross the Mississippi River at Memphis, Tennessee, and the citizens are undecided what to call it. Among the names that have been proposed are Franklin D. Roosevelt, Ed Crump, and Westbrook Pegler. . . . War Department records show that more men named Cohen enlisted in New York City than those of any other name. . . . A prize boar owned by Emmert Brothers, Mason City, Iowa, is named One World. . . . And the blue ribbon for male Duroc-Jersey hogs at the Mississippi-Alabama fair September 30 went to an eleven-hundred-pounder named Congressman, from Tupelo, the home town of Representative Rankin.

CENSORSHIP: A soldier stationed in White Horse, Alaska, during the war recently learned that a letter of his had been held by army censors for two years because it contained a snapshot that revealed his location. "The only thing we could write about freely was our excursion trip to Great Bear Lake on the Arctic Circle," he says. "Now I find that all the uranium used in the atom experiments came from Great Bear Lake."

LABOR: T. D. Kemp, Jr., a columnist in the Charlotte, North Carolina, Observer, makes this suggestion: "Should the Russians succeed in having General MacArthur thrown out of Japan, he would be useful here in our own country. You can think of no better way to end these strikes, particularly the ones that get out of hand, than to have General MacArthur take the job of assisting President Truman in straightening things out. With a few million veterans rallying around MacArthur, labor bosses will think twice before calling or prolonging strikes."

ANNOUNCEMENT: The Julian Messner Award for the best book combating intolerance in America has been increased to an outright prize of $5,000 plus an advance of $1,500 against royalties by a grant from the foundation established in memory of Ensign Lionel Judah Tachna, who was killed in the Battle of the Coral Sea.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. One dollar will be paid for each item accepted.]

On Criticizing the Vatican

BY LAWRENCE FERNSWORTH

(Mr. Fernsworth, liberal Catholic writer, was correspondent of the New York Times and the London Times in Spain during the civil war. He is the author of "Protestants Under Franco" and "Dictators and Democrats.")

IN A broadcast to a recent rally of the Spanish Refugee Appeal of the Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee in Madison Square Garden, Harold J. Laski criticized the Vatican for its support of Franco and by implication for its whole policy of political interventionism. The Catholic press construed his remarks as an attack on Catholicism; and as if to confirm Mr. Laski's arguments, Catholic groups made a concerted effort to silence Station WJZ, which broadcast his address, and to have Actors' Equity expel five actors who had participated in the rally. These events make it appropriate to recall some of the basic facts about the political character of the Vatican.

In recent years Catholic authorities have written vigorously and eloquently in defense of the thesis that the Vatican is a sovereign political state and as such has the qualifications for political action. On October 10 the New York Times carried a dispatch from Rome on the action of the Allied Control Council in addressing the Vatican, among other "countries," on the subject of the repatriation of German and other Axis diplomats accredited to those "countries."

The New York Times for May 12, 1940, printed on its editorial page a lengthy, two-column letter written by Bishop (now Archbishop) James H. Ryan of Omaha setting forth the Vatican's claims to be recognized as a political entity. Bishop Ryan said, "Though conscious of the religious power of the Pope, head of the Catholic church, we have chosen to remain blind to the political power of the Pope who is King. But is it the part of wisdom not to recognize the Papacy for what it is, despite any religious feelings to the contrary?" Elaborating further on the political character of the Vatican, Bishop Ryan described it as "the listening post of Europe" and said that, from "its far-flung outposts" "thousands of well-trained official and unofficial diplomats are constantly reporting on even the slightest changes in public opinion in their respective territories." All this was in support of the thesis, put forward by the entire hierarchy and its press, that the United States should grant diplomatic recognition to the Vatican as a political institution.

Professor Laski's criticisms were directed against the Vatican's political attitude toward Franco's Spain. As Archbishop Ryan suggested, he seems to have chosen "to recognize the Papacy for what it is."

Surely the actions of any political entity, large or small, are a proper object of comment. To hold otherwise is a blow at free speech and, it would seem, a real affront to those millions of Americans who cherish free speech. To call this kind of legitimate debate an "insult" to Catholics is no more justified than to call adverse criticism of our government's acts an "insult" to Americans. Americans would be the first to take offense at a claim which so stultified their intelligence. This, I am sure, holds true of the great majority of Catholics, who, being intelligent, must resent being made to look foolish.

The rally for the Spanish anti-fascist refugees was, in fact, presided over by a Catholic. What is more, millions of Catholics applauded—and continue to applaud—the letter of the late President Roosevelt denouncing Franco as a fascist and the recent statement of President Truman, issued in support of President Roosevelt's directive to our Spanish ambassador, "We do not like Franco." During the Spanish civil war a poll showed that Catholics, for the most part, declined to accept the political conduct urged upon them by their hierarchy.

In its issue of October 19 the Commonweal said: "What Mr. Laski attacked was the discipline and politics of the church and not the church itself, and it is a sad thing when Catholics so easily earn the dislike of their neighbors by the assumption that any criticism of any aspect of the church is inadmissible. We must ever be watchful not to allow our faith to serve as a cloak under which we strive to smother political discussion." One of our greatest liberal Catholics, Associate Justice Murphy of the United States Supreme Court, said in a speech last Fourth of July: "Ours is now the spiritual battle—the battle against all manifestations of the Nazi disease we find among our own people."

The new push to bolster the Fascist regime of Spain, which owes its being to the Fascist regime of Italy and the Nazi regime of Germany, and the efforts to stifle the legitimate criticism of those who continue to fight against fascism—World War II will not be ended until its causes are liquidated—are "manifestations of the Nazi disease."

The bizarre kind of thinking indulged in by those who would try to silence all criticism of Franco, and all comment on the political role of the Vatican in the matter of Spain, is illustrated by an editorial in the Catholic News, Archbishop Spellman's diocesan organ, for October 13. Commenting on the "Frank Fay case," the paper charges that the five actors who attended the meeting "represented themselves as reflecting the attitude of all the members of their casts"—this is not substantiated by any report I have seen. Mr. Fay, it goes on, in accusing fellow-actors of misrepresenting the attitude of other actors, "spoke for millions of Americans." The paper brands the alleged action of five actors in claiming to speak for a limited number of fellow-actors as a public offense, but in the same breath itself claims that Mr. Fay spoke "for millions of Americans," although there is not the slightest evidence that he had any such mandate.

Concerning the refusal of various groups to let free speech about Spain be stifled by such tactics, the editorial continues: "This incident is further evidence of the manner in which the organized radical minority strives to control all avenues of contact with the mind of the public; if this effort to silence inquiry about leftist-influenced activities succeeds we may expect even more brazen attempts."

The same column of editorial comment which demanded an investigation of "leftist" activities accused the New York Post of "violating all canons of journalism" because it turned the spotlight on a Christian Front meeting in Queens, and as a result some of the chief participants were arrested and charged with insulting Jews. There was no word of regret for the insults to the Jews—which were real.

It seems plain that the apologists for Franco, the Spanish usurper, will never understand that firm opposition to all attempts to silence criticism of this "Nazi disease" among our own people is part of the "spiritual battle" in which all who cherish man's freedom and dignity must take part.

America's Homesick Army

BY JOSEPH FREEMAN

(Joseph Freeman, author of the novel "Never Call Retreat," traveled with a USO show for nine weeks this summer in France, Germany, and Austria. During that time he lived in army billets and talked with many G. I.'s and officers.)

THE Jagdschloss was hidden deep in the forest. Once the hunting lodge of a German millionaire, it was now an officers' club of the Thirtieth Infantry, spacious and luxuriously furnished. Veterans of the famous Third Division welcomed us in the lounge, bar, and music room. An orchestra played "Oh, What a Beautiful Morning!" Then the club officer, a young lieutenant who looked a little like Robert E. Sherwood, gave me a copy of "The Dogfaced Soldier," song of the Fighting Third. A USO pianist played it on the Bechstein and we all sang it. There was plenty of champagne and cognac, the house was impressive and comfortable, the evening full of high animal spirits, friendly laughter. It was hard to believe that these men had been fighting in the Bulge six months ago, that war was still raging in this area only three months ago, that the nearby city of Kassel lay in utter ruins.

The lieutenant who resembled Sherwood asked me to follow him. On the stairway he said, "I'm going to show you how far away from a foxhole a man can get in this army." We entered a vast, beautifully furnished apartment. The lieutenant went to a small table near the French windows, shoved aside his forty-five, and put out a bottle of Black and White and two glasses. "I've never lived like this before," he said. "What do you think of it?"

"Great," I said.

"Back home," he said, "I was a salesman. I don't know what I'll do when I get out of the army, but I know I won't live like this." He showed me pictures of his pretty wife and six-year-old son whom he had not seen since the kid was four. "I like to sit here late at night," he said, "and write them letters." Then he swept his hand around the room and said, "You can have it. Just give me any place in the U. S. A."

The army doesn't all live as elegantly as this lieutenant or as the young warrant officer from Brooklyn who runs the three best hotels in Paris for big brass. I've seen open-air camps where fifteen or twenty thousand troops lived under canvas and have eaten chow carelessly cooked and ladled out of huge aluminum cans into a precarious blueplate. Some soldiers take this philosophically. In the tent city outside Marburg one corporal said to me, "Everything is relative. Big tents are luxury compared to pup tents; pup tents are luxury compared to foxholes." Many G. I.'s, however, resent the inequalities in army life. They particularly resent it in sections of Germany where their living conditions are inferior to those of many German prisoners of war and of Nazi big shots who have been allowed to retain their homes.

Our army, like our civilian population, has its gradations of income, comfort, and status, but on any level the G. I. in Europe is a privileged character. He is sitting on top of the world. He is the best-equipped fighting man there is, and he has just finished off the most powerful army in Europe's history. Against the background of a continent wrecked by fascism and war, whose people are for the most part sallow, undernourished, small, poorly dressed, and thoroughly frightened, G. I. Joe stands out for his youth, good looks, energy, robust health, easygoing humor, and immense generosity. He is the best-dressed man in Europe and the richest. A pack of cigarettes, a piece of five-cent chocolate, a cake of soap, gets him services even a black marketeer can't buy. Many officers live in first-class hotels requisitioned from the French or in palatial homes taken from German industrialists and Gauleiters. Enlisted men often have barracks and clubs that would do credit to any American community. Everywhere appreciative laughter greeted F. P. A.'s gag, "How are we going to get used to the rigors of civilian life?" Europeans have the psychology of scarcity, Americans the psychology of plenty, and G. I. Joe has all the confidence and candor that go with plenty.

Yet nearly every man in the army wants to go home toot sweet, and that gives him another distinction in Europe. I ran into Poles who did not want to go back to Poland, Rumanians who did not want to go back to Rumania, and Russians who did not want to go back to Russia. The only one who invariably wants to go back to his own country is G. I. Joe. This is his central urge; it decides his gripes, amusements, and hopes.

You notice this the moment you reach Paris. You have your own sentimental memories of the city, and as your jeep rattles in from Orley Field you are not a bit disappointed visually. It is all there, the marvelous capital that has enchanted many generations. But Henry, our driver, a young Jersey grocer with a good combat record, warned us: "Hope you brought plenty of soap and towels. You won't be able to get anything except in PX. Them Frogs have nothing at all." Then, as a crowd began to gather at 6 a. m. in the Etoile to celebrate the fifth anniversary of the liberation movement, Henry said, "They're going to parade again. There's nothing them Frogs love better than a parade. They'd rather parade than eat."

You are surprised the first time you hear this gripe. Then you reach the point where you are surprised if a G. I. says a good word for France. With some exceptions the G. I. is lonely in Paris. For a while it is all a great adventure, the thing he dreamed of in his foxhole. He goes to the Louvre, Notre Dame, the Bois; stares at the inscriptions on the Arc de Triomphe; strolls along the Left Bank; visits Gertrude Stein and Picasso. He picks up girls in the Pigalle, which he calls Pig Alley; makes money selling watches and cameras to the French; buys Chanel No. 5 and Schiaparelli for someone back home; sees the Folies Bergères; gets drunk in the Lido. But you can't keep that up forever. There comes a time when Joe stops whistling after the girls and resents it when they ask him for money right off the bat and plenty of it. He is sore about paying $1.25 for a small slug of inferior cognac or sour wine, especially since he knows the French get it for 20 francs. He hates to be gypped; he is bored. The letdown from the exciting period of combat is terrific, and Paris can't make up for it. I've seen G. I.'s wandering in the streets at night alone or in couples singing high-school songs or lying by the dozens on their backs in the Place de la Concorde, right out in the street, smoking in silence, looking up at the sky and thinking of home.

This nostalgia finds relief in criticizing the French. The women are no beauties; the men are rude and lazy, they won't work, they are not rebuilding the country. Every trifle is exaggerated, and the French do not help matters by their attitude. I've heard them tell G. I.'s openly: "You are not needed here; why don't you go home?" They complain that our soldiers are boisterous, get drunk in the streets, make no distinction between one kind of woman and another, calling after anything in skirts, and buy up things which are scarce in France.

The G. I. knows chiefly the street girl and the shopkeeper. He rarely sees real French life, which is in the home. He thinks the French are ungrateful after that marvelous day of liberation when they kissed and embraced him. When they tell him to go home, he says: "Okay, brother, just fix it for me."

The upshot of these petty conflicts is a disquieting paradox. The G. I. does not like our allies, and he has a growing admiration for the people he was fighting a few months ago. It was in France that I first heard an American soldier praising the Germans: "Them Krauts are rebuilding their country. Boy, they know how to work."

Then comes the real surprise, the G. I.'s enthusiasm for German women. We heard it for the first time from Roger, the pfc. who drove us in a jeep to Reims. He was a tall, blond, gangly boy of twenty-four from the deep South. He had lost an eye in combat, and his arms and legs were wired where German shrapnel had shattered the nerves. But he was a cheerful wag who talked about himself with great humor. He was crazy about his family back home, and talked a lot about them, too. Then he got off on his adventures with European women. In France, he said, the boys put up with street girls because what else can they do, but if you want to see real nice dames, go to Germany. They're beautiful, beau-ti-ful, he said, and told us about the girl who had been his "wife" in Germany.

"See these pants?" he said. "She sewed that permanent crease in them. It'll last forever. She sewed creases like that in all my pants and shirts, see what I mean. Once they put me in the guardhouse for sassing an officer. This girl heard I was on bread and water." He laughed. "I was, too. So one night she comes around to the clink and brings me a chicken. I used to tell her about Southern fried chicken, and I'll be a son of a gun if she didn't make it for me. The M. P.'s wouldn't let her into the guardhouse, but their eyes popped. They brought that chicken in to me themselves and you ain't kiddin', it was good. What a dame!"

General Eisenhower's ban on fraternization was still on when we reached Augsburg the first week of July. It prohibited "visiting German homes; drinking with Germans; shaking hands with them; playing games or sports with them; giving or accepting gifts; attending German dances or other social events; accompanying Germans on the streets, in theaters, taverns, hotels, or elsewhere except on official business; discussion and argument with Germans, especially on politics or the future of Germany."

In most respects the ban was adhered to. There was no difficulty about that. The Germans were not fraternizing with us. You walked along the streets of Augsburg surveying the damage our bombs had done, and streams of Germans passed you looking straight ahead in grim silence. That was typical of the United States zone.

But in regard to women the ban was a flop. Venus always follows Mars, and the Fräuleins were as the G. I.'s had described them—the healthiest, best-looking, most attractive girls in ETO and the best-dressed, too. In Paris you rarely saw women with stockings; in Germany you rarely saw women without them. It was no use telling Joe that these women were well fed and well dressed because Germany had robbed all Europe for them. Joe wanted companionship, and the Fräuleins were lonely, too. Five million German men have been killed in battle; millions of others are caged P. W.'s. And the Fräuleins play the oldest game in the world the way Joe likes it. They have a sense of humor. Laughing, they slap their backsides and say, "Verboten!" They do not ask for money. They do it only for their friends, and they haven't an enemy in the world.

So the G. I.'s violated the fraternization ban, sneaking off with Fräuleins into the woods or their homes. Going with German girls like that was scarcely an act of friendship toward the beaten foe. The most crushing humiliation that can be inflicted on men is to take away their women. Sometimes conquering soldiers take the enemy's women by force. G. I. Joe likes to make friends and influence women by the charm of his personality and his PX rations.

Some officers acquired steady sweethearts among the German women. The Joes picked them up in the street. When you pick up girls in the street you are likely to encounter little bugs known as gonococci and spirochaetae pallidae.

It is now no secret that these had a great deal to do with altering the formal relations between the G. I.'s and the Germans. There was a $65 penalty for fraternizing. The idea was to fine Joe so heavily that he would stay away from the women. What he did was to stay away from the prophylactic station. In the army the word fraternization came to mean sex. The grapevine quoted a three-star general to the effect that cohabitation without conversation is not fraternization. The boys called Was ist los?—the opening phrase of a flirtation—the $65 question. The result was an alarming rise in the venereal-disease rate. The ban on fraternization had to be lifted. At first Americans were allowed to associate with Germans only in public places. Now they may visit them in their homes, too.

This solved one problem by creating two others. In general, G. I.'s are not politically minded. When they heard we had just arrived from the states, they asked about the cigarette, meat, and gasoline shortage; whether it was hot when we left; what movies were playing back home; how we celebrated V-E Day. They showed no interest in the British elections, the Truman Administration, or Germany's future. The questions they asked everybody all the time were: When do you think the Pacific war will be over, and when do you think we'll go home? The way they were put, in the intention behind them, these were personal, not political questions. They revealed that G. I. Joe, the world's best soldier, hates war and doesn't care much for army life. They revealed, too, the power of the silver cord, what Philip Wylie once called the "pull of Mom," the longing to get back to Main Street and stay there. But it was more than that. It was a recoil from Europe as the scene of slaughter, a longing for America, which was remembered and idealized as a place of peace, plenty, and freedom. In any event, wasn't Joe drifting back into a state of mind whose political expression is isolationism? And now that he could meet Germans freely and indiscriminately, wouldn't he be a sucker for Nazi propaganda? The danger was all the greater since the army made no serious effort to teach him what the basic conflicts in the modern world were about.

I was still in Augsburg when the fraternization ban was lifted. The immediate effect was interesting. People who the day before had passed us on the street in resentful silence now looked for an excuse to talk to us. An elderly woman, seeing me standing near an army car, asked if I could drive her to her mother thirty miles away. A fifteen-year-old boy wanted to know where the American Gestapo was. Gestapo means state police, and he was looking for our M. P.'s. The G. I.'s came out into the open with their Fräuleins. They complained humorously that this took all the fun out of it, but whenever necessary they reported to the Pro station. A few refused to have anything to do with the Germans even after there was no rule against it. They said that Germans are incurably evil, that the only good German is a dead German, that nothing can change their lust for world dominion, that they would start another war as soon as possible. But for the most part our soldiers were friendly to the Germans they met. They made a very clear distinction, however—at least this summer—between taking out German girls and taking in German ideas.

[This is the first of two articles on the G. I. in Europe.]

Brittany Goes to the Polls

BY IDA TREAT

(Ida Treat is the author of "The Anchored Heart," a story of the Breton island which was her home during the invasion and early occupation and to which she has now returned. Her husband was commander of a Free French corvette.)

Ile de Bréhat, France, September 24

THE garde-champêtre, our island cobbler and one policeman, knocked at my door the day before yesterday. Before I left France five years ago I used to dread his coming; invariably he brought unpleasant messages. Had I hens, ducks, or rabbits? They had to be listed for the Germans. Did I own a radio set or a wood-burning stove? Of course if I hid them well, I needn't hand them over. But would I please make a bundle of two blankets, three sheets, and as many pillow-slips? "If you don't give them willingly, they'll come and take all you have."

This time, too, the garde-champêtre's visit was official. But pleasanter. He brought me my voter's card. A little blue folder with Marianne in her Phrygian cap crossed by three lines of print: "Carte d'électeur, valid for all electors until March 31, 1946." At the top, "République Française, Liberté, Egalité, Fraternité." A woman citizen of the liberated French Republic, I am now entitled to vote.

As it happens, I have never voted anywhere before. Marie-Anaik, my peasant neighbor, is one ahead of me. She cast her ballot last spring for the town council. "You come with me and I'll show you how it's done," Alain Lebras, her husband, reassured me. An elector for forty-five years, Alain can neither read nor write.

After the garde-champêtre's visit I received three others. Agents of the local candidates called to leave literature and ballot slips. They merely handed them in at the door. There is no house-to-house canvassing in France. Alain Lebras sums up the general feeling about tactics of that sort when he says belligerently, "I'll have no stranger coming to tell me who to vote for."

For the past week a long panel by the Town Hall has been plastered over with election posters. They all say more or less the same thing: "Our policy—reconstruction, efficient rationing, suppression of the black market, épuration, clean politics." The Communist posters are the only ones that show photographs: a man plowing beneath a giant crab poised in the sky—"trusts, Vichy committees, bureaucracy, parasitism, disorder"; German prisoners busy in the mined fields, with the caption "They sowed the mines; they must clear them out. They destroyed; they must rebuild." That strikes home. A gang of prisoners has already removed eighty of the deadly "bottles" from the pasture beyond my garden wall. Alain Lebras was blown up in his own clover patch last year and by miracle is still alive. Every day we hear of accidents to farmers on the mainland, less lucky than my neighbor Alain. One hundred million German mines in France!

There are three candidates for the seat of conseiller général in our département—an Independent Republican, a Socialist, a Communist. The first is a retired mine engineer; the second, a local merchant's clerk; the third, the mayor of a village on the mainland.

"What's an Independent Republican?" Amélie, our village seamstress, wants to know.

"Probably a white," says Alain Lebras. (On our island the old term still applies to anyone tinged with conservatism.)

"At any rate he's old," says Marie-Anaik. "Une vieille barbe. What we need today is young men."

"You wouldn't vote for a Socialist!" Amélie peers scandalized from beneath the ruffles of her black wind-bonnet.

"I'm not saying. But we don't want any ci-devants in the new government."

Amélie is still perplexed. She is a pious woman, and the word "Republican" in pre-war days meant but one thing to her. What if the Republican candidate should turn out to be an anti-clerical!

The widow of a manufacturer of church ornaments who has just called at the farm for her milk says she has a poor opinion of all three candidates. She doesn't intend to vote at all—not until the referendum next month. The other women eye her severely. Is that the way to build up a new France?

Before the war I never felt there was much justification for the claim that French women were indifferent to suffrage. Certainly what has happened since—defeat, invasion, resistance, and the daily fight for bare essentials—has been enough to shake any woman out of her lethargy (though I should never think of associating "lethargy" with any French woman of my acquaintance). Here in Brittany women have run farm and family—including the seafaring husband during his brief appearances—for generations. No shock of war was needed to give the sailor's wife a sense of responsibility. Is her status as citizen now recognized officially? So much the better. That is justice. To govern a state, what is it but governing a family and a farm on a bigger scale? Brittany women are interested in government rather than "politics." They leave the political game to the men of the household—a pastime like belotte or manille at the village inn, or bowls on the square. The women on the farm have never had time for play.

In the farmhouse kitchen Marie-Anaik adjusts her spectacles and studies the three programs laid side by side on the kitchen table.

"When we chose the town council, a lot of people wanted Yvonne Leguen, the baker's wife. She's been to school, knows everybody, and talks well. Talks a lot. I voted for Alice Lasblé. She's no talker, but she has one of the best-run farms on the east shore and she did it all herself. Yvonne bakes the bread, but the rest of us furnish the wheat. When threshing stopped last month because there wasn't any more gasoline for the thresher, the Mayor—he's another talker—said we'd have to wait and that was all there was to it. As if we could wait, with the autumn storms coming on! But Alice went off to the Préfecture and we got fuel for the thresher in two days. We have to deliver our wheat if we want unrationed bread next month. I'm glad Alice was elected. You see, she understands; she's one of us."

Obviously the retired engineer is not "one of us." That must be one of the reasons why Marie-Anaik pushes aside the ballot slip of the Independent Republican. An additional reason: she doesn't like the word "Independent." "If he's alone he's nobody. If there are people behind him I want to know who they are." As for the labels "Socialist" and "Communist," they have no terrors for her. "They can't frighten me any more with words."

Election Day. A typical autumn Sunday—high winds chasing the clouds across the sky, brief squalls of driven rain, and the tide of the equinox piling up thirty feet of water against the rocks. In the Town Hall on the square the urne, the ballot-box, stands ready, between the isoloirs, two red curtains tacked to the rafters. Six hundred voters are on the list that the Mayor's assistant checks off one by one.

All day long they come. After early mass the congregation queues up on the steps of the Mairie. "The whites vote in the morning, the reds in the afternoon," grins the garde-champêtre.

Old women in their wind-bonnets, clutching the blue card. Families in their Sunday best. The doctor's widow, back from two years in the concentration camp, where her husband died. The electrician, still wearing the beret and khaki uniform of General LeClerc's troops. (The electrician's wife was shot for denouncing patriots.) The schoolmistress on crutches—she was injured during the bombing of Nantes. The innkeeper's wife, whose son, a political deportee, is still missing. The former Mayor, who was accused of intelligence with the enemy, and acquitted. The white-haired woman who delivers telegrams—in black for her prisoner of war who never came home.

At the inn two red-faced merchants from the mainland are having lunch with two noisy girls. Wine at 250 francs the bottle, lobster at 160 francs the portion. The girls in brand-new tailored suits, brand-new high-heeled shoes—there is not a scrap of leather at our cobbler's—and with huge leather handbags. The whole get-up of the party screams black market.

"Are you voting, Yvice?" asks one of the girls.

"Penses-tu!" guffaws the merchant. "Haven't you seen the posters? It's Cachin, Thorez and Company who are going to save France."

I climbed the steps of the Town Hall, flanked by Marie-Anaik and Alain. One by one we handed in our cards and received in exchange a blue envelope with the seal of the Republic in the center. Behind the red curtain each slipped his ballot in the envelope and stepped out again to drop it in the box. Three more names checked off the voters' list.

"I hope our man wins," said Alain as we crossed the square.

"Whoever wins, he'll have a lot to do."

"He and the rest of us," said Marie-Anaik.

Everybody's Business

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Heresy in High Places

THE Committee for Economic Development is the youngest, the best publicized, and the most evangelical of the national organizations devoted to the advancement of private enterprise. Unlike the National Association of Manufacturers and the United States Chamber of Commerce, it does not carry on offensive and defensive lobbying in Congress. Its mission has been to create faith in the ability of business to solve the nation's economic problems by encouraging business to plan for prosperity. To this end it has organized intensively at the community level, setting up more than 2,900 local C. E. D.'s to spread the gospel throughout the land. From these branches a mass of data has flowed to the busy headquarters in New York, there to be translated into inspirational releases.

As a result of all this activity, the C. E. D. was able to announce promptly on the cessation of hostilities in August that in the first full post-war year, out of a total labor force of 60,000,000, 53,500,000 would be employed. Allowing for 3,500,000 men in the armed forces, and a "labor float" composed of men changing jobs or voluntarily idle numbering 2,500,000, it estimated that only about a half-million men would be actually unemployed. Another report issued in September suggested that reconversion would be completed by September 1, 1946, when total employment would be 24 per cent higher than in 1940 and only 12½ per cent below the war-time peak. If this did not mean "full employment"—a phrase which the committee appears to shun—it did indicate employment at a fairly high level.

The basis of the committee's statistics is the collection through local and industry groups of estimates by individual business men of the numbers on their pay rolls if orders come in as plentifully as they hope. That is to say, the figures tell us a good deal more about potential production than they do about actual demand. Clearly, the C. E. D. board was aware of this fact, even though its publicity tended to obscure its significance, for it set its Research Committee to work on the problem of how to maintain total demand so as to absorb total production.

The report of this committee, published on October 11 under the title "Toward More Jobs and More Freedom," is an important document. In fact, I am tempted to call it "historic," for it provides proof that some of the basic concepts of Keynesian economics have at last penetrated into the upper stratum of American business society.

America's capacity to produce in abundance and variety, the report asserts, has been amply demonstrated, but "we have not yet shown a corresponding ability to maintain peace-time market demand for goods and services at satisfactory levels." How, then, since business men cannot produce unless they sell, is demand to be sustained? I have insufficient space to summarize the report's analysis of the different causes of instability in demand. It is good to note, however, that "consumer confidence" is given the same prominence as "business confidence," and that the role of insecurity of employment in undermining consumer confidence and so curtailing demand is recognized.

The most striking section of the report is that devoted to the "crucial responsibilities" of government "for promoting and maintaining high levels of productive employment." In the fiscal and monetary fields, it declares, government exerts a major influence on the stability of demand. The huge volume of public debt and the probable magnitude of national revenue and expenditure in the post-war period will give government fiscal policy a greater "leverage" than ever. In what way can this leverage be most effectively exercised? The conventional business answer is by rigid economy, by tax reduction, by balancing the budget, and by reducing debt. The C. E. D. Research Committee takes another view. "It is generally agreed," its report declares, "that an annual balance of the budget is impractical—that an attempt to balance in a depression year might work against recovery. And yet it is agreed that a peace-time increase in the public debt should be avoided and that as much debt should be retired as is consistent with maintaining high levels of employment and production." How are these two objectives to be reconciled? The answer, the committee suggests, is to increase expenditure and reduce taxes when market demand is weak, to reduce spending and raise taxes in periods of prosperity.

Here we have, in short, a new statement of the "compensatory theory," which looks to government fiscal policies to offset the fluctuations in demand inherent in the free-market system. It is the theory which gave potency to the Murray Full Employment bill before that measure was emasculated by Senator Taft's amendment assuring a balanced budget precedence over the maintenance of jobs. The C. E. D., although it has phrased its statement timidly, and shrunk from exploring its full implications, does indorse the view that it is the state of employment which must determine budgetary policy and not vice versa.

Members of the Research Committee responsible for this report include Ralph E. Flanders, New England industrialist and president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Boston; Marion B. Folsom, treasurer of Eastman Kodak; Paul Hoffman, president of Studebaker; Eric A. Johnston, of Chamber of Commerce fame and now "movie czar"; Ernest Kanzler, chairman of Universal Credit Corporation; Beardsley Ruml, treasurer of Macy's; and R. Gordon Wasson, vice-president of J. P. Morgan and Company. No impractical professors of economics on this list! The one member of the committee who dissented from the fiscal policies advocated in the report was John Fennelly, partner in the investment firm of Glore, Forgan and Company.

Looking at this roster of eminently respectable business men, one is not surprised that the Wall Street Journal could hardly believe its eyes. Unable to shake off a life-long habit of never directly criticizing powerful figures in the business world, it makes the rather insulting suggestion that the majority of the men responsible for the report actually disagree with it. Henry Hazlitt, the Hayek of the New York Times, is more frank. He finds the report a "most disheartening development," and while I take an exactly opposite view, I understand his dismay. When economic heresy spreads to such quarters, where is it going to stop?

The People's Front

OF ALL those who, during the past five years, have talked so much about the necessity of unity and concerted effort to make sure that the war should not be lost politically, only the workers have translated words into action. The liberals, divided before the war, remain divided today. They cling stubbornly to their separate organizations and continue to conduct little vendettas among themselves mixed in with all sorts of courtesies and smiles. Some of them have become bitter and cynical: they are anti-British, anti-Russian, anti-everything. Others have fallen into a kind of mysticism: they think that merely by pronouncing the magic words "world government" they can open a door of escape from the hard realities that we face today.

Until now only labor has taken effective international action. Governments and workers began to deal with the peace at the same moment. But while the governments wrangled at San Francisco, the labor leaders of the world were working together in Oakland to build a new international. Few people paid any attention to their efforts; of the thousand newspapermen in San Francisco, only a half-dozen of us crossed the bridge to Oakland to watch them at work. The Oakland meeting, unlike the one at San Francisco, was successful; in September at Paris the World Federation of Trade Unions emerged, fully articulated and united, as one of the few promises of the post-war world. We don't know how the first public assembly of the new league of nations will come out. We don't know whether we shall witness the divisive bickering that took place at San Francisco and ruined the recent Conference of Foreign Ministers in London. But the international labor organization is already there, uniting the proletariat of forty countries, broadening day by day the sphere of its activities.

The World Federation of Trade Unions has demanded representation in the United Nations Organization in an advisory capacity. Its demand should be strongly supported by everyone who wants to avoid a new war. The presence of the labor international would inject blood and sinew into the UNO. The new league had a difficult birth, complicated by the rivalries and suspicions of its members, big and small. But what weighs most heavily against it is its remoteness from the people. During the war there was much brave talk about giving the common man a place at the peace conference, about the participation of citizens' organizations in administering the peace. Women's groups, liberal organizations saw themselves seated around the green baize table. They believed that at the very least their leaders would have a voice and would form part of the new world secretariat. It was a nice dream. But old-time diplomacy, which still rules the world, has no intention of permitting "the people" to participate in the peace. It will continue the tested practice of Geneva: one condescended to receive a delegation from time to time; one talked vague generalities with them and then ignored their demands entirely.

But the world labor movement is no "delegation to Geneva." It is 70,000,000 organized workers, knowing what they want and how to ask for it. They will not be so easy to brush off, especially if they are courageously led. And that is just what the new organization has—leaders who realize their strength and are determined to have that strength acknowledged and respected.

Among those leaders I particularly want to mention Sidney Hillman. His share in the creation of the labor international was in a certain sense decisive. He has proved an able and skilful diplomat at a time when diplomacy's stock is very low indeed. Without his patient intervention it might have been impossible to hold the British and Russian delegates together. But his historic contribution has been to introduce the American labor movement into world affairs. From time immemorial American labor has been all but absent from the international movement. The role of the American Federation of Labor in the International Federation of Trades Unions was hardly more than nominal—and what influence it exercised was reactionary. At international labor conferences or at moments of crisis like the terrible days of Munich, when the question of mobilizing world labor came up, someone always suggested, "We must get the Americans in on this." Came the invariable answer: "That's a waste of time. American labor leaders are not interested in foreign affairs unless their country is directly involved; they are concerned only with wages, hours, and working conditions."

I have spent more than thirty years in the world struggle for socialism; in that time American labor as a political factor has been practically non-existent. Everybody was familiar, of course, with the I. W. W. program of direct action. We knew, too, the fighting spirit of certain unions, notably the steel workers and the miners. But the I. W. W. was an anarcho-syndicalist, anti-socialist organization, while other powerful unions confined their interests exclusively to American problems.

It is the C. I. O. leaders who have put an end to this position, which in no way reflected the strength or even the militancy of American labor. The day on which Philip Murray announced that labor was going to ask for a place at the peace table marked a turning point for workers in America and in the world. Labor must participate in solving all the problems connected with the peace, beginning with the problem of the control of atomic energy. By courageously crossing the frontiers of the United States, American labor will now command attention in Europe as well as at home. In the international crises that lie ahead it can play a decisive role. At the same time the increase in its prestige abroad will place it in a better position to fight for the interests of American workers. Sidney Hillman and the C. I. O. have rendered an invaluable service to international democracy.

DEL VAYO

BOOKS and the ARTS

MORGENTHAU'S PLAN FOR GERMANY

BY LEON HENDERSON

GERMANY IS OUR PROBLEM. By Henry Morgenthau, Jr. Harper and Brothers. $2.

MOST people are familiar with the general outlines of the Morgenthau plan for Germany. But I recommend that this book be read from cover to cover, copiously underlined, and kept handy in the magazine rack as background for news stories on the subject, which will serve to illumine the plan's weaknesses and strengths. The German problem will be with us for many moons. Current procedure will be reorganized many times, it is safe to predict, but the Morgenthau plan in toto will never be adopted. It can be, however, a yardstick to measure our "flagging will" to render Germany impotent for war.

Henry Morgenthau would deprive Germany of all heavy industries and by breaking up the Junker estates provide farms for its surplus population. He would evict all Germans from the industrial Ruhr, internationalize it, and partition the rest of the Reich into a northern and a southern state. These states would be under Allied control, operating through a ministry of German civil servants, until satisfactory self-governance is possible. The European economy would be fortified by all useful machinery, raw materials, and labor to be found in Germany, but no continuing reparations in industrial products would be exacted, lest this help Germany to rebuild its war-making potential again. Morgenthau would bring our soldiers home and leave the military occupation to Germany's continental neighbors. Real disarmament would be undertaken immediately by commissions of the United Nations as war allies, and not by the UNO. As war allies, they would exercise complete external control over foreign trade, foreign exchange, foreign assets, and the like, but they would be forbidden to assume any responsibility for internal economic controls except for military purposes.

One of the chief values of the book is to be found in the forceful review of the tragic mistakes made by the Allies after World War I. Without quoting Poincaré's prophetic forebodings or Winston Churchill's expressed fears of the Bolshevist menace, the author recaptures the essence of both for pertinent warning today. His chapters on the dangers of long-continued reparations and on Germany's will to try it again and ability to try it again are convincing. (The War Department has had an elaborate survey of bombing damage made by qualified civilians. Their disturbing report, if it is made public, will amply fortify Mr. Morgenthau's contention that 75 per cent of Germany's industrial potential is intact.) These chapters take on added strength when considered in conjunction with the future of atomic-bomb warfare and with the Kilgore report, "Elimination of German Resources for War."

The case for de-industrialization of Nazi Germany is well made, but the methods proposed leave much to be desired, unless the book is to be an "I-told-you-so" twenty years hence. Mr. Morgenthau, in stating his reasons for writing the book, says that the Potsdam Declaration was an attempt by the three principal Allies to carry out the objectives of his policy. Reserving comment on the Potsdam Declaration and the nullifications and deviations by its administrators and their advisers, this reviewer finds great difficulty in believing that the Big Three saw eye to eye with the ex-Secretary of the Treasury. The difficulty is greater when one reads Part Two of the Morgenthau plan, which is omitted from the book for some reason, though it was the portion which excited the most violent opposition of Henry Stimson. As I understood the basic philosophy of the plan from a reading of it and explanations by the Morgenthau subordinates, all heavy industries were to be removed or destroyed, and the Germans were to be left to shift for themselves in a pastoral state. "Let them stew in their own juice" was the phrase most often used to describe the plan. History may prove this to have been the ablest suggestion, or Henry Morgenthau's plan may win by default later, but that is quite different from finding it within the Potsdam Declaration. (There is a similarity of language between the declaration and the recently published directive of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, 1067, revised, by which American control is exercised.)

No, the Potsdam Declaration does not reflect the Morgenthau philosophy, and the British especially would certainly deny it. Morgenthau wants complete elimination of heavy industries; the declaration speaks of rigid control and restriction, and plainly contemplates not a pastoral state but a modest balance between agriculture and industry. Take steel, for example. The dispute among the Allies is not concerned with the entire destruction of the industry but with how much tonnage should be retained of Germany's 23,000,000-ton capacity. The Russians suggest 3,000,000 tons, the British urge 11,000,000 tons, our own FEA experts suggest 5,000,000 or 6,000,000 tons. In 1932 Germany used 4,000,000 tons of steel for domestic purposes. If Germany were left to govern itself, on Morgenthau lines, even 3,000,000 tons of steel could rebuild a military machine.

Morgenthau as prophet is proving to be accurate. Nearly every dispatch describing the operation of United States controls seems to buttress his forecasts that the American soldier is "too inexperienced in the ways of international banditry to serve as a guard in the German reformatory." Raymond Daniell, the New York Times correspondent, reports from Berlin, "We Talk Tough, but We Act Soft," "Pity for Germans Grows in U. S. Ranks," "Germans to Regain County, City Rule," and "U. S. Experts Urge Reich Export Rise, Russia Suspicious."

Such signs are ominous. Taken together with the failure of the London conference of Foreign Ministers, they may influence us to withdraw from Europe. Taken together with Patton's removal in Bavaria, they may mean what Morgenthau hesitates to say—that it was a mistake to intrust the army with civil administration, and that the State Department's German policy has been weak. It is fair to assume from present indications that President Truman will act soon to eradicate soft tendencies in our German administration, perhaps by replacement with civilians and by a stronger political representative. Certainly a major change is called for. In the circumstances, what workability has the Morgenthau plan?

The first hurdle is to persuade our European Allies, particularly the French and the British, to accept the reduction of Germany to a state primarily of small farms. I spent most of last winter in Europe studying plans for the economic control of Germany. I was compelled to report my disappointment over the lack of determination to dismantle the German industrial state. The reasons were many and mixed, but bulking large was the fact that the Western European countries were far more exhausted and crippled than we, who gained strength through the war effort, can realize. These European countries, faced with desperate problems of national existence, just do not possess the extra energy and resources to reorganize Europe's industrial economy and at the same time handle all the dislocation and chaos which would attend forced agriculturalization of the enemy. They have other ideas, and they are sure the Russians have, too.

De Gaulle and most of the French support the proposal to internationalize the Ruhr, but for the most part the British and the Russians are indifferent. Even the French say it would be impossible to deport all Germans from the Ruhr, or to repopulate the region with other nationalities. Most of the French officials whom I consulted said they would not favor Ruhr internationalization unless the United States promised to maintain troops in Europe for more than twenty years. The memory of Allied resistance to French occupation in the twenties, which eventually led to English support of German rearmament, is still too vivid in France. Again, the four-way partition of Germany and the peculiar alignment of reparations validated at Potsdam set a pattern which is almost an insurmountable barrier to internationalization of the Ruhr. Some of the drive generated by the "heat of battle" has been lost. A different pattern of accord, even a modified Morgenthau plan, might have been set up by the European Advisory Commission if the American agencies had permitted it to try to get agreement on matters requiring joint operations. Even the Russians seemed willing last winter to cooperate with Ambassador Winant on over-all matters, but our difficulties with policy here at home prevented agreement.

The greatest obstacle to acceptance of the Morgenthau plan is doubt whether 5,000,000 workers, displaced by the removal of heavy industries, could be relocated on farms in Germany's reduced territory. The British study of this possibility vigorously denies it. So does FEA Project 23, a careful survey by four American agricultural experts whose opinion I respect. Morgenthau argues the possibility of absorption, but says anyway it is a German, not an Allied, problem. This may mean that he feels that if chaos, dislocation, and unemployment result, these may serve to carry out Roosevelt's idea, as expressed in a letter to Secretary of War Stimson: "It is of utmost importance that every person in Germany should realize that this time Germany is a defeated nation. I do not want them to starve to death, but, as an example, if they need food to keep body and soul beyond what they have, they should be fed three times a day with soup from army soup kitchens. That will keep them perfectly healthy, and they will remember that experience all their lives. The fact that they are a defeated nation, collectively and individually, must be so impressed on them that they will hesitate to start any new war."

Most of us, for mixed reasons, would like to have the lesson of defeat driven home, but we shrink from any personal responsibility. The plan strives valiantly to sidestep the responsibility for consequences but does not quite succeed. Those who must administer the country, unless they are drawn from those who survived Nazi horrors, will be driven to ease tensions, to get things going again. Human nature is the strongest opponent of the plan.

Despite the challenges to the workability of his plan, Henry Morgenthau's book is now the ablest fighting weapon against a soft peace.

NOTES BY THE WAY

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

THE HENRY JAMES REVIVAL may be said to have reached something of a milestone with the publication of a volume of James's short stories selected and edited by Clifton Fadiman (Random House, $3), if only because Mr. Fadiman's imprimatur will bring this book to rest on so many living-room tables, likely and unlikely, throughout the land. It is a circumstance which might have elicited one of James's deeper chuckles—the circumstance, I mean, that the least known of his little-read works should be not only presented to a "vast audience" by one who happens to be master of ceremonies of a popular radio program but presented in the manner, ingratiating but strict, of a good instructor.

The seventeen stories are arranged in a "course," progressing from "the relatively simple to the supremely complex, from the casual to the concentrated, from the merely serious to the grandly tragic," from Four Meetings to The Pupil, The Beast in the Jungle, and The Jolly Corner. And aside from the introduction there is appended to each story a note which "places" it in James's development—and often, I may add, puts the putative reader in his place as well.

I find it an excellent course. The introduction goes straight to the important points. Among other things, Mr. Fadiman formulates "the case against James" and discusses it with coolness and intelligence and with the simplicity which "is on the other side of the complex—not that which never has divined it." He has understood, for instance, James's view of art and its function, not as the embalming process implied in the phrase "art for art's sake" as it is ordinarily used, but as an organizing principle which confers meaning, shape, and immortality on the perishable materials of human experience and character. Mr. Fadiman defends James, but OUTSTANDING NEW NON-FICTION FROM VIKING . . .

FRANKLIN AND HIS BIOGRAPHER COLLABORATE Here, for the first time, is the whole autobiography—in Franklin's own words as he might have completed it himself—with additions from manuscripts now first published or collected. Never have his personal writings been assembled in so valuable and significant a form. $5.00

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN'S AUTOBIOGRAPHICAL WRITINGS

Carl Van Doren, Editor

AN ADVENTURING SCIENTIST LEADS US BACK INTO OUR PAST From rabbits to dinosaurs, this famous scientist has hunted almost everything that ever lived. Now he tells of the exciting search for man's ancestral pedigree. In this popular account, the bones of our prehistoric ancestors reveal their part in the cosmic drama of mankind. Illustrated $3.00

Roy Chapman Andrews

MEET YOUR ANCESTORS

DUAL EXPRESSION OF HARTLEY'S GENIUS

Known to the public as a painter, Hartley was equally gifted as a poet. Here is his best poetry, accompanied by nine reproductions of his paintings. Illustrated. $3.00

SELECTED POEMS

Edited and introduced by Henry W. Wells

POEMS FROM A NEW LITERARY TALENT

His first collected volume of poems published in America is striking evidence of Dr. Comfort's talent—a significant work by the author of The Power House. $1.75

by Alex Comfort

THE SONG OF LAZARUS

THE ROOTS OF JAPANESE FANATICISM

This story of a people in the grip of a sinister religion explains the legend on which Japan's political doctrines are founded. $2.75

by Robert O. Ballou

SHINTO

The Unconquered Enemy

20th Anniversary Year

At all Booksellers THE VIKING PRESS

he manages pretty much to avoid the defensive tone. He does not write down and he does not simplify. As a result, the rich complexity of a great artist stands forth as a value to be plumbed, not as a defect to be overcome. He cannot resist making use, and clever use, of James as a witness to the incorrigibly vicious character of "the German." This is the only gaffe in the book—I call it a gaffe not merely because I disagree with Mr. Fadiman's attitude toward the German question but because so crude a generalization seems utterly out of place among the meticulous differentiations of James. But it is far less telling than the use James makes, so to speak, of Fadiman. For Mr. Fadiman's introduction and his notes, brief as they are, contain an indictment of our contemporary way of life and culture in which texts from James are driven home with such fierce feeling that the arraignment takes on the aspect of a personal testament, even of a mea culpa. I quote several paragraphs, not merely because they illustrate the tone and temper of Mr. Fadiman's comments, but because his polemic seems to me so full of force and pertinence.

> For example [he writes in his introduction], those who care passionately for our English speech find in the precision, the exquisiteness, the close workmanship of James's prose a relief from the careless, uncleanly, and hyperthyroid jargon which currently passes muster for sound writing. James's almost fussy concern for elevated, even noble standards of craftsmanship operates in agreeable contrast to our own fetish of relaxation, our cult of "informality" (a sweet name for mental laziness). Ours is a period in which books are made easy for us to read; in which, if this reading is too hard for us, we are given pictures accompanied by nursery-prose captions; in which if pictures are too difficult we are furnished with comic-strips. Years ago James saw all this coming. Indeed, he described with stunning accuracy the triumph of our most admired journalism when he spoke of "the bastard vernacular of communities disinherited of the felt difference between the speech of the soil and the speech of the newspaper, and capable thereby, accordingly, of taking slang for simplicity, the composite for the quaint, and the vulgar for the natural." To Howells he wrote, "The faculty of attention has utterly vanished from the Anglo-Saxon mind, extinguished at its source by the big, blatant Bayadère of Journalism." Those who find themselves unable to agree that the communication of ideas and feelings must necessarily be on a pre-adolescent level find in the careful complexities of Henry James a welcome challenge.

In the following passage he is writing of The Great Good Place, the story which he considers "most densely charged with contemporary application."

> One good way to feel this story is to read it, as I chance just to have done, after listening to Mozart. The Mozartian note—perfection achieved with essentials—is precisely not the note of our time. We are anti-Mozartian in many ways but primarily in our passion for organizing non-essentials, both material and mental. Dimly conscious that we have lost a few simple things, we cover over our sense of loss by distributing as widely and as ingeniously as possible a million complicated things. . . .
>
> The consequence of what James in this story calls "the modern madness, mere maniacal extension and emotion," is a special form of lunacy known as being "under pressure." The sense of pressure has little to do with overwork or specific worries. Rather is it identical with the whole pattern of our lives, based on "getting somewhere" or "getting something." It comes about because we are engaged in doing something unnatural. We are neglecting, we are denying, man's rational mind.
>
> The Great Good Place is the world of Mozart's music, "all beautiful with omissions." It is not—this is the whole point—a mere refuge, an escape hole. On the contrary, it is "real life"—the life of achievement, success, accumulation, and motion—that is the escape. It is the escape from the mind, the escape from reflection, the escape from a recognition of one's own personality. The Great Good Place is simply ordered reality, stripped truth. Wherever the mind comes into its own, that is the Great Good Place. As the Brother says, "I don't speak of the putting off of one's self; I speak only—if one has a self worth sixpence —of the getting it back."

Mr. Fadiman has "done well" by James's shorter fictions; and he himself is not the least interesting, or the least Jamesian, of the characters to be met with in the pages of this book.

The Voice of Liberal Japan

DILEMMA IN JAPAN. By Andrew Roth. Little, Brown and Company. $2.50.

THE dilemma discussed here is that of the victorious powers in dealing with defeated Japan, a dilemma born of the conflicting policies of the "Japan gang" and the "China gang" in the State Department. Despite the recent reorganization of the department, despite the "hard peace" now being increasingly driven home to the Japanese people by the MacArthur administration, some embarrassing signs of this dilemma have risen to the surface during the first several weeks of the occupation. Thus we find the occupation government still doing business with "the group which proclaim themselves authentic moderates and liberals," as Mr. Roth warns our authorities might do, and getting dangerously close to becoming "the watchdogs of the Old Order and the Old Gang" in Japan. Mr. Roth's uncanny analysis of the situation, written long before the events he forecasts actually happened, reads like a well-documented history except that it is written in the future instead of the past tense. It is a monument to the intelligence of the American experts on Japan. Many so-called experts, including the Old Gang, have written copiously but often with disappointing naivete and superficiality about Japan. In sharp contrast, Mr. Roth writes with rare insight and deep understanding. He deals with the basic cause of Japan's military aggression, its economic, political, and social feudalism, and uncovers the democratic forces within Japan with which we can and must work.

Mr. Roth has rendered an important public service by showing how we may revert to our earlier occupation policy of "appeasement" and, on the other hand, how the democratic forces within Japan can be assisted and encouraged to make "a sweeping democratic transformation and a complete recasting of . . . its entire political and economic system." These forces, Mr. Roth points out, are to be found in four groups: "among small business men who seek to break the crushing hold the Zaibatsu and the burden of

A distinguished American critic presents a giant of American literature

THE SHORT STORIES OF

HENRY JAMES

Edited, with an introduction and notes,
by CLIFTON FADIMAN

➡ The reputation of Henry James grows greater year by year. Interest in his work is reaching, in this decade, the proportions of the Proust cult of the '20's and the Joyce boom of the '30's—and rightfully so. For this American author, born 100 years ago, ranks with the French Proust, the Irish Joyce, and the German Mann as one of the few truly great modern writers.

James wrote about 80 short stories. Here are 17 of his best, carefully selected not only for their literary quality, but as illustrations of the themes that absorbed his creative imagination for over a quarter of a century. 700 pages, 17 stories, with critical notes on each story by Mr. Fadiman. $3.00

How many of these Henry James stories have you read?

FOUR MEETINGS
A BUNDLE OF LETTERS
LOUISA PALLANT
THE LIAR
THE REAL THING
THE PUPIL
BROOKSMITH
THE MIDDLE YEARS
THE ALTAR OF THE DEAD
"EUROPE"
THE GREAT GOOD PLACE
THE TREE OF KNOWLEDGE
THE TONE OF TIME
MRS. MEDWIN
THE BIRTHPLACE
THE BEAST IN THE JUNGLE
THE JOLLY CORNER

At all bookstores
RANDOM HOUSE, NEW YORK
Publishers of the Modern Library

war-time taxation, among professionals opposed to militarism and favoring democracy and the opportunities it provides for full use of their skills, among industrial laborers seeking democracy and the opportunities for improving their living standards, and among peasants interested in throwing off the yoke of a semi-feudal and parasitic landlordism." The four groups form "a core of conscious democrats and genuine anti-militarists," and while they may not agree "on ultimate objectives or on tactics," they will nevertheless rally under one banner because "the task of reforming Japan is sufficient in scope to command the assiduous and cooperative efforts of all democrats and anti-fascists." Mr. Roth describes dramatically the past performances of these "hardy democrats," and gives us assurance that the Japanese people lack neither "forward-looking individuals" for necessary political and economic leadership nor the will for a fundamental and lasting change.

No more accurate record of Japan's "conscious democrats and genuine anti-fascists" has ever appeared in print. Indeed, Mr. Roth has contributed to the democratization of Japan by giving a voice to Japan's hardy democrats. The most amazing fact is that though he is not one of them himself, he has so much and such correct knowledge about them. This reviewer, if he may be forgiven for asserting it, counts himself one of those Japanese "who received their higher education in the twenties, when non-traditional thought was most widespread in the universities"—this was true at the college, Meiji Gakuin, whose president was none other than the Daikichiro Tagawa that Mr. Roth mentions along with Yukio Ozaki in Chapter VII.

Mr. Roth speaks for the long-suffering democratic leaders of Japan the words they have been forbidden to utter in Japan and cannot yet freely speak. And he speaks for them—for us—eloquently and sincerely. Everyone who wishes to know what "Ozaki, Tagawa, and Saito, as well as the lesser-known democrats" in Japan are thinking but are prevented from communicating because of language and other difficulties will find it in Mr. Roth's book, for he has given us the voice of liberal Japan.

TSUYOSHI MATSUMOTO

The life story of a courageous Hindu and her famous family

WITH No REGRETS

Krishna Nehru

"The autobiography of the sister of Jawaharlal Nehru. The author, like her brother, writes with an easy grace, and she has made what she has to say about herself, her family, her upbringing, and her political opinions into a constantly interesting personal narrative that is certainly as important a book as has been published about India this year." —The New Yorker. Illustrated. $2.00

An ASIA PRESS Book

at all bookstores

The JOHN DAY COMPANY

BRIEFER COMMENT

Oklahoma

OLD-TIME EDITORS of small-town papers had a success formula to the effect that you printed the names of every subscriber to your paper at least once a year. Marquis James seems to have applied this to his story of his Oklahoma boyhood, called "The Cherokee Strip" (Viking Press, $3). If he has left out the name of any man, woman, or child who was in or around Enid, Oklahoma, in the years between 1893 and 1911, said Oklahoman has a just complaint. The winner of the Pulitzer prize for his first-rate biography of Andrew Jackson has done an autobiography filled to the brim with small-town characters, about each of whom he has some anecdote, engaging, indifferent, boresome. His father's story about the famous "run" in 1893, when the section of Indian land which is the locale of this book was opened to white settlement, is a good one, and his accounts of some of the ways of the tramp printers who were always blowing in and out of the newspaper shops are faintly amusing. But a few pages of Oscar Ameringer's neglected autobiography, "If You Don't Weaken," are worth all of Mr. James's prolonged memories if you want a good picture of what the Southwest was like before it was conquered by the oil men and their pliant politicians.

MCALISTER COLEMAN

Aldous Huxley's Philosophy

MANY WISE MEN are quoted in Aldous Huxley's new book, "The Perennial Philosophy" (Harper's, $3), to show that the great religious and mystical writers of the East and the West really agreed with each other about the good life and God. One would expect this hidden unanimity to be suspected, like everything else that is too good to be true. But Mr. Huxley is without suspicion. He is not disturbed that these great authors appear to disagree with each other, nor is he perplexed by their own strong impression of disagreement. He has found a sufficient number of resemblances in their writings to persuade himself that there is a Perennial Philosophy, a phrase which he capitalizes and whose common usage to signify Thomism he ignores.

Drawing without bias or hesitation upon texts which are Buddhist, Brahman, Taoist, and Christian in inspiration, Mr. Huxley provides a mixture of quotation and comment upon such subjects as Grace and Free Will; Immortality and Survival; Time and Eternity; and Contemplation, Action, and Social Utility. These and other important matters are dealt with in from ten to twenty pages, and when the brief citation and elucidation are concluded, the reader is confronted with the tacit assumption that there is little more to be said. The significance of this consensus of opinion is neither discussed nor elucidated. What if many writers have said the same thing about many important subjects? Agreement is not proof. It is not illuminating, and it is often deceptive. Even if the doctrine which Mr. Huxley represents is "immemorial and universal," it is the doctrine as such which requires attention, not mere age, repetition, or popularity. The fact is that Mr. Huxley's perennial philosophy is at once brand-new, old-hat, and a hodge-podge in which he has put together whatever he wanted to find in his reading. The reader who knows nothing of religion or mysticism will be deceived by this book, and the reader who has some acquaintance with these difficult matters will merely be irritated.

DELMORE SCHWARTZ

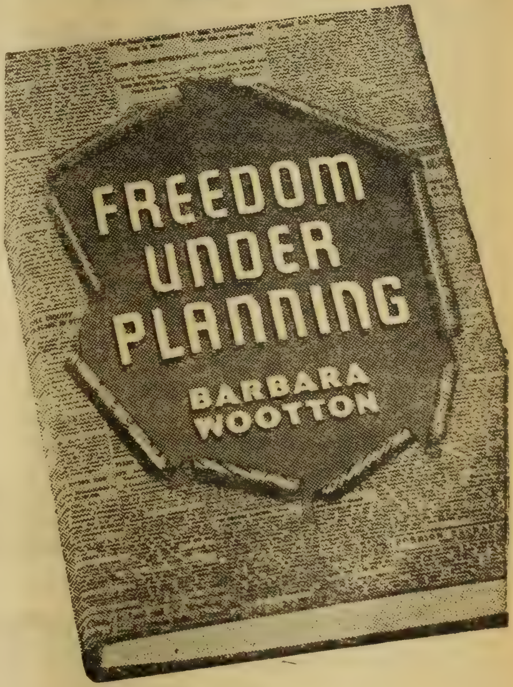
Sovereignty and Peace

NOTHING SHOWS more convincingly the obsessive character of the principle of self-determination than its inclusion in the Atlantic Charter despite its glaring failure as a device for implementing Wilson's Fourteen Points. It was its practical inadequacy which led Dr. Alfred Cobban to a reexamination of the theory. His penetrating analysis in "National Self-Determination" (Oxford, $4.50) may disappoint both the realists and the sentimentalists of political science. Zealots of nationalism will dislike Dr. Cobban's conclusion that "national sovereignty is irreconcilable with any solution of the fundamental problems of the modern world" and leads both to national and international disaster. But his book will find favor among those concerned with the establishment of a fair balance between the big powers and the small nations which are dependent upon them. Rejecting self-determination as an "absolute right," Dr. Cobban arrives at his ultimate conclusion after unbiased examination of three multi-national empires—the British Commonwealth, the United States, and the U. S. S. R.

This conclusion is that regions having a distinct national consciousness must be treated as the basic elements "in the pattern of European society" and that the rights of scattered minorities must be enforced. Any disinterested observer will agree with Dr. Cobban that if self-determination for small nations means suicidal economic nationalism, the less we have of it the better. But since dependence on the great powers is more absolute now than ever before, this statement somehow contradicts Dr. Cobban's view that all nations "have equal rights in economic, cultural, and spiritual well-being." Even admitting that small states enjoying material prosperity are less likely to become bones of contention between great states struggling for domination over them, the assumption of unselfishness in the great states is as unwarranted as the hope of enforcing the rights of scattered minorities. Dr. Cobban himself admits that equal sovereignty of all states might become "a barrier against consolidation of world peace," and even his scholarly book fails to offer a remedy against aggressive nationalism, which has, unfortunately, survived two world wars.

RUSTEM VAMBERY

"Debunks the generalities of Hayek" — MORDECAI EZEKIEL



"SHOULD BE READ by every citizen who is interested in economic progress and democracy."—Mordecai Ezekiel

"PROCEEDS in a manner both informed and judicial to dissect and discuss all of the primary issues of economy, liberty, government, and culture involved in efforts to make and enforce plans designed to escape another disaster such as blasted the world after 1929."—Charles Beard

"THE MOST CANDID and the most conscientiously reasoned job of thinking which has yet appeared on the subject . . . offers a sorely needed corrective to such arguments as Hayek's The Road to Serfdom."—George Soule

"IF I WERE teaching economics again, I would consider it one of the first five books that had to be read . . . The best thing of its kind that has come to my attention recently."—Leon Henderson

2nd PRINTING BEFORE PUBLICATION
$2.00 at your bookstore

THE UNIVERSITY OF NORTH CAROLINA PRESS
Chapel Hill, N. C.

MOTION PICTURES

ALHAMBRA
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
COLISEUM
81st STREET
86th STREET
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
58th STREET
HAMILTON
MARBLE HILL
125th STREET
PELHAM
REGENT
RIVERSIDE
ROYAL
23rd STREET
WESTCHESTER
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCHELLE
WHITE PLAINS
YONKERS

NOW RKO

"A Striking Drama, Bulging with Gusto"
—Walter Winchell

'BACK TO BATAAN'

STARRING JOHN WAYNE
WITH ANTHONY QUINN
Thrilling Story of Native Guerrilla Fights in the Philippines
— AND —
'RADIO STARS ON PARADE'
FRANCES LANGFORD • WALLY BROWN

"A great film . . . I cannot suggest my regard for it without using such words as veneration and love."
—Agee, Nation

LESTER COWAN presents
ERNIE PYLE'S "STORY OF G.I. JOE"
Starring BURGESS MEREDITH as Ernie Pyle
Now playing Popular Prices
Brandt's GLOBE, B'way at 46 St.

"Delightful divertissement." . . .—N. Y. Times
NOEL COWARD'S
naughtiest comedy
"BLITHE SPIRIT"
in Blushing Technicolor
WITH CONSTANCE CUMMINGS REX HARRISON KAY HAMMOND
now at the
WINTER GARDEN
BROADWAY AT 50th STREET

UNITED ARTISTS presents
Constance BENNETT • Gracie FIELDS
"Paris-Underground"
Doors Open at 8:30 A. M.
BROADWAY at 47th STREET
Brandt's GOTHAM

NOTICE OF CHANGE OF ADDRESS

Nation subscribers should give at least three weeks' notice of a change of address, indicating the old as well as the new address.

DANCE—MUSIC

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE—NOW to NOV. 6
S. HUROK presents
Ballet Theatre
THE GREATEST IN RUSSIAN BALLET
SEATS NOW AT BOX OFFICE
FOR ALL PERFORMANCES
Evenings 8:30 (Incl. Sun.), $1.20-$4.80. Mat. Sat. & Sun., $1.20 to $3.60
2,000 SEATS $1 to $1.50 (PLUS TAX) AT ALL PERF.

Monday Eve. Symphonies at 8:30
N.Y. CITY SYMPHONY LEONARD BERNSTEIN
TICKETS at Box Office . . . 90¢ — $1.80, tax included.
NEW YORK CITY CENTER 131 WEST 55th STREET
F. H. LaGUARDIA, President

STAGE PLAYS

MICHAEL TODD Presents
UP IN CENTRAL PARK
Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS Lyrics by DOROTHY FIELDS Music by SIGMUND ROMBERG
BROADWAY THEATRE, Broadway at 53rd Street. Matinees: WED. & SAT.

"DESERVES ITS GREAT SUCCESS!"—Nichols, Times
Rodgers and Hammerstein present
MADY CHRISTIANS • OSCAR HOMOLKA
in JOHN VAN DRUTEN'S
I REMEMBER MAMA
from Kathryn Forbes' "Mama's Bank Account"
with JOHN TETZEL • ADRIENNE GESSNER • RICHARD BISHOP
MUSIC BOX 45th Street, West of Broadway. Phone: Circle 6-4636
Eves. 8:35 Sharp. Mats. Thurs. and Sat. 2:35 Sharp

Notice to Publishers

The CHRISTMAS BOOK NUMBER of The Nation will be dated Dec. 1. Advertisers are already placing space reservations for this annual feature, which will be printed in 48 pages or more. Deadlines: Nov. 16 for space reservations and copy to set; Nov. 21 for final OK's and complete plates.

- BOOKS OF 1945, Margaret Marshall's selective listing, will be published on Dec. 8. Deadlines for this issue are Nov. 27 for space reservations, Nov. 30 for final OK's and plates.
- Publishers' advertising rate, $200 per page. Current circulation is running well above the 42,300 reported in the Spring ABC statement.

THE Nation
20 Vesey Street New York 7, N. Y.

Films

JAMES AGEE

EARLY in "Kiss and Tell" Shirley Temple's screen mother is horrified to find the child stepping up her sales of guest towels to soldiers, at some kind of patriotic ice-cream supper, by throwing in kisses. This is so played that one half expects the injured innocent to squawk suddenly, "But *jee*pers, Mommy, it was only for *mon*ey," and to be snatched-to-bosom and cooed over forgivingly for the quintessence of clean-limbed American nubility she is. But that would have given too quick and conscious a happy ending; the authors have hours more of the same and worse up their sleeves. There is, for instance, a lump of calf love from across the lawn who, when he is not too busy bumping into properties, expresses himself all but exclusively through several thousand exclamations of "ho-ly ca-ow!" not too mercifully varied, now and then, by "don't be a dree-yup!" There is a Horrid Little Brother whose own favorite aria is a withering "persnly I think it's all ve-ry dumb." There is an hour or so during which the audience, pimpishly helped out by the camera, which develops an almost pathological interest in the girl's hind quarters, may tickle itself with the thought that most of the other players think that Shirley—yes, little tiny *Shir*ley—is pregnant and, for a while, even unmarried. There is a plot held together only through the enormous stupidity, cowardice, and mean-heartedness of as ugly a bunch of suburban parents as have never yet got themselves done up brown, in any treatment worthy of them. It is all brilliantly characteristic of the worst anyone could think of American family life, and it is all clearly presented on the assumption that you will find it charming, and sympathetic, and funny, because everyone in it is so exactly like you. I like Shirley Temple, and I rather like this movie, but I can't accept a foot of it, I'm afraid, in quite the spirit it is offered in.

"Blithe Spirit." Noel Coward's smooth color production of his play about the ghostly wife who returns to make mischief with the kind of second marriage generally insisted on in the dangerous words "perfectly happy." The ghost, who faintly suggests a bidet out of repair, is very entertaining. Whenever Margaret Rutherford is on screen, as the medium who starts and tries to control the trouble, the picture is wonderfully funny.

"And Then There Were None." René Clair–Dudley Nichols version of the Agatha Christie round-robin. Might better have been played for fear as much as for taste and laughs. Skilful cast, stretches of pretty Clair adroitness; almost devoid of feeling; a smooth, cold, amusing show.

"Duffy's Tavern." The radio characters and a variety show including everyone in Paramount—except maybe Y. Frank Freeman—who was not overseas, in hiding, or out to lunch. Most of their turns are about as incisive as a Mozart sonata played through a catcher's mitt; but Ed Gardner and Victor Moore are very likable and sometimes quite funny.

"Paris Underground." Constance Bennett production of the Etta Shiber novel about two women who helped innumerable grounded airmen get back to England. Good performance by Bennett except in any attempt to portray actions requiring a heart. Excellent performance by Gracie Fields. Otherwise mainly trash, involving enough handsome young men, in various postures of gallant gratitude, to satisfy Mae West in her prime.

Drama

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

VICTOR HERBERT'S "The Red Mill" is hardly a classic, and reviving it is not exactly a cultural duty. Nevertheless, Miss Paula Stone, daughter of the star comedian in the original production, has brought it from the West Coast for an eight weeks' stay at the Ziegfeld, and I imagine that her motives are simple. Actuary statistics show that the average life span is considerably longer than it used to be, and there are undoubtedly still extant a considerable number of people who, like the present writer, remember "The Red Mill" as among the first musical comedies they ever saw. Youngsters who get taken along to the revival will probably not, as a result, be more inclined to listen with conviction to stories of the good old days, but the nostalgic—if I may use the copywriter's favorite word—will probably have a good time. And for them "The Red Mill" is not a bad choice.

In plot and atmosphere and musical style it is enough like some dozens of other operettas of the same epoch to serve a generalized purpose. Few persons now between the ages of forty-five and eighty can have failed to see in their youth something enough like it to prepare them for a recherche du temps perdu. In fact, most of them may be pardoned if they remain not certain whether they ever actually saw "The Red Mill" or only the same thing under several other names. In the revival some of the dancing is in a manner considerably less simple than anything known on the popular stage of 1906, but otherwise few attempts have been made at that modernization which seldom succeeds in accomplishing anything except the destruction of whatever authentic style the original may have had.

Henry Blossom's standard book, with its scene laid in picturesque Holland and its story of the burgomaster's pretty daughter doomed to marry the bigwig of a neighboring village, is relentlessly followed. Dorothy Stone plays the skirt-tossing ingenue of the period in strictly traditional fashion, and the inevitable chorus of merry village maidens starts the proceedings with the inevitable gleeful song about the holiday which has just been proclaimed. As for the rest of the score, it contains, despite long stretches of eminently forgettable filler, three or four of Herbert's better tunes, still familiar to all who occasionally eat where a string ensemble discourses discreet "dinner music"; and they are really good tunes even though each is in a long-consecrated genre — namely, the comic song "In Old New York," the romantic duet, "Because You're You," and the march song, "Every Day Is Ladies' Day with Me," the last inevitably sung in a dashing uniform and fitted out with a male chorus. If "The Red Mill" is taken as evidence, it will leave the argument concerning the good old days versus the modern still in the state where there is something to be said on both sides. Forty years from now "Oklahoma!" will almost certainly seem a good deal better than the Herbert-Blossom opus does today. On the other hand, I doubt that even the rather better than run-of-the-mill contemporary musical comedies will stand up one bit better.

BOOKS FOUND FREE!
WHAT BOOKS DO YOU WANT?
We quote lowest market prices. No charge for locating Hard-to-Find and Out-of-Print Books. All books, OLD or NEW, mailed POST-FREE.
SEARCHLIGHT BOOK NATION
22 East 17th Street, New York City

The "Ladies' Day" song is very well sung by a newcomer to Broadway named Edward Dew, and a word should be said for Eddie Foy, Jr., who knows the tricks of the low comedian's trade as they are almost never known except by those who began to learn them in infancy. As chief comedian he has very nearly nothing to work with, and he fills the part out with standard steps and gestures and tumbles, every one of which is as old as the hills but most of which still get laughs when they are expertly performed.

Dance

B. H. HAGGIN

WHEN I said there had been occasion to observe that not only composers but choreographers and even dancers can have a facility in the use of their medium which enables them to go through the motions of artistic creation without having what it takes to achieve genuine artistic communication, I was thinking, in the first place, of Todd Bolender's "Comedia Balletica," which the Monte Carlo Ballet Russe has added to its repertory, and in which the given space and time is filled in with movements that convey nothing but the ability to fill a given space and time with movements. And I was thinking, in the second place, of Danielian's performance in the Monte Carlo revival of "L'Après-midi d'un faune." Any pianist with finger facility can make some effect with the cascades of sounds of a Liszt Etude; but it takes a great artist to inflect a Mozart melody. Similarly, a dancer with agility can fling himself around the stage and fill the air with leaps and turns; but it takes what the great dancer has—the inner force that projects itself through his slightest gesture, even his motionless presence—to give effect to the few simple and quiet movements of the Faun. Danielian's agility has covered his lack of that force, which is now glaringly revealed by his ineffectual movements in "L'Après-midi d'un faune"; and the piece has nothing of the power it has had in some past performances.

For the rest the Monte Carlo persists with "Red Poppy" and "Scheherazade," and without all the first-rank dancers it needs for all its first-rank parts—the result being that along with such glories as the classic ballets danced by Danilova and Franklin it continues to offer classic pas de deux badly danced by Krassovaka and Danielian, a "Beau Danube" that gets worse and worse with the new vulgarities that Danielian has added to his old violence, and with Danilova's lack of stamina (to say nothing of the colors of the replaced costumes).

I should mention the secure musical foundations for the dancing provided by Balaban's work with the orchestra; the somewhat shaky ones provided by Boutnikoff.

The Metropolitan's recent "Marriage of Figaro" has been one of the finest productions in its history, and Eleanor Steber's Countess one of the outstanding things in the production. Victor now offers her singing of Porgi amor and Dove sono (11-8850; $1); and I am happy to report that it is as beautiful on the record as in the opera house: the voice is as lovely, the phrasing as musical. What I am unhappy about is the orchestral contexts. And the easiest way to describe what I find wrong with them is to describe what I find right in the ones that Fritz Busch provides in the Glyndebourne recording—their relaxed pace, their refined and sensitive execution, and their integration with the vocal part. Last year I mentioned the bad effect of Leinsdorf's hurried, driving treatment of the opera when he took it over at the Metropolitan in Bruno Walter's absence; now again on the record he takes Dove sono at a pace too fast for its character and effect; and in addition the excellent players do no more than play their notes—with no refinement of tone, or grace, or subtlety of inflection, and above all with no relation to the line of Steber's phrasing. Moreover, the sound of the orchestra is made harsh by the recording.

The rest of Victor's October list is far less distinguished; and only two items call for discussion here. One is an album of music from "Carmen" recorded by Stokowski with the New York City Symphony (Set 1002; $4.50). The excerpts are the Prelude and Entr'actes, the Changing of the Guard, and the Chanson Bohême recorded by Beecham in the Columbia set, with the Smugglers' March, Stokowskian transcriptions of Micaela's aria and the Habanera, and the Minuet and Farandole from the "L'Arlésienne" Suite. The performances document Stokowski's further deterioration as a musician, which one had thought could not go any further: for a long time now he has not played music but played with it; until now the play has been with sonority and pace; now it is with phrasing, and one listens openmouthed to the excessive and perverse inflections and accents that he inflicts on the music. The performances are recorded with spaciousness and distinctness; but the reverberation of the empty hall has bad effects. It is regrettable that the performances have been recorded and issued at all; but it will be even more deplorable if they replace the ones that Stokowski recorded with the Philadelphia Orchestra many years ago.

Then there is the single record (11-8826; $1) with the Polonaise Je suis Titania from "Mignon" and the Hymn to the Sun from "Le Coq d'or," sung by Patricia Munsel. It is almost two years since I heard her sing the Polonaise in a broadcast of "Mignon" from the Metropolitan; and the bright, steady, clear tones that she produced with ease and security on that occasion left me completely unprepared for what came off the record now. If I were Miss Munsel I would, if necessary, have paid Victor back the cost of the record to keep it from being issued; and I would have stopped singing in public until I had found out how not to produce this tremolo-ridden shrieking.

I will discuss Victor's new plastic record next week.

PSYCHOANALYSIS

Alert, Intelligent Readers and Writers should belong to BASIC BOOKS . . . the NEW time and money saving way of keeping posted on current literature on psycholoanalysis, psychosomatic medicine, psychiatry and psychology.

Clip coupon and mail NOW

BASIC BOOKS, Inc.,
New York 21, N. Y.
714 Madison Ave.,

Please send me FREE Basic Bibliography and your literature pertaining to the advantages of becoming a member of BASIC BOOKS. N

Your Name..

*Address..

Letters to the Editors

America's Duty

Dear Sirs: Earl G. Harrison says, and I. F. Stone echoes him approvingly, that, because of anti-Semitism and xenophobia in all places, including America, but Palestine, the Jews have only Palestine as a possible refuge. Will they find neither anti-Semitism nor xenophobia there? It seems to me cowardice and hypocrisy for us to demand that another country be hospitable, yet not to demand it of our own. To justify the appeal made to Britain, our government ought openly to say that we will facilitate immigration, especially of the persecuted and the homeless, as far as our laws allow. And more, every man who pretends to hate Nazism should accord to the Jew in America completely equal rights of residence, of education, of employment.

EDWARD S. ALLEN

Ames, Iowa, October 9

"Fan Her Head!"

Dear Sirs: "We want democracy," said the Red Queen.

"But a revolution starts with a minority," said Alice.

"A revolution is always wrong," said the Red Queen, "until it succeeds and then it—"

"So," said Alice, "that's why the anti-fascists are now asked to keep quiet."

"Certainly," said the Red Queen. "All revolutions are wicked unless they succeed and then they are democratic and the fascists must be permitted to vote."

"But," said Alice—

JOHN BUCHANAN

Berwick, Nova Scotia, October 8

Penny-Mindedness

Dear Sirs: It is humiliating to read the protests of Senator Taft and other reactionaries against President Truman's proposal to wipe the Lend-Lease slate clean, on the ground that we are throwing away our "bargaining position" with Great Britain.

Now that we have delivered a resounding kick in the teeth to Great Britain by terminating Lend-Lease in the most ungenerous and ungracious way possible, are we to follow it up by beating our ally over the head with the bludgeon of a penny-by-penny accounting? We did our best and gave our utmost: so did the British, and for an extra two long years. Isn't that enough?

What do any of our allies have that we want and that we must extract from them by such strong-arm tactics? If we have learned anything from the last few years, it should be that what we most want from our allies is their continued friendship and trust. There are hard years ahead for all of us, and we shall not make them any easier by exercising a strangle-hold on the windpipes of our friends.

Let's stop talking and acting like a bunch of shyster lawyers and shifty-eyed horse traders, and behave like men. We American soldiers who have been stationed in England have tried to act like men, and we like to think that we have gained the friendship and respect of the English people. We don't sneak up behind our friends when they are resting in the pub from a long day in the fields with the knowledge of a very scanty supper ahead of them and sock them behind the ear. Let's have a little less loud talk from Washington about the American way of life and a little better demonstration of it in practice.

SGT. JOHN T. APPPLEBY,
U. S. A. A. F.

The Austrian Maquis

Dear Sirs: "Service Man's" letter about Austria in your October 6 issue seems to me to demonstrate in every line where and why and how AMG is making a hopeless mess of governing the liberated territories of Europe. He, like the vast majority of other Americans in uniform over there, is scarcely acquainted with European history (which is in great part the fault of the American method of schooling), and has no interest in informing himself. He states that he finds "the Austrians more disgusting than the Germans" because—among other things—they "heiled Hitler and continued doing so during the Anschluss." Perhaps the following lines written to me recently by my husband, an officer in the American army, may suggest to "Service Man" that he has a very great deal to learn about the people in whose country he is at present stationed.

But no matter what happens in the future to Austria, my memories of these days will always be tragic ones. So many Austrians died in the cause for which we all fought, and so many of them suffered, and I can still see the agony in their eyes—not from hunger and poverty, which they had experienced too, but agony that they should be treated as enemies. You must understand if I want to stay here for a while longer and do what I can. . . . I am writing a report on the whole Austrian resistance movement in my spare time. Something has got to be done to make the world realize the difference, the difficulties, the undescribable hardships of the Austrian Maquis in comparison with the Maquis in any other country of Europe. The French, may it be said to their everlasting honor, are wonderful about Austria. Only those who have suffered as Austria did have any understanding of what she has been through.

KAY BOYLE

New York, October 4

The A. V. C.

Dear Sirs: Although your articles on the subject of veterans have been generally good, I have never seen a complete article done on the subject of veterans' organizations. Because this subject is of such obvious importance, it seems to me that you are overlooking an opportunity to do complete justice to a new group, the American Veterans' Committee, that stands for the principles and ideals you proclaim.

I am a member of this organization and have been fortunate enough to be present at the founding of three local chapters in Indiana. The task has been no easy one because the older organizations completely dominate the scene.

How completely successful they have been in influencing public officials and even the general public is well illustrated in Highland Park, Ill. There, it seems, the American Legion has almost succeeded in its proposal to make the war memorial for that town an enlargement to the American Legion Post.

We of A. V. C. need the support and cooperation of all liberals. The Nation could do its part in an article setting forth the aims of all the groups and allowing public opinion to judge which was most entitled to support.

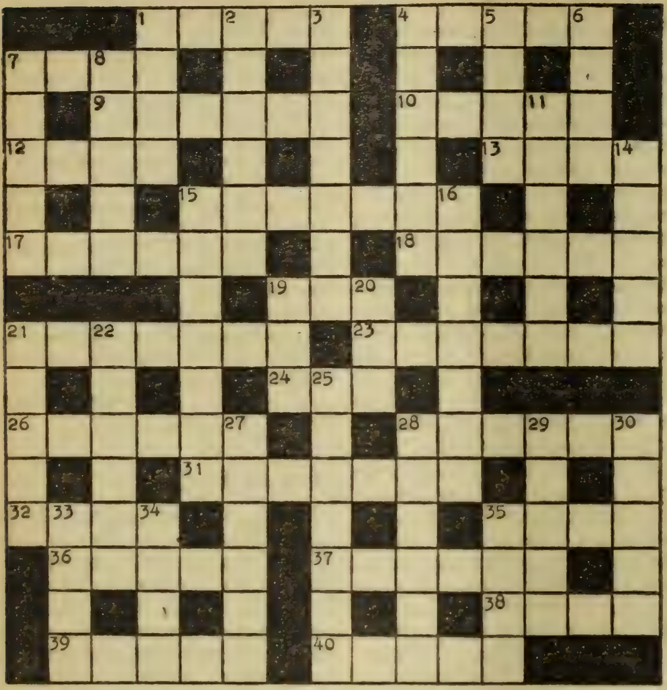
MURRAY SILBERSTEIN

Naval Armory,
Michigan City, Indiana, October 16

[We share the writer's enthusiasm for the A. V. C. His suggestion for a broad review of veterans' organizations is a good one. --EDITORS THE NATION.]

Crossword Puzzle No. 132

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 Come to tea
4 Rowland Hill wondered why he should have all the good times?
7 Expectancy
9 An outside rise
10 A darn job it is to make this
12 "The Garden of England"
13 Putting your foot in it is one way of getting a hearing
15 Moves uneasily
17 "Many a mickle makes a ------" (Scots proverb)
18 Sovereign's due
19 Weapon
21 Null, am I? (anag.)
23 She only paints for the purpose of make-up
24 It's worth 100,000 rupees
26 Shakespeare and Schubert joined in asking who she was 28 The best wool
31 Little lumps
32 It's no longer called a hautboy
35 It was formerly Christiana
36 Evidently still for rent
37 The repetition of a song
38 Feminine name
39 The water is under this vessel
40 Stolen by the Knave of Hearts in "Alice"

DOWN

1 Sure thing
2 A No. 5 iron to the golfer
3 This bird has swallowed a nag! No wonder it's scarlet!
4 Hatred (anag.)
5 Contended
6 Famous Italian bathing beach
7 Theatrical nonsense (slang)
8 Sudden fright for which there's no visible cause
11 Damson (anag.)
14 An old magistrate
15 A French politician in Finland
16 Attacks on the besiegers by the besieged
19 Every one of us
20 It is put to the proof
21 Lariat
22 Ranks next to Shakespeare in English literature
25 I am bent, but still going 'round
27 The South wind
28 An old tradesman
29 Dramatist whose statue will be found at 35 Across 30 Egg-shaped
33 He wins the toss
34 Dash
35 Found in a forest but not in a wood

* * *

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 131

ACROSS:—1 BACKGAMMON; 6 OURS; 10 DULLARD; 11 DIARIST; 12 LIFEBUOY; 13 TRILL; 15 ORGAN; 17 MASEFIELD; 19 BRIC-A-BRAC; 21 ELBOW; 23 SONGS; 24 SPANGLES; 27 INTERNS; 28 ELYSIUM; 29 NOSE; 30 MORTGAGEES.

DOWN:—1 BODY; 2 CALLING; 3 GRAVE; 4 MIDSUMMER; 5 ODDLY; 7 UTILIZE; 8 SETTLE DOWN; 9 TARTUFFE; 14 COMBUSTION; 16 NOAH'S ARK; 18 SACRAMENT; 20 IGNITES; 22 BEEHIVE; 24 SISCO; 25 GAYDA; 26 EMUS.

RESORTS

"Fore" the Golfer
Newly Conditioned Course
A Grand "Pro"
New Clubhouse
. . . await your pleasure.

The Glenmere
28 miles of beautiful private trails. Also — excellent tennis, boating and fishing on our private 7½-mile lake, golf, game rooms, cocktail lounge, dancing, really fine food . . . congenial atmosphere. Open Year 'Round
Only 51 Miles from New York
CHESTER, N. Y. Chester 200 (N. Y.) RE 2-5047

COLONIAL TERRACE HOTEL
Peekskill, New York. Tel. Peekskill 400
Open All Year
Winter Sports — Homey — Friendly — Restful
Informal — Excellent Cuisine — Dietary Laws
Rooms and Suites Available
Special Winter Rates on Request

BREEZEMONT PARK
ARMONK, N.Y.
35 MILES FROM NEW YORK CITY
"A Country Estate in the Scenic Hills of Westchester County"
The nearest of all nearby resorts. Exclusive location. Luxuriously furnished. Dignified. All sport activities. Excellent cuisine
OPEN ALL YEAR Phone Armonk Village 955

Intimate Different Delightful OAKWOOD NEW WINDSOR, NEW YORK
Tel. Newburgh 4477. Only 53 miles from N.Y.C.
REOPENING for THANKSGIVING, NOV. 21st
Enjoy the glories of late Fall and the beauty of Winter 'midst the hospitable surroundings of this charming Colonial Estate. Skating on private lake. Unexcelled cuisine Open fireplaces.

HUDSON VIEW HOTEL
HAVERSTRAW NEW YORK
A 50-minute ride!
"Deservedly Famous for 25 Years"
Fine Food—Scenic Beauty—Steamheated
Private Baths—Sports—Quite Reasonable
Make Holiday Reservations NOW
Dietary Laws Haverstraw 2076

Birdland CENTRAL VALLEY, N. Y.
200-ACRE ESTATE 1,000-FT. ELEVATION
Congenial adult resort. All sports. Clay Tennis Courts. Golf. fine food. Only 45 miles from N. Y. Open all year.
ELECTION DAY SPECIAL: 4 days $30
Highlands Mills 7895 N. Y. C.: WA 5-4671

HATHAWAY LODGE
Formerly the palatial 592 acre Macy estate in the beautiful "Hills of the Sky." Large, luxurious rooms, most of which have open fireplaces and private porches. Tennis, Handball, Swimming Pool. Horseback Riding, also Golf nearby. Marvelous food. Open all year. Attractive rates.
For reservations or further information write or call
HATHAWAY LODGE, Haines Falls, N. Y.
Telephone: Tannersville 299

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 161 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • NOVEMBER 3, 1945 NUMBER 18

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 445

EDITORIALS

Are We Planning War? 447
G. M. Wants a Strike 448
Poulos and Palestine by Freda Kirchwey 449

ARTICLES

Greek Tragedy, 1945 by Constantine Poulos 450
New Deal for France by Oreste Rosenfeld 453
British Labor's Headache by Aylmer Vallance 454
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison 456
The People's Front by Del Vayo 457
Oil Beneath the Waters by Alan Barth 458
America's Homesick Army II by Joseph Freeman 460
It Happened in Portland by Carey McWilliams 462

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall 464
The Atom by Benjamin Harrow 465
Wandering, Waiting, Working by Rolfe Humphries 466
Briefer Comment 468
Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling 472
Art by Clement Greenberg 476
Records by B. H. Haggin 476

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 478

CROSSWORD PUZZLE NO. 133 by Jack Barrett 480

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor J. KING GORDON
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

European Editor: J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates
LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS
CAREY MCWILLIAMS REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 8, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

PRESIDENT TRUMAN HAD A MAGNIFICENT chance on Navy Day to reassert this nation's leadership in world affairs. Less than a mile from where he stood a great battle fleet lay at anchor in the Hudson River. It was fitting that the Commander-in-Chief should pay tribute to the naval might and the courage and skill that so largely contributed to victory. And just because we are strong and because we have no immediate cause to fear an enemy it hardly seemed necessary to shake our armed might in the world's face. The President was in a position, in fact, to declare that the national security of any nation in the future can rest only in a strong international organization. Instead, he repeated with vehement protestations the anachronistic folklore of national security so beloved by the brass hats, who appear to have slept through the bombing of Hiroshima and Nagasaki. Mr. Truman's restatement of American foreign policy was noble but strangely unconvincing. He presented the United States as a cross between Theodore Roosevelt and St. Francis of Assisi. Throughout the twelve-point declaration ran a tone of self-righteousness, a smug superiority to the "lesser breeds without the law." From this attitude it is but a short step back to isolationism—a short step forward to imperialism. Almost as an afterthought the program made obeisance to a United Nations organization. But in view of the whole tenor of the speech, it seems hardly likely that Englishmen, Russians, Greeks, Hungarians, Indonesians—or even Americans—will interpret Point 12 as a realistic commitment to a world organization that will place limits on the sovereign rights of aggression and guarantee the freedom and security of all peoples—including the American people.

*

THE ADEQUATE CONTROL OF ATOMIC ENERGY continues to hold the chief focus of national discussion. The Senate has sensibly passed the McMahon bill and has named its author, Senator Brien McMahon, chairman of an eleven-man committee to investigate the whole field of atomic-power control. The House Military Affairs Committee, it is to be hoped, is meanwhile extracting some of the most noxious venom from the May-Johnson bill. Outside Congress, Albert Einstein, in an interview with Raymond Swing that appeared in the November Atlantic, urged that the atomic bomb be intrusted to a world government with full military powers set up by the United States, Great Britain, and Russia. His hesitation to turn over the bomb now to the United Nations Security Council or share the "secret" with Russia clearly stemmed from a sharp appreciation of the sorry state of international confidence. But Dr. Einstein, alas, evaded the central issue. It is easy to say "world government"; it is hard to dispel the distrust between ourselves and Great Britain and Russia that has bedeviled all recent attempts to reach understanding. Let us assert it again: what is needed without delay is a new Big Three Conference to break the log-jam of international suspicion. It must take place well in advance of the first meeting of the United Nations Assembly, scheduled to be held January 2.

*

A SLY, ARISTOCRATIC, HYPOCHONDRIAC PRINCE, Fumimaro Konoye, has emerged as the joint nominee of Emperor Hirohito and General MacArthur for the very strategic task of revising the Japanese constitution. Sixty years ago another prince wrote the present one as a means of forestalling popular demands for liberty and produced a political strait-jacket which has bound Japan to this day. It is not surprising that Konoye should get the Emperor's nod, for he is the most skilful defender of the ruling oligarchy in present-day Japan. He is an intimate of the Emperor and closely linked with the Zaibatsu and was, when it was more fashionable, friendly to army extremists. He took Japan into the war against China, suppressed anti-fascists, and organized the totalitarian Imperial Rule Assistance Association. He helped to prepare a smoke screen for the attack on Pearl Harbor by persuading our gullible ambassador, Joseph Grew, that General Tojo was really rather a good sort. General MacArthur's indorsement of him at this late date is a warning that, despite some excellent directives from Washington, a strong hangover of our former Grewsome policy still persists.

*

PLAYING POLITICS WITH FUNDS FOR RELIEF is no game for this hour of the world's need. Yet this seems to be the purpose of several amendments proposed in connection with the $550,000,000 appropriation asked for UNRRA. The most moderate is Representative Herter's proposal that no part of the appropriation shall be used in any country unable to certify, among other things, that press representatives "will be granted full liberty to observe and report upon the distribution and utilization of relief and rehabilitation supplies and services." The most extreme—and absurd—is Representative Brown's proposal to forbid the use of American funds in any country that interferes with the freedom of the press or imposes any censorship upon information in time of peace. Either of these amendments would bar UNRRA aid to the Philippines because General MacArthur has imposed press limitations there. Undoubtedly the proposals will get ardent support on the House floor; vocal devotion to press freedom is an easy avenue to publicity. The resultant delay in voting funds may have disastrous effects. The sum requested represents simply the balance of the $1,350,000,000 pledged to the international organization by Congress. It is urgently needed now for the purchase of food and other supplies. With a desperate winter approaching, it would be tragic if a break develops in the pipeline of aid to the liberated peoples of the world.

*

ALTHOUGH "KING" RYAN WAS SUCCESSFUL IN forcing the striking members of his International Longshoremen's Association back to work, his grip on the union, which he has ruled autocratically for so long, has clearly weakened. By skilful use of the "red" issue, reinforced by more direct methods, he achieved a split in the insurgents' ranks, two of whose leaders recanted after being beaten up. But the spirit of revolt against his leadership has not been crushed, as the longshoremen showed when they rejected by a huge majority the new contract he had negotiated. Ryan and the New York Shipping Association then agreed to submit disputed issues to arbitration. This move, however, is likely to be blocked by a court order won by the insurgent group, which restrains Ryan from entering into any agreement with the employers pending formal trial of charges that his conduct of the union has violated its constitution. Consequently, there is renewed hope of a public airing of the murky internal affairs of the I. L. A. Believing that the issues involved in this case are of far more than local interest, The Nation has assigned an experienced investigator to study the situation on New York's waterfront. The first of his reports will be published shortly.

*

THE SETTLEMENT THAT ENDED THE STRIKE IN the motion-picture industry represents a complete victory for, and vindication of, the position taken by the Conference of Studio Unions. The contracts of these unions will be reinstated and all striking members returned to their jobs as of the date the dispute started. Recognition of the Set Decorators' Union follows as a matter of course from its recent certification by the National Labor Relations Board, and a procedure has now been established with the American Federation of Labor for the settlement of so-called jurisdictional disputes in the motion-picture industry. All this represents a decided setback for the International Alliance of Theatrical and Stage Employees (I. A. T. S. E.), whose dictatorial methods started the trouble. Thus The Nation's prediction of ultimate victory, made at the start of the strike, has been fulfilled. Under the honest and courageous leadership of Herbert Sorrell, the 7,000 members of the fourteen unions on strike waged a fight with few parallels in recent labor history. For thirty-three weeks they held out in the face of extreme violence by goons, thugs, and employer-minded police and of mass arrests. To continue a struggle of this kind, not for a matter of wages and hours, but for a principle—the right of men to belong to a union of their own choice—shows an understanding and integrity which the whole labor movement should salute.

*

THE COMMITTEE ON UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES may be abolished as a result of a petition filed in the House by Representative Patterson of California. The committee's request for the scripts of eight liberal radio commentators has made it clear that the new Rankin-dominated body is no less a menace to American civil rights than was its predecessor, the Dies committee. As Raymond Swing has pointed out, the committee's action could have only one motive—a desire to restrict freedom of criticism on the American radio. While the committee may be powerless to censor radio scripts directly, the mere request to see them might intimidate commentators and their sponsors. Similarly, the current inquisition at Hollywood seems to be aimed at preventing producers and players from using the movies as a vehicle for political enlightenment. Nothing can justify its continued existence.

Are We Planning War?

PRESIDENT TRUMAN'S message to Congress on universal military training is an elaborate argument for that curiously outdated guaranty of national security. The proposal, as he discussed it, must be examined on two counts: Does it contribute materially to national defense? What does it portend for the foreign policy of the United States?

1. Will universal military training contribute materially to national defense? Our answer is no. The President said he was concerned with "a long-range program of national military security for the United States." As "one essential part of this program" he offered a post-war military organization containing three elements—a "comparatively small" army, navy, and marine corps, a "greatly strengthened" reserve, and "a general reserve composed of all the male citizens of the United States who have received training." This is a plan designed to win the last war, not the next.

It is not necessary to stress the disingenuous parts of the President's message. He said that trainees "would be no closer to membership in the armed forces than if they had no training," and in the next breath points out that "the emphasis in the training . . . will be on the use of all the instruments and weapons of modern warfare." One wonders what "membership in the armed forces" consists in.

Mr. Truman said: "If attack should come again, there would be no time under conditions of modern war to develop that latent strength [of our untrained citizenry] into the necessary fighting force." He added: "Never again can we count on the luxury of time with which to arm ourselves. In any future war the heart of the United States would be the enemy's first target. Our geographical security is now gone—gone with the advent of the robot bomb, the rocket, aircraft carriers, and the modern air-borne armies."

We believe this to be a correct view of a future war. But if this is true, what security does a "general reserve" provide? What battlefield do "the robot bomb, the rocket, . . . and the modern air-borne armies" offer a "general reserve"? Where is this reserve to fight? What time will it have in which to be mustered, equipped, and transported overseas to cut off at the source the hail of rockets, the stream of air-borne armies?

The President offered a half-answer to these questions when he said: "Modern war is fought by experts—from the atomic scientist in his laboratory to the fighting man with his intricate modern weapons. The day of the Minute Man who sprang to the flintlock hanging on his wall is over. Now it takes many months for men to become skilled in electronics, aeronautics, ballistics, meteorology, and all the other sciences of modern war. If another national emergency should come, there would be no time for this complicated training. Men must be trained in advance."

This is a half-answer that begs the main question of military training. Can a year of such training give men this kind of knowledge? And even assuming this to be possible, can men trained in a year to handle the new tools of war come back in three years or six to prepare to use the weapons developed in the meantime by modern technology?

All these questions must be answered in the negative. And because they cannot be answered affirmatively, the President posed an irrelevant set of alternatives when he said, "We can maintain a large standing army, navy, and air force. Or we can rely upon a comparatively small regular army, navy, and air force, supported by well-trained citizens who in time of emergency could be quickly mobilized."

These are not the alternatives. The alternatives are: we can belatedly build up the sort of military establishment which was useful in the past, or we can plan a military establishment appropriate to the future—a highly trained professional force which is kept up to date through worldwide intelligence on atomic energy and its applications, and on all scientific developments in the fields of electronics, aeronautics, rocket propulsion, and the tactical handling of air-borne armies.

These are not toys which drafted boys can play with for a year and then forget in the hurly-burly of going to college or making a living. If it is true that "only might can assure peace," universal military training is no longer a policy capable of providing the kind of might needed in the atomic age. It is, in fact, the policy most likely to contribute to a decline of the might which is needed. The gravest danger we see in the universal-military-training proposal is that it will engender a sense of false security in this country, and in the Congress which must pass its laws.

2. Mr. Truman's proposal carries serious implications for America's foreign policy, which were not disposed of by his Navy Day address.

We cannot believe that the President's military and foreign-affairs advisers are ignorant of the implications of atomic energy and other developments in the field of technological warfare, even though the President himself has apparently been protected from hearing of these immediate scientific probabilities by the administrators who wish to control their application and keep the public in the dark. We can only assume that the Administration and the high command expect another war within five years and that they believe that war will be fought with Russia.

Only on the basis of this expectation can the insistence upon universal military training be explained. For if there is to be war in five years, it is probable that the Soviet Union will not have been able to produce atomic explosives in significant quantities; the war may not be fought on lines radically dissimilar from the last war, and universal military training may indeed help us win.

We realize that this sounds like sensationalism of the worst sort. We submit that it is simply another way of saying what the unsensational Walter Lippmann said in his column last Thursday:

> During the dangerous and difficult years which lie ahead of us—the years when the world must be pacified in order that there may eventually be peace—our own influence in the world will be directly related to our actual and immediate—not our potential and eventual power. In these dangerous years the paramount question will be whether or not a new combination is to be formed for the purpose of making still another attempt to overthrow the civilized order to which we belong, of which we are a principal defender. It is the task of diplomacy, acting through the United Nations Organization and through our alliances, to deal with such a new combination at the first sign that it is being formed. If we are well armed, diplomacy can do this without resorting to arms. If we are disarmed, our verbal protests will be disregarded, and in the end we shall have to fight.

There could be no clearer exposition of the bankruptcy of twentieth-century nationalistic foreign policy, that two-faced policy which attempts simultaneously and hopelessly to achieve national security through the mutually contradictory methods of unilateral action and international cooperation. On the one hand, the sovereign states ratify the United Nations charter and declare that the reign of international law has at last arrived. On the other hand, the sovereign states act on the assumption that the charter embodies no law, that it is alliances and arms rather than organization that count. They move quickly to occupy the ground from which to defend their sovereignty and national self-interest. This two-faced policy will inevitably degenerate into the single policy of the armaments race, and we shall have war.

For the Congress to pass a universal military training act now would be to foreclose the issue. The issue need not be foreclosed so soon: nothing would be lost and much would be gained by delaying the decision for two years. Therefore we urge the postponing of the vote, while citizens and scientists and Congressmen alike most prayerfully consider the true alternatives: no more wars or one more war, world law or world ruin.

G. M. Wants a Strike

ON NOVEMBER 5 a Labor-Management Conference will begin discussions in Washington of a carefully prepared agenda, devoted solely to the problem of improving industrial relations and minimizing strife.

About the same time the General Motors Corporation is expected to issue its answer to the case put forward by the United Automobile Workers for a 30 per cent rise in hourly wage rates. There is every indication that it will be a flat rejection, and as a result the Washington conference to promote industrial peace may very well be disturbed by the din of a pitched battle between our largest union and our richest and most powerful corporation.

Walter P. Reuther, the union's spokesman, has declared, however, that every possibility of reaching a settlement will be exhausted before a strike is called. To this end negotiations are being continued despite the fact that management representatives are so indifferent that they read newspapers while Reuther and his colleagues present their arguments.

This is only one of many signs that General Motors is not merely ready for a battle but even anxious to provoke one. H. W. Anderson, vice-president of the company and its chief negotiator, has indeed asserted that charges to this effect are absolutely ridiculous. But Ralph Hendershot, financial editor of the New York World-Telegram, whom none will accuse of enmity toward business, wrote on October 24: "Motor management's unofficial position is that if there must be war with labor, now is the time to have it. The public is not only short of cars but is counting on the automobile industry to provide a large portion of the nation's post-war jobs. Consequently it will take a much keener interest in the issues at stake than ordinarily." Mr. Hendershot might have cited an even more potent argument for war now from the corporations' point of view. It is that any losses a strike this year may involve will be offset by a reduction of taxes on excess profits accumulated before V-J Day. In fact, with the excess-profits tax due to lapse, there is a lot to be said from the profits angle for delaying reconversion until 1946.

The belligerent attitude of the General Motors management is also illustrated by a letter sent to its employees, which, although negotiations were still in progress, assumed that a strike was inevitable and warned the struggle would probably be prolonged. Finally, we have to take into consideration a long statement issued to the press by Charles E. Wilson, president of the company, declaring that if prices of cars are not raised, automobile workers will have to swallow a 23 per cent cut in take-home pay. There was only one other alternative, he suggested, and that was an amendment to the Wage-and-Hour law making the legal work-week forty-five hours instead of forty.

This request to Congress to dilute labor standards seems to have impressed a lot of editorial writers by its sheer arrogance. At any rate they failed to see that as a solution for the present wage controversy it is 100 per cent phony unless G. M. and other corporations are prepared to guarantee forty-eight hours' work weekly for the period of their union contracts. If they are, this would leave take-home pay at its war-time level and make current negotiations much easier. If they aren't, the Wilson plan is simply one for getting more labor for less money.

No General Motors spokesmen have yet attempted to refute in detail the U. A. W.'s claim that its wage demands can be met without raising prices. Careful studies by the union's research staff indicate that on the basis of a 50 per cent increase in output over 1941 next year—G. M. is planning a 70 per cent increase—it would be possible to pay higher wages, cut prices, and still leave shareholders bigger profits than they have ever known. There may be something wrong with these calculations, but if so, it is up to the company to demonstrate it. Management can no longer be allowed to take G. M.'s attitude that profits are solely the concern of the management and stockholders, and cannot be discussed with the union.

Prices, wages, and profits are all bound together, and the public cannot judge what prices and wages are fair if denied information about profits. On October 30, before this issue appears, the President is expected to announce a new wage-price policy, and on the basis of recent studies by government economists to give his support to moderate wage increases coupled with the general maintenance of price ceilings. Business will undoubtedly howl, but it better be warned now that the public will not be impressed unless it proves its case with facts and figures. The kind of propaganda General Motors has been pouring forth to pin responsibility for a strike on the workers might have been good enough in the twenties; today the corporation has got to answer the union's case fully or lose out in the court of public opinion.

Poulos and Palestine

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

CONSTANTINE POULOS, author of the remarkable article on Greece in this issue of The Nation, was thrown out of Palestine last week. He was thrown out by Major General B. F. Giles, United States Middle East commander, on the demand of the British authorities. The incident is instructive. It reveals, in microcosm, almost everything that is wrong with British-American foreign policy.

As correspondent for the Overseas News Agency Poulos has written some of the best stories to come out of Eastern Europe. He got into Greece before the first British contingents landed and lived with the guerrillas. Since the liberation of the Balkans he has spent months in Bulgaria; indeed, he sent dispatches out of that country while the newspapers were reporting that it was still barred to American correspondents.* Poulos has made a name for himself in this war for courage, enterprise, and honesty. In addition to these qualities he has one which is rarer among correspondents: he is a man with political understanding. He knows—and explains—what events mean.

And that is why Poulos was thrown out of Palestine.

In an article published in The Nation last December Poulos told the story of Britain's maneuvers to smash the left-resistance movement in Greece. As the first full report to appear in America, it attracted much attention. The article which appears in this issue will, I believe, make an equally deep impression, for Poulos shows, almost a year later, how successful the British effort has been. Greek freedom is crushed; its champions are dispersed; the country is hungry and dangerously demoralized. Rex Leeper, the British ambassador, pursues the same tactics under the Labor government that he introduced under Churchill. America's representatives still obediently follow the Foreign Office line. This is known as continuity in foreign policy.

But one must not become cynical. As Poulos points out, Mr. Leeper and Mr. McVeagh and Mr. Bevin and Mr. Byrnes are firmly insisting on early elections in Greece; free elections; supervised elections; elections with the left forces effectively atomized, the people's movement crushed, and thousands of political prisoners (men who fought on our side) safely stored in jail. This is known as democracy in foreign policy.

Constantine Poulos went to Palestine, and in his first dispatch, published in the New York Post on October 24, he said, "Palestine in October, 1945, is reminiscent of Greece in October, 1944." He described the atmosphere of tension, daily recharged by wild rumors and made-up tales of terrorism in the local reactionary press. And he predicted that soon British intervention would be found necessary, both to "establish law and order" and to "prevent massacres"—as in Greece.

It was after this single dispatch that Poulos's permit to visit Palestine was revoked by the Middle East command.

Before this article is read, an agreement on a common policy for Palestine between Britain and the United States will probably have been announced. Whatever its terms may be, I have little doubt that the United States will offer to share responsibility with Britain for working out and enforcing them. Clearly the British have a right to demand that we do more than give advice on the administration of the Middle East.

But American participation will not automatically insure a more courageous, decent policy. Formally we are jointly responsible for Allied policy in Greece and in Italy; in practice, as Poulos has shown, the policy is British. In Palestine we may merely find ourselves used as a cover for a slightly modified policy of Arab appeasement. This is the role we have cheerfully played in Syria and Lebanon.

America is profoundly committed to support of a Jewish National Home in Palestine. Our policy was first announced by President Wilson in 1919 and has been repeated by every President since then; it was indorsed in a resolution unanimously adopted by Congress in 1922 and embodied in the United States-British convention on Palestine ratified by the Senate in 1925. Never have we receded from this position: Indeed, it was stated with explicit emphasis in both party platforms in 1944 and restated by President Roosevelt last October. America is committed. But today, when the surviving, homeless fragments of Europe's Jewish community are clamoring for admission to Palestine, a curious and new note has crept into official statements in Washington. We are sorry for Europe's Jews, certainly: but it is one thing to care decently for the survivors, to find places of refuge for them, in Palestine if possible, or indeed almost anywhere except in America; it is another to follow a policy which will create difficulties with the Arabs.

The exchange of letters between Ibn Saud and President Roosevelt sounded the new note too clearly to be misinterpreted; even if the President believed that his promise of consultations with the Arabs implied no retreat from his pledged policy, it carried that implication to the Arab leaders and stiffened their resistance. And the reiteration of his words by Secretary Byrnes has had the same effect. Since then they have redoubled their threats and stepped up their demands. They now not only warn us that war will follow any attempt to set up a Jewish state in Palestine, but worse —much worse because much more convincing—they threaten to refuse the oil and refinery agreements now under negotiation with American firms. And in this threat one can discern a reason both for the new willingness of the United States to share with Britain the control of policy in the Middle East and the new note of compromise which has crept into our pronouncements on Palestine.

Next week we shall know better whether these ugly suspicions are justified: but meanwhile it is significant that a correspondent of the caliber of Constantine Poulos has been expelled from Palestine by joint action of the British and American commands. Significant, and extremely stupid. For it offers convincing proof that the situation in that unhappy fragment of western Asia will not bear the scrutiny of a man who knows how to look behind the press releases.

---

* His article, Bulgaria from the Inside, appeared in The Nation for June 23.

Greek Tragedy, 1945

BY CONSTANTINE POULOS

Athens, October 13

IT IS very depressing to revisit Greece one year after its liberation. The tragedy is deep and overpowering.

Greece today is a country to which the fascist ministers and financial backers of Dictator John Metaxas can return in safety and resume their brutal exploitation of the Greek people; it is a country where the people are so hungry that last month when the liner Gripsholm brought these fascists back from the United States, where they had been living in luxury, men in little boats fought viciously over the garbage dumped by the ship in the harbor of Piraeus.

There is gaiety in Greece. Americans will probably see that gaiety soon in a March of Time film. They will see a luxurious night club with smartly dressed women and handsomely groomed men dining and dancing expensively.

Outside the night club, on the night early in October when the March of Time unit was photographing the palace, a taxi driver was waiting for a party. "Sure," he said bitterly, "I served two years in jail in the thirties. I stole. I am going to steal again. The four people I am driving around tonight will spend in one hour in there three times what I make in one month. I have a family."

Unskilled laborers, like the taxi driver, are making 75 cents a day. Skilled and white-collar workers get between $1.25 and $2 a day. Food prices went up 123 per cent from August 15 to October 10. A loaf of bread costs 50 cents, olive oil $1.40 a quart, meat 70 cents a pound, and sugar $2 a pound.

Today Greece is experiencing one of the most serious crime waves in its history; and the same small group of Greek financiers and industrialists which made huge profits under the Germans is making even bigger profits now. With no Stock Exchange to speak of, the economy of the country is tightly controlled by this handful of men, for most Greek businesses, large and small, have always operated on credit obtained from the National Bank of Greece. Although 51 per cent of the stock of the bank is held by the government and public institutions, the actual control of the bank's operations is in the hands of a few closely intermarried families and two large British banking houses, which hold the remainder.

Such highly concentrated control of business and finance in a country the size of Greece enables these circles to manipulate the country's economy to their own benefit. Recently, when price ceilings which were unsatisfactory to the industrialists and financiers were strictly enforced, this group of profiteers was able to sabotage them and finally force their revocation by skilfully organizing the withholding of commodities from the market.

Determined to profit regardless of what happens to the Greek people, this same group, with the connivance of the government, is using UNRRA supplies to fatten its pocketbooks. A plan for the strict control and audit of raw-wool and cotton stocks brought to Greece by UNRRA and turned over to the Greek government has been blocked by these people, and much of the finished product appears on the black market at exorbitant prices. The big mill-owners are claiming a 20 per cent shrinkage on UNRRA's raw stocks which they are given to process. Six experts who resigned from the Ministry of Supply this month, charging graft, favoritism, and misuse of UNRRA's supplies, say that only a 7 per cent shrinkage is possible, and that the remaining 13 per cent is diverted for sale on the black market.

A big killing is also being made on the heavy remittances from Americans in the United States to their relatives and friends in Greece. The Greeks on the receiving end are paid off by the banks at the official exchange rate of 500 drachmas to the dollar. But the dollar is actually worth 1,500 drachmas.

The corrupt, deliberately inefficient Greek authorities—the same ones who worked for the dictatorship, the Germans, and the quisling governments—are not only collaborating in thus mulcting the Greek people and driving them to crime and desperation, but are also maintaining a back-breaking budget which completely ignores the needs of a sick, homeless, hungry nation. One-third of the Greek budget goes toward meeting ancient and modern state loans held by British banking firms. Well over another third goes for military expenditures, including the purchase of Lend-Lease equipment from the British. (Raw wool from UNRRA's stocks was recently turned over to the Greek army by the government in direct violation of its agreement with UNRRA.) What is left goes to maintain the archaic, stifling Greek bureaucracy.

So, one year after the Germans withdrew from Greece, the Greek people are still hungry, still without clothes, and hundreds of thousands of them are still without shelter. And the thread of British responsibility runs through it all.

WHAT THE BRITISH HAVE DONE

The British have set up three governments in Greece since last January, and all three have fallen. Today, as this is being written, Greece has no government. But the pretense continues. The Archbishop is in the Regency, the British ambassador is in his embassy, and all's well with the Greeks.

Only it isn't. The British are still intent on destroying the leftist socialist movement in Greece. The revelation that the British had selected George Papandreou to be Greek Prime Minister for just that single reason, which was first made in the article called Rule Britannia in The Nation of December 2, 1944, has been confirmed by Papandreou himself in a published collection of his documents. Early in 1944, Papandreou reports, he sent to the British authorities in Cairo a long memorandum of which the burden was, Who will save the Greek people from the E. A. M.? Of course, Papandreou himself gave the answer—Papandreou backed by Allied force. Soon afterward he received the following cable:

"Cairo invites Papandreou leave immediately." He did.

British censorship in Cairo and Greece prevented the story of the hysterical British efforts to wipe out the E. A. M. from being published. Correspondents were not permitted to report on agreements signed between British intelligence agents in Greece and quisling groups.

The story of the guns which the British rushed to the royalist-fascist organization "X" three weeks before Athens was liberated—and of how the quisling government ordered its own troops to guard the transaction so that any attempt by the E. A. M. to hi-jack them would be frustrated—did not get out in time.

The story of the iniquitous "Mr." Shepherd, who under UNRRA's benevolent cover lavishly financed the anti-E. A. M. campaign of the royalist-rightist groups almost to the day that trouble broke out, was stopped on the ground of military security.

The fact that Colonel M. Woodhouse, British chief of Allied intelligence in Greece during the last years of occupation (under the pseudonym "Colonel Kris"), used to head a fascist student movement at Oxford was not made public.

There is still a censorship in Greece. It is the well-known "hidden censorship." Two copies of all dispatches must be submitted at the telegraph office. Efforts to trace the second copies have been fruitless. The trail leads only as far as the director of the telegraph office, who admits there is censorship but doesn't know who exercises it. Inasmuch as the "stringers" who do most of the reporting out of Greece now for American and British newspapers and agencies are Greeks, they cannot report as fearlessly as they would like.

No indictment of British policy in Greece can be severe enough. The Greeks have a favorite way of demonstrating how far the British attitude toward Greece has gone. They take visitors to Piraeus and point to a sign which says "Latrines: British, this way—Sikhs and Greeks, that way." All the sweetness-and-light stuff which the British Ministry of Information puts out through its propaganda agency in Greece, the Anglo-Greek Information Service, cannot alter the bitterness which the majority of the Greek people feel toward the British. Not long ago this organization, without the knowledge of UNRRA, asked the Greek government for 150 tons of newsprint from UNRRA's stocks. When it was turned over to them, still without UNRRA knowing anything about it, they passed it out to "friendly" anti-E. A. M. newspapers. Aside from the political implications of such chicanery, the move upset UNRRA's plan for the equitable distribution of newsprint to Greek papers regardless of their politics.

British policy remains unchanged, and the British ambassador, Rex Leeper, who could well write, if he had the time, a "My Day" column describing the continuous stream of Greek officials who call at the British embassy to get his approval on every move they make, doesn't give up. Every indication that the left movement is still alive and strong, like the fourth-anniversary demonstration of the E. A. M. on September 27, when 100,000 people jammed the Athens Stadium and the streets around it, makes him work all the harder to circumvent it.

All during his hectic efforts to force the elections through as quickly as possible, he ignored the left. He talked to men who head parties made up only of their close relatives, and he talked to men who collaborated with the Germans, but he didn't talk to a single member of the resistance movement, and he didn't see any Socialist or Communist leaders.

Failing in his attempts to form an anti-E. A. M. bloc, the British Ambassador gave the Prime Minister, Admiral Petros Voulgaris, permission to announce that elections would be held on January 20. Every party, from the Liberals to the Communists, denounced the move and declared its intention to abstain from the elections, since conditions throughout Greece precluded any possibility of an honest vote. Only the Monarchists and the quislings applauded the Prime Minister's announcement. With such an overwhelming majority of the people opposing it, the government had to resign.

But the merry-go-round still went on to the British ambassador's tune. The aged leader of the Liberals, Themistocles Sophoulis, was called on by the Regent to form a government—with the proviso that he include the Monarchists. Sophoulis was willing to include the Monarchists, but they, carefully coached by the British ambassador, were adamant in their refusal to join a representative government which might include any leftists, even Socialists, and whose first decision would be to postpone the elections until spring. The former Prime Minister, Emmanuel Tsouderos, was next asked by the Regent to try to form a government, with the same condition. He ran into the same impasse.

Of course the result was a deadlock, but now no one could say that the British hadn't tried to make these quarrelsome "primitive" Greeks get together. The next step, too, the British ambassador had foreseen—the falling back on Admiral Voulgaris or someone like him, who would set up a "service government" of royalist-militarists.

THE WHITE TERROR FLOURISHES

The Voulgaris government gave a good illustration of how a service government, officiating under special dispensation of the British, works. It ignored the suffering of the people and by its inefficiency and graft nullified the excellent intentions and efforts of UNRRA's Greek Mission to bring some succor to the country. It replaced the democratic-republican officers in the army and navy and officials in the government with royalist flunkeys. It encouraged fascist terror gangs and viciously persecuted the left.

On Wednesday, October 3, 1945, in an Athens criminal court, a member of the Greek resistance movement was placed on trial for his life, charged with having killed during the German occupation an officer of the Nazi-created Security Battalion. The indictment, as read in the court, charged that "on an unspecified day during the last fortnight of September, 1944, the accused, Athanasios Hadjiyiannis, deliberately and with premeditation, killed one Basilios Papamargaritis, an officer of the Security Battalion . . . guarding a munitions ship in the harbor of Piraeus. This criminal effort was not without losses to the attackers, as the Germans seized two of them and executed them on the spot. The accused, though shot through the left arm, escaped by jumping overboard." (He was arrested later when he went to the Greek police station to claim the bodies of his two fallen comrades.) The indictment further charged the accused with "carrying arms illegally and without permission from the authorities." The authorities at that time were the quislings acting under German orders.

Three weeks ago UNRRA stepped in and instructed the Greek government to issue free food from UNRRA's stocks to political prisoners. Up to that time the prisoners had lived on what little food was brought in by the families of some of the men, which was pooled and divided. E. A. M. claims there are more than thirty thousand men and women in the prisons. The American embassy says there are only a little more than five thousand. Other competent observers who have visited the prisons place the figure at sixteen to twenty thousand.

Leftist newspapers cannot circulate openly in the provinces; in Athens the royalist newspapers which appeared all through the German occupation and quietly faded out of existence when Greece was liberated are again publishing their anti-democratic, anti-Semitic venom. A pamphlet is being circulated in Athens describing the daring activities of the Greek actors, actresses, and playwrights in the resistance struggle. It does not mention any names. To do so would be to invite persecution.

On March 25 last, Greek Independence Day, the E. A. M. newspaper in Athens told the story of the two university students who gave the first signal of Greek resistance by tearing down the swastika flag from the Acropolis on May 21, 1941, less than a month after the Germans had entered Athens. The newspaper gave their names. It was a mistake. The "X-ites" searched them out and beat them up unmercifully. Every day, throughout Greece, Liberal Republicans, Socialists, and Communists are beaten, jailed, and murdered.

In a statement to the Minister of the Interior the prefect of Attica reported on October 1 that a steady flow of refugees from the rural areas into Athens was stepping up the population of the capital to one-fifth of the nation's total. The comparative safety of Athens to which these people are fleeing is ephemeral. There are tens of thousands of outstanding warrants for the arrest of members of the resistance movement, either on trumped-up charges or on the basis of some action taken during the resistance period, such as that of the young E. L. A. S. man who killed a collaborationist while trying to blow up a German munitions ship.

That is Greece today—one year after the Germans left it.

AMERICA BACKS BRITAIN

The Americans? Oh yes, in the face of these conditions they join the British in working for immediate elections. When they are not doing that, the staff of the United States embassy is busy explaining to everyone who will listen that the American correspondents, George Weller, Richard Mowrer, M. W. Fodor, Leland Stowe, et al., who reported last December's tragic events, are all Communists. In addition, the American embassy in Athens distributes anti-E. A. M. literature to visiting Americans. ("This booklet just happened to come in today. Take it along with you if you want it. It's very interesting.")

The American ambassador is a nice man. He is no longer even mildly critical of British policy; he seems to be more concerned over whether or not the American soldiers on rest leave in Greece wear neckties.

Two days after the armistice between the British and the E. L. A. S. was signed last January, British headquarters in Greece issued to British officials a confidential review of the struggle. "E. A. M. and E. L. A. S.," it read, "have suffered a military defeat just when both their military strength and their political ascendancy were at their height." Exactly. What Mr. Churchill, Ambassador Leeper, and Marshal Sir Henry Maitland Wilson—significant in view of his recent statements to the Baltimore Sun—were unable to accomplish in three years of trickery and treachery General Scobie's tanks, rocket-firing airplanes, bombers, field pieces, and destroyers were able to accomplish in six weeks.

A year ago, after a ten-year struggle, the Greek people had cleansed their country of fascism. The British brought it back.

The resistance movement, which gave the Greek people, stunned by sudden occupation and weakened by deliberate starvation, a new spirit, is today defamed and ostracized. The men who helped the Greek people regain their self-respect and restrain the immorality, meanness, and servility into which their horrible sufferings were pushing them are now "criminals and outlaws."

The left movement in Greece is still large and well organized. The E. L. D. (Union for Popular Democracy) and the S. K. E. (Socialist Party of Greece) have withdrawn from the E. A. M. and will soon combine in one Socialist Party under the leadership of Professor Alexander Svolos. Though they no longer maintain organic unity with the Communist Party, there is an ideological understanding and solidarity. The Socialists have steadfastly reiterated their decision not to participate in any government in which the Communists are not represented. The Communists are now the only real party in the E. A. M. But the E. A. M., despite faulty Communist leadership, still represents a revolutionary promise to many Greeks and has a large following. To the Greeks, who like to deify, the E. A. M. has taken on an almost mystic form. Indeed, the E. A. M. was a power far greater than the Communists realized. That is one reason why they misled it with appeasement, compromise, and vacillation. The Communists never understood how much the E. A. M. meant to the Greek people. The revolt which the E. A. M.'s resistance struggle and attendant self-government in the liberated areas kindled in the hearts and minds of the Greek masses was too great, too overwhelming to be canalized down a narrow party line.

Now the left is divided. Its buoyancy, its militancy have been bludgeoned down. It may rise again, but it will not be the broad, powerful, popular mass movement that it was.

The workers and peasants, the class which made up the bulk of Greek emigration to the United States in the early part of this century, wanted to stay in Greece last year. "We will make Greece a good place to live in," they said.

This year it is different. The men and women who a year ago were turning coffee houses into schools and community centers are now holed up in their homes. The young men who a year ago were voluntarily repairing roads and rebuilding demolished bridges now stand sullenly on street corners. Today one hears peasants and workers saying, "We must get away. Anywhere. There is no hope in this accursed land. This is not life. It is a terrible thing to say, but we hate our country. They have made us hate it."

New Deal for France

BY ORESTE ROSENFELD

(Editor-in-chief of Le Populaire, organ of the Socialist Party of France.)

Paris, October 25 (by cable)

ON SUNDAY, October 21, a referendum and a general election were held in France. In the referendum, upon which the Radical Socialist Party had insisted, the French people, by an overwhelming vote of 18,000,000 to 700,000, indicated their desire for a new parliamentary structure to replace the old two-chamber system imposed by the constitution of 1875. And by more than 12,000,000 to 6,000,000 votes they adopted the Socialist Party's proposal for an executive-legislative setup, much like Britain's, which will prevent Cabinets from toppling every few months over some minor incident provoked by a few ambitious politicians. The Assembly will elect the Premier, and a government can be overthrown only by a record vote forty-eight hours after a motion of censure. The Assembly will sit for not more than seven months; at the end of that time it is to submit a new constitution to the French people for their approval.

The results of the referendum were a foregone conclusion, but the general election brought sharp surprises. Of course everyone expected the defeat of the Radical Socialist Party, which had shot its bolt even before the First World War. The chief party of the Third Republic and generally regarded as the party of the liberal French bourgeoisie, it had produced some remarkable leaders: Waldeck-Rousseau, Jules Ferry, Cambon, Clemenceau, Joseph Caillaux are names which the world recognizes. In the period between the two wars, however, under the leadership of such men as Edouard Herriot, Edouard Daladier, and Albert Sarraut, the party was increasingly unable to adapt itself to the new conditions created by monopoly capitalism. Pacifist, slightly chauvinist, mildly liberal, deeply divided on domestic and foreign policy, at times allied with the rightists, at times supporting the Socialists, the Radicals in 1936 had to yield first place to the Socialists. In the end the party was fatally compromised by Daladier's action at Munich and Chautemps's acceptance of the Pétain coup d'état. After the liberation it had no role to play in a France seeking a new economic structure. Nevertheless, local conditions and the personal prestige of some of its candidates enabled it to obtain a considerable number of seats in the municipal elections last May and in the cantonal elections in September. It was expected to show a loss of strength in the general election, but scarcely to experience total eclipse. Yet that is precisely what happened; with only 25 to 30 seats in a chamber of 585 deputies, the last remaining support of liberal capitalism disappears from the French political scene. M. Herriot himself was elected by only a scant plurality in Lyon, and all the other party leaders, including Daladier, were beaten.

Another surprise was the tremendous victory of the Mouvement Républicain Populaire, headed by Georges Bidault, Minister of Foreign Affairs, and Maurice Schumann, known as a speaker for Radio France in London from 1940 to 1944. General de Gaulle has evinced sympathy for the M. R. P.; it is a Catholic party but has a liberal social outlook, a party standing for order but born of the resistance. Some success for it was expected, but no one thought it would emerge on an equal footing with the Socialists and Communists. On reflection, however, one finds its victory understandable. In the first place, its leaders won wide respect as members of the resistance during the German occupation. Secondly, as a new party it bears no blame for the shameful events of 1940. Thirdly, as a Catholic party it does not frighten practicing Catholics by indifference to religious questions. And finally, it has a very advanced social program, which satisfies the workers organized in the Confédération des Travailleurs Chrétiens. Thus it was bound to get the votes of a large section of the workers and of the lower middle classes. In addition, the complete collapse of the rightist parties threw to the M. R. P. the votes of those adversaries of socialism who saw in the new party a moderate force capable of checking the sweeping economic reforms demanded by the Socialists and Communists.

The Socialist Party did not do as well as it had hoped. True, it received 750,000 more votes than in the cantonal elections of September 22, but the Communist vote rose as well, and the two parties now find themselves on a par, each with about 150 or 155 seats. The Socialists registered sharp gains in the industrial regions—Paris, the north, and the Pas de Calais—but did not cut into the Communist vote there. The total Socialist vote was more than four and a half million, that of the Communists practically the same. At present, therefore, the workers are divided into two parties of equal strength. It had been expected that the consistent pro-Russian attitude of the Communists and their frequent volte-faces would prevent them from obtaining so great a success.

For the first time in the country's history Parliament will not be made up of a wide variety of party and non-party representatives, with personalities outweighing programs and principles. In the new Constituent Assembly 84 per cent of the deputies will be grouped in three equally matched parties. This insures greater stability to a Cabinet and greater continuity in government policies, but it also creates a new complication. The government of tomorrow must be a three-party coalition. A government composed of representatives of only two of the parties—say, Socialist-Communist, or Socialist-M. R. P., or M. R P.-Communist—could not survive. A two-party coalition would control a bare majority. But is a three-party agreement possible? The social and economic program of the M. R. P. accepts the minimum reforms advocated by the Socialists. The Communists accept them too, though in the campaign they avoided any discussion of social changes. But on the religious question the M. R. P. comes into conflict with the French Communists; it was attacked by them very violently, and often unjustly, during the campaign as the party of reaction. And it is distrusted by the Socialists because of its stand on private religious schools. The Socialist Party respects liberty of conscience and religion but insists on a state monopoly of education and on strictly secular education in the primary and secondary schools. As for a Communist-Socialist entente, the Communists conducted such a bitter campaign against the Socialist Party, and particularly against Léon Blum, that relations between the two parties are now very strained.

These obstacles, however, are not insurmountable. The three parties will be absolutely obliged to reach an understanding—otherwise, no government is possible. The country has already waited a year; any further delay in putting into effect the first measures of socialization and in organizing national life on a new basis will only increase France's difficulties. Fortunately, during the underground struggle against Vichy and the Germans the three parties, working together in the Comité National de la Résistance, agreed on a common program of reforms, formulated by the Socialists and adopted on their initiative. This program should be the program of the new three-party government. The Constituent Assembly will meet on November 6. The representatives of the three parties must reach agreement before that date. The election quarrels are in the past—only the future matters.

British Labor's Headache

BY AYLMER VALLANCE

(The Nation's London correspondent)

London, October 22

LABOR Ministers, one suspects, must now and then take a glance at the back benches and echo the Duke of Wellington's comment on his troops in Spain: "I don't know what they will do to the enemy, but, by God, they frighten me." Since Parliament reassembled, it has been evident that the Cabinet has less to fear from its opponents than from its supporters. With Mr. Churchill absent, sick, the Opposition has cut a poor figure. Debating the bill to give the government blanket powers to continue for five years such of the war-time controls as are necessary for orderly reconversion and price stability, the Tories did not dare to admit publicly that they wanted a profiteers' free-for-all scramble. So they had to argue, very ineffectively, that two years of controls—their counter-proposal—would be in the spirit of true British liberty, whereas five years spelled red tyranny. Again, when they proposed a motion of "grave apprehension" at the state of housing, their guns were silenced in advance by a devastating White Paper, issued on the eve of the debate, showing that Tory Ministers in the Coalition and Caretaker governments had made a sorry mess of the program for temporary, prefabricated houses. Instead of the 500,000 emergency dwellings whose production—with the speed of a "military operation"—Mr. Churchill talked of eighteen months ago, only 4,152 have so far been erected, with another 6,055 "begun"; and costs, miscalculated by the Tory architects of the program, have rocketed from the $2,400 originally estimated for a Portal house to over $4,000 for an average "pre-fab" dwelling. The Opposition's record and present performances are such as to give the government little concern: its headache comes from the back benches.

It is not yet a serious headache. There is no real rebellion—none at least which Ministers cannot out-maneuver by the familiar tactics of a few minor concessions and much masterly inactivity. But the party's rank and file in the House are displaying definite signs of uneasiness and impatience. These relate not only, or mainly, to the government's stiff, parochial foreign policy. True, most Labor M. P.'s are disquieted by the growing realization that Mr. Bevin's success in bawling out Mr. Molotov may prove to have been purchased at the price of partitioning the world into antagonistic spheres—with Britain sandwiched uncomfortably between two gigantic continental powers. Many, too, are alarmed by signs that the Foreign Secretary's brave stand for democracy and the rights of small nations has been interpreted by Catholics here and on the Continent as an all-clear signal for an anti-Communist crusade. But Socialists in Britain have traditionally been British, not international, Socialists; the British Communist Party is not loved; and on the issue of our relations with the U. S. S. R. the Labor Party is split from head to heel.

It is split, too, on the question of Palestine. The Cabinet cannot delay much longer in announcing its decision—which will be, unless there is a last-minute change of heart, that the White Paper substantially stands, with the minor modification that a monthly quota of 1,500 Jewish immigrants will be allowed in 1946. The majority of Labor M. P.'s will be inclined to protest that this is a breach of declared party policy, and that the government will be cynically sacrificing the Jews for the sake of angling for the unreliable help of the Arab League against domination of the Middle East by the U. S. S. R. or Standard Oil. On the other hand, the left in Britain by no means indorses the 100 per cent Zionist case; and though Mr. Attlee may have difficulty in justifying a refusal to admit forthwith to Palestine a much bigger proportion of the unhappy Jewish refugees now penned in occupation camps, he will plead with some force that Britain alone cannot reconcile the irreconcilable in Palestine, that American cooperation is essential. In short, there is enough nationalism in the parliamentary Labor Party to enable the government to get away with a foreign policy not noticeably less imperialist than Mr. Churchill's.

It is in relation to home affairs—and it is about these that M. P.'s get letters from their constituents—that the first, faint rumblings of back-bench rebellion can be heard. When the government announced last week its inability to improve this winter the hard lot of old-age pensioners now drawing a basic $2.50 a week, a hostile resolution calling for an immediate 75 per cent increase was offered, with the supporting signatures of 170 Labor M. P.'s. The signatories complained, not without good grounds, that the Cabinet had yielded weakly to obstruction by the Ministry of Pensions' permanent officials, whose argument was that the consequent revision of over two million supplementary, means-tested pensions would be too big a job for the department's war-depleted staff. It is all very well, say the rebels, to be "sensible"; but what is happening to the promised "boldness and decisiveness"?

They get a dusty answer. The Cabinet is unwieldy in size, and its agenda is congested. In the absence of expeditious Cabinet decisions—which might be more promptly forthcoming and better thought out if a small inner Cabinet were free to concentrate on a few major issues of over-all policy—departmental Ministers are doing their best, and it is in many cases a good best, but they are often getting in each other's way. While the Board of Trade, for instance, is out to maximize production and exports, the Ministry of Labor, pestered by the service departments for more man-power, is still calling up irreplaceable skilled workers in key sections of industry. Worse still, the Cabinet seems blind to the fact that in many cases the longer it takes to announce the general lines of future policy the more difficult it will be to impose a Socialist solution.

For example, is the Cabinet determined to have an all-in, salaried state medical service? It has not said so with any precision; hence as doctors are released by the services and perforce buy their way into practices, the vested medical interest against socialization is reinforced. Are the railways, reprieved from nationalization during this—and the next?—session, to be allowed, with the liquidation of the War Transport Department, to embark on their own individual post-war programs, including renewal of their old wasteful fight with road transport? They will do so, and make the transition to public control much more difficult, unless the government quickly decides and announces precisely what forms of transport are to be nationalized, and when, and declares its intention to continue, ad interim, the whole mechanism of war-time transport control.

Above all, there is the continued absence of any announcement by the Cabinet of an over-all wage policy. Is it desired to "freeze" for the time being all the existing basic rates? Or should war bonuses and overtime earnings, whose abrupt loss precipitated the current big unofficial dock strike, be consolidated to some extent in an upward adjustment of basic hourly wages? And is any attempt to be made to bring the low rates paid by some—now vital—export industries into line with those of trades which enjoyed war-time prosperity? Wages are an integral factor in national planning. But at present they are being left out of account. The dockers are being left to fight it out with the port employers, while the government, "holding the ring" but using troops to unload essential food cargoes, gives the dock workers the impression that it is in practice on the employers' side.

This is disconcerting to back benchers in the House. They are dismayed also at the inch-by-inch progress of parliamentary procedure; and when they look carefully at the one definitely Socialist measure so far introduced, the Bank of England bill, they find that its provisions contain a good deal of "appeasement" of the financial district. The bill, it is true, gives legal ratification to the sovereignty which the Treasury has long exercised informally over the bank's policy; but the bank's directorate, whose personnel is unlikely to undergo radical change, will enjoy a great deal of autonomy. Moreover, though effect is nominally given to Labor's election pledge that the operations of the commercial banks would be "harmonized with industrial needs," the nationalized bank's powers to give "directions" to the deposit banks, as defined in Section 4 of the bill, are to be wielded only if the governor and directors choose to wield them. And no sanctions are provided against refusal to obey.

After this cautious approach by Mr. Dalton to the problem of securing real public control over finance, Labor M. P.'s were eager to cheer Aneurin Bevan when he promised the House that no landlords would be allowed to obstruct a vigorous housing campaign, that profiteering in building would not be tolerated, and that owners of houses with many empty rooms might be compelled to let their vacant space to tenants. Bevan's speech was rousing Limehouse stuff. (Indeed, he is clearly in the running to play the part of the Lloyd George de nos jours.) But when they read in Hansard, next day, the Minister's exposition of definite housing proposals, they were disconcerted once more by the realization that except for a little "supplementary" production by reconverted ordnance factories he is leaving the provision of all materials and components to private firms, that the local authorities on whom he is relying exclusively to organize building are apparently to be given no special financial aid at low interest rates by the Treasury, and that he failed to give any convincing assurance that he would be able to redeploy enough labor to get his projects started soon in a big way.

All this, then, adds up to a sizable back-bench disenchantment and to the certainty of increasing pressure from behind to make party leaders demonstrate more convincingly that they are not just an administration of liberal reformers, that their ultimate target is a real 100 per cent Socialist state, and that they will move steadily toward that end. To this the leaders will reply: "We are not Marxists; we are first and foremost a government, and a government's business is to run the country. We did not seek a mandate to socialize more than a fraction of the national economy. We took over a concern which will remain 90 per cent capitalist until the electorate decides otherwise. We must work with existing institutions, whether they be banks or chiefs of staff or associations of employers or local authorities packed with Tory realtors. We cannot afford, nor is it our intention, to have a head-on clash with vested capitalist interests in general. Stop talking like revolutionaries—which you are not—and let us get on with the respectable business of government."

Is this a tenable attitude? You will get one answer in Transport House and another, very different, from the dockers now on strike; but it must serve as explanation for the many apparent contradictions in the government's policy. Diego Valdez, according to Kipling, set youth and spring aside in the vain hope they would await his pleasure while he toiled "in bondage to great deeds." The Labor government is setting a full Socialist policy aside. It is in bondage not so much to "great deeds" as to its own self-imposed limitations.

Everybody's Business

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Britain's Taxes and Ours

SUPERFICIALLY there is some resemblance between the tax program put before Congress on October 1 by Secretary of the Treasury Vinson and that offered to the House of Commons on October 23 by Hugh Dalton, Chancellor of the Exchequer in the British Labor government. Both propose to remove from the tax rolls the lowest brackets of income-tax payers; both provide for relief to business as a stimulus to new investment.

The fact that the fiscal doctors agree is, however, no proof that they are both right. On the contrary, it seems to me evidence that one of them is very wrong, for the economic position of the United States is so different from that of Great Britain that similar prescriptions cannot possibly be good for both. In this country, once purely temporary shortages are overcome, the great problem will be to keep effective demand level with production, and a tax program should be designed, above all, to stimulate consumption. In Britain demand exceeds not only current production but potential production for years ahead, and Britain's budget should aim therefore at curbing consumption and encouraging the enlargement of productive facilities.

In proposing elimination of the 3 per cent normal tax and reduction of excise taxes, Mr. Vinson did recognize the importance of adding to mass purchasing power. But out of the $5 billion which he considered the maximum available for tax reductions in 1946, he was willing to allot only half for this purpose. The remainder, he thought, should be used to stimulate reconversion and expansion of industry by abolishing the excess-profits tax.

In arriving at this conclusion Mr. Vinson, I feel, accepted uncritically the view that profit is the sole progenitor of enterprise. Untaxed excess profits will not give birth to industrial expansion unless growth in demand promises to provide a market for the products of that expansion. The increased earnings resulting from the ending of the excess-profits tax might promote such a grant if they were used to lower prices and raises wages. But currently business is resisting wage increases while seeking higher prices, thus shortsightedly doing its best to curb the demand on which future expansion depends. Mr. Vinson's proposed present to the corporations, which Congress appears likely to ratify, is apt therefore to produce merely bigger dividends and bigger company reserves. That means a growth in investment funds but not, until demand justifies it, a growth in actual investment of the kind that creates jobs. And there is already an abundance of investment money available.

Some months ago Mr. Vinson wrote—I quote from memory—of "our pleasant problem of raising our standard of living 50 per cent in the next few years." No such delightful puzzle keeps a British Chancellor of the Exchequer awake at night. He knows that an improved standard of living for his country can be achieved only very slowly as national losses of real capital are made good. In designing a budget his unenviable task, therefore, is to maintain a tight curb on spending. Theoretically perhaps, he should offer no tax relief at all of the kind that encourages consumption. For goods are and will long continue to be in short supply in Britain, and any increase in purchasing power must tend to reinforce inflationary pressures. On the other hand, to overcome its difficulties Britain needs increased production and additions to real capital in the shape of houses, factories, new machinery, and so on. Hence budgetary policy must aim at stimulating both labor output and capital investment.

Facing this situation, Mr. Dalton gave relief both to the lower-bracket incomes and to business, but his bounty to the latter was accompanied by stern warnings that the proceeds were to be devoted to development and not frittered away in increased dividends. The excess-profits tax is to be reduced from 100 per cent—of which 20 per cent took the form of a post-war credit—to 60 per cent, and corporations will also benefit by a 10 per cent reduction in the standard rate of income tax, which will make the rate payable on retained profits 45 instead of 50 per cent. A further important stimulus to investment will be provided by speeding up refunds of excess-profits-tax credits, which will give British business as a whole a capital nest egg of $1 billion.

Relief to the workers will result from a restoration of pre-war exemptions to $440 a year for single persons and proportionately for married couples. The graduated tax scale is also to be eased, but even then it will amount to 15 per cent on the first $200 of taxable income and 30 per cent on the next $300. In the case of the higher incomes, those above $8,000, the relaxation of the burden offered by these revisions in normal tax is to be offset by additions to surtax which will leave the very wealthy with a slightly smaller net than during the war. Defending this provision, Mr. Dalton said that it was framed to "continue that steady advance toward economic and social equality which we have made during the war and which this government intends to continue in peace."

During the war low incomes in Britain were called upon to furnish an increased share of the revenue. Through the reduction in personal allowances the income-tax collector reached down into the pockets of all but the very lowest-paid workers. In addition, heavily increased excise taxes on tobacco, beer, tea, amusements, and so forth, and the purchase tax payable on many kinds of consumers' goods, riddled household budgets. As a result the tax load on British labor has reached a point where it is a deterrent to effort. When earnings from four days' work bring weekly income to a level above which any addition is subject to a 30 per cent deduction for tax, the temptation to take a long week-end sometimes becomes irresistible. While the fighting was still on, patriotism to a large extent counteracted the urge to take things easy. Now there is a need to provide fresh incentives to the greater production which Britain sorely needs. Easing the load on the lower brackets is designed to achieve this end.

Mr. Dalton's program, unlike that of Mr. Vinson, clearly relates taxation to the need of the economy as a whole. It is an encouraging first instalment of the fiscal planning which the British Labor government intends to employ as a major instrument of policy.

The People's Front

LATIN AMERICA is sitting on a pile of uranium. Those who have believed that after this war, just as after the last, the Latin American countries would tag along docilely at the skirts of their two rich aunts, the United States and Great Britain, are badly mistaken. The day is also past when a candidate in Latin America can make lavish campaign promises and then, once elected, limit the "benefits of democracy" to his relatives and friends. The people of the American republics have been profoundly shaken by the war; a revolution is taking place throughout the continent, and everything that happens in Europe echoes in the mountains of Latin America from Patagonia to Popocatépetl.

Take the French elections as an example. In the United States the vote was generally interpreted as an overwhelming victory for General de Gaulle. But the elections have a larger meaning; they confirm the trend of Europe toward the left. In England for the first time the Labor Party holds an absolute majority in the Parliament. In France for the first time the Communists and Socialists together are the majority in the new Constitutional Assembly. These two facts prove that the people of Europe want a change of society from top to bottom. If in the seven months that lie ahead De Gaulle shows that he understands the people's mandate, he may continue to rule France. If he ignores that mandate, the political revolution will go on without him.

In Latin America the revolutionary process unchained by the war takes various forms. On one side fascism is trying desperately to prevent a popular upheaval; on the other side the awakening masses push toward real political and economic democracy. Every Nazi who has managed to slip through the Allied cordon has taken refuge in Argentina or in Franco's Spain. One of the world's great aviation authorities, the Loyalist General Emilio Herrera, recently said that some of the key German engineers and technicians who had worked in Germany on the atomic bomb were continuing their experiments in Spain. Today in Argentina the Nazi agents sent over from Germany in 1939 to spread the message of the Greater Reich are patiently waiting for a crisis to develop among the United Nations; that will be their signal for a new political offensive.

The Argentine anti-fascists have suffered a temporary setback, but their fight is continuing. I have just received a first-hand report of present events from the leaders of the opposition movement. When the army ousted Perón a few weeks ago, it did so as a last resort in the hope of maintaining the control it has held since 1930. The gigantic anti-fascist demonstration of September 22 had mobilized all the forces opposed to the dictatorship. They asked for (1) transfer of power to the Supreme Court; (2) immediate lifting of the state of siege; (3) general elections to be held within ninety days. Then began a campaign of civil disobedience. Badly frightened, the military leaders, after many hours of discussion in the Campo de Mayo, decided to sacrifice Perón, but only on condition that "under no circumstances would they allow the reins of government to slip out of their grasp." They believed they could calm the Argentine people by offering them a new Cabinet, without Perón but still controlled by the army. Their maneuver failed. The stubborn insistence of the democratic leaders on "unconditional surrender" circumvented the farce of a "democratic-military" government. Perón returned to power, this time on the backs of the most Naziphile elements of the army. His new Cabinet is even more Nazi than the previous one; a victorious Hitler selecting his puppet government for Argentina could not have chosen differently. It is rumored that the notorious munitions manufacturer, Fritz Mandl, is now raising twenty million pesos among the Nazis of Argentina to finance Perón's presidential campaign. So Perón enters the race backed by Nazi money and by a gang of pistoleros headed by the Ruggero brothers—the Argentine equivalents of Al Capone—who, together with the police and the Argentine-Spanish Phalanx, furnished the shock brigades for a victory celebration on the day of Perón's return to the Casa Rosada.

The case of Venezuela is different. There is reason to question the motives of some of the men directing the new junta; but behind the coup, supplying mass support and social meaning, was a revolt against the century-old system of monopoly landholding and economic inequality. Several months ago leftist newspapers had already begun to publish a list of the great fortunes of the country. One of the most popular moves of the new government was the announcement that it would investigate the personal wealth of public officials as far back as 1907.

Young Venezuelan army officers, educated abroad, many of them inspired by democratic ideals, joined the Betancourt revolt. They resented the fact that a handful of generals dominated the army. And they knew that while an army lieutenant received the same pay as a bus driver, the generals were extremely rich. "It was high time," said one of the military leaders of the successful coup, "that our army ceased being a domestic police force." As a matter of fact, in the spring of 1944 an abortive uprising took place in three army barracks at Caracas and Maracay; it was quickly suppressed, and no reports of it reached the outside world.

On the economic front the war had introduced an explosive factor in the rising cost of living: rice and caráotas negras, the national dish of Venezuela, which cost 7 cents before the war, now costs 47 cents. The housing shortage is acute. It is true that a good many reforms had been put through by the Medina government, but not quickly enough to satisfy "Juan Bimba," the man in the street.

One thing is clear today: social changes that once took a quarter of a century to crystallize now occur in a year's time—in Europe, and in Latin America as well. DEL VAYO

Oil Beneath the Waters

BY ALAN BARTH

(Of the staff of the Washington Post*)*

Washington, October 25

THE most generous obeisance to the theory of states' rights in the legislative history of the United States was made by the House of Representatives on September 20. By a vote of 108 to 11 the House passed a resolution, now before the Senate, declaring that "the United States of America hereby renounces and disclaims any right, title, interest, or claim in and to all lands beneath tidewaters and navigable waters within the boundaries of each of the respective states." It happens that beneath the tidewaters off the coasts of California and Texas lie the richest stores of petroleum now known to exist within the jurisdiction of the United States government. The recoverable oil content of the submerged California coastal fields alone is estimated at about 200,000,000 barrels; with development of the process called "whipstocking," it may be possible to pump incalculable additional amounts from the underwater land as much as five or six miles from the shore.

A decade or so from now this oil may constitute the only available fuel for the United States navy. According to competent geologists, the known oil deposits under the land areas of this country will meet our national needs for no longer than fourteen years. Yet the House was in tumultuous haste last month to renounce any claim of the federal government to the undersea deposits. It was in such haste, indeed, that its Judiciary Committee could not find time to hear a single representative from the Department of the Interior or the Department of Justice or from the army or the navy. It was in such haste that it indorsed this stupendous renunciation after a single afternoon of debate, with less than a quorum of its membership in attendance. And it did it with such an absence of fanfare that its action rated no more than half an inch of space the next morning on page 23 of the New York Times, on page 17 of the Washington Post, and on page 4 of PM.

The haste of the House is a tribute to the lobbying talents of three men—Edwin W. Pauley, formerly treasurer of the Democratic National Committee and now United States Reparations Commissioner, who has a heavy financial stake in the tidelands through his Petrol Oil Corporation of California; the attorney general of California, Robert W. Kenny, who managed to marshal forty-five of his fellow attorneys general in support of the legislation; and William W. Clary, a special assistant attorney general of California, who helped Kenny draft the legislation and then came up to Washington to explain its virtues to House leaders, with the help of some introductory telephone calls from Ed Pauley. Edward A. Harris of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch has disclosed that Clary's fee, if the legislation is finally enacted, is to be paid in part by the oil companies which will be its principal beneficiaries.

Representative LaFollette of Indiana, one of the few House members who opposed the bill, offered an astute, if somewhat caustic, testimonial to Pauley's participation in it. "I find a rather unique coincidence," said Mr. LaFollette, "in the rise of Ed Pauley in the Democratic Party and the removal of Mr. Biddle and the naming of Mr. Clark. I am wondering if the Republican members have made appropriate arrangements for their share of any campaign funds that may arise out of the passage of this legislation."

The stake of the oil companies, and of the states of California and Texas, is a mammoth one. Private operators have leased the tidelands from the states and have paid royalties to state treasuries on the oil they extracted. The arrangement has, of course, been mutually profitable; but it has not resulted in any conservation of oil for national-defense purposes. This happy partnership might have continued without a care had it not been for a notion which formed in the back of Harold Ickes's curmudgeonish mind that perhaps California and Texas were leasing lands which really belonged to the nation. Mr. Ickes persuaded Mr. Biddle, as the final act of that gentleman's attorney generalship, to file a suit testing the validity of the state titles. Direct hearing of the suit by the United States Supreme Court has now been sought by Attorney General Clark.

The state attorneys general assert vociferously that the state titles are indisputable—that they are inviolate attributes of the sovereignty with which the states came into the Union. Mr. Kenny reiterates tediously that the question has been settled by the courts at least fifty times. But the fact is that a federal claim to the tidelands, or to their mineral resources, has never been asserted by Congress, and the specific issue of federal versus state ownership has never been clearly determined. The states undoubtedly have an extremely strong case. But their very reluctance to put it to judicial test should serve to whet popular interest in the views which the nine justices of the Supreme Court may hold on this matter.

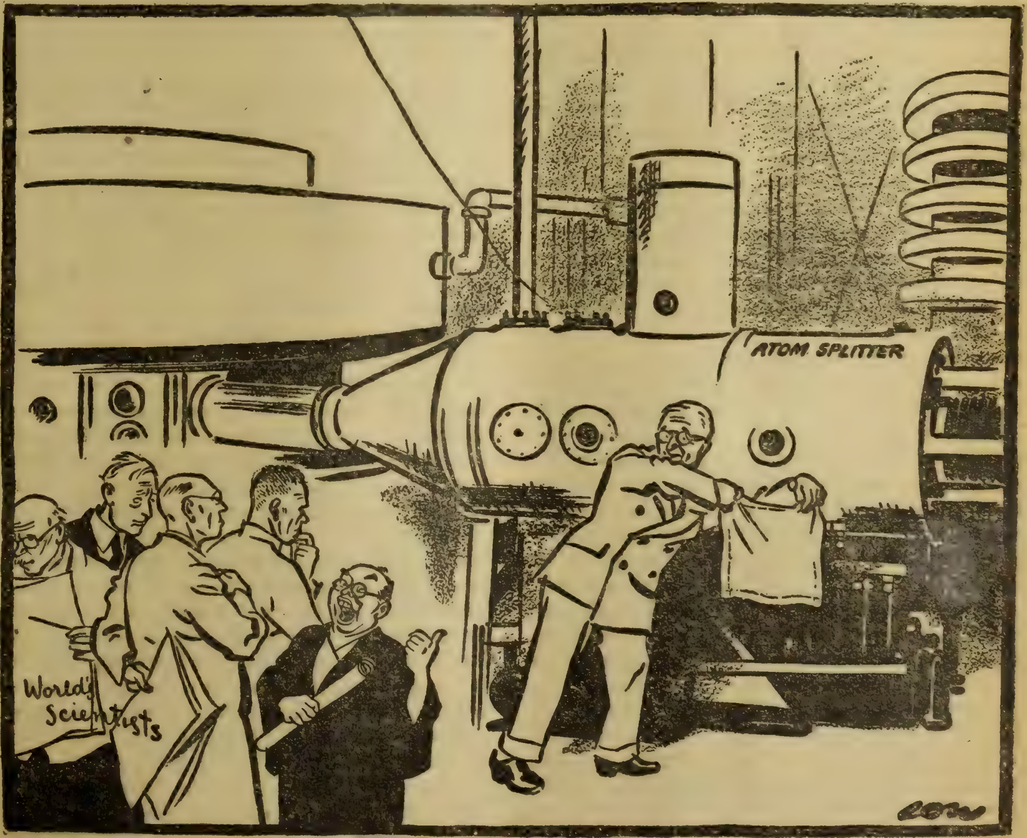
What the oil-company lobby has done in this situation is closely akin to what the fire-insurance lobby did when the Supreme Court had under consideration an anti-trust suit against insurance underwriters. It has sought to circumvent the judiciary by rendering the issue moot through legislative action. Congress has unquestionable authority, of course, to determine policy in this matter; it can change the law, if it desires, after a court decision has been rendered. But to legislate while litigation is in progress is to undermine judicial authority in a most reckless fashion.

As in so many cases of its kind, the tideland oil controversy has been piously and speciously presented in terms of states' rights. Most of the attorneys general of non-oil states went along with Mr. Kenny on the ground that the suit brought by Mr. Ickes threatened their municipal powers over harbor developments, shore installations, and other surface rights. The transparency of this fiction was revealed by Representative Sam Hobbs of Alabama, who proposed an amendment to the resolution adopted by the House which would have left the municipal powers of the states intact and would simply have asserted and recognized as among the paramount powers of the federal government "the right to conserve and appropriate for any constitutional purpose any mineral deposit, including petroleum, in any submerged land within the territorial waters of the United States of America." Opponents of the amendment said that it "would absolutely scuttle this bill." Obviously, it would have scuttled their real purposes. The Hobbs amendment was voted down, 105 to 17, although its author pleaded with his colleagues to "think twice before you wipe out so much of our national-defense potential."

Judge Hobbs advanced the view that although title in the submerged lands belongs to the states for municipal purposes, "it is subordinate to the paramount right, not title, of the United States for the four constitutional powers—including the power to build and maintain armies and navies—to utilize so much of the contents of those lands as may be necessary in the execution of those constitutional powers." He based his view in part upon an opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of Pollard's Lessee against Hagan, which declared: "This right of eminent domain over the shores and the soils under the navigable waters, for all municipal purposes, belongs to the states within their respective territorial jurisdictions, and they, and they only, have the constitutional power to exercise it. . . . But in the hands of the states this power can never be used so as to affect the exercise of any national right of eminent domain or jurisdiction with which the United States have been invested by the Constitution."

There is nothing novel about a federal claim to the tidelands. In 1937 the Senate passed a joint resolution—which died in the House—declaring the submerged lands along our coast "to be the property of the United States," and directing the Attorney General "to assert, maintain, and establish the title and possession of the United States to the submerged lands." Such an assertion of the federal right is essential if these rich resources are to be saved for the use and protection of the American people. Until it is made, the federal power will lie dormant. Congress, as the representative of the people, ought to make the assertion and then let the Supreme Court rule upon it.

President Truman the other day asserted American jurisdiction over the resources of the entire continental shelf of the United States—as against any claim which might be advanced by a foreign government, not against the claim of California or Texas. But it is the United States navy, not the California or Texas navy, which will make the President's claim respected—provided the navy has enough oil to patrol and protect our national shores.



SSH! IT'S SECRET!

America's Homesick Army

BY JOSEPH FREEMAN

(Joseph Freeman, author of the novel "Never Call Retreat," traveled with a USO show for nine weeks this summer in France, Germany, and Austria.)

II

THOSE who fear the effects of fraternization on the political opinions of our soldiers in Germany are misled by clichés. They think the G. I. does not know the score because he does not mouth the familiar phrases of the democratic creed, the big words which are seldom defined and often made meaningless by repetition. But the G. I. is through and through the creature of our democratic tradition. As a rule he is young enough to remember his school days, with their idealized presentation of the American way of life, and young enough for his memories not to go back beyond the Roosevelt era, in which the democratic idea was transmuted into action more forcefully than at any other time since Lincoln. The G. I. never mentions the four freedoms which he defended on the battlefields of Africa, Europe, and Asia, but he is a man of freedom, as Raymond Chandler's hero was a man of honor, "by instinct, by inevitability, without thought of it, and certainly without saying it."

That is what has so far protected our soldiers from the political dangers of fraternization. From dozens of G. I.'s I heard the same ideas expressed about the Germans and Germany, and in almost the same words. Riding along the Autobahn toward Heilbronn, Bayreuth, or Munich, one may have a driver from Boston, Los Angeles, Atlanta, or St. Paul. Until a few months ago he may have been an infantryman, artilleryman, machine-gunner, or tank driver. But he always starts the conversation like this: "Ever been in Germany before? Beautiful, ain't it?" Yes, you say, it's certainly a beautiful country. "What a place!" the G. I. says. "If they had a beautiful country like that, why did they want to conquer other countries? They say they didn't have enough space. That's a lot of malarky. Look at all that space. You can drive for miles without seeing a house. They've got space, all right, but they haven't any sense. They're nuts about fighting, that's what's the matter with them." After a while he briefs you some more about the Germans. "Ever meet any Nazis in Germany? Damned right you haven't, and what's more, you won't. There aren't any Nazis in Germany. Anyway, that's what the Krauts want you to think. They're all innocent. They never did anything, never heard anything."

After the fraternization ban was lifted, many Germans seized every opportunity to propagate their views among our soldiers. One heard the same line of talk all through the United States occupation zone. Much of it came from the German women who waited at army tables and cleaned army billets. "What do you think of Germany?" they ask. "Have you seen Kassel and Frankfurt?" Yes, you say, you have seen them, and Marburg, Darmstadt, Stuttgart. "Kaput, no?" Yes, totally kaput. The houses are piles of brick in the street. "I was in Kassel," says the waitress; "60,000 persons were killed in one air raid." The chambermaid says, "I was in Heilbronn the night your fliers killed 28,000 in one raid." Another says, "You should see Cologne, where my father was killed"; or, "Ach, Berlin—ganz kaput. My mother was killed there." They sound as if we were the war criminals, they the innocent victims. "It's too bad about your father and mother," you say, "but Germany started this war. Have you any idea what your armies did in Lidice, Warsaw, Stalingrad?" Then comes the excuse to which the G. I. is exposed every day: "We didn't know. Why should the innocent suffer for the guilty?" What about the concentration camps? There's one a few miles from here. Did you know about that? "We didn't know a thing," the German woman answers.

Occasionally one meets a German who admits some connection with the Nazis, but it was always through Zwang, coercion. In Bamberg a woman told me that her brother was forced into the S. S. because he was tall and strong. "Now," she said, "the Allies will shoot him." In Regensburg a dapper young man who claimed to be a writer said that he had been compelled to join the Nazi Party to avoid persecution for marrying a Jewish girl. Oh, what he suffered from the Nazis for love of that woman! He had to divorce her because she could not bear to think that she was not as free to marry him as an "Aryan" woman. I could not find out what finally happened to her, but there was no doubt that the young man had survived the Nazi regime in excellent health. We also ran across ardent German democrats who said they had fought the Nazi regime secretly. How is it, we asked, that millions were arrested and you escaped? The ardent democrat replied, "I was too clever for them."

Unless a soldier is in some special branch, army life restricts his contacts with Germans. He is likely to meet few people who show any awareness of what the world has suffered from Germany or any interest in conditions in other countries. Of course such people exist, and a free political life will eventually bring them to the fore. In Germany's last free election nearly 16,000,000 Germans voted against Hitler. And the newspapers have reported that the Nazis killed 1,000,000 German "Aryans" in the concentration camps. It will take years to separate the sheep from the goats in Germany, and at this moment some of our army commanders are not even trying. But the G. I. makes his own distinctions. He tells about treacherous fighting at the front, when German soldiers killed American doctors trying to dress their wounds. He laughs about the prisoners of war who recite the Geneva Convention to get privileges which the Germans denied to Allied prisoners. "I wouldn't give those dirty Jerries a thing," he says. And though he fought the war without much political emotion, one thing hit him hard.

"Did you ever see a concentration camp?" a captain asked me. "Well, you know how generous our Joes are. During combat they'd kill the Krauts and the Krauts would kill us. Then we'd win and take prisoners. And in five minutes we were dressing their wounds and giving them cigarettes and chocolate. Then our boys saw their first concentration camp. They went wild. They shot their military prisoners. They grabbed S. S. men by the neck, ducked their heads in the river, drowned them like rats. They got rough. But you have to see a concentration camp to know how they felt."

Nazis, P. W.'s, S. S. men, Germans who tell you Germany is innocent—for these G. I. Joe has no use. They do not fool him, and he cannot see why we compromise with them. A sergeant and a pfc. in Bad Nauheim were the first to call my attention to evils which General Eisenhower has since started to clean up—the deliberate appointment of known Nazis to local posts under MG, and the failure to discriminate between persons who had suffered in concentration camps for resisting the Nazi regime or for being Jews, and those who got on pleasantly and profitably with the Hitler gang. But the G. I. is fair to Germans who with evident sincerity condemn the monstrous acts of the Third Reich. When he is moved to believe a person who says, "We did not know," he is likely to answer, "Well, there are a lot of things in our own country we do not know."

The G. I.'s reactions to the Germans were sound while the war was still fresh in his mind. The present danger derives from the failure of the army authorities to educate him politically, the persistent efforts of Nazis to make a good impression on him, and the absence of democratic German groups in public life which could counteract that impression.

In their opinion of Russia soldiers differ as widely as civilians. Some are deeply sympathetic and others violently hostile to the U. S. S. R., but there is general agreement that the Russians are great fighters and made the defeat of Germany possible. Officers and enlisted men who met the Russians at Torgau and other junction points described them as swell eggs. But often the G. I. criticizes the Russians from the viewpoint of high American living standards. He thinks of them with good-natured amusement as men whose uniforms are untidy, whose manners are rough, who loot everything in sight, and who are crazy about watches, which the G. I. is happy to sell them at extravagant prices. When you ask a G. I. who has been in Berlin about the Russians, he grins and says, "They're okay but dirty; and, boy, can they drink!"

Normally Russians are very friendly, but the feeling among American soldiers is that Red Army men are not encouraged to associate with them. Unfortunately the G. I.'s hear a good deal of criticism of Russia from other sources. Russian displaced persons who do not want to go home insist that if sent back to Russia they will be arrested because they "have been abroad." It is rather confusing to an American to learn that someone who has spent three years in Dachau will be detained in a Russian camp until the authorities are certain he has not been infected with Nazi ideas. Most of the Germans with whom the G. I. fraternizes voice fear and hatred of the Russians. In any army mess hall at Berchtesgaden I saw a sixteen-year-old German waiter turn green with terror when an American told him jokingly that he was a Russian. More often, anti-Russian talk takes the form of flattery: "You Americans are wonderful; you must stay here. If you leave, those terrible Russians will move in."

The G. I. is now simply marking time in Europe, waiting to be shipped home. He wanders through the streets of Paris, does his occupation job in Germany, makes love to mademoiselles and Fraüleins, plays with kids, drinks a little and gambles a little. He visits museums and cathedrals, climbs to the Eagle's Nest above Berchtesgaden, which he considers a piece of magnificent megalomania. He goes to army movies, plays tennis, swims, listens to the radio. He drives jeeps or European cars along strange highways, through picturesque villages and cities, learning some geography on the way. He learns a little French or German from the girls he picks up. He talks of his combat experience with an impressive grasp of machinery and tactics. He hates war and will sometimes argue with officers against peace-time conscription. He is a thoroughly disciplined soldier, but he makes fun of post-war reveille and formation and the extreme meticulousness about uniforms that General Patton insists on. About unnecessary social distinctions between officers and men he gripes freely in private conversation and in the B-Bag of Stars and Stripes. Free speech was never mentioned in ETO, but it was practiced all the time.

The G. I. doesn't talk about the American way of life. He represents it because he has so keen a sense of fair play, so deep a respect for the human personality. He shows humility and thoughtfulness in victory. I heard the news of the atomic bomb over the radio at an airstrip outside Paris with scores of G. I.'s. As the story came across the field through the loudspeaker, it brought them not only the good news of victory but assurance that they would not have to fight in the Pacific. I expected them to cheer. Instead there was a long silence. Then a soldier said quietly, "I guess people better not have any more wars or they'll destroy the whole world."

Everyone who talked with our soldiers in ETO this summer felt that a great moment in the history of the democratic idea had been reached and wondered how long it would last. That will depend a good deal on what happens to the soldier when he returns to civilian life. He is anxious about his future. Technical and master sergeants, company and field-grade officers with rank, authority, and good incomes are afraid of not getting a job at all or of getting a petty job with poor pay and little authority. Many officers were school or college boys before the war and have never had any experience in getting or holding a job; I know a twenty-four-year-old captain who kept asking the more experienced enlisted men under him, "How do you go about getting a job?" Some G. I.'s are afraid of leaving a setup where all the thinking is done for them. They want to get out of the army but do not know how they will manage without this vast machine which feeds, clothes, houses, and pays them, and gives them free transportation, medical care, and recreational facilities. "I'm not used to worrying about these things," one man said. "When I get out, will I be able to think for myself?" Army training is necessarily based on the leadership principle. The G. I.'s are used to it, and that will have to be reckoned with.

In reply to a War Department questionnaire asking, "How much have you thought about exactly what you will want to do after the war?" 75 per cent of the men canvassed said they had thought a good deal, 20 per cent had thought some, and only 5 per cent had thought hardly at all about it. The replies showed little difference between officers and men, whites and Negroes, men stationed in the States and overseas. Nearly two-thirds planned to work as employees in industry, agriculture, or government. About 12 per cent planned to work for themselves in business or on a farm, and about 8 per cent wanted to attend full-time schools. Eighteen per cent were undecided about what they were going to do.

The War Department reports further that in their plans for the future most of the soldiers did not take into account the G. I. Bill of Rights, and that "few of them could claim a thorough knowledge of that bill." In a recently completed survey of laws and organizations, government and private, affecting veterans of World War II, Edward L. Bernays showed that much has been done but that much more needs to be done in the direction of simplification and coordination. Legislation for veterans fills a 750-page book which only a trained lawyer can read. Federal, state, and private agencies apply these laws in segments.

When five million G. I.'s have been brought home, the veterans, the government, and the country as a whole will face some stiff problems. Joe has gone through hell and back again. Yet he returns to the country he has saved with very modest demands. He does not want to run the show. All he wants is work and security. If the government, the community, and the veterans cooperate with intelligence and good-will to apply and extend the G. I. Bill of Rights, the problems before us can be solved within the democratic framework. Then we may perhaps have a carry-over into the post-war era of that remarkable feeling for free and decent human relations which marks the G. I. today.

[This is the second of two articles on the G. I. in Europe.]

It Happened in Portland

BY CAREY McWILLIAMS

(Author of "Prejudice: Japanese Americans" and "Ill Fares the Land")

Los Angeles, October 22

IN response to the appeals to patriotism of the Kaiser shipyards and the War Manpower Commission, Ervin Jones, a middle-aged Negro, left his home in Shreveport, Louisiana, in the early days of the war to work in Portland, Oregon. With Jones came other members of his family—his wife, Elva; his five children, Ardoria, Marie, Derret, Ervin, Jr., and Revordia; and two sisters of Mrs. Jones, Susie and Zandaree Rembo. Portland was crowded, but the Jones family found a small apartment in Guilds Lake, a predominantly Negro district. Jones and Zandaree found employment in the shipyards as chippers—hard, dirty, and dangerous work. The family got along all right in Portland but hoped to return to their home in Shreveport after the war. One of the slogans in the campaign to enlist shipyard workers for the West Coast had been, "You will like our mountains." They liked the mountains around Portland, Elva said, but they missed the lake, the pine mills, the zinnias, the acacia tree, and their friends in the First Baptist Church "back home."

On August 21 last, at two in the morning, four policemen in plain clothes and a deputy district attorney went to the Jones apartment on a tip from a Negro informer that they might find Scott Thomas, a Negro wanted for the murder of Beatrice Terry, a Negro woman. The officers had no definite information that Thomas was, or had been, in the Jones apartment; they were acting on mere suspicion, based on the word of an informer. The evidence of what actually happened when they sought to enter the Jones apartment is sharply contradictory: the police officers contend that Jones attempted to resist a search of the premises; the Jones family say that they thought robbers were breaking into the apartment, that they did not know the intruders were police. In any case Officer Bard Purcell shot and killed Ervin Jones in the apartment. The officers did not find Scott Thomas, nor did they discover any evidence that he had been using the apartment as a hideout.

The police maintained that no inquest was necessary, but under the leadership of Mrs. Ruth Haefner a Citizens' Committee was formed on September 16 for the purpose of demanding a formal inquiry by a coroner's jury. Yielding to the demands of this group, the coroner convened a rather remarkable jury of six citizens to investigate the circumstances under which Jones had met his death. Though the case involved Negroes and occurred in a Negro district, no Negroes were put on this jury. Under the Oregon law the coroner need not consult anyone in selecting a jury, and the jury chosen consisted largely of officers of the Republican Party machine in Portland. These were: Helen La Monde, who acted as campaign manager for the Republican Party during the recent Portland mayoralty election; Harriet Monroe, state secretary and treasurer of the Council of Republican Women; Mrs. C. E. Runyan, ex-national committeewoman, former member of the Republican State Central Committee, active leader in Pro-America; John Dickson, retired railroad executive, Rotarian, and a Republican member of the state legislature; H. L. Idleman, a state office-holder and a member of the Republican State Central Committee; and Richard Tusant, described merely as a "Republican." After hearing testimony for two days, the jury retired and within an hour returned a verdict of justifiable homicide. At the inquest the presiding officer refused to permit the jurors to be questioned about any possible prejudice and denied a request that the police officers should place on the record their original report on the shooting.

The same Citizens' Committee that had demanded the inquest promptly denounced the verdict as "an invitation to lawlessness, a serious threat to the security of all persons in their own homes, and a grave miscarriage of justice." This statement was signed by representatives of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Mrs. Nancy Honeyman Robinson, Democratic national committeewoman from Oregon and an outstanding citizen of the Northwest, numerous churchmen, and other citizens of Portland. The Portland Oregonian, in an editorial of October 12, called for a thorough investigation, pointing out that four of the six jurors were active in Republican machine politics and that no Negro had been selected, "although racial feelings could not be excluded from a case of this kind." On the night after the release of the coroner's verdict a near-riot, in which Negro soldiers took part, occurred in the Vanport area. Acting on the demands made by the Citizens' Committee, the district attorney announced that the case would be submitted to the grand jury and that the evidence would be presented by a representative of the Attorney General's office, since a deputy district attorney was one of the eyewitnesses to the shooting. Early in the morning of October 15 an attempt was made against the life of Thomas B. Handley, the district attorney, but was thwarted by police officers detailed to guard his home after he had received threatening messages.

The behavior of the Portland police since the shooting of Jones has been truly amazing. Despite the excitement aroused by the case in a community that has been described as a major area of racial tension for the last two years, the police issued a statement charging that the Citizens' Committee's demand for a grand-jury investigation was merely an attempt to foster racial strife! Some time after Jones was killed the police arrested Scott Thomas, the man they were seeking on the night of August 21. Shortly before the coroner's inquiry, however, Scott Thomas, together with sixteen other prisoners, escaped from the county jail. Although the police managed to catch the other escaped prisoners, Scott Thomas, an important witness for the Jones family, is still at large. A few days ago the police announced that they had received information that Thomas was actually in the Jones apartment when the shooting occurred, but they have refused to provide any details.

For two years now informed observers have warned the authorities that race feeling was running dangerously high in Portland. Nevertheless, Mayor Earl Riley has stubbornly refused to take the most obvious precautions to avert conflict. A report by the Portland City Club, commented upon in the editorial columns of The Nation on August 25, provided documentary proof that immediate action was needed. This report stressed the unsatisfactory conduct of the police and made specific recommendations to Mayor Riley and Governor Snell. As might have been expected, the recommendations were ignored. The present widespread demand for an exhaustive investigation of the Jones case will probably assure an honest and thorough inquiry by the grand jury, but that will not of itself clear the charged atmosphere in Portland today. In fact, the existing tensions are likely to increase as unemployment mounts in the area. If trouble is to be avoided, the minimum program recommended by the Portland City Club should be put into effect at once.

The family took the body of Ervin Jones back to Shreveport, because, as Mrs. Jones said, they wanted him buried in "friendlier earth." But they have returned to Portland to assist in the pending investigation.

No Guns for Christmas

THERE will be no guns this Christmas. We had them last Christmas, and the Christmas before, and the one before that. This year it will be a peaceful Christmas.

We have set our feet on the road of peace. But the road is not easy. We have known it would be hard. We have talked about the difficulty of keeping the nations together after the war, of building an organization to prevent another war. We had talked of full employment, of peace in industry, of the end of prejudice and intolerance. Now these problems are on us, and some others we did not dream of a year ago—the atom bomb, the vast, all-embracing problem of controlling a new and awful power, of using it so that it enriches civilization and does not destroy us all.

Men of good-will, of courage, of intelligence see that it is their task to solve these problems. It is for such persons that The Nation has been published for eighty years—to give them the information and guidance they need for understanding the great questions of the day.

As a regular Nation reader you do not need to be convinced of The Nation's worth. Thus we do not hesitate to suggest that for the coming holiday season you again make a gift of a Nation subscription to those friends of yours whose intelligence you respect, whose point of view you share. It will be a gift not for a day, or a week, but for fifty-two weeks of 1946. It will be a gift that will be especially valued this Christmas, when there are no guns, but a deep awareness of the battle for peace that must be won.

★

The cost for a yearly gift subscription is only $3. For order form and full particulars kindly turn to

Page 473

BOOKS and the ARTS

NOTES BY THE WAY

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

THE style of a censor is almost bound to be self-conscious, long-winded, and fussy. Protecting other people's morals is an anxious business, and anxiety makes for long sentences cluttered with apologetic clauses, timid participles, and mealy-mouthed verbs. The non-censor, on the other hand, is free to follow the good old rule that a straight line is the shortest distance between two points—which cuts down the reading as well as the writing time.

I've just been reading extracts from the decision of the Massachusetts Supreme Court ruling that "Strange Fruit" is obscene, indecent, and impure. These extracts, which were distributed by the National Council on Freedom from Censorship, run to almost four single-spaced typewritten pages. The first three, which are filled to the brim, are devoted to the views of the censors. The dissenting opinion of Judge Charles Lumus is printed on the last page, and there is white space to spare.

Here is a passage from the censors' opinion:

> The fundamental right of the public to read is not to be trimmed down to the point where a few prurient persons can find nothing upon which their hypersensitive imaginations may dwell. The thing to be considered is whether the book will be appreciably injurious to society in the respects previously stated because of its effect upon those who read it, without segregation either of the more susceptible or the less susceptible, remembering that many persons who form part of the reading public and who cannot be called abnormal are highly susceptible to influence of the kind in question and that most persons are susceptible to some degree, and without forgetting youth as an important part of the mass, if the book is likely to be read by youth.

And here is Judge Lumus:

> The [majority] opinion rests its support of the conviction upon the statutory words "manifestly tends to corrupt the morals of youth" as well as upon the other prohibitions of the statute. . . .
>
> Such knowledge as I have leads me to believe that without such artificial stimulation [as actual or threatened prosecution] novels of the class into which the book in question falls are read by few girls and practically no boys. The great mass of readers are mature women. Plainly the book was not written for juveniles. They would find it dull reading under normal conditions.

It may well be that Boston is the only city in the country where juveniles will be caught reading "Strange Fruit." Such is the strange fruit of censorship.

THE ERN MALLEY AFFAIR will not down. Last spring the American editor of Angry Penguins, the Australian magazine on which the hoax was perpetrated, wrote me a letter saying, among other things, that Dorothy Green, whose adverse remarks about the poems of "Ern Malley" I had quoted approvingly, was a fellow-traveler. This observation, as I said at the time, seemed to me highly irrelevant. Miss Green found it worse than that. I have a letter from her which reads in part as follows:

> I am sorry to take up your time, especially over a matter that may seem somewhat out of date to you now, but the remarks made about me by the American editor of Angry Penguins (Mr. Roskolenko), which you quoted in The Nation of June 23, have just come to my notice. He seems to have left you with the impression that I am a member of the Communist Party, and I should be extremely grateful if you could allow me space to deny emphatically membership in that or in any other political party. . . . If he deduces from my article on the Malley affair that I am a Communist, or any other sort of 'ist for that matter, then he would be well advised to study a little elementary logic. The article was based entirely on my judgment that the Malley poems were bad poems. . . . I am not concerned with avant-gardism, penguinism, surrealism, but only with the poem which confronts me at a particular moment. And this, I think, is the only thing with which a critic has any right to be concerned.

I READ "The Russian Story" by Nicholas Mikhailov (Sheridan House, $2.75), and I still feel as if I had been out in a big east wind. As history it is more curious than convincing, but the spirit of the book is extremely informative. Mikhailov is described as a great Soviet geographer and historian, and he has written a hymn to Soviet geography and history which is enough to sweep Russians off their feet and make Henry Luce tremble in his boots. It reminds one, in a way, of the self-glorifying American oratory of the last century when the eagle was kept so continuously in flight from the peaks of the Alleghenies to the top of Mount Hood that its shadow was said to have worn a trail across the basin of the Mississippi. With the great difference that, according to Constance Rourke, who ought to know, the American encomiums were as often as not regarded as "buncombe" by both orators and auditors. "The Russian Story," needless to say, is preternaturally solemn; it fairly hums with the energy and power of a giant country feeling its strength and flexing its muscles. And when the Soviet geographer says that "all of Western Europe could be easily tucked away in the expanse between the Ob and the Lena River," the reader involuntarily looks around for Western Europe.

As I have indicated, the historical content of the book is less authentic than the spirit which animates it. But by compressing 1,000 years of Russian history into 200 pages, Mr. Mikhailov has made any demand for detail or documentation seem irrelevant, not to say ungracious. Obviously he didn't have space to mention the Soviet-Nazi pact or the Finnish war or the trials. Or is this another case of brevity being the soul of wit?

Let me illustrate his method. On page 24 he writes: "In November (old style—October), 1917, under the leadership of Lenin and Stalin, the Revolution triumphed." But by the time any old-style Octobrist has got his breath, Tovarisch Mikhailov has finished with the civil war, the type changes, and we read: "Now Hitler was at the gates of Tula. . . ."

He returns to the civil war when you least expect it—just after Napoleon has been driven out on page 68. "Stalin," he tells us, "was in direct charge of the uprising in Petrograd in October, 1917." A few lines farther on he has this to say:

> [Stalin] finds the southern front in a state of collapse. At headquarters great laxity prevails; traitors and incompetents are in commanding positions: the army is on the retreat. This is the handiwork of Trotsky, commander-in-chief at that time.

And so on. But again, before you know it, Russia is saved, the type changes, it is the late autumn of 1941, and no questions asked.

Pravda recently scoffed at the freedom of the press in Western capitalist countries and acclaimed the Soviet variety. It said that "the freedom of the Soviet press is in service to the people. The Soviet journalist is free because no exterior opinions can influence him." Mr. Mikhailov might be said to be "free" in this sense, for certainly, so far as I can judge, he is not influenced by exterior, that is, non-Soviet, opinions in his survey of Russian history.

Mr. Mikhailov writes well, and some of his passages about the Russian countryside have a lyric quality which provides relief from the exalted and, in the end, exhausting tone of dedication. Dedication has its points. As a way of life, it can get to be pretty wearing. The Russians have had a quarter of a century of it.

Mr. Mikhailov says that "the aim of the Revolution was the happiness of the people." I look forward to the day when the Kremlin, replete with Major Triumphs, will announce a Five-Year Plan of Minor Joys, including the joy of writing history which doesn't have to double as a press release.

MOST DISMAL THOUGHT OF THE WEEK:

Their weekly chore:
To make you roar!
(Adv. for a radio program)

The Atom

ATOMIC ENERGY FOR MILITARY PURPOSES. By Henry De Wolf Smyth. Princeton University Press. $1.25, paper; $2, cloth.

ALMIGHTY ATOM. By J. J. O'Neill. Ives Washburn. $1.

ATOMIC ENERGY IN THE COMING ERA. By David Dietz. Dodd, Mead and Company. $2.

IF WE divorce the discovery of the "atomic bomb" from its social implications, it remains an exciting romance. For never before have so many of the beautiful discoveries of science been pooled to reach one overpowering climax. And yet, as in other scientific discoveries, we are here dealing, at one and the same time, with a "soaring angel and a creeping snake"; given a catalytic push in one direction, it should bring happiness to mankind, but pushed in the wrong direction, it may well mean the end of this planet.

I cannot see how any attempt at secrecy in regard to the preparation of the atomic bomb can succeed beyond a very short time. The foundations of the process, and even some of its details, are common knowledge to physicists and chemists everywhere. The feeling of insecurity of which we in this country are conscious with this treasure in our hands cannot be lessened by further attempts at secrecy. No nation has the power, no nation should want the power, to keep the secret of the bomb to itself. Inevitably we are led, it seems to me, to advocacy of an international organization to supervise this death-dealing instrument.

Of the three books before us, the one by Smyth has deservedly become a classic overnight. It gives us a fascinating picture of the series of experiments which have led to our present knowledge of atomic structure—a necessary prelude to the atomic bomb. What an array of master-minds in this field since 1896—Becquerel, the Curies, Thomson, Rutherford, Einstein, Chadwick, Fermi, Urey, and others.

The key to the work lies in a few fundamental discoveries: that the atom is a "planetary system," with a nucleus of neutrons and protons surrounded by outer orbits of electrons; that chemical reactions—such as the burning of coal or of gasoline—involve the outer electrons only, with the liberation of a comparatively small amount of energy; that the great storehouse of energy is in the nucleus; and that what we call "matter" and "energy" are quantitatively related—they are, in fact, different forms of the same eternal "stuff."

When we speak of the energy of the atomic bomb we mean the energy stored within the atom—in the nucleus. With this in mind, we get some startling figures. Smyth points out that about two pounds of matter converted into energy give twenty-five billion kilowatt-hours of energy—equivalent to the total power of the electric industry in the United States running for about two months (the figures are for 1939). When two pounds of coal are burned, we get about eight and a half kilowatt-hours of energy. In the former case we liberate the energy within the nuclei of the atoms; in the burning of coal the nuclei of the carbon and other atoms are not disturbed.

The practical achievement of the atomic bomb depends, among other things, on the selection of a suitable element for "atomic fission"—uranium; and on methods for controlling the reaction, which are secrets. It is no small satisfaction that the very Hitler who longed for an atomic bomb drove from his country some of the scientists who made the atomic bomb possible in this country.

Smyth's report, beautifully presented, unfortunately requires some knowledge of the physical sciences for a full appreciation of the story. The books by O'Neill and Dietz are written in a more popular manner. They are worthy attempts, particularly the volume by Dietz, but from my point of view they are somewhat deceptive, because the "man in the street," after having read them, thinks he knows a good deal about the subject, when in reality he knows it but vaguely. There is, unfortunately, no other remedy but to take a refresher course in college physics and chemistry.

BENJAMIN HARROW

Wandering, Waiting, Working

LETTERS OF RAINER MARIA RILKE, 1892-1910. Translated by Jane Bannard Greene and M. D. Herter Norton. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.50.

TO THE devotion of M. D. Herter Norton, this time in collaboration with Jane Bannard Greene, we owe gratitude, again, for a substantial addition to our store of information about Rainer Maria Rilke. These letters, addressed to some fifty correspondents, begin in substance with the year 1897, when Rilke was twenty-two years old; before that, from the years 1892 to 1897, we have only half a dozen items, most of them rather brief notes, one an extensive rhapsody to an early love. They end with the year 1910, a logical terminus, for it was that year which saw the final editing and sending to print of the Notebooks of Malte Laurids Brigge. These years, then, present Rilke, as it were, between two periods of coming of age—a nominal date, when he was eighteen, or twenty-one, and a more actual date, when the "other self," he could feel, was summed up, and exorcised.

During these years Rilke traveled and lived in many lands—in Germany, Austria, Russia, and France, where he served for a while as secretary to Rodin; in Italy, Sweden, Denmark, and Belgium. And during these years he wrote many books, a book a year, almost, if one can count as far back as the "Life and Songs," of '94, and "Wild Chicory" and "Offerings to the Lares," in '96. There were prose books as well as verse: the "Stories of God," first issued in 1900, were republished in 1904: the more substantial books of poems—the "Book of Pictures," the "Book of Hours," the "New Poems"—come in the years after the turn of the century.

To the average writer, no doubt, these would seem like reasonably active and fruitful years; to Rilke they did not appear so. Convinced or, anyway, trying to reassure himself of his own uniqueness, dedicated and devoted to his vocation as artist, he would not work at anything else. As for eating, let the ravens provide. They did so, ravens in the forms of in-laws, or a long-suffering but generous father, or patrons from the nobility. Determined as he was—"Whoever does not consecrate himself wholly to art with all his wishes and values can never reach the highest goal. He is not an artist at all"—Rilke could not always accept this manna with composure and an easy conscience. "This winter ['02] poverty stood before me for months like a specter, and I lost myself and all my beloved aims and all the light out of my heart and came near taking some official post, and that would have meant: dying and setting out on a spiritual transmigration full of homelessness and madness." "When, Lou, when will this miserable life begin to be effective, when will it grow out over inability, inertia, and opacity to the simple reverent joyousness for which it longs? Is it growing at all? I scarcely dare ask about my advancing steps, because I am afraid . . . to find that their tracks run in a circle, keep coming back to that notorious disconsolate spot from which I have already so often started out."

And it is true, one feels of Rilke's spiritual struggles, that he did make a good many false starts, that he sometimes seems, quite unnecessarily, to be imposing on himself the pattern of hazing he endured in military school, that he dramatizes himself, more subtly, but with the same mawkish priggishness he praises himself for in a very early letter to Valery David-Rhonfeld—"I suffer it because Christ suffered it, silently and without complaint, and while you were hitting me, I prayed my good God to forgive you."

That Rilke could be silly is on the whole good news rather than otherwise. We need to be reminded, occasionally, that artists are not high priests, to the manor born; that they are human beings, can get themselves in jams and messes, make damn fools of themselves. We could perhaps stand a good deal more revelation of Rilke's foolishness, errors, and, for that matter, hard-boiled practicalities. But what is important is to learn how to outgrow silliness; and in that study the letters of these years of Rilke's life are valuable testimony. If one tires of precepts, or suspects that they are set down more to reassure the instructor than to convey instruction, one can find in Rilke's progress much beyond the precept, much in the way of example: what he preached, he learned to practice.

Above all, patience; patience, endurance of solitude and suffering; patience, and work. "Where I create, I am true." . . . "Deep composure for the sake of the fashioning." . . . "Time passed in the difficult is never lost." . . . "The using up of strength is in a certain sense still an increase of strength . . . what is required of us is that we love the difficult and learn to deal with it." . . . "Everything depends only on how much and how completely he will be able to transpose himself into artistic matter." . . ."The hostile thing is not life but myself." . . . "Works of art are indeed always products of having-been-in-danger, of having-gone-to-the-very-end in an experience, to where no man can go further. The further one goes, the more one's own, the more personal, the more unique an experience becomes, and the work of art, finally, is the necessary, irrepressible, most valid expression of this uniqueness." . . . "How old one must become in order really sufficiently to marvel, to remain nowhere behind the world; how much one still undervalues, overlooks, misconstrues."

For all his steadfast, rigorous, sometimes almost morbid examination of the self, and his study of the conversion of that self into artist, Rilke was not led up the blind alleys of self-concern into any bogus, dubious mysticism. Sometimes preaching anticipated, sometimes dawdled behind, practice; but the general direction was forward, as if the capacity to look inward improved the ability to turn the gaze outward. What poet, ever, has seen more clearly and joyously the visible world? Over and over, reading these letters, one marks passages that testify to Rilke's ability to see, "with eyes that really contemplated and found repose in everything." "A green rectangular field, flat against the curving, deep-blue sea beside which it was set. . . . On this field a woman sitting, in rhubarb red and orange, another in a faded green going back and forth among the white sheets and table cloths hung out to dry on lines and moved in most varied fashion by the wind, now hollow and drawn in, full of translucent shadow, now dazzlingly billowed out, ever and again interrupted by the distinct blue of the sea and overflowed by the sky continually coming down over everything." . . . "One goes through the Luxembourg and in the

DOES AMERICA NEED A STRONG ENGLAND?

There's dynamite in the growing rift between England and the United States—and it takes a man like Sir Norman Angell, Nobel Peace Prize winner, to reveal it clearly and courageously. He meets pointed questions that are frequently asked, but seldom answered with authority. Is England really on the edge of economic ruin? Why should we help restore her to a position of world leadership, when we can expect the stiffest kind of trade competition? Suppose we don't help—how grave are the dangers to which we expose ourselves—military as well as economic? And finally, what is the truth about her recent "socialist revolution"—a truth most American commentators muffed badly?...It took courage for an Englishman to present this unvarnished picture of Britain today. Norman Angell has produced a notable document for all Americans to read, in "America Needs A Strong England."

THE FATE OF WARTIME MARRIAGES

They're breaking up. The very boys and girls who rushed to the altar under the impetus of war are rushing just as avidly to the divorce courts under the impetus of peace. Precisely why are there so many marriages in wartime...and why are so many of them —38 per cent—ending in divorce? Citing dramatic case histories, "The Fate of Wartime Marriages" reports on a vast social problem that is almost sure to involve people near and dear to each of us.

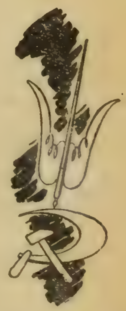
THE AMERICAN MERCURY—for November—NOW ON SALE

General de Gaulle by Henry C. Wolfe presents a fresh interpretation of the enigmatic general of whom we will continue to hear so much...What Doctors Know About Headache may help you find out what to do about yours, if you are a headache-sufferer...Record of an Industrial Miracle reveals the almost fantastic job which American Industry did in the war...There's a charming nostalgia in The Gracious and Spacious Days by Charles Hanson Towne, and the very opposite in the tale of the Robinson Crusoes of the war in Battle of the Rocks by two veteran marines...There is a delightful short story, Far Be It From Me. Alan Devoe writes on Leeches, Philip Wylie about Sinclair Lewis' newest book, and George Jean Nathan on The Bear Market in Comedians. Other articles such as Sumner Welles: Diplomat De Luxe, The Ordeal of Yugoslavia, and Switzerland: Prosperity and Freedom round out a full, rich issue. Altogether a rewarding quarter's worth of good reading.

The American Mercury

The American Mercury and Russia

John Foster Dulles recently broadcast the following statement: "For over four years, every meeting of representatives of the great powers was followed by a pronouncement which gave the impression that complete harmony had been achieved. That was the war diet of soothing syrup. The reality was that there was unity in so far as it related to joint effort against common enemies. But behind that there have always been the differences which are now coming to light." THE AMERICAN MERCURY has never given its readers any soothing syrup. It has insisted on realistically recognizing the fundamental differences between totalitarianism and democracy. It has insisted on telling the truth, no matter how unpopular that truth was at a given moment. Our attitude has evoked criticism because it has been mistaken for hostility toward Russia. We firmly believe that it is essential that Russia and the United States cooperate in peace as well as in war. But not at the sacrifice of our basic principles. We will continue to guide our readers in their thinking by presenting facts rather than soothing syrup.



Lawrence E. Spivak PUBLISHER

Now, more than ever, America needs fighting books like this one . . .

BY MARSHALL FIELD

America can well be proud of this book. It is the exciting story of a democratic crusade . . . of the publication of PM and the Chicago Sun, the historic battles with the Associated Press and the Chicago Tribune, and the story of how Marshall Field's great fortune is fighting for what he considers the essentials of freedom: groceries, peace, access to facts, and a healthy scepticism of traditional ways of doing things.

JOSEPH BARNES: "A heartening book . . . He is confident that there is nothing wrong with us that more democracy won't cure."—N. Y. Herald Tribune

HENRY A. WALLACE: "The word 'freedom' has to be redefined every year. Marshall Field has been one of the most helpful of all public figures in bringing about the current redefinition."

CHARLES LEE: "Candid and cogent . . . a thought-packed book that bugles to the minute man within. No American can afford to miss it."
—Philadelphia Record

LEWIS GANNETT: "Has unique significance . . . America is safer because we produce such 'traitors to their class'."—N. Y. Herald Tribune

$2.50, wherever books are sold
UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS
5750 Ellis Ave., Chicago 37, Ill.

dense, close air sees the rise of the fountains (like a woman in a Japanese print), and a dahlia that melts like a dark berry as one looks at it, and geranium-red and yellow in begonias and colors and colors (the light ones as if they had turned fluid, the dark ones on a black background), all fraternizing with each other on gray." Rose petals that "lie in the grass like torn-up letters," or pictures of bread, Westphalian ham; tea, lemons, red mandarins, "in which a summer is folded up very small like an Italian silk handkerchief in a nutshell."

Nor was it only landscape; it could be people, Rodin, or Tolstoy, with a little too much enthusiasm; Ellen Key, with no remorse over disillusionment. Bernard Shaw—"There is a man who has a very good way of getting along with life—of putting himself into harmony with it. . . . Proud of his works, like Wilde or Whistler, but without their pretentiousness, proud as a dog is proud of his master." Mrs. Shaw—"a solicitous, quietly attentive good woman, full of zeal and enthusiasm for beautiful things, hovering about her husband with all this as the spring wind plays about a billy goat." Rilke's own mother—"this lost, unreal woman who is connected with nothing, who cannot grow old." Baudelaire—"he had a long road to go to get there, Baudelaire, and he went on his knees and crawling." A poetry reading—"again the awful old ladies, whom as a child I used to marvel at, still the same and no more amusing now that the marveling was on their side. A few littérateurs, also the same, dustier, shabbier, and more worn-out with every year, inquisitive and too kindhearted and too easygoing to be envious." Gorky—"you know my opinion, that the revolutionary is the direct antithesis of the Russian: that is, the Russian is admirably suited to be one, rather as a cambric handkerchief is very nice for wiping up ink, provided you completely misuse and ruthlessly misjudge its real attributes." Dante: Ibsen: Van Gogh: Cézanne. Above all, Cézanne.

And all this, which another man could be proud of as his maturity, was in Rilke's case the insight only of his emergence from callowness. In 1910 he was thirty-five, and only beginning, really, with Malte Laurids Brigge out of his system. Not too long, please, Mrs. Norton, for the letters from 1910-1926; and if it is not asking too much could we, next time, have also an index? ROLFE HUMPHRIES

BRIEFER COMMENT

A Middle Western Anthology

JOHN T. FLANAGAN names his selection of the literature of the Middle West "America Is West" (University of Minnesota Press, $3.75), a title dubious in idiom, vague as geography, and false as a literary category. What Mr. Flanagan means is that America is Middle West, but obviously the shorter title is more poetic and more impressive. Abraham Lincoln, Frederick Lewis Turner, and Henry A. Wallace are among Mr. Flanagan's authors, but also included are Ring Lardner, James T. Farrell, Sinclair Lewis, and John Dos Passos, who in a variety of ways help to demonstrate the exact opposite of the editor's intention. For Mr. Flana-

Start to SPEAK A FOREIGN LANGUAGE CORRECTLY IN ONLY 7 DAYS

- SPANISH
- FRENCH
- GERMAN
- ITALIAN

WHICH can bring YOU the biggest returns in business, in social life?

Language Phone
METHOD

THIS BOOK IS FREE—SEND FOR IT AT ONCE • Don't Delay!

FOR many years to come government activities in Europe and South America will open countless opportunities for Americans who know one or more foreign languages. Business will be on the lookout for men and women to conduct affairs with foreign firms, maintain contact with individuals, manage overseas offices.

GET PROOF Get proof that now you can master your choice of four basic languages—easily, pleasantly and right in your own home! Get proof that within one short week you will have learned useful words and will be speaking phrases and even entire sentences in Spanish, French, German or Italian correctly and fluently.

Because Funk & Wagnalls knew that following the war there would be a great demand for a quick, easy way to learn a foreign language, this great publishing house started long ago to lay the groundwork for this announcement.

Now after three years of the most painstaking preparation, the completely new, up-to-the-minute improved Language Phone method is ready for you—ready to give you quick mastery of the basic language of your choice by listening to a language master!

HOW THE LANGUAGE PHONE METHOD WORKS

Have you ever noticed how easily you acquired the tune of a new popular song? Actually this calls for memorizing hundreds of musical notes and phrases; yet you do all this unconsciously, not by laboriously memorizing the individual notes.

Well, that's just how easily you can learn to converse in another language—when you use the new Language Phone Method!

This way, sitting comfortably at home, you listen to the cultured voice of an internationally famous language professor, electrically transcribed on records. At the same time you see the words he is speaking in a printed supplementary conversation-pronouncing manual. This way almost at once you start to speak and read the language you are studying.

NOT A "Correspondence Course"

Using the new Language Phone Method, you spend no tedious hours memorizing grammar rules and mere lists of words. You can have as many or as few "language-study companions" as you choose (a roomful can listen as well as one person!). And—you don't pay for high, by-the-lesson tuition. You pay only one, moderate known-in-advance sum for everything needed to give you complete mastery of the language.

METHOD ENDORSED

Learning a foreign language through the medium of phonograph records has been an important part of the Army and Navy war-effort program. The success has been so great that leading college educators have given it their fullest approval, and signified their intention of using the record method of teaching in colleges, universities and schools throughout the country.

Start RIGHT HERE
To Mold Your Future—let a foreign language multiply your opportunities!

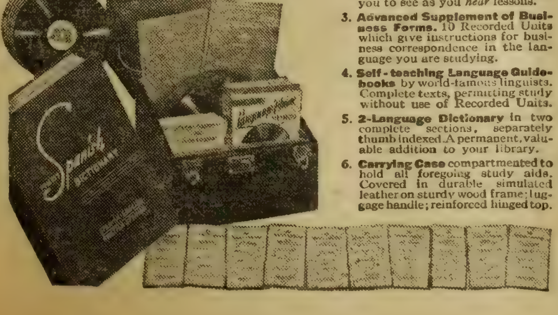
STOP MERELY WISHING you could speak Spanish, French, German or Italian! Now you can make your wish come true! You"ll be amazed at how quickly and enjoyably you progress from speaking just a single simple sentence to rattling off a complete conversation.

Take advantage of this opportunity which may spell success for you and your family and fill in the coupon below. It will bring you a complimentary copy of the beautiful 24-page booklet shown here, and information about how you can get a complete, new Language Phone kit for seven days' free trial. Remember, when you send in this coupon you are not ordering anything. You are merely requesting your free copy of the booklet. There is no obligation on your part, and no agent will call on you.

THE NEW 1946 FUNK & WAGNALLS LANGUAGE PHONE METHOD

18 Records
Double Faced

Thirty-six brand-new electrically transcribed lesson records in each of our French, Spanish, German and Italian Language Courses . . . New self-teaching language guidebooks . . . Two-language dictionary . . . Commercial business and travel section in each advanced course . . . All records and textbooks in a handsome, simulated leather carrying case.



Here's what you get—all sent to you for seven days' free trial.

1. 36 Recorded Units (on 18 double-faced records) electrically transcribed in world-famous RCA-Victor and National Broadcasting Company studios.
2. Conversation-pronouncing Manual synchronizing with the first 26 Recorded Units, enabling you to see as you hear lessons.
3. Advanced Supplement of Business Forms. 10 Recorded Units which give instructions for business correspondence in the language you are studying.
4. Self-teaching Language Guidebooks by world-famous linguists. Complete texts, permitting study without use of Recorded Units.
5. 2-Language Dictionary in two complete sections, separately thumb indexed. A permanent, valuable addition to your library.
6. Carrying Case compartmented to hold all foregoing study aids. Covered in durable simulated leather on sturdy wood frame; luggage handle; reinforced hinged top.

MAIL THIS COUPON

FUNK & WAGNALLS COMPANY, 354 Fourth Avenue, New York 10, N.Y.

Yes, send me my free copy of the 24-page booklet about your easy method of learning a foreign language, and tell me how I may obtain a complete Language Phone kit to try out in my own home for seven days.

( ) SPANISH ( ) FRENCH ( ) GERMAN ( ) ITALIAN
Check language desired

Please Print Name and Address Plainly
Name.......................................
Address.......................................
N-1 City.................... State...........

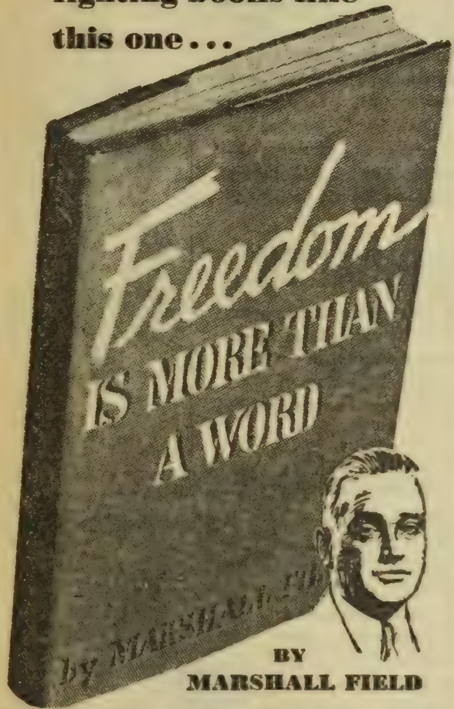
Now, more than ever, America needs fighting books like this one . . .



BY MARSHALL FIELD

AMERICA can well be proud of this book. It is the exciting story of a democratic crusade . . . of the publication of PM and the Chicago Sun, the historic battles with the Associated Press and the Chicago Tribune, and the story of how Marshall Field's great fortune is fighting for what he considers the essentials of freedom: groceries, peace, access to facts, and a healthy scepticism of traditional ways of doing things.

JOSEPH BARNES: "A heartening book . . . He is confident that there is nothing wrong with us that more democracy won't cure."—N. Y. Herald Tribune

HENRY A. WALLACE: "The word 'freedom' has to be redefined every year. Marshall Field has been one of the most helpful of all public figures in bringing about the current redefinition."

CHARLES LEE: "Candid and cogent . . . a thought-packed book that bugles to the minute man within. No American can afford to miss it."
—Philadelphia Record

LEWIS GANNETT: "Has unique significance . . . America is safer because we produce such 'traitors to their class'."—N. Y. Herald Tribune

$2.50, wherever books are sold
UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS
5750 Ellis Ave., Chicago 37, Ill.

dense, close air sees the rise of the fountains (like a woman in a Japanese print), and a dahlia that melts like a dark berry as one looks at it, and geranium-red and yellow in begonias and colors and colors (the light ones as if they had turned fluid, the dark ones on a black background), all fraternizing with each other on gray." Rose petals that "lie in the grass like torn-up letters," or pictures of bread, Westphalian ham, tea, lemons, red mandarins, "in which a summer is folded up very small like an Italian silk handkerchief in a nutshell."

Nor was it only landscape; it could be people, Rodin, or Tolstoy, with a little too much enthusiasm; Ellen Key, with no remorse over disillusionment. Bernard Shaw—"There is a man who has a very good way of getting along with life —of putting himself into harmony with it. . . . Proud of his works, like Wilde or Whistler, but without their pretentiousness, proud as a dog is proud of his master." Mrs. Shaw—"a solicitous, quietly attentive good woman, full of zeal and enthusiasm for beautiful things, hovering about her husband with all this as the spring wind plays about a billy goat." Rilke's own mother—"this lost, unreal woman who is connected with nothing, who cannot grow old." Baudelaire—"he had a long road to go to get there, Baudelaire, and he went on his knees and crawling." A poetry reading— "again the awful old ladies, whom as a child I used to marvel at, still the same and no more amusing now that the marveling was on their side. A few littérateurs, also the same, dustier, shabbier, and more worn-out with every year, inquisitive and too kindhearted and too easygoing to be envious." Gorky—"you know my opinion, that the revolutionary is the direct antithesis of the Russian: that is, the Russian is admirably suited to be one, rather as a cambric handkerchief is very nice for wiping up ink, provided you completely misuse and ruthlessly misjudge its real attributes." Dante: Ibsen: Van Gogh: Cézanne. Above all, Cézanne.

And all this, which another man could be proud of as his maturity, was in Rilke's case the insight only of his emergence from callowness. In 1910 he was thirty-five, and only beginning, really, with Malte Laurids Brigge out of his system. Not too long, please, Mrs. Norton, for the letters from 1910-1926; and if it is not asking too much could we, next time, have also an index? ROLFE HUMPHRIES

BRIEFER COMMENT

A Middle Western Anthology

JOHN T. FLANAGAN names his selection of the literature of the Middle West "America Is West" (University of Minnesota Press, $3.75), a title dubious in idiom, vague as geography, and false as a literary category. What Mr. Flanagan means is that America is Middle West, but obviously the shorter title is more poetic and more impressive. Abraham Lincoln, Frederick Lewis Turner, and Henry A. Wallace are among Mr. Flanagan's authors, but also included are Ring Lardner, James T. Farrell, Sinclair Lewis, and John Dos Passos, who in a variety of ways help to demonstrate the exact opposite of the editor's intention. For Mr. Flana-

Start to SPEAK A FOREIGN LANGUAGE CORRECTLY IN ONLY 7 DAYS

Language Phone
METHOD

SPANISH	FRENCH
GERMAN	ITALIAN

WHICH can bring YOU the biggest returns in business, in social life?

FOR many years to come government activities in Europe and South America will open countless opportunities for Americans who know one or more foreign languages. Business will be on the lookout for men and women to conduct affairs with foreign firms, maintain contact with individuals, manage overseas offices.

THIS BOOK IS FREE—SEND FOR IT AT ONCE • Don't Delay!

GET PROOF Get proof that now you can master your choice of four basic languages—easily, pleasantly and right in your own home! Get proof that within one short week you will have learned useful words and will be speaking phrases and even entire sentences in Spanish, French, German or Italian correctly and fluently.

Because Funk & Wagnalls knew that following the war there would be a great demand for a quick, easy way to learn a foreign language, this great publishing house started long ago to lay the groundwork for this announcement.

Now after three years of the most painstaking preparation, the completely new, up-to-the-minute improved Language Phone method is ready for you—ready to give you quick mastery of the basic language of your choice by listening to a language master!

HOW THE LANGUAGE PHONE METHOD WORKS

Have you ever noticed how easily you acquired the tune of a new popular song? Actually this calls for memorizing hundreds of musical notes and phrases; yet you do all this unconsciously, not by laboriously memorizing the individual notes.

Well, that's just how easily you can learn to converse in another language—when you use the new Language Phone Method!

This way, sitting comfortably at home, you listen to the cultured voice of an internationally famous language professor, electrically transcribed on records. At the same time you see the words he is speaking in a printed supplementary conversation-pronouncing manual. This way almost at once you start to speak and read the language you are studying.

NOT A "Correspondence Course"

Using the new Language Phone Method, you spend no tedious hours memorizing grammar rules and mere lists of words. You can have as many or as few "language-study companions" as you choose (a roomful can listen as well as one person!). And—you don't pay for high, by-the-lesson tuition. You pay only one, moderate known-in-advance sum for everything needed to give you complete mastery of the language.

METHOD ENDORSED

Learning a foreign language through the medium of phonograph records has been an important part of the Army and Navy war-effort program. The success has been so great that leading college educators have given it their fullest approval, and signified their intention of using the record method of teaching in colleges, universities and schools throughout the country.

Start RIGHT HERE
To Mold Your Future—let a foreign language multiply your opportunities!

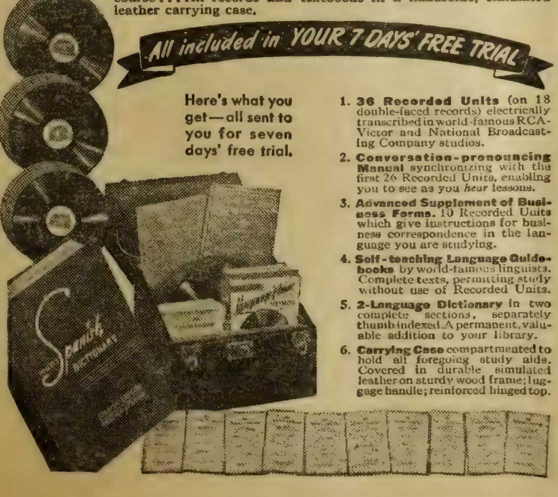
STOP MERELY WISHING you could speak Spanish, French, German or Italian! Now you can make your wish come true! You'll be amazed at how quickly and enjoyably you progress from speaking just a single simple sentence to rattling off a complete conversation.

Take advantage of this opportunity which may spell success for you and your family and fill in the coupon below. It will bring you a complimentary copy of the beautiful 24-page booklet shown here, and information about how you can get a complete, new Language Phone kit for seven days' free trial. Remember, when you send in this coupon you are not ordering anything. You are merely requesting your free copy of the booklet. There is no obligation on your part, and no agent will call on you.

THE NEW 1946 FUNK & WAGNALLS LANGUAGE PHONE METHOD

Thirty-six brand-new electrically transcribed lesson records in each of our French, Spanish, German and Italian Language Courses . . . New self-teaching language guidebooks . . . Two-language dictionary . . . Commercial business and travel section in each advanced course . . . All records and textbooks in a handsome, simulated leather carrying case.



All included in YOUR 7 DAYS' FREE TRIAL

Here's what you get—all sent to you for seven days' free trial.

1. 36 Recorded Units (on 18 double-faced records) electrically transcribed in world-famous RCA-Victor and National Broadcasting Company studios.
2. Conversation-pronouncing Manual synchronizing with the first 26 Recorded Units, enabling you to see as you hear lessons.
3. Advanced Supplement of Business Forms. 10 Recorded Units which give instructions for business correspondence in the language you are studying.
4. Self-teaching Language Guidebooks by world-famous linguists. Complete texts, permitting study without use of Recorded Units.
5. 2-Language Dictionary in two complete sections, separately thumb indexed. A permanent, valuable addition to your library.
6. Carrying Case compartmented to hold all foregoing study aids. Covered in durable simulated leather on sturdy wood frame; luggage handle; reinforced hinged top.

MAIL THIS COUPON

FUNK & WAGNALLS COMPANY, 354 Fourth Avenue, New York 10, N. Y.

Yes, send me my free copy of the 24-page booklet about your easy method of learning a foreign language, and tell me how I may obtain a complete Language Phone kit to try out in my own home for seven days.

( ) SPANISH ( ) FRENCH ( ) GERMAN ( ) ITALIAN
Check language desired

Please Print Name and Address Plainly
Name. . . . .
Address. . . . .
N-1 City. State. . . . .

H. G. WELLS—
Prophet of
the Atomic Bomb

Read his latest book:
"CRUX ANSATA — An Indictment of the Roman Catholic Church"
An historical summary of the Catholic Church's political intrigues leading to its tie-up with the Nazi-Fascist-Shinto Axis.
Cloth Binding $1.75 Paper-covered $1.25

Also get a copy of
"BEHIND THE DICTATORS" by L. H. Lehmann
A fully documented analysis of Vatican-Fascist collaboration.
Cloth Binding $1.75 Paper-covered $1.00

COMBINATION OFFERS	Both Cloth Bound Books	$3.00
	Both Paper Bound Books	$2.00

New Pamphlet
"VATICAN POLICY IN THE SECOND WORLD WAR"
48 pages of Documented Facts 25c

Free to those who return this ad with their order for the above books

Order From:
AGORA PUBLISHING CO., Dept. N51
229 WEST 48TH STREET NEW YORK 19, N. Y.

The provocative confessional of a leading English critic

THE UNQUIET GRAVE

by Palinurus
(Cyril Connolly)

"A bitter yet refreshing bouquet in which Mr. Connolly's own perceptive, irreverent, and 'self-dismantling' comments on the quality and meaning of life are mingled with the wit and wisdom of the writers he most admires. It is one of those books which disturb and incite the mind, and I happen to feel that that is one of the primary functions of a book."
—Margaret Marshall, The Nation

"An extraordinarily pleasing, extraordinarily stimulating book."—Chicago Sun

At all bookstores • $2.50

HARPER & BROTHERS

gan believes that the Middle West, which he entitles "the heartland," has provided a real center for the arts. "For the last three decades," he says in his introduction, "American literature has been primarily the story of those (Middle Western) men and their successors." The truth is that American literature has not been limited in the least to the Middle West, and Middle Western authors have responded to their region chiefly in terms of dislike, satire, and departure. Even Mr. Flanagan's piety as a Middle Westerner does not prevent him from including a good many samples of the rejection which the Middle West has inspired. At the same time it is clear that he delights in colorful characters, quaint dialects, and all the other fixings which make most forms of regionalism resemble nothing so much as a morbid passion for home cooking. DELMORE SCHWARTZ

In Business for Our Health

NOT COUNTING THE AMERICAN RED CROSS, more than 20,000 voluntary health agencies in the United States spend upward of $50,000,000 annually, have perhaps 20,000 paid employees, count more than 300,000 persons on their governing boards, and command the loyal support and part-time assistance of more than 700,000 other volunteers. This is big business; and since these agencies deal with most of the important causes of sickness and death, it is clearly important business too.

"Voluntary Health Agencies," by Selskar M. Gunn and Philip S. Platt, with a Foreword by Dr. Louis I. Dublin (Ronald Press, $3), is "an interpretative study" of this business. It is an admirable study, long overdue. For fifty years voluntary health agencies have been growing in size and number. Much has been known about some of them, but little about the movement as a whole—little about its coverage, its effectiveness, the efficient relation of its parts, whether it is economically or wastefully administered, whether it is carefully planned or has grown like Topsy. The present volume throws a flood of light on these and many other aspects of the movement. After describing and appraising local agencies and state and national organizations, after examining the role of boards, executives, and volunteer workers, after considering problems of finance, the authors come to the following general conclusions:

The most striking fact is the marked unevenness of the movement. Excellent agencies abound, but far too many are inadequate. Voluntary health agencies should subject themselves to searching self-analysis, with the help of expert counsel where needed. They should concentrate on the strengthening of executive and board leadership. They should more effectively coordinate their work. They should simplify and unify their appeals for public support. They should cheerfully and cleanly transfer appropriate activities to the official agency. Recognizing the essential leadership of the official agency, they should strengthen and support that leadership.

It is a first-class prescription. The test will come in the degree to which 20,000 independent bodies can be prevailed upon to take it. The divine right of private initiative, with its accumulation of vested interests, yields slowly to rationalization.

Stop the Spanish Atomic Bomb!

By JOHN M. COFFEE

Member of Congress

"EVEN as the first of the atomic bombs crashed down on Japan, the world was hit with the terrible knowledge that Nazi scientists in Germany were within a few months of being the first to successfully harness the terrible destructive powers of uranium. But the bombs which fell in Hiroshima and Nagasaki did not destroy the Nazi scientists who had spent a decade or more in working on the development of atomic power.

The German cartels, who hired and supervised the researches of the Nazi atomic scientists, today control more than forty per cent of the industrial resources of fascist Spain. Many of the German Nazis who worked on atomic bombs in Nazi Germany are now safe and working in laboratories in Nazi-Falange Spain.

On July 3, 1945, I introduced a resolution (H.R. 312) in the House of Representatives which called for a complete diplomatic and commercial break with the Franco regime. I said then, and I repeat it now, that such a move on our part would severely curtail the life of the Nazi-Falange regime in Spain.

Franco Spain is, today, the last outpost in Europe of Axis fascism. It is the last refuge where Axis cartels and Axis scientists can function without interference. It is the one spot left in Europe from which the Axis fascists can launch still another attempt to seize world domination.

I must remind those who think my warning is far fetched that it was in Spain that the Nazis in this war did much of their experimental work on the rocket bombs which hit London and Antwerp, killing British civilians and American soldiers alike. I need only point to the map of Europe to show how dangerous Spain can be as a launching point for rocket bombs carrying atomic explosive warheads.

The atomic bomb makes the continuance of Nazi fascism in Spain the personal problem of every peace-loving American. Once deprived of diplomatic and commercial relations with the United States, the Franco regime will fall. I therefore, call upon all Americans who love their country to immediately wire or write to the President of the United States, asking him to follow up the gains of San Francisco and Potsdam by immediately breaking all diplomatic and commercial relations with the Franco regime in Spain. I also ask all Americans to write to their own Representatives in Congress urging their support of H.R. 312, the resolution calling for a diplomatic and commercial break with Franco Spain.

Franco mortally fears the Coffee Resolution. When the American Committee for Spanish Freedom, headed by Bishop Lewis O. Hartman, launched a drive to get one million signatures to a petition favoring the passage of H.R. 312, the Madrid radio savagely attacked the American people. Franco's radio spokesman said that it would be impossible to find one million Americans to sign this petition. There is only one way to answer this slur: clip the coupon below, and send it to the Committee for as many copies of this petition as you can distribute. It is up to the American people to determine our national policy towards Nazi-Falange Spain. The Coffee Resolution is the people's mandate on Spain. When it passes in Congress, Franco falls. Your future is in your hands."

John M. Coffee M. C.

American Committee for Spanish Freedom

NATIONAL OFFICERS

Bishop Lewis O. Hartman, Chairman
Hon. John M. Coffee, Vice-Chairman
Allan Chase, Secretary
Bartley C. Crum, Vice-Chairman
S. L. M. Barlow, Vice-Chairman
Samuel J. Novick, Treasurer

PARTIAL LIST OF SPONSORS

Dr. Louis Finger
Leon Pomerance
Bennett Cerf
Olin Downes
Dr. John A. Mackay
Eugene P. Connolly
Joseph Curran
Jay Rubin
J. Raymond Walsh
Johannes Steel
Lewis Merrill
Mrs. Ferdinand de Bermingham
Elmer A. Benson
Norman Corwin
John M. Cowles
Jo Davidson
William Feinberg
Jose Ferrer
Mark Van Doren
William S. Gailmor
Moss Hart
Stanley M. Isaacs
Albert E. Kahn
George S. Kaufman
Dr. Foster Kennedy
Bishop John J. McConnell
Mrs. Vincent Sheean
Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam
Rabbi Benjamin Plotkin
Michael J. Quill
Mrs. William L. Shirer
Mrs. Lionel Perera, Jr.
Stephen H. Fritchman
Pierre Van Paassen
Mrs. George Marshall

BREAK RELATIONS
WITH FASCIST SPAIN

WEAR THIS BUTTON

AND DO YOUR BIT

Send now for your supply

AMERICAN COMMITTEE FOR SPANISH FREEDOM
55 WEST 42nd STREET • NEW YORK 18, N. Y.

Please send me .... petitions asking Congress to pass H.R. 812, the Coffee Resolution, which calls for a break with fascist Spain.

Please send me .... anti-Franco buttons at ten for one dollar.
I wish to become a member of the American Committee for Spanish Freedom. I enclose $........................ as my contribution to defray cost of this advertisement and other activities of the Committee.

NAME..

ADDRESS..

CITY..

STATE..

FREEDOM UNDER PLANNING

By BARBARA WOOTTON

"DEBUNKS the generalities of Hayek . . . Should be read by every citizen who is interested in economic progress and democracy."
—Mordecai Ezekiel

2nd printing before publication, $2.00

MEXICAN VILLAGE

By JOSEPHINA NIGGLI

"THE BEST NOVEL published in the past two years."—Betty Smith.
"Not quite like anything else written on the subject of Mexico . . . fiction in the tradition of the pure story-tellers . . . utterly faithful, wholly convincing portrayal of Mexican village life . . . without a peer in its field."—Joseph Henry Jackson, N. Y. Herald Tribune Books

Illustrated with drawings by Marion-Fitz Simons, $3.00

At your bookstore

THE UNIVERSITY OF NORTH CAROLINA PRESS
Chapel Hill, N. C.

The COMMUNITY CHURCH of New York
presents

SCOTT NEARING

in two series of lectures
Tuesday Evenings, November 6 through December 4 at 40 East 35th Street, New York City

7 — 8:15 p. m.
"DOES WAR PAY?"

8:30 — 10 p. m.
"AMERICA'S ROLE IN WORLD AFFAIRS"

ADMISSION:
Single lecture, 50 cents; course ticket single series, $2.00; course ticket both series, $3.75.

Notice to Publishers

The CHRISTMAS BOOK NUMBER of The Nation will be dated Dec. 1. Advertisers are already placing space reservations for this annual feature, which will be printed in 48 pages or more. Deadlines: Nov. 16 for space reservations and copy to set; Nov. 21 for final OK's and complete plates.

THE Nation
20 Vesey Street New York 7, N. Y.

"The voluntary health agencies of the country," says Dr. Louis I. Dublin in his Foreword, "are at the crossroads." He "firmly believes that a great future awaits the voluntary health movement in our country." May his hope be justified by the event.

ROBERT P. LANE

FICTION IN REVIEW

THE scholarship and historical avidity of Robert Graves are awesome things indeed. After having deserted the Rome of Claudius for the England of John Milton, Mr. Graves has now gone back again in time, to Minoan Greece, and reconstructed the voyage of the Argonauts. How much of "Hercules, My Shipmate" (Creative Age Press, $3) is sound historical and geographical conjecture I am not in the least competent to judge; such questions as occurred to an untrained reader like myself were satisfactorily answered in the book's fascinating jumble of a historical appendix. As story, however, Mr. Graves's new novel is excellent entertainment, and this despite the moments when it is overburdened with detail. Inasmuch as it is the assumption of "Hercules, My Shipmate" that Jason's voyage for the Golden Fleece actually took place, it is its further quite proper assumption that the voyage was impelled, vexed, and colored by the political-religious realities of the day; and these Mr. Graves re-creates with a nice balance between what we can suppose to be the attitude toward their own past of the Greeks of Hellenistic times (he explains that he is writing from the vantage point of the second century B. C.) and our own modern attitude toward the pre-Periclean civilization. He suggests, that is, a certain historical distance from his subject, but without at all patronizing it. And although there is a hint of exploitation of the material for its present-day social interest—a touch of strictly twentieth-century chic in the picture of woman-dominated Lemnos, as an instance—one must admire the strength with which Mr. Graves resisted the obvious temptation to play psychoanalytical anthropologist and, in general, his refusal to impose modern "scientific" interpretations upon a historical narrative.

When one returns to the flyleaf after finishing Elizabeth Janeway's "Daisy Kenyon" (Doubleday, Doran, $2.50) and reads once again that "this novel has not been serialized in any form prior to book publication," one can only wonder why not. Except for some adultery and a bit of rape, both decently atoned for before the story ends, this second novel by the author of "The Walsh Girls" is surely the stuff of women's-magazine fiction. There is the heroine of Mrs. Janeway's title, a magazine illustrator, beautiful with red hair piled on top of her head; there is her married lover, Dan O'Mara, a selfish go-getting lawyer but with alluring moments of Irish charm and hard-headed idealism; there is the tender Pete whom Daisy marries to save him from memories of a dead wife and to save herself from Dan. Attach to this familiar triangle a pair of staunch, no-nonsense friends straight out of Philip Barry; add to the familiar emotional situation a war situation which sends Pete to camp, Dan to Washington, and Daisy to brave pieces; and smarten up the whole story with a running patter of wise talk about politics

THE Nation

FOR YOUR FRIENDS

There's no better gift!

52 TIMES A YEAR FOR ONLY $3

You can give The Nation as a gift to as many people as you wish at the special rate of only $3 each. And with it goes the usual greeting card. You can renew your own subscription now or whenever it expires at the regular yearly rate of $5, or if you want to make a real saving, you can renew for two years for $8 or three years for $11. Just fill out and mail the order form below.

GIFT ORDER FORM

THE NATION ASSOCIATES, Inc. • TWENTY VESEY STREET • NEW YORK 7, N. Y.

Dear Nation: Please send gift subscription of one year of The Nation to my friends as indicated below, at the special gift rate of $3 each.

☐ Also renew my own subscription to The Nation at the regular rate for .... years.
☐ Don't renew my subscription now. ☐ Remittance inclosed. ☐ Please bill me.

My Name is..
Street ....
City.. Zone & State...

Regular Renewal Subscription Rates: One Year $5 • Two Years $8 • Three Years $11
For Foreign and Canadian subscriptions add $1.00 a year.

LIST GIFT SUBSCRIPTIONS HERE

Name ....
Street ....
City.................................. Zone & State....................
Gift Card should read from...
☐ Send Gift Card to me for mailing.

Name ....
Street ....
City.................................. Zone & State....................
Gift Card should read from...
☐ Send Gift Card to me for mailing.

Name ....
Street ....
City.................................. Zone & State....................
Gift Card should read from...
☐ Send Gift Card to me for mailing.

Name ....
Street ....
City.................................. Zone & State....................
Gift Card should read from...
☐ Send Gift Card to me for mailing.

WINNER
Dodd, Mead
INTERCOLLEGIATE LITERARY FELLOWSHIP PRIZE NOVEL

GOLD
IN THE STREETS
By Mary Vardoulakis

The moving story of a little group of Greeks who left their olive-crowned island of Crete for the mills of New England. With subtlety and realism Mary Vardoulakis writes of these people—her people—and their new won freedom that was Americanization.

At all bookstores • $2.50

DODD, MEAD • NEW YORK

The Person in the Body
AN INTRODUCTION TO PSYCHOSOMATIC MEDICINE
By LELAND E. HINSIE, M. D.
Professor of Psychiatry, College of Physicians and Surgeons, Columbia University

Within recent years doctors have become increasingly aware of the close relation between the emotions and bodily ills. In this book an eminent psychiatrist discusses the influences of mental distress on the organs of the body, covering all the common disorders and citing numerous case histories to clarify the major issues for the reader. THE PERSON IN THE BODY will be valuable for physicians and patients, and of great interest to everyone who wishes to be informed about the latest developments in psychosomatic medicine.

At all bookstores • $2.75

"BOOKS THAT LIVE"
W·W·NORTON & CO. • 70 Fifth Ave., N. Y. 11

—and what can possibly be lacking for a successful serial of life among the sophisticated sufferers? It becomes the final suitable pretentiousness that Mrs. Janeway subtitles her book "An Historical Novel, 1940-1942."

Mrs. Janeway's first novel, "The Walsh Girls," had very grave faults. It was tedious, over-internal, and achieved its effect of scale by the usual female trick of scaling what are presumed to be the heights of female emotion. "Daisy Kenyon" can be accused of none of these things. It is paced, externalized into action, and, quite the opposite of boasting its female sensibility, it boasts that there are some women who are just as much in the worldly know as some men. It is nevertheless so far inferior to Mrs. Janeway's earlier novel that at first glance one can scarcely connect the two performances. For, at least, whatever its moral-literary inadequacies, "The Walsh Girls" sounded a note of earnestness which we are accustomed to listen for as the distinction between a serious writing effort and commercialism; whereas "Daisy Kenyon" rings with all the hollowness of pure slickness. Only when one recalls that moral earnestness is itself becoming more and more the commercial taste, that sensibility is more and more a form of present-day slickness, does one begin to realize that perhaps the distance between Mrs. Janeway's first and second novels is not so great as appears on the surface.

Albert J. Guerard's "Maquisard" (Knopf, $2) is also a second novel which is inferior to its predecessor; but here the circumstances of the composition of the new book must be taken into account. Despite its unevenness and a certain imbalance between its two major themes, Mr. Guerard's "The Hunted" was one of the noteworthy novels of 1944, a book distinguished among current fiction for the quality both of its author's relation to his characters and of his social and moral insights; for instance, what Mr. Guerard had to say about college fraternities remains one of the fresh and significant statements about American life. "Maquisard," a very small novel about the maquis in the period following the liberation of France, has no such quality. It has no boldness or penetration; indeed, it is linear, oversimplified, even trite. But the fact that it is the product of Mr. Guerard's own period of service in France seems to me to make usual critical opinion irrelevant. I do not know whether "Maquisard" was actually written on the scene, but certainly it was written with no time or space for reflection, and I take it to be either a literary exercise—that is, an effort on Mr. Guerard's part to keep his hand in, to remember that he was a writer—or else a tribute exacted by association so personally felt that it denies one proper literary distance; or perhaps it was both. At any rate, the context and obviously modest intent of the performance demand that we suspend conventional judgment on it.

DIANA TRILLING

The New Statesman and Nation
England's Leading Weekly Review
may now be obtained through
THE NATION
20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.
Yearly subscription $6.50 including postage
SPECIMEN copy on request

CONCERTS

N. Y. CITY SYMPHONY LEONARD BERNSTEIN
MONDAY EVENING, NOV. 5, 8:30 and TUESDAY, NOV. 6, 6 p.m.
MENDELSSOHN'S Italian Symphony; HAYDEN'S Concerto for Cello and Orchestra; RANDAL THOMPSON'S Second Symphony.
NEW YORK CITY CENTER 131 WEST 55th STREET
TICKETS at Box Office, 90¢, $1.80, tax incl. F. H. LaGUARDIA, President

MOTION PICTURE

20th Century Fox presents
Rene Clair's
AND THEN THERE WERE NONE
Agatha Christie's masterpiece of suspense!
On Stage - - in Person!
CARL RAVAZZA
JAY JOSTYN • NICHOLAS BROTHERS
Extra! DAVE APOLLON
Now Playing ROXY 7th Ave. at 50th St.

STAGE PLAYS

MICHAEL TODD Presents
UP IN CENTRAL PARK
Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS Lyrics by DOROTHY FIELDS Music by SIGMUND ROMBERG
BROADWAY THEATRE, Broadway at 53rd Street. Matinees: WED. & SAT.

"DESERVES ITS GREAT SUCCESS!"—Nichols, Times
Rodgers and Hammerstein present
MADY CHRISTIANS • OSCAR HOMOLKA
in JOHN VAN DRUTEN'S
I REMEMBER MAMA
from Kathryn Forbes' "Mama's Bank Account"
with JOHN TETZEL • ADRIENNE GESSNER • RICHARD BISHOP
MUSIC BOX 45th Street, West of Broadway. Phone: Circle 6-4636
Eves. 8:35 Sharp. Mats. Thurs. and Sat. 2:35 Sharp

VICTORY
LOAN

MOTION PICTURES

RKO NOW

Manhattan
ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST.
86th ST.
58th ST. near Lex.
HAMILTON 125th ST.
REGENT
RIVERSIDE
23rd ST.
Bronx
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL
Westchester
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

"Fascinating Spy Film" —Herald-Tribune "Highly Dramatic" —N. Y. Times
'THE HOUSE ON 92ND STREET'
William EYTHE • Lloyd NOLAN • Signe HASSO
Exciting and Authentic Pictures of FBI Technique Used in Capturing German and Japanese Spies
— and —
'DIVORCE' Kay FRANCIS Bruce CABOT

Brooklyn
BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYOU Coney Island
Queens
ALDEN Jamaica
Keith's FLUSHING
Keith's RICH. HILL
STRAND Far Rockaway

"A Striking Drama, Bulging with Gusto" —Walter Winchell
'BACK TO BATAAN'
STARRING JOHN WAYNE
WITH ANTHONY QUINN
Thrilling Story of Native Guerrilla Fighters in the Philippines
— AND —
'RADIO STARS ON PARADE'
FRANCES LANGFORD • WALLY BROWN

FOREVER . . . Irresistibly Spellbound!
DAVID O. SELZNICK presents
INGRID BERGMAN
GREGORY PECK
in
ALFRED HITCHCOCK'S
Spellbound
ASTOR Broadway at 45th St.
Late showing every night

Art

CLEMENT GREENBERG

THERE having been a dearth of art along Fifty-seventh Street this past month, I trust Mr. Haggin will forgive me for poaching on his preserve. I want to protest against the omission of Anthony Tudor's realistic ballet "Dim Luster" from the last and present runs of the Ballet Theater at the Metropolitan. I know little about ballet, but "Dim Luster" seems to me one of the most original and successful works of art produced in the last five years—regardless of whether or not ballet is the very minor art form some assert it to be.

Like opera, ballet in this country is a rite, but not so much a social and financial as a cultural and sexual one. Like all latter-day rites, ballet has a remote point of departure, and there is little relation between life as lived in the audience and the notion of it conveyed from the stage. With opera, ballet belongs under the heading of what is called escapist art. But for a number of reasons which cannot be gone into here, ballet is not quite so uncompromisingly escapist. For one thing, it is less archaeological and more folkloristic.

The remarkable thing about Anthony Tudor's ballets is that at times they actually try to deal, in cogent terms, with some of the issues that right here and now agitate the private lives of a good section of the ballet audience.

True, in most of his works Tudor is either too pretentious—in a Weimar Republic, depth-psychological sort of way—or too cute, although even I can discern the brilliance of the choreography in almost everything he does. But in "Dim Luster" he delivers himself for the first time purely and inevitably; here his art bites off exactly as much as it can chew, not too much and not too little. The choreography is a sublimation of the ballroom, the kind of dancing most natural to the audience itself and the kind, after jitterbugging, most popularly alive. The story is not injected into the dancing, nor is the dancing superimposed upon the story. Every element, including the décor and Richard Strauss's slightly dissonant music—which alludes to and parodies ballroom music—flows into and out of every other element.

The scene is a ball: a couple in white among other couples, striding and whirling. During a slight pause someone puts his hand on the male partner's arm, which suddenly brings some memory out of his past. His body freezes in its momentary pose, while his partner stands wondering. Then the floor empties, the lights go down, and he is left to dance alone in front of the skilfully contrived illusion of a mirror, on the other side of which another dancer, dressed exactly as he is, dances back the illusion of his reflection. Then, as the lights go dimly up, a girl dressed in pale green appears, and she and the man dance together: his first sweetheart—innocence, enthusiasm, illusion, etc. The dance finishes, the lights go off and on again, returning the man to the ballroom and his partner. A moment later the latter too receives a flash of memory, from a dropped handkerchief, and she goes through the same pantomime, likewise dances with the wraith of her first sweetheart, and is then returned to the ballroom and her partner. This happens to both dancers two or three times, each time with a different lover out of their respective pasts, as in memory they advance from innocence to what I take to be sin and responsibility. In the intervals, when they are together in the ballroom, they grow more and more bored with each other, and by the time the curtain falls are dancing with the perfunctoriness of indifference and alienation. Punkt.

"Dim Luster" contains a rather dark view of contemporary sexual relations. The narcissistic passages offer a clue to a meaning underneath the obvious one, which is merely that the past is perfect while the present is incomplete. No, the partners are each in love with their respective selves, and because they are in love with their selves, they are in love with their own sex. Thus they may really be in love with each other's past, with the men or women the other has had. (Marlene Dietrich sings a song that goes "My past that makes you hate me makes you love me too.") The final impression is that the triumph of homosexual over heterosexual love is being celebrated; a homosexual pattern is shown imposing itself on a heterosexual situation.

This seems to me to be something much more realistic than anything ballet has ever dared to do before. It has behind it the courage of the truth, for the tendency toward the homosexualization of all sex in our society is becoming more and more apparent. What is involved is not simply homosexuality as such but the devaluation of love and sexual relations in general. Perhaps this is why the audience has rejected "Dim Luster"—it would not have been withdrawn for any other reason than lack of public approval. The audience does not want to be told anything about its own life, it does not want realism; it wants its art high-flown and fancy.

That one of the most original works of art of our small moment should have proved unpalatable to a presumably literate audience is—to use the first cliché that comes to hand—one of the saddest commentaries upon the present state of art-consumption.

Records

B. H. HAGGIN

THOUGH I could not attend Victor's demonstration of its unbreakable plastic record to the press, I was able to obtain one of the records that had been played on that occasion—part of the new Koussevitzky-Boston Symphony recording of Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel"; and later I received my review copy of the complete set of two records (DV-1; $4.50).

The review copy enabled me to hear what the plastic record sounds like when new. For one thing it has almost no surface noise; and this by itself would probably cause the recorded sound to stand out more clearly and cleanly than on the shellac record. But in addition the plastic record seems to take the extremely fine impression of high vibration—frequencies that the shellac record does not take (I judge by the difference between the sound from a plastic pressing of a Toscanini recording that Victor issued to record-critics a couple of years ago, and the less brilliant sound from the shellac pressing that it issued to the public); and I think it is these additional high frequencies that give the sound of the Boston Symphony performance its amazing beauty, brilliance, and sharpness of definition.

But I was interested also in what the plastic record sounds like after it is played—whether, in particular, those fine impressions of the high-frequencies remain or are destroyed. The noise-producing abrasive mineral filler of the shellac record had the purpose of keeping the impression of the recording from being destroyed by the abrasive effect of the needle in the heavy pickups that were used in phonographs until quite recently; and one of the things that prevented the substitution of plastics—for example, of vinylite, on which that Toscanini recording was pressed for record-critics—was their inability to resist this destructive effect of the heavy pickups in hundreds of thousands of existing machines. When, therefore, Victor announced its plastic record I inquired whether the plastic was vinylite, and if so whether it had been made resistant to the effect of heavy pickups. My questions were referred to the engineering division; and no answers have arrived thus far. But the Victor representative from whom I obtained the demonstration record thought it was made of the same plastic as the Army V-discs, which were made of vinylite; and the demonstration record itself provided one of the answers—for there are more than one—to my question about the effect of heavy pickups.

The record was one of a number that had been played at the demonstration to show, among other things, that the plastic records work with automatic record-changers. The pickup on the changer of the machine on which they had been played had, I discovered, a permanent sapphire point; and it weighed, I also discovered, about two ounces—which was twice what I had always been told was safe with a sapphire point even on shellac records (that is, the excessive weight would cause excessive wear on the sapphire, which eventually would begin to produce excessive wear on records). The machine had presumably been used to play shellac records, and my demonstration record may have been played with the sapphire worn down by this previous use; on the other hand it may have been played with a new sapphire; in either case the sapphire point, worn or new—in a pickup which weighed two ounces and exerted the side-pressures of a record-changer—had erased enough of the high frequencies on the first part of one side of my demonstration record, to rob it of the richness and brilliance of the corresponding passage on the new record. Only that first part of one side had been damaged; the rest was like new, and I would guess had not been played: the record-changer had been set working and had substituted another record.

Possibly a changer with an unworn sapphire point in a one-ounce pickup would be safe; but possibly the changer's side-pressures would still be destructive. Certainties about this type of changer, or about the older type with a heavy pickup and chromium needle, would require tests which I am not able to make.

I was, however, able to test the effect of a heavy pickup that is not part of a record-changer. Picking a brilliant phrase of the high violins on the demonstration record, I played it thirty times with a two-ounce Astatic Tru-Tan and a new Victor chromium needle; and I then found—by a comparison with the same phrase on the new record—that this had not produced the slightest loss in brilliance. But I am fairly certain that there would have been a loss if the chromium needle had been worn down by many previous playings of shellac records, or if the needle had been a misnamed "permanent" sapphire or alloy that had been used on a couple of hundred thousand shellac records. (Victor and Columbia chromium needles, incidentally, are worn down much more quickly than they used to be, and must be watched very carefully and removed at the first trace of fuzziness in the sound.)

The engineer to whom I talk about these matters raised a question that had not occurred to me. "People may be willing to pay $2 instead of $1 for a record that gives them the music without surface noise and with greater clarity and brilliance of sound. But I can't figure out how that doubled price is necesary on the basis of cost. When you consider the costs that enter into the $.60 the retail dealer pays for the one-dollar shellac record—the artist's fee; the cost of recording studio, equipment, and engineers; the cost of manufacturing plant, machinery, and labor; the cost of promotion and sales; other overhead costs—all of which remain the same whether the recording is pressed on shellac or on vinylite; and then when you come to materials, you can see that vinylite might cost twice as much as shellac, or three times as much"—or ten times as much, an industrial chemist interjected—"and it would not push the price up to $1.20 to the dealer and $2 to the public." And the chemist doubted that vinylite actually was at all more expensive than shellac today.

A last fact about the new record: one usually has to clean the dust out of the grooves of a shellac record before the first playing; but the plastic record has to be cleaned before each playing. (The method I use is to press one edge of a soft-bristled handbrush lightly on the rotating record.)

And finally a word about the Koussevitzky-Boston Symphony performance of "Till Eulenspiegel": the playing of the orchestra is a pleasure to the ear; but Koussevitzky heavily underlines every point with tempos that knock the work out of shape and destroy the continuity of its flow.

LANGUAGE IS POWER
. . . Forge ahead, win special assignments, promotion, better job in global peace time opportunities through ability to speak a foreign language.
MASTER A NEW LANGUAGE quickly, easily, correctly by
LINGUAPHONE
The world-famous Linguaphone Conversational Method brings voices of native teachers INTO YOUR OWN HOME. You learn the new language by LISTENING. It's amazingly simple; thousands have succeeded. ◆ ◆ 29 LANGUAGES
Send for Free book, Call for Free demonstration
LINGUAPHONE INSTITUTE
81 RCA Bldg., New York 20 • Circle 7-0830

BOOKS FOUND FREE/
WHAT BOOKS DO YOU WANT?
We quote lowest market prices. No charge for locating Hard-to-Find and Out-of-Print Books. All books. OLD or NEW, mailed POST-FREE.
SEARCHLIGHT BOOK NATION
22 East 17th Street, New York City

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

For a Postwar Future
BUY BONDS!

Alcoholics ARE Sick People

ROBERT V. SELIGER, M.D.
Assistant Visiting Psychiatrist
JOHNS HOPKINS HOSPITAL
(An educational pocket-size monograph sent in a plain envelope.)

Book Dealers' Agent
REMINGTON PUTNAM CO.
Baltimore 1, Md.

ALCOHOLISM PUBLICATIONS
2030 Park Avenue, Baltimore 17, Md.

Please send: ALCOHOLICS ARE SICK PEOPLE.

☐ copies $2.00 cloth bound

Name..
Address..
....

Letters to the Editors

A Foolish Thing

Dear Sirs: The army openly invited a race riot in New York last week when it ordered Negro troops to load the big British liner Queen Elizabeth, on which rank-and-file strikers of the International Longshoremen's Association had refused to work. Employment of the troops was an attempt at strike-breaking by the army, with colored soldiers forced to assume the role of scabs.

Violent race conflicts have often originated in the replacement of white strikers by Negro workers. The army, which has fostered racial antagonism in its own ranks by Jim Crow policies, did a foolish thing in a highly explosive labor situation. ALBON P. MAN, JR.

Hollis, N. Y., October 19

$625 a Year

Dear Sirs: The Southern Tenant Farmers' Union, with headquarters in Memphis, Tennessee, has asked for support for its campaign to win a guaranteed $625 minimum annual wage for share-croppers, tenant farmers, and wage hands in the cotton country. The union reports that 60 per cent of the farm families in Arkansas earned less than $400 in cash during the war-boom year of 1944. The planters are seeing to it that earnings go even lower this year. They have been instrumental in having ceilings imposed on cotton pickers' wages in parts of Mississippi, Arkansas, and Texas (under the Economic Stabilization Act) which fix the upper limit of pay for a ten-hour day at $2 to $2.50. A laborer on a cotton plantation averages only 125 days' work a year in normal times.

The people in the cotton country are determined that they shall not be driven back to the misery of the 1930's. Their campaign for $625 a year, guaranteed by contract with the employers, should demonstrate to the nation that there must be improvement in the grave economic problems of the South. The men and women of the Southern Tenant Farmers' Union have shown that they have the courage to challenge the system which has enslaved them. We cannot do that job for our share-cropper friends but we can help.

The National Share-Croppers' Fund gives aid to democratically controlled and locally directed organizations in the South which constructively tackle the evils from which the farmers of the South suffer. We need $25,000 immediately to support the new struggle of the share-croppers for a $625 annual wage. If you want to back them up, send us your gift.

EDUARD C. LINDEMAN, Chairman

New York, October 3

In the Track of Trade

Dear Sirs: Would some Nation reader please send in again for publication that famous poem about America's conquest of the Philippines in 1898 which begins:

> If you see an island shore
> Which has not been grabbed before,
> Lying in the track of trade
> As islands should, etc., etc.

Not only is this poem applicable to the campaign of our present-day imperialists for American annexation of Pacific islands, but I myself have need of it for a new book I am writing. It should be kept before the public.

AGNES SMEDLEY

Saratoga Springs, N. Y., August 25

Winter in Saint-Dié

Dear Sirs: May I call the attention of your readers to the agonizing condition of one French city, Saint-Dié in the Vosges Mountains? Saint-Dié, which was formerly represented in Parliament by my uncle, M. Jules Ferry, was utterly and wantonly destroyed by the Germans last November, a week before its liberation by the Americans.

Saint-Dié has close ties with your country. It was here that in 1507 a local printer was the first to use the word "America" to designate the new continent, discovered, as he thought, by Amerigo Vespucci. More recently our contacts with America have been frequent and cordial. In 1939, on the occasion of the New York World's Fair, our mayor and city council were invited to the United States and were received by President Roosevelt.

On November 8 and 9, 1944, most of the inhabitants of Saint-Dié were evacuated by the Germans, 970 men being sent to Mannheim. The city was then methodically pillaged. Night and day trucks bearing the inscription Don de la ville de Saint-Dié aux sinistrés de l'Allemagne carried off our belongings. From November 13 to November 17 Saint-Dié was burned to the ground; where fire did not work, dynamite was used. Fifteen men found in hiding were shot. When American soldiers entered Saint-Dié on November 23 they found smoking ruins where formerly a historic and prosperous city of 17,000 souls had stood. The inhabitants, returning to their homes, found in most cases that they had lost everything they owned: 10,585 persons in Saint-Dié face the coming severe winter of the Vosges without proper shelter, without clothing, without food (the fields are mined and the cattle gone), without heat (the woodlands are also mined).

Is there anything America can do to help the people of Saint-Dié?

MME ABEL FERRY

Paris, France, October 1

Negroes on Buses

Dear Sirs: As a North Carolinian who has traveled much by bus in the South I share every emotion that Edgar Brooke described in his piece in The Nation of October 6. I am also aware that all the things he observed are exactly as he related them. None the less, I should like to offer a minority report.

Item. "The passengers reacted to this episode with apathy; no one said a word." How does Mr. Brooke know that all the passengers were apathetic? Silence does not necessarily denote apathy —or agreement. I have a hunch that some of the white passengers were decidedly uncomfortable. Some people keep quiet in such circumstances because they feel that any words they may say would only hurt the Negro worse. I have often heard even the most "superiority-conscious" Southerners express their distaste for such scenes. The one thing, it seems to me, that should not be overlooked is that most white Southerners—like most Negro Southerners—want above all to avoid conflict.

Item. Most drivers do not, so far as I have observed, make Negroes stand when there are white people standing, provided there are seats in the rear for Negro occupancy. Furthermore, in all my years of bus riding I have never seen a single white passenger ask a Negro to rise. (I know, of course, that it has happened.) Similarly I have never seen a bus driver—and I am familiar with the type Mr. Brooke mentions—ask a Negro to give his seat to a specific white man or woman. I have seen them request Negroes, with varying degrees of politeness, to move farther back when in the course of the trip white people entered who would have had to sit to the rear of the Negroes. (Incidentally, it is not uncommon to see white men and women sitting on the back seat with Negroes while Negroes occupy a couple of seats ahead. It seems that for their own convenience they can put up with the Negroes' presence.) In North Carolina and Virginia I have often seen Negroes sitting farther front than the state laws permitted—and without any kind of comment from other passengers or drivers.

Item. It was unpardonable for the bus driver to shout: "You, nigger, get off that bus!" In fairness, however, to the Greyhound lines, many of whose practices I can see no sense in, I have seen, at least ten times, a bus driver refuse to permit men who had been drinking to enter. Of these all but one were white. I have seen bus drivers in their petty-dictator role refuse without apparent reason to let passengers with tickets enter, even when there were still seats available, but I have as often seen white people rejected as Negroes.

I feel that Mr. Brooke is too pessimistic about the future of relationships between Negroes and whites. Without being an idealist one can still report many incidents on the credit side of the ledger.

A story told by Lillian Smith, author of "Strange Fruit," in, I think, South Today is one that almost any liberal Southerner could duplicate. I tell the story from memory. In a crowded bus from Atlanta to Columbia, South Carolina, one seat is vacant—beside a Negro woman in the center of the bus. A blustering man enters, sees the seat, orders the woman to move to the rear. She explains that she is not well and that the vibration over the rear wheels would make her condition worse. The state laws of Georgia and South Carolina are of course on the white man's side. A gentle lady—a Georgian—gets up, addresses the man, saying, "Sir, won't you have my seat?" She sits down beside the Negro woman. The significant thing to me is that at the destination everyone on the bus—except the blusterer—took the trouble to thank the Georgia woman for what she had done.

C. P.

Harrisburg, Pa., October 10

Deadly Parallels

Dear Sirs: Our Military Government men in Germany must have studied the lessons of World War I, including the memoirs of General Henry T. Allen, who was in charge of American troops in the Rhineland, 1919-23. For in no way do their ideas differ from those of Allied generals then. General Allen and other Allied occupation authorities took the position that the ablest pro-democratic German was hopelessly "inefficient" and that Junkers, industrialists, and Wilhelm-appointed bureaucrats were the boys to work with in saving the world for democracy.

General Allen wrote: "The German bureaucracy was a carefully selected body of officials with reasonable prospects of life tenure, and in consequence supervision of their work was a far simpler matter than actual government by Allied officials would have been. . . . The counsel of moderation won the day, and most of the old officials remained at their posts." Allen was happy because "trained and responsible officials could transmit and carry out orders better than agents of workmen's councils." This fraternization at the top was "welcomed by officials, who regarded our presence as of great assistance to them in enforcing their authority."

Certain naive pro-democratic Germans protested that this was nullifying the purpose for which the war had been fought and proposed that elections be held to select new officials. But Allied generals continued to support their favorites, and, said General Allen, "the local authorities were . . . notified that these elections would not be held."

Still less were the Allied generals willing to give the German people an opportunity to deal with their militarist exploiters with bullets. After the Armistice democratic forces in Germany were disarmed, and loyal supporters of the Kaiser's old order were armed. Lloyd George, Pershing, and Clemenceau testify—without apology—that the General Staff was left with machine-guns to be used in putting down possible democratic demonstrations. As General Allen observed, the "Allied armies, enemies as they were, were far preferable to the anarchy of the Spartacists and Bolsheviks."

Naturally some joy gatherers will dispute the validity of the parallels I've indicated. They'll say that today we have General Ike and then we only had Black Jack. Nevertheless Robert Murphy, the man who first used the "efficiency" fascist-protecting formula in North Africa, is still General Eisenhower's guide in such matters. True, the General recently spanked two-gun Patton. But not until alert newspapermen and the American public had done it first.

Is there still another parallel to come? Allied occupation methods in 1919-23 helped to keep militarists in power and to bring on World War II.

WALTER WILSON

East Chatham, N. Y., September 28

A Shoe for a Shoe

Dear Sirs: I've been stationed in Italy and Germany for almost two years. During this time I've visited several refugee centers. The sharp contrast between the living conditions of refugees and those of German civilians makes me wonder whether we realize the true meaning of "justice" and "humanity."

If the Nazis have robbed the rest of the civilized world of all material goods, why in the name of justice and humanity doesn't the AMG requisition clothing from German civilians for the thousands of displaced persons? The clothing could be requisitioned on a proportional basis from each community through the Bürgermeisters and distributed by UNRRA. Clothing from all

FREE to All AUTO owners

AUTOMOBILE
USER'S GUIDE with wartime suggestions

196 PRACTICAL SUGGESTIONS

that will help you to get ☞ better gas mileage

☞ longer tire life
☞ better performance
☞ lower upkeep costs

Get a FREE COPY from any General Motors dealer, or use coupon below.

Customer Research Dept., Room 1817
GENERAL MOTORS, DETROIT 2, MICH.

Please send FREE COPY of new edition 64-page "Automobile User's Guide"—containing 196 practical suggestions on care and operation.

Mr.
Mrs. ....
Miss
please print

Address ....
please print

City .... Zone State

Make of car
now owned .... year model

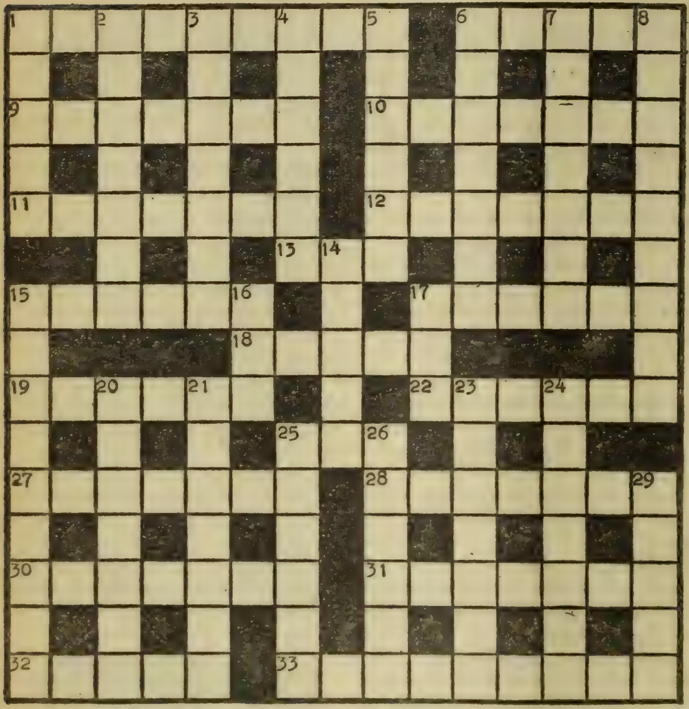
11

Crossword Puzzle No. 133

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 Invention which literally blew the baron of old out of his castle
6 Reputedly the greatest of all operatic prima donnas
9 Like the glamorous movie star after a ducking (4 & 3)
10 Though the speakers illustrate their meaning at these lectures, audiences are left very much in the dark
11 Side of the coin containing the head
12 Foolish fellows who may find themselves in the soup
13 No end of a fellow
15 Hands off!
17 German gun
18 You, I and the cat go to town
19 Making some progress in the boat, despite quarrelling
22 It cannot make a man, save on some worn-out plan
25 Swallowed
27 Don't tell married men these can't lie; they know the naked truth
28 What we call trucks the British call this 30 The widest but not the highest falls
31 Examined closely
32 "When Adam -----d, and Eve span, Who was then the gentleman?"
33 A brain specialist, of sorts, in Rabelais' Gargantua

DOWN

1 Clown in The Merchant of Venice
2 The Lost City of Assyria
3 The junk man might collect this from the golfer (3 & 4)
4 English poet and essayist (1631-1700)
5 Exchanged for an Oliver
6 First mortal female that ever lived
7 Multiplies by three
8 Where it would not seem to matter how poor the traveler was 14 Live—but only just 15 "On with the dance, Let joy be ---------" (not from Childe Harold)
16 Studied hard (slang)
17 A very inconstant creature, Plato decided 20 Bird: first name Walter until L was knocked out of it
21 Give an account of 23 Run fast
24 One who joins up
25 Sideways: ask an insect
26 Official residence of French presidents in Paris
29 Taken in an argument

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 132

ACROSS:—1 COMET; 4 DEVIL; 7 HOPE; 9 ARISEN; 10 AMEND; 12 KENT; 13 DOOR; 15 FIDGETS; 17 MUCKLE; 18 HOMAGE; 19 ARM; 21 LUMINAL; 23 ARTISTE; 24 LAC; 26 SYLVIA; 28 MERINO; 31 NUBBLES; 32 OBOE; 35 OSLO; 36 UNLET; 37 ENCORE; 38 ENID; 39 LINER; 40 TARTS.

DOWN:—1 CERT; 2 MASHIE; 3 TANAGER; 4 DEARTH; 5 VIED; 6 LIDO; 7 HOKUM; 8 PANIC; 11 NOMADS; 14 REEVE; 15 FLANDIN; 16 SORTIES; 19 ALL; 20 MAC; 21 LASSO; 22 MILTON; 25 AMBIENT; 27 AUSTER; 28 MERCER; 29 IBSEN; 30 OVOID; 33 BULL; 34 ELAN; 35 ORES.

organized relief agencies will apparently be too little and too late for the rigors of this winter. Are we going to let the wretched D. P.'s freeze to death while the closets of German civilians bulge with clothing? Why can't we at least take a shirt for a shirt; a shoe for a shoe? CPL. SIDNEY STENZLER

September 5

Rimmer Material

Dear Sirs: I am engaged upon a life of the painter, sculptor, and anatomist Dr. William Rimmer of Boston. I would be very grateful if anyone knowing of the existence of paintings, drawings, letters, or other material relative to Dr. Rimmer would communicate with me. He was active in Providence, New York, and Boston between 1860 and 1878.

LINCOLN KIRSTEIN

New York, October 11

Where to Get It

Dear Sirs: Those of your readers who are interested in combating anti-Semitism may be interested to know that the famous and effective "Memorandum on Anti-Semitism" by Philip Wylie has been reprinted from the American Mercury and is now available on receipt of a stamped addressed envelope sent to the Community Church of Boston, 3 Joy Street, Boston 8, Massachusetts.

JAMES H. LEWIS
President of the Community Church

Boston, October 19

CONTRIBUTORS

BENJAMIN HARROW is professor of biochemistry at the College of the City of New York.

ROLFE HUMPHRIES is author of "The Summer Landscape," "Europa and Other Poems," and "Out of the Jewel." He translated García Lorca's posthumous collection of poems, "The Poet in New York," and edited with M. J. Benardete the Loyalist anthology "And Spain Sings."

DELMORE SCHWARTZ is the author of "Shenandoah," "In Dreams Begin Responsibilities," and "The Imitation of Life and Other Problems of Literary Criticism."

ROBERT P. LANE is executive director of the Welfare Council of New York City.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 161 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • NOVEMBER 10, 1945 NUMBER 19

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 481

EDITORIALS

Get Our Troops Out of China 483
Wage-Price Equation 483
A Nation Forum on Atomic Power 484

ARTICLES

Portents in Egypt by Michael Clark 485
No Homes for Veterans by Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr. 486
Britain and the Bomb by Aylmer Vallance 488
The Myth of Patrick J. Hurley by Máxwell S. Stewart 489
A Lecture to Liberals by Reinhold Niebuhr 491
Revolt in Asia: II—Indonesia by Andrew Roth 493
In the Wind 495
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison 496
The People's Front by Del Vayo 497

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Karl Shapiro's Poetics by Delmore Schwartz 498
Study of the Jews by Meyer Levin 498
Peace and Law by Albert Guerard 500
Briefer Comment 503
Films by James Agee 506
Records by B. H. Haggin 506

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 507

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 134 by Jack Barrett 508

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor J. KING GORDON
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

European Editor: J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates
LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS
CAREY MCWILLIAMS REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

SINCE FREEDOM FROM WANT IS FUNDAMENTAL to the enjoyment of other freedoms, and since the pressure of hunger is a standing menace to peace, it is fitting that the Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO) should be the first of the United Nations satellite groups to start operations. Meeting at Quebec at the end of October, the organization adopted a charter which has already been signed by more than thirty nations, elected officers, and began discussions of its monumental task. FAO will collect and distribute information regarding nutrition, food, and agriculture, provide on request technical assistance to member governments, and prepare and recommend to "the appropriate authorities" positive measures to improve the production and distribution of food and other farm products. Naturally there was some controversy at the conference about where to begin. Countries with the most advanced farming practices—the United States, Canada, Australia, and Denmark, among others—were particularly concerned about prospective surpluses and urged the promotion by FAO of international controls which would stabilize prices. On the other hand, China and India, whose great problem is to increase productive efficiency and so raise the deplorably low living standards of their people, proposed that for the time being attention should be concentrated on supplying technical assistance. Countries which must import much of their food, such as Britain, also appeared uneasy about measures which might restrict supplies or raise prices against them.

*

THE SOLUTION FOR THIS DIVISION OF INTERESTS lies in recognition of the fact that the problem of overproduction is simply the reverse face of underconsumption. And in choosing Sir John Boyd Orr as director general of FAO for the next two years, the conference picked a man who can be depended upon never to lose sight of this neglected truism. Orr is one of the brilliant group of nutritionists who contributed so much to the success of Britain's war-time food program. Outstanding as a scientist and organizer, he also has a broad social vision. In his first statement as director general he hit hard at "the nineteenth-century economics of scarcity" and declared that FAO's primary objective must be to feed a hungry world able to consume all the food that can be produced. "Finances," he said, "won't stop us. Everything that is physically possible and is desirable is also financially possible." Under such leadership we may hope for international measures which will insure that food is never again deliberately destroyed in one country while people elsewhere die of famine.

TWO NEW STEPS IN ITS SOCIALIZATION PROGRAM have been announced by Britain's Labor government. All air-transport services and airports used for regularly scheduled traffic are to be state owned and operated, and the huge communications company, Cables and Wireless Limited, is to be nationalized. Neither of these proposals can be called an attack on free enterprise, for both services have been in the hands of monopolies in which the government held a financial interest and over which it exercised at least partial control. In the field of air transport a number of experiments have been made, since commercial flying began, to achieve a satisfactory set-up in Britain for air transport. Both free competition and controlled private monopoly failed to produce really effective services. Shortly before its end the National Government put forward plans for a mixed system, with a publicly owned corporation operating empire and transatlantic services, and the railroads and shipping companies given a participation in companies flying European and South American routes. This scheme was widely criticized and now, in accordance with its election pledge to socialize all forms of public transport, the Labor government has decided that post-war reorganization of air routes must be based on full public ownership.

*

SOCIALIZATION OF COMMUNICATIONS HAD NOT been so clearly indicated by the Labor Party program, but it is certainly a logical step. The Cables and Wireless merger was consummated during the inter-war period under the auspices of a Conservative government. Perhaps the primary motive was to save the cable services, with their imperial and strategic significance, from being put out of business by radio transmission. But a secondary result was the continued payment of interest and dividends on assets which had become obsolete. The acquisition by the government of a minority interest with the right to appoint a director made little apparent difference to the operations and financial workings of the combine. Now that outright acquisition is proposed, the company's board is protesting vociferously that the plan is "impracticable and unworkable," and also "dangerous to the foreign concessions." This is a point of interest to the United States, which has, in fact, been pressing Britain to abandon such concessions as that which gives Cables and Wireless a monopoly of the external communications of Saudi Arabia. On November 19 a conference between America, Britain, and the Dominions on international communications is to be held in Bermuda. Since the British delegation will now be able to approach the problems involved purely from the point of view of national interest, and without regard to the vested interests of private capital, the chances of a satisfactory agreement should be enhanced.

*

THE QUESTION OF MULTI-POWER CONTROL of Japan should hinge on two considerations. First, will it help to kill the roots of aggression in Japan? Second, will it narrow the American-Soviet rift which threatens the rickety structure of international peace? On both scores a five-power council with supervisory authority sitting in Tokyo would be a marked improvement over an advisory council sitting in impotent isolation in Washington. Such a shift would seem to be indicated by Secretary Byrnes's statement of October 31: "We cannot have the kind of cooperation necessary for peace in a world divided into spheres of exclusive influence and special privilege." This is as applicable to Japan as it is to the Balkans. We certainly cannot argue that Australia, China, and Russia have a less lively interest than we in preventing the resurgence of Japanese strength. Their participation should help speed up the process of purging and reorganizing Japan. Further, the presence of these powers in Tokyo would tend to stiffen the American attitude toward the Emperor. The Russians, in particular, might modify our inclination to favor the genteel members of the Zaibatsu, the bureaucracy, and the aristocracy and to ignore the democratic possibilities among the more rough-hewn tenant farmers and industrial laborers. It is true that multi-power supervision is more cumbersome than single-power control, but the whole process of international cooperation is complicated and requires patience. The most promising arrangement would be a joint supervisory council with an American chairman, to whom wide discretion should be given.

*

AMERICAN TEACHERS MIGHT BE BETTER OFF in many cases if they went to Japan. For the directive on education issued to the Japanese government by Supreme Allied Headquarters says:

> Teachers and educational officials who have been dismissed, suspended, or forced to resign for liberal or antimilitaristic opinions or activities will be declared immediately eligible for, and if properly qualified will be given preference in, reappointment.
>
> Discrimination against any student, teacher, or educational official on grounds of race, nationality, creed, political opinion, or social position, will be prohibited, and immediate steps will be taken to correct inequities which have resulted from such discriminations.
>
> Students, teachers, and educational officials will be encouraged to evaluate critically and intelligently the content of instruction and will be permitted to engage in free and unrestricted discussion of issues involving political, civil, and religious liberties.

It is enough to make a Texas or New York teacher wonder why Supreme Allied Headquarters can't liberate him too.

*

THE SATISFACTION OF KNOWING THAT VARGAS has at last been put out of office is tempered by news of the prominent role which General Goes Monteiro, Minister of National Defense, played in the Brazilian coup. Of the pro-Nazi Brazilians, whose activities during the war were a cause of constant apprehension to the Allies, Goes Monteiro was perhaps the most conspicuous. It is true that Senhor José Linhares, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, who will serve as interim President until elections are held on December 2, has a clean record. It is also reassuring that the chairman of the National Democratic Action, former Foreign Minister Octavio Mangabeira, has flatly denied any parallel with events in Argentina and has described the overthrow of Vargas as a "genuine civic accomplishment." But we are perennially skeptical about Latin America's army-promoted "democratic revolutions." The Nation had scarcely appeared on the newsstands with a warning against a premature celebration of Perón's downfall, when word came that Perón was already back in office, more powerfully entrenched than before. In the case of Brazil such a quick set-back for the democratic forces is less likely. The elections will probably be held. A democratic reorganization is possible. But we would feel happier—and the Brazilian people would too—if Getulio Vargas had taken along with him his bosom companion of the Hitler hey-day, the ambitious and unscrupulous Goes Monteiro.

Get Our Troops Out of China

THE Navy Day speech of President Truman was inadequate in many respects, but the fundamental principles he enunciated would serve admirably as a basis for making over this country's policy toward China. Take, for example, Point 4: "We believe that all peoples who are prepared for self-government should be permitted to choose their own government by their own freely expressed choice, without interference from any foreign source." The question of democratic rights is one of the main issues in dispute today in China. By and large it is the parties of the left—the coalition of groups making up the Democratic League and the Communists—which have been urging free elections and an extension of civil rights. The Chungking government, while making some concessions, has resisted these basic demands. Yet as Maxwell S. Stewart shows in his article on Hurley's record on another page, the United States has not only failed to back the Democratic League but is using American armed forces to support Chungking in its attempt to establish its authority over the only sections of China where elections of any kind have been held.

It is obvious that the President did not have China in mind when he made his pronouncement; otherwise, he might have expressed some of the points quite differently. But a change in phraseology would not alter the fact that our recent policy in China is incompatible with our protestations of democratic faith. In using the armed forces of the United States to support one side of a domestic quarrel, we are committing the very act we denounce with moral fervor when it occurs in Hungary, Rumania, or Bulgaria. Nor can this conduct be excused on the ground that our intervention is on a minor scale. In addition to the American troops stationed in China at the end of the war, we have dispatched some 50,000 marines to take over control in the partisan-dominated areas of North China and have assembled transport planes from the entire Pacific area to ferry Kuomintang troops into the districts seized by the marines. The United States Seventh Fleet, supported by carrier aircraft, has landed an American-equipped veteran Kuomintang army at Chingwantao, a vital port previously held by the partisans. It is reported that the United States has equipped thirty Chungking divisions for the North China campaign, and American air-force personnel is being recruited for Chiang's army.

While it would be difficult to prove that civil strife would have been avoided if the United States had maintained strict neutrality in China, the assurance of American backing must inevitably have encouraged the Kuomintang militarists to seek a showdown at this time. Without American assistance Chiang had no means of getting his forces north of the Yellow River. His troops are weary of war and, deprived of the prospect of help, he would probably have been willing to accept Communist control of North China rather than risk hostilities. But when it became apparent that, under the guise of disarming the Japanese, American forces could be used to dispute the Eighth Route Army's position in the north, the Kuomintang generals naturally jumped at the opportunity.

The longer our troops remain the more difficult it will be to take them out. An impossible situation has been created by the planting of a number of Kuomintang islands in areas that have long been dominated by the partisans. If the United States insists on maintaining these areas for Chungking, it must be prepared to shoulder the responsibilities of permanent occupation. Each day our soldiers remain increases the danger that American blood will be shed in a war against the Chinese on their own soil, and that the United States will be involved in a situation such as the British faced in Greece a year ago.

This country cannot pull out of China's affairs, but it can use its immense influence to promote unity and encourage democratic tendencies. Two immediate steps should be taken. First and most important is the immediate withdrawal of American troops. Even now this move might check the further spread of civil war in China since Chiang Kai-shek has not formally declared his hand by denouncing the Eighth Route Army leaders as "traitors." The second necessary step is the prompt replacement of Ambassador Hurley by a man of liberal tendencies who will restore the policies pursued by General Stilwell and Ambassador Gauss. Only by prompt action, both diplomatic and military, can we undo the harm our recent course in China has brought about.

Wage-Price Equation

PRESIDENT TRUMAN in his radio speech on wages and prices was obviously attempting to maintain his chosen position in the middle of the road. But it was equally obvious that political and economic pressures were slowly pushing him toward the left. Realization of this fact caused the sharpest outburst of criticism from conservative elements in the press and Congress that he has yet encountered. Accusations that the President was yielding to labor pressure, that he was being taken into camp by the apostles of the "new economy," were freely expressed. The honeymoon period is over, and the hopes that stirred so many reactionary breasts after the death of Roosevelt are fading again. The New Deal, it appears, in spite of setbacks is still vigorous; so much so, indeed, that even diehards are awakening to the horrid truth that it was not just a one-man show but a broad, deep trend in national history.

The last group, perhaps, to accept this fact will be the Congressional reactionaries of both parties. To them the President spoke sharply during his broadcast, putting on them responsibility for delaying legislation needed to ease reconversion and provide means to forestall a postwar depression. Two important measures are now stalled in the House of Representatives—the bill increasing the amount and scope of unemployment compensation, which has been put in cold storage by the Ways and Means Committee, and the Murray Full Employment bill, to which the House Expenditures Committee is giving such desultory consideration that Secretary of the Treasury Vinson's suggestion of "filibustering" appears fully justified. Another Congressional move protested by the President was the current attempt to kill the United States Employment Service and leave its functions to the state, although many of them have no machinery for the purpose. As Mr. Truman said, the service will be indispensable in the months ahead, when under the most favorable circumstances unemployment is bound to be heavy.

On the subject of wages the President afforded some disappointment to both sides, but on balance he supported the claims now being put forward by many unions. True, he discouraged proposals for increases in hourly wage rates that would compensate fully for reductions in war-time take-home pay. Nevertheless he emphasized strongly the importance for the whole economy of checking the current shrinkage in the national wage envelope. He pointed out that tax and other concessions to business had provided it with an ample cushion against temporary losses and declared that a great many industries could well afford to give moderate increases in wages without passing the cost on to their customers.

In his arguments for holding the price line while allowing elasticity to wages, Mr. Truman stressed the importance of maintaining volume. Elsewhere in this issue Keith Hutchison discusses the tendency of industry to seek a wage-price equation that positively discourages high production. We are glad to see that the influence of the Administration is being thrown against this practice. The President's generalized statement of the case has been well amplified by Chester Bowles, who pointed out that "in industry after industry we have seen wages and other costs absorbed as volume soared and profits moved to levels several times higher than prewar. We should not underestimate the tremendous extent of the cost savings which will result from the huge volume which lies ahead in peace-time production."

There is, we think, no doubt at all that if industry will go ahead and produce, without damaging its future markets by price increases and pay cuts, before next year is very old it will find present prices quite profitable. In any event the President has offered a safety-net to provide for accidents by giving industries an opportunity to come back to the Office of Price Administration in six months and state their case for increased prices.

Disappointment has been expressed in some quarters because the President failed to produce a "formula" for relating wages and prices. But he can hardly be blamed for this omission since no conceivable recipe would meet the infinite variety of conditions involved. What he did was to define loosely the area within which collective bargaining can now proceed. In general he placed on industry the onus for preventing wage disputes where the union is willing to settle for a moderate advance. On the other hand, his ruling on the price line should serve to restrain labor from pressing demands which employers can prove will involve losses.

In any case, we cannot hope to avoid a considerable number of strikes in the next few months. A trial of strength will probably be necessary in numerous instances before either side is willing to settle. Some employers, as the president of the National Association of Manufacturers has admitted, are in a belligerent mood and consider the times propitious for a showdown which "will teach the unions their place." There are others, fortunately, who seem to appreciate the value of coming to an agreement with their workers and pushing ahead for full production. If in each industry one or two have the sense to follow this line, their competitors may think twice before getting into a prolonged dispute.

There is no need, therefore, to give way to fear of a dark winter of industrial warfare. Judging by the headlines, a wave of strikes swept the country in the past two months, bringing business almost to a standstill. Actually, the Department of Labor's cold statistics tell us, the loss of working time in September occasioned by strikes was 6/10 of 1 per cent. Bearing this in mind, let us keep calm and beware of press campaigns designed to excite panic and pressure Congress into passing hasty and unwise legislation.

Coming in THE NATION

—o—

SAUL K. PADOVER
Solution for Germany

MAURICE ROSENBLATT
Behind the Dock Strike

CAREY McWILLIAMS
The Education of Colonel Evans Carlson

A NATION Forum on Atomic Power

ONLY a few Americans are ever going to understand the process of releasing the power of the atom; but if civilization is to survive, a lot of Americans will have to understand what its release means and decide how the process can be controlled and eventually used for building a new world instead of annihilating an old one. In 1914, when he first wrote about war waged with atomic bombs, H. G. Wells concluded that only by passing through a period of hideous devastation—the earth's great cities destroyed, millions of people starving and homeless in every country, food supplies and transportation wiped out, and political chaos over all—could mankind learn to live in peace and apply the released energy of the universe to producing wealth and social progress. Perhaps Wells was right. But in this fateful moment of 1945 the peoples of the world are staring with fixed and anxious eyes at the challenge science has flung at their feet. They want to meet and surmount it without subjecting the nations to the teaching of catastrophe. They know that this will be possible only if they learn fast and make up their minds soon, and then force their decisions on their leaders.

Americans in particular are called upon to master the problem with the least possible delay, for it is the policy of the United States which in the immediate future will chiefly determine the use of atomic power, its control, and the relations between nations which depend on both. The bills now before Congress have been framed by legislators almost totally illiterate in the field of nuclear science. Their constituents know less than they do. Had it not been for the quick action of the scientists, particularly those associated with the bomb project—action unprecedented in American politics—the May bill would certainly have passed the House almost without discussion, establishing controls which would have throttled scientific progress and set up a dictatorial central authority. It may still go through, amended though not improved; but as the result of mounting public interest and criticism, action in the Senate may be more deliberate and better planned. Hearings will be held before the McMahon Committee on Atomic Control, and opinion will have a chance to make itself felt. It is possible, too, that the visit of Prime Minister Attlee will modify the prevailing, and terrifying, mood of superiority which now dominates our atomic policy —the mood so unctuously expressed in the President's Navy Day speech. A dispatch in this issue from our London correspondent reports the general sentiment in England for international control of atomic processes.

But none of these possibly delaying factors lessens the need of earnest, rapid self-education on the part of the American people. We must study, think, and act. As a contribution to that effort, the Nation Associates is sponsoring a three-day forum to be held at the Hotel Astor in New York on December 1-3 to discuss the questions so urgently pressing upon us: the possibility—and value—of continued secrecy; the effect of American control of the bomb on British-American relations and on British-American relations with Russia; possible methods of international control; the role of business in the production of atomic energy; the impact of atomic energy on the social-economic structure. These are a few of the areas which the forum will explore.

We realize, with regret, that only a fraction of The Nation's readers will be able to attend a New York meeting. (It is interesting, however, that already delegations from as far away as Wisconsin and Michigan have notified us of their intention to come.) But after the sessions the speeches and as much as possible of the discussion will be published and distributed to our subscribers and other interested persons, either as a supplement to The Nation or as a pamphlet.

On another page of this issue appears an announcement of the dinner which will conclude the forum. It speaks for itself —eloquently, we believe. The earlier sessions, on December 1 and 2, will be described in succeeding issues as the program for each is completed. We can say now, however, that the conference will hear from such other experts in political and physical science as Dr. Henry De Wolf Smyth, author of the official War Department report on the bomb, "Atomic Energy for Military Purposes"; Thomas K. Finletter, lawyer and author of "Can Representative Government Do the Job?"; two distinguished newspaper men, Walter Millis and Edgar Ansel Mowrer, known to everyone for their writing in the field of international affairs; M. J. Coldwell, chairman of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, Canada's socialist party. Some of these men will address the sessions; others will lead the discussion from the floor. And we intend to leave plenty of time for free intervention and questions by the delegates, since this forum will be what the word implies —not a mere series of lectures.

The forum is intended to add to the knowledge and crystallize the opinions of American progressives and so to increase their ability to influence policy in Washington. For this reason we urge all readers within reach of New York to attend every session.

Portents in Egypt

Cairo, November 5 (by cable)

COLONIAL SECRETARY HALL'S grave warning to the Jews after last week's attacks on railway lines and business establishments did not pass unnoticed by the Jews or Arabs. And it is indisputably true that the recent terrorist activity in Palestine, if understandable in view of the extreme irritation over the delay in a decision on Palestine, has damaged the Zionist position in the world. But independent Egypt, where troubles with the most serious implications occurred on Friday and Saturday, does not come within Hall's sphere, and his solemn words were not addressed to Egypt.

On Thursday, the eve of Balfour Day, all the stores in Cairo and Alexandria received a warning signed by the united front of Arab and Moslem organizations threatening destruction if they were not closed by Friday at 10 a. m. A "spontaneous" general strike began on Friday with an orderly student demonstration. But shortly after ten the riff-raff, especially bands of hooligans in their early teens, swarmed from the populous sections toward the center of the city. The reinforced police, seemingly unwilling to disperse the ebullient crowd by force, were finally unable to control the situation. The demonstrations quickly degenerated into anti-Jewish rather than nationalist affairs, ending in indiscriminately anti-foreign, anti-minority disturbances. The latent xenophobia that is always a danger in the Middle East is now flaring up, intensified by the lust for pillage. Dispatches will have carried the details about the synagogues which were sacked, the Jewish and Christian shops which were looted, and the churches which were damaged in the Cairo and Alexandria riots.

If it is thought that the seriousness of these outbreaks is understood and deplored by all responsible Moslems here, the comments in the Arab press are disillusioning. While some papers condemned, others extolled "the glorious day." The Wafdist daily, Al Misri, commented: "The feeling of the Arabs was expressed in the most magnificent manner. Yesterday Egypt showed herself brimming with zeal and enthusiasm for the cause of Palestine." Meanwhile the foreign-language press is not hiding its uneasiness. The French Bourse Egyptienne said on Saturday evening: "It is impossible to hide the truth: yesterday's events have provoked among the non-Egyptian sections of the population a feeling of profound distress. Youths going from store to store used coarse language to intimidate proprietors and employees. There is an intolerable intervention of private associations in public affairs which no government can allow. Investigation and sanctions are imperative in the public interest. For these irresponsible elements, if unchecked, will feel free to proceed from audacity to audacity." The Egyptian Gazette said: "There is much talk these days of treaty revision and evacuation of British troops, and it is said that foreign residents have nothing to fear for the future. But when people are forced to close their shops and then have them pillaged, it does not make it easier for those who wish to negotiate." This, of course, is the natural foreign reaction earnestly shared by Christian and Jewish Egyptians. Yet the Wafdist daily Balagh did not hesitate to assert: "It is the first gesture of solidarity for the Arab cause in Palestine. Of course the Arab League has already presented many protests, but the Arab League is only an association of states, while the strike the other day was inspired by the feelings of the people. It will serve as a lesson to the Anglo-Americans. They know now that Arab unity is not a vain word."

Recent events in Egypt will disappoint people everywhere who hoped for and believed in the maturity of the Arab world. They are a frightening echo of the events in Syria last May when Frenchmen were massacred by Syrians feeling sure of British protection. It will not pass unnoticed either that in Palestine itself the Jews were not molested.

MICHAEL CLARK

No Homes for Veterans

BY FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT, JR.

(During the war Lieutenant Commander Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., served with distinction in the Atlantic, Mediterranean, and Pacific theaters. He has recently been honorably discharged and is now chairman of the Veterans' Housing Committee for New York of the American Veterans Committee.)

LAST year men slept on the frozen ground in Belgium or stood watch on deck in the freezing winds of the North Atlantic. This year they don't want to sleep on a park bench in the cold of an American winter. Yet we may see them there, and possibly much worse sights, unless immediate action is taken to remedy the housing shortage.

The scarcity of housing has been an acute national problem all during the war years. Now, with service men and women being discharged daily in increasing numbers, the problem has become more critical than ever before. If the situation in New York City can be taken as an index, it has already, even in these early stages of demobilization and reconversion, reached the proportions of a major crisis and even scandal.

For a long time many New York City officials have recognized that some provision would have to be made to bridge the gap between the very little new building and the demand for housing. But while there have been many conferences and a great deal of talk, talk is all the city has done. The men and women who have been discharged or are about to be discharged, who have had all they want of foxholes and now seek homes, are becoming disillusioned, bewildered, and bitter. Today in New York City 20,000 veterans and their families are searching for places to live. With every week that passes their number increases by 3,500. By next summer more than 100,000 veterans and their families will be in need of housing in New York City alone. But nothing has been done to provide homes even for the 20,000 veterans now demobilized and badly in need of a place to live.

Home is probably the most precious thing in the world to a man who endured war. There is hardly a man who didn't spend hours remembering his home, how it used to look, or how it was going to look when he and his wife got a place and bought their furniture. Most soldiers dreamed of a clean little place, all-American, with good plumbing, plenty of heat, a bathtub, and unlimited hot water. But the only places now available in New York City for the veterans are substandard tenement dwellings—cold-water flats where you are lucky to find one toilet for a whole floor instead of one for the whole building out in the backyard, and where the tenant has to heat his water, heat his own apartment, and wage continual war against roaches and rats. Medium-priced and even the highest-priced buildings are fully rented and have waiting lists that don't give the veteran a chance. And even if the veterans were willing to move into the tenements—and they are not willing, I can tell you—there still would not be enough apartments to take care of all of them.

Are returned service men and their families actually going to have to set up housekeeping in pup tents in the parks before the city provides immediate temporary housing as a stop-gap?

Unless something is done quickly, the veterans will become more and more cynical—just what we do not want to happen this time. A man has to have a home before he can look for a job and become again a productive part of community and national life. In even larger aspects, we have learned through grim experience in a global war the dangers inherent in a dissatisfied group which considers itself cheated of its rights.

Recognizing these dangers and the immediate necessity of providing homes for returning veterans, the American Veterans Committee, an organization of World War II service men and women, has taken the lead in action to solve the housing problem in New York and throughout the nation. At a veterans' housing rally sponsored by the A. V. C. on October 24, 1,500 veterans and their families, representing every section of Greater New York, took part in what housing authorities have described as "the biggest, noisiest, and most effective housing meeting to be held in New York City in the last five years." In an open and heated discussion period the veterans and their wives, outspoken, indignant, and passionate, served notice that they want and expect places to live. They also elected a Veterans' Housing Committee for New York City, and unanimously passed this resolution:

> WHEREAS: Veterans are returning to this city at the rate of 500 a day and confronting the worst housing shortage in the city's history; and,
>
> WHEREAS: prompt, energetic emergency action is necessary to alleviate a situation which is daily growing more scandalous;
>
> Be It Resolved: That the city, in cooperation with Washington housing authorities, undertake immediately to obtain vacated and unused temporary war housing to be made available to veterans within sixty days: We regard this as the one practical and immediate solution to the city's housing crisis;
>
> That the veterans be given priority in the Hunter housing development which is about to be vacated by the navy;
>
> That the director of reconversion, Mr. John Snyder, be urged to reestablish priority controls over construction materials, so that they may be allocated speedily to meet the housing shortage;
>
> That one effective central vacancy-listing bureau be established that would receive notice of all vacancies in the city;
>
> That when such vacancies occur, they be made available to all our citizens regardless of race, creed, or color;
>
> That thanks be expressed to the citizens of New York for their readiness to take into their homes veterans and their families who have not been able to find apartments.
>
> WHEREAS: Temporary housing is a stop-gap solution until permanent housing becomes available; and,
>
> WHEREAS: The present housing shortage is an intensification of a pre-war crisis in which several hundred thousand New York families lived in substandard dwellings;
>
> Be It Resolved: That Congress be urged to pass the Wagner-Ellender bill, which would make possible a maximum of 50,000 new dwelling units in the city;
>
> That we recommend to the citizens of New York that they vote "yes" on Election Day on Proposition 1, which would authorize more state aid in financing public housing projects;
>
> That the state legislature be urged to authorize the appropriation of $80,000,000 of loan funds for public housing;
>
> That continued encouragement be given to insurance companies and banks to enter the field of housing construction; and,
>
> That the Senate Finance Committee be urged to extend rent control beyond June 30, 1946.

The Veterans' Housing Committee for New York City consists of Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., chairman; Sgt. Rudolpho Murreigho, A. U. S.; Charles G. Bolté, chairman of the American Veterans Committee; Lt. John Finley, U. S. N. R., and Lt. Comdr. G. W. Hodges, U. S. N. R., both on terminal leave and trying to find homes; George Abo, president of the Manhattan Chapter of the A. V. C.; and Sol Shapiro of the American Legion.

The committee is currently engaged in carrying out the mandate of the 1,500 veterans at the housing rally to consult with officials on the means by which action on the recommendations of the resolution can be expedited. We have attempted repeatedly to see Mayor LaGuardia. As this is being written a letter has just been received from the Mayor saying that he will discuss the veterans' housing problem with us. In Washington the committee consulted with John B. Blandford, Jr., administrator of the National Housing Agency, Philip M. Klutznick, the federal Public Housing Commissioner, and others, who understand the gravity of the situation.

However, the federal government will not and cannot interfere in local community problems unless the community itself initiates a request for federal assistance. Temporary housing in the form of prefabricated units which were formerly used for war workers' housing is available, and several cities and forty-six universities have already used it to solve their housing problems, but New York City has asked for none. Meanwhile, across the river, Newark's slogan, "Homes for Service Men by Christmas," may be realized, as temporary homes with a capacity of from 7,000 to 8,000 people go up. To receive temporary housing units a city must provide the land and the facilities for the units and, under the existing law, transport the units from their present location to the new location. However, the cost per unit is not large. Further, the Wagner-Ellender bill, now pending in Congress, will permit the government to provide greater financial assistance to states.

The Mayor's objection to temporary housing, voiced on a radio broadcast a few weeks ago, was that such housing was unsuited to New York and that it would take six months at least to set it up. He added that veterans wouldn't live in the dwellings. It is a matter of record that not in six months but in six weeks after the late President Roosevelt was informed that a city for 75,000 persons was needed for work on the atomic bomb, Atom City in Oak Ridge, Tennessee, was ready and open. The veterans themselves, who have built bridges, laid airstrips, and erected buildings, know just how fast buildings can be put up if there is energetic cooperation behind the projects. As one veteran said the other day, "If we could do it in war, there's no reason why it can't be done for us in peace. The housing problem for veterans is an emergency situation." As for priorities on necessary materials, reliable housing authorities maintain that temporary housing could be made ready for service men in thirty to sixty days. Mayor LaGuardia's skill in cutting red tape is well known. If he wished, he could go to Washington tomorrow morning and come back in the afternoon with a go-ahead on all the material that would be needed.

The A. V. C.'s Veterans' Housing Committee recommends that a trial project of 1,000 temporary housing units be undertaken to determine their full value in solving the present crisis. The committee is not asking that temporary housing accommodations be made permanent parts of the city, to become eventual slum areas. It proposes a time limit of two to three years so that permanent housing can be given a chance to catch up with demand.

The stage is set. Only one man has to act. The federal government stands ready to help. The Board of Estimate is empowered to appropriate funds to provide dwelling accommodations at once. The City Council has gone on record as willing to pass any remedial legislation offered by the administration and has even urged that the administration give it the legislation. All New York has to do to get housing is for the Mayor to call Washington. That is something he is known to be capable of doing.

This is a critical period for veterans. It is imperative that we secure the minimum essential of life—a home—for the men and women who fought for the life of this nation. It is also imperative that the veterans be made to feel that their government recognizes their problem and is at least doing something to solve it. The public officials of our government have a great responsibility to act in a way that will preserve the faith and confidence of the veteran in the American way of life.

Britain and the Bomb

BY AYLMER VALLANCE

(The Nation's London correspondent)

London, November 2 (by cable)

THE announcement of Prime Minister Attlee's intention to visit Washington to discuss control of the atomic bomb, coupled with news of a projected large-scale research and development center in this country, evokes mixed feelings in British Labor circles. The idea of personal Truman-Attlee conversations is welcome, but it is regretted, first, that there is no hint of comparable Attlee-Stalin talks later—which are regarded as essential to dispel the suspicion that the British and Americans are in cahoots against the Soviet Union—and, secondly, that the Cabinet seems to have no definite British atomic policy. Serious anxiety is felt here lest the anti-Communist sentiments of the majority of the Cabinet lead to hitching Britain to the American power-politics wagon. Queried in Parliament Tuesday, Morrison did not deny an allegation by Captain Blackburn that the Quebec agreement between Churchill and Roosevelt stipulated that the peace-time developments of atomic energy should be left "very much to the discretion of the United States President." This agreement, it is felt here, is no longer realistic, since, considering the scientists' endeavors, all industrialized states can be expected within a few years to be capable of manufacturing atomic bombs.

Truman's recognition that America's monopoly will be short-lived is thought to explain the puzzling dualism of his Navy Day speech, in which high-minded principles of foreign policy contrasted with an insistence that the United States must maintain huge land and sea forces to support the atomic bomb's power. This part of Truman's speech made a painful impression here. It is pointed out that the Axis powers will be helpless for at least a generation to come, that Russia has been bled white by casualties, that Britain is financially bankrupt. The defensive needs of the United States, therefore, cannot justify the proposed large-scale armaments, and the uncomfortable inference is that Truman was demanding overwhelming United States forces to back up the United States foreign policy, which, it is feared here, is orientated principally against Russia. Inevitably the Russian reaction will be a straining to overtake the American lead in atomic power, and there is no doubt here that the Russian scientists will soon possess the complete know-how. As a result, the world situation resembles a perilous armed truce, with the United Nations Organization an impotent spectator of the rivalry between two continental powers, each unable physically to conquer the other but wielding weapons capable of destroying civilization. This is a miserable prospect for the small nations, whose leadership falls naturally to Britain.

Earnest hopes are therefore entertained that Attlee, anticipating the Washington talk, will take the opportunity offered by the parliamentary debate scheduled for next Wednesday to declare unequivocally that the British government favors placing the development and control of atomic energy exclusively in the hands of the World Security Council. The Council would wield executive power through the agency of a genuinely international military staff, including an office of inspection charged with insuring that no national plants illicitly manufacture the bomb. It is recognized that this would require a real revolution in human thinking—the abandonment of the whole conception that a nation must control its military potential. Acceptance of such a proposal is of course easier for Britain, whose future man-power and economic resources reduce it to a minor power in comparison with Russia and the United States. Russia, inveterately suspicious of the Western democracies, is likely to raise objections to international inspection. And America, rather than make the biggest immediate sacrifice of national power, may ask pointedly, "Would nineteenth-century Britain have consented to surrender its mastery of sea power in favor of an untried international authority?" Nevertheless, opinion here extending far beyond the Labor Party is virtually unanimous that the atomic bomb confronts humanity with a completely new situation which must be handled in a completely new way.

For the first time in modern history a weapon exists the exclusive control of which would make a World Organization, in contradistinction to the old League of Nations, really irresistible. The inescapable choice is between taking a revolutionary forward step to establish the supremacy of a decisively armed international authority and drifting to final catastrophe through the power politics of sovereign states.

The Myth of Patrick J. Hurley

BY MAXWELL S. STEWART

THE outbreak of widespread fighting in China, approximating civil-war conditions, has weakened but not destroyed the remarkable myth that has grown up around Ambassador Patrick J. Hurley. Only a few weeks ago the newspapers were hailing General Hurley—back-slapping oil man turned diplomat—for having at last achieved a settlement between the Chungking government and the Communist regime at Yenan. Some papers even hinted that he had arranged the recent pact between China and Russia. He was credited with having achieved these remarkable feats by means of the typically American qualities of common sense, perseverance, and fair play, with an added dash of high-pressure salesmanship. It was implied that he had succeeded where Stilwell and Gauss had failed because he refused to play politics and was respected by all parties and groups for his straight shooting.

Myths die hard. Although it is now apparent that Hurley's diplomacy failed to bring unity, few Americans realize the extent of his responsibility for the present civil strife. Few recognize the degree to which American prestige in China has been undermined by his activities; few are aware of the menacing international implications of his policies. If people are to understand what has happened in China these past few weeks, the Hurley myth must be exploded. This requires blunt speaking and the disclosure of some facts hitherto hidden by the fog of censorship.

General Hurley was sent to China in August, 1944, with Director of the War Production Board Donald Nelson. Nelson's duties in China were clearly defined. He was to see what could be done to revive China's war industries, which speculation, profiteering, and lack of raw materials had virtually brought to a standstill. Just why Hurley—a Republican who was Secretary of War when President Hoover called out the army against the bonus marchers—should have tagged along with Nelson was not apparent. Representative Judd of Minnesota pointed out at the time that Hurley knew little or nothing about China. When interviewed at Chungking, Mr. Nelson was purposely vague about Hurley's role; he said the General would discuss military problems with Stilwell while he, Nelson, dealt with economic problems.

We now know that President Roosevelt was deeply alarmed lest Chungking collapse completely and hoped that Hurley, as his personal representative, could persuade Chiang Kai-shek to agree to a specific plan for rejuvenating China's military effort. The President authorized Hurley to make three specific proposals: (1) that General Stilwell be made commander-in-chief of all Allied forces in China in order to insure the most effective possible distribution of arms and supplies for the entire theater; (2) that the Chinese army be reorganized and the dead wood in the Chinese high command eliminated; (3) that the war effort of the Kuomintang and Communist armies be unified under Stilwell's command.

Chiang Kai-shek, badly frightened by the rapid Japanese advance in the South, agreed to these proposals. It looked as if the Hurley mission would succeed; at that moment China was nearer unity than at any other period. But then, suddenly, everything fell to pieces. Stilwell laid down the law to Chiang about storing up American arms for domestic purposes instead of using them against the Japanese. Chiang angrily demanded Stilwell's recall, and Hurley, hoping to save his mission and ignoring both the merits of the issue and Stilwell's unique competence, backed the Generalissimo. Newsweek quotes Hurley as saying: "Joe, I have only two stars to your four, but I'm going to tell Washington one of us has to leave here."

Convinced from long experience in China that Hurley's ready acquiescence in Chiang Kai-shek's demand had hopelessly weakened America's position in China, Ambassador Gauss submitted his resignation. Thus without achieving the purposes for which he was sent to China, Hurley had managed in a few short weeks to deprive the United States of the services of two exceptional men. Stilwell's military genius and understanding of the Orient have earned him a secure place among the great leaders of the war. Ambassador Gauss is much less widely known, but in retrospect the fact that he could quietly win and hold the respect of all Chinese groups during the difficult years after Pearl Harbor marks him as a man of outstanding ability.

At this point a more sensitive man than Hurley would have resigned and returned to private life. But Hurley is no shrinking violet. Pride rather than sensitiveness is his chief characteristic. He could not admit failure, even to himself. In consequence one of the most bizarre chapters in the history of American diplomacy now opened. Essentially, it was concerned with the efforts of one man—a clever, energetic, domineering man—to salvage his personal pride.

One hears many stories about the General's vanity. When he was named ambassador to China, Hurley was placed on inactive status in the army, and though he retained his rank, was not entitled to wear his uniform in performing civilian duties. But he could not lay aside those two stars. He continued to wear his uniform until specifically ordered not to do so, an order that had to be backed up by President Roosevelt before it stuck. Another incident is as characteristic. Shortly after he was installed in Chungking, Hurley arranged for a specially designed Cadillac, a super-deluxe model, to be flown in from India for his personal use. Just how he arranged it is not clear. He told the State Department that it was a gift from the army, and for purposes of face told Yenan that it had been presented to him by the President. For a time he retained an army sergeant as chauffeur, but the sergeant was later withdrawn and his successor, a Chinese chauffeur, rapidly rendered the car unfit for use. Interestingly enough, the World-Telegram, an ardent Hurley supporter, admitted this love of display in the General when it predicted, long before the incident of the Cadillac, that he would soon be riding down the streets of Chungking in a rickshaw "with a fringe on the top . . . and a dashboard of gen-u-ine leather."

One of Hurley's most serious diplomatic weaknesses is a direct outgrowth of his amazing vanity. Although Gauss and his predecessor were fully as anxious as Hurley to further unity in China, their code of diplomatic behavior impelled them to work quietly in the background. Long experience had convinced them that active intervention in negotiations would not only be resented but would probably, in view of the subtlety of Oriental bargaining, impede a real settlement. Hurley possessed no such inhibitions. Undismayed by his initial setback, he took upon himself the task of acting not merely as an intermediary but as a principal in an effort to obtain a Kuomintang-Communist agreement. It is reported that some of the final negotiations took place at the embassy and that Hurley insisted on drafting sections of the pact.

A certain amount of intervention in Chinese internal affairs could be justified by war-time necessity. If the war had followed a different course, unification of Chinese armed forces might have saved many American lives. But successful intervention requires great skill and delicacy. These traits, unfortunately, are lacking in the Oklahoma oil man's make-up. At the very outset he discarded his one real ace—the bargaining power inherent in America's vast economic and military potential—and tried to win the jackpot by sheer bluff. Instead of following the Stilwell—and Roosevelt—policy of distributing American supplies where they would be used most effectively against Japan, Hurley gratuitously announced that American support would be given exclusively to the Kuomintang—on the ground that Chungking was the one "legal" government in China. Fortified by this assurance, Chiang Kai-shek saw no need for further concessions to Yenan. The negotiations that had been under way for some months were soon terminated. Hurley's second effort to obtain an agreement failed as completely as the first.

Hurley has tried to give the impression that despite the favoritism he showed toward Chiang Kai-shek he has been on excellent terms with the Communist leaders. This has been asserted repeatedly in the American press. Did he not make a special journey to Yenan to escort Mao Tse-tung to the final Chungking negotiations? The Communists' opinion of Hurley, however, has been clearly stated by the Yenan radio on several occasions. One broadcast declared that in aiding Chungking exclusively Hurley had sacrificed the "honor of democratic America" and encouraged civil war. Off the record the Communists charge Hurley with duplicity and unconcealed partisanship. They accuse him of making promises which he had no intention of keeping and of turning over to Chiang Kai-shek vital military information which they had furnished him in confidence. Although Mao Tse-tung chose Hurley as an escort to Chungking rather than risk kidnaping by the Kuomintang, he pointedly refused to accept Hurley's hospitality in Chungking. Nor is Hurley trusted by the center parties that make up the Democratic League. Obsessed by the notion that the Kuomintang is the only bulwark against communism, he has ignored the attempts of various moderate groups to democratize China's governmental machinery.

Vanity may also explain Hurley's high-handed methods with his staff and compatriots. Among his Foreign Service assistants were several unusually intelligent young men who spoke Chinese fluently and had had years of experience grappling with Chinese political problems. These men protested against his abandonment of America's bargaining position and his partiality for Chiang's reactionary regime, and Hurley was too thin-skinned to suffer their criticism. He struck back by purging his staff of all men with long experience in China. He ordered also that all policy reports to the State Department be routed through his office, and by this action deprived the department of its normal sources of unbiased information. To prevent criticism of his policies from reaching the American public, Hurley extended his control to American correspondents, screening them for political reliability and restricting their movements. After years of effort the correspondents had gained permission from the Chungking government to visit Yenan. Hurley quickly saw to it that this permission was revoked and that most of the diplomatic and military observers stationed in Communist territory were withdrawn. The result has been a virtual blackout on reliable information from that area during the past year. General Wedemeyer, who replaced Stilwell, has generally supported Hurley's policies, but the two are reported to have had a first-class row over the favorable reports sent to Washington by some of the army officers stationed in Yenan. Only Roosevelt tact prevented a major crisis. As the story was told by Hurley to a group of Congressmen, the President greeted him on one of his visits to Washington with the remark: "Well, Pat, they tell me that you are busy writing a book out there entitled 'Alone in China.' " Strangely enough, Hurley felt complimented.

Before the end of the war the worst that could be said of Hurley's policies was that they hindered Chinese unity and thus prevented China from pulling its full weight in the struggle against Japan. After Japan's surrender, Hurley's desire to strengthen Chungking was translated into active military intervention, which encouraged the irreconcilable elements within the Kuomintang to press for an immediate showdown. Although during the war Hurley had opposed sending American military aid to North China on political grounds, he had no compunction about sending American marines to aid American-convoyed Kuomintang troops in occupying the chief cities of North China before they could be seized by the Communists. Earlier, Kuomintang troops had been flown to Nanking and Shanghai to keep those cities from falling into Communist hands. And today the United States navy is being used to transport Kuomintang troops to Manchuria so that the reds will not control that immensely rich area. As Time, an ardent supporter of the Hurley policies, bluntly stated it: "The U. S. was underpinning its energetic diplomacy with the sword . . . time and the full might of the U. S. in China were working . . . for . . . Chiang."

By thus intervening in behalf of the Kuomintang Hurley has lost his third, and what seemed a few weeks ago his best, opportunity to settle the Kuomintang-Communist dispute. A short time after Russia and China signed their treaty of friendship and alliance a Moscow newspaper carried a discreet article urging that a unified democratic government be set up in China. This was generally interpreted, as was no doubt intended, as a gentle reminder that Russia expected Chiang Kai-shek to widen the base of his government and institute democratic reforms in exchange for the return of Manchuria and Soviet economic assistance. The Chiang-Mao negotiations followed this prompting, and a basic settlement might have resulted if the Kuomintang leaders had not received a windfall in the form of American military assistance. With the assurance of American backing, explicitly promised on several occasions by both Wedemeyer and Hurley, the Kuomintang militarists have not hesitated to plunge the country into civil war.

Although the decision to back Chiang Kai-shek against the Communists was arrived at by Hurley against the judgment of experienced foreign-service officials in China and of the Far Eastern Division of the State Department, it can hardly be attributed solely to ambassadorial vanity. Political as well as personal factors undoubtedly played a decisive role. The same kind of power politics is being played in China as in Poland, Rumania, Greece, and the South Pacific. Apparently Hurley, like many conservative Americans, is under the illusion that Chiang Kai-shek's forces, with American aid, can be made to serve as a buffer against Russia. Yenan, of course, cannot be used in that way. In any event, Russia-haters have aligned themselves firmly behind Hurley's policies in the belief that they offer the only method of curbing Soviet influence in Asia. This judgment, however, is not justified by the facts. Unbiased military observers believe that Chiang's forces would be more of a liability than an asset in any defense of China against the powerful Red Army. China is immensely war weary. The conscripts in Chiang Kai-shek's armies have but one desire—to go home at the earliest possible moment. Only a few divisions, mostly American trained, can be depended on as an effective military force.

Nor is Hurley justified in assuming that with Russian interference ruled out by the Sino-Soviet pact the Kuomintang, aided by the United States, can easily overcome the Communists. If Chungking attempts to suppress the Communists and establish its power in Manchuria, the Soviet Union may well regard the incursion as a breach of the understanding upon which the treaty was founded. Russia agreed to recognize Chinese sovereignty over Manchuria, but it did not necessarily agree to recognize the authority of the present Chungking regime in this vital area.

The plain fact is that Chungking's authority in vast sections of China can be supported only by American arms. If the United States wants to maintain its influence in China it must choose between two courses: continuous intervention and the use of a permanent army of occupation, or a return to the Stilwell-Gauss policy of encouraging and assisting all Chinese groups—the left Kuomintang, the Democratic League, and the Communists—that are seeking to establish a functioning democracy in China. Only a China that is democratic can be counted on to align itself with the democratic aspirations of the American people.

Hurley's choice is clear. His China would be a puppet China, bolstered by American arms and patrolled by American troops. Is that the choice of the American people?

A Lecture to Liberals

BY REINHOLD NIEBUHR

(Professor of Christian Ethics at Union Theological Seminary and contributing editor of The Nation*)*

LIBERALISM may mean so many different things to different people that one doesn't quite know whether one desires or deserves to belong to the group known as liberals. A fair degree of agreement is found, however, on one distinctive mark of liberalism, conceived not as a creed but as a spirit. Liberalism, it is generally conceded, seeks to deal with the problems of the community with some degree of objectivity. It makes a conscious effort to redress the balance when the scales have been weighed down by party passion or private interest.

A large section of American liberalism has failed to meet this test of the liberal spirit. It has been engulfed by the passions of war and corrupted by the immense self-righteousness and sense of power of a victorious nation. It has aggravated, rather than mitigated, the passions of war, particularly those which swirl about in the chaos of the war's aftermath, having lost their proper object and therefore their creative function. This indictment requires a bill of particulars, which I give below.

1. Enemy nations are always appraised in war time in terms which suggest their total and congenital depravity. The passions of conflict lead to such judgments, and they are made plausible by the seeming unanimity on moral questions in the enemy nation, as glimpsed behind the battle line and the wall of censorship. If the enemy nation is governed tyrannically, the plausibility of such judgments is increased. When the battle is over, however, the full complexity of the moral and political life of the enemy nation is revealed. No nation, not even one so deeply corrupted as Germany was, is without its residual sources of health and sanity. It is the business of liberalism to restore discriminate judgment, which is all the more necessary because criminal nations cannot be executed or imprisoned for life, as are confirmed individual criminals. For our own sake and for the sake of the world's health, we must find in the defeated nations elements upon which can be based the new structure of their life and of our common life with them. Liberal journalists, nevertheless, have regarded "Germans" from the standpoint of an inverted racial theory and allowed themselves indiscriminate judgments about the "sullenness" or the "cravenness" of Germans; frequently they have formed these judgments without knowing enough of the German language to make direct contact with Germans. A friend just returned from Germany writes: "There are innumerable Germans of proved and profound anti-Nazi convictions who have never been seen by our journalists or our army intelligence people. Neither have sufficient knowledge of the German past to identify these men or the linguistic ability to talk with them. Even a brief conversation with Germans proves that it is not an absence of a sense of guilt which is their problem but a sense of guilt so overwhelming that it threatens to engulf them."

2. Victorious nations are naturally inclined to suggest that the peace of tomorrow will be threatened primarily by the foe who threatened it yesterday. Yet it might be put down as axiomatic that the chief peril to the peace of tomorrow lies in the difficulty of maintaining the alliance which gained the victory. Efforts to maim a vanquished foe, already rendered impotent by total defeat, are unnecessary if the alliance of victors is stabilized, and may become futile if the alliance fails. In the former case the present impotence of the defeated nation is sufficient to prevent further aggression. In the latter case the victorious powers will compete with each other in an effort to arm the vanquished nation, the one side against the other. Frantic efforts to guarantee the peace by maiming the beaten enemy can therefore have only short-range efficacy. Yet a section of our liberal press has filled the air with its apprehensions that we have failed to destroy the political and economic power of the foe with sufficient completeness. It has not analyzed critically the social consequences of the forced migration of Germans from the ceded parts of the Reich to the overcrowded and economically chaotic regions that remain.

3. Though nothing could be clearer than that there is no dividing line between war potential and general industrial potential, part of the liberal press speaks glibly of destroying Germany's war potential, and periodically accuses the army of not being vigorous enough in carrying out this policy. Meanwhile General Eisenhower insists that we must send food to Germany in order to prevent starvation; and if we are not careful we shall have the permanent task of financing out of our own pocket the importations of food necessary to an industrially developed nation like Germany. We may even refuse to allow the manufacture of the agricultural machinery which is required to maintain the highest level of agricultural production. Nevertheless, a large section of the liberal press not only takes ex-Secretary Morgenthau's angry economics seriously but tries to make the Potsdam agreement conform to his theory even more consistently than was intended. Our complete control of the German economy enables us to prevent the manufacture of any instruments of war for years to come without the kind of wholesale destruction now proposed. If we follow the policy of destruction we shall increase the economic chaos in Europe, and the hard sentimentalities of the moment will give way to softer sentimentalities when the cry of the hungry is heard. We are not Nazis, and the instincts of humanity will finally prevent us from doing what we now intend.

4. Russia knows what it wants from Germany. It wants to relate the section it controls—and if possible all of Germany—to its political and economic purposes. We do not know what we want, and our lack of policy tends to create both an economic and a political vacuum in Central Europe. This is not to our interest, nor will it lead to a stable peace. A section of liberalism is estopped from making a critical analysis of this problem by its "fellow-traveler" proclivities. Any responsible analyst of world affairs knows that we must find a basis for a stable accord with Russia. But it is stupid to imagine that we can find one only by accepting the policy of the Soviet Union as unwaveringly virtuous and prohibiting all critical discussion of the Potsdam agreement.

5. A section of the liberal press is tempted to compound liberal idealism with an imperial sense of power. It wants the forces of occupation to be as large as possible, and periodically lectures our commanders on how to force democracy upon our foes. It has done little to illumine the fact that military organizations, designed for military combat, are ill prepared to deal with the political complexities of defeated nations. The general tendency of the military mind to prefer "law and order" to any ferment of democracy should persuade liberals that it is important to transfer our authority as quickly as possible to civil officers, who should exercise it with such restraint as to allow responsible government to emerge. We can, by our power, remove the most obvious sources of corruption in enemy nations, but we cannot rebuild these nations in our image by our power. We are unable to do this, not only because there are limits to the efficacy of alien power and limits to the political imagination of military men, but also because there are contradictory impulses in the democracy which informs our life. We are not certain whether we want democracy for our defeated foes, or whether we want to prevent them from having a more radical democracy than the wealthiest nation on earth allows itself. A genuine liberalism would deal more critically with our own political complexities and contradictions as they impinge upon the life of the nations we have vanquished, and would not regard our power as the undefiled fountain source of democracy in the world.

6. In dealing with the problem of bringing individual leaders among our foes to trial some liberals have shown no understanding of the obviously limited capacity of a court of victors to render judgments which will commend themselves to the vanquished as just. They seem to have forgotten that American, or even Allied, judgments are not the judgments of a universal mind, though our omnipotence may tempt us to think they are. Thus liberals were almost unanimous in demanding that the Emperor of Japan be tried as a war criminal. The statesmen of the world were in this case wiser and more modest than liberal journalists and commentators. The Emperor of Japan is only the apex of a feudal-reactionary social system which must be destroyed. There is evidence that in the immediate issues of the war the imperial house tried, however vainly, to restrain the fanatic militarists. But even if this were not the case, it is politically stupid to imagine that we could hasten the democratization of Japan by such means. Leaders in both enemy nations have committed criminal acts which have so far defied both their own best standards and our own that we can bring those criminals to justice without having our partial judgments, as victors, too much impugned. To take the position that leaders of enemy nations are criminals because they opposed us is to allow the megalomania of a very powerful nation to distort our sense of justice.

Unfortunately we do not have an organized world, and do not yet possess completely impartial instruments of justice. We must do the best we can to punish those who have defied the most widely accepted standards of humanity. We shall be the more successful if we do not attempt or claim too much, and if we remember that the decisions of men and nations who "are judges in their own case" are viewed with considerable cynicism by those who are too weak to defy such judgments.

Liberals have generally hailed Justice Jackson's achievement in establishing, as one standard of justice for the international court, the definition of aggressive war as a criminal act. The Russians had the honesty to resist this idea for a while, knowing that it made them guilty in the case of Finland. They finally yielded, probably having decided to make this not too costly concession to Anglo-Saxon cant. More Nazi criminals than we can ever execute are guilty of the most obvious crimes against generally accepted standards of humanity. Why, then, should we engage in the dubious business of making a war of aggression an ex post facto crime, before the world has been organized upon a basis of universal law and before an international community has set up instruments for assessing guilt?

We have lived, and may still be living, in a state of international anarchy. Under such conditions some wars are more overtly aggressive than others; the war just ended certainly placed our foes in the category of overt aggressors. But all wars are expressions of the anarchy in which the nations live; and a vanquished nation is always able to satisfy its own conscience that it was prompted by the necessity of meeting covert aggression with overt action. It will be less inclined to do so if the victors refrain from too simple and too self-righteous judgments.

On this as on every issue under discussion American liberalism has failed to exercise the kind of restraint upon the pride of powerful and victorious nations which it is the traditional function of liberal intelligence to exercise. Such restraint is desperately necessary at the present moment as we move with unaccustomed and untried power into the complexities of world politics.

Revolt in Asia: II–Indonesia

BY ANDREW ROTH

(Author of "Dilemma in Japan")

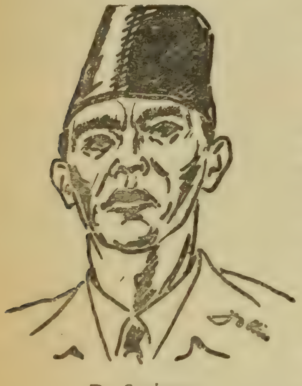
SIGNS have a mocking quality in sweltering, tense Batavia. Splashed high on the buildings in large, clear letters are excerpts from the Declaration of Independence, the Gettysburg Address, and other stirring American protests against the servitude of man to man. But in the streets hostile Indonesians see trucks on which the letters "U. S. A." have just been painted over carrying Netherlands soldiers clad in American uniforms and nervously fingering American-made guns.

A train pulling out of the Batavia station bears a more contemporary slogan: "We don't want a second Dutch treat!" The feeling behind it is grim rather than humorous, for even through the bloody veil of the recent Japanese occupation the Indonesians remember that the Dutch have always considered the Indies a bedrijf, or business concern, to be exploited as efficiently and profitably as possible. Before the Japanese invasion three-fourths of the total capital investment in the fabulous Indies—the world's second richest colony—was in the hands of the Dutch. And from this investment was derived a profit amounting to more than a fifth of the Netherlands' national income. In bitter contrast the vast majority of the 72,000,000 Indonesians were ill fed and ill housed on their average wage of 20 cents a day.

Dutch political administration was authoritarian and paternal. Laws and decrees emanated from one man—the Governor General. The carefully stacked Volksraad, or People's Council, was a debating chamber which could criticize but not control. Indonesian petty officials governed the native population through an ingenious system of indirect control of native institutions. These officials, kept loyal by handsome salaries, were given the duty of collecting taxes so that the Indonesian masses would not feel directly the weight of Dutch demands. The Dutch encouraged such manifestations of native culture as Balinese dancing, but their educational policy was utterly colonial: after 350 years of their rule the illiteracy rate in the islands was 92 per cent. They were not so race-conscious as most European colonial administrators, and intermarriage with Indonesians was condoned and even favored. But this liberal attitude had its origin in the need for enlarging the governing class. Eurasians were given the status of Europeans so that they might be set off against their pure Indonesian relatives, who had no citizenship rights.

During the past thirty years Dutch rule has been challenged with increasing fervor and strength by the swelling ranks of Indonesian nationalists. Roughly speaking, the nationalist movement has three main streams. One group favors a moderate, gradualist approach, with emphasis on native education and on slow progress toward independence in collaboration with the Dutch authorities. Another group is inspired by religious nationalism. Indonesia is 85 per cent Moslem, and the powerful Moslem nationalist organizations ask their followers as Indonesian colonials to resist Dutch imperial rule and as Moslems to rise against the Christian "infidels." The Moslem leaders look to the Islamic world for support in their struggle. A third group of all-out, non-religious nationalists embraces both middle-class elements and left-wing workers. Its leaders are drawn largely from the intelligentsia, but its mass support is furnished by the burgeoning trade unions, peasant organizations, cooperatives, and women's and youths' groups.

The turbulence that marked the early twenties culminated in widespread insurrectionary outbreaks in 1926 and 1927. In February, 1933, the Indonesian crew of the Seven Provinces, the flagship of the Dutch navy in the Indies, staged a mutiny. The Dutch responded by further curtailment of liberties. Thousands of the rebellious natives were arrested and sent to concentration camps in New Guinea and Banda, where the sea, the jungle, and the malarial swamps took the place of barbed wire. The secret police was strengthened, and all workers, particularly those in factories, were fingerprinted. Censorship of the press was tightened, and no outdoor meetings were allowed without a special permit. In one instance the police declared an indoor nationalist meeting illegal on the excuse that the roof had holes and was therefore open to the sky!



Dr. Soekarno

Despite these repressive measures nationalism continued to grow. In 1941 some five million nationalists of all varieties united in the Madjlis Rakjat Indonesia (Supreme People's Movement of Indonesia). The movement had its own newspapers, a news agency, Antara, and a national song, "Indonesia Raya."

During the late thirties Japan's consuming interest in the oil, bauxite, and other wealth of the Indies and its evident intention to drive southward focused interest on the problem of the defense of Indonesia. A narrow fringe of the nationalists succumbed to Japan's blandishments, but the majority recognized that Japan offered only another and more virulent form of imperialism. The Batavian Students' Federation sent ambulances to the Chinese victims of Japanese aggression. Indonesian delegates to the second World Youth Congress, held at Vassar in 1938, strongly supported its anti-fascist program. The Madjlis Rakjat Indonesia demanded that the people of Indonesia be armed and that the nationalists be given responsible posts in the government to insure mobilization of the people for the defense of Indonesia. The Dutch refused and tightened security restrictions against both the Indonesians and the Japanese. After the fall of Holland to the Germans in 1940, the Indies were put under complete martial law. All nationalist meetings were forbidden, nationalist leaders were arrested, nationalist newspapers were closed down. When Japan attacked the islands in 1942, the Dutch forces, unsupported by popular mobilization, were quickly overwhelmed.

The Japanese conquest substituted economic rape for Holland's systematic economic exploitation. Pressing military needs and the consuming avarice of the militarists and Zaibatsu monopolists resulted in ruthless looting of the country and despoiling of the people. Soon the food and clothing shortage became acute. Men were pressed into labor gangs and women dragged off to the horrors of Japanese army brothels.

The Japanese sugar-coated their ruthless economic spoliation with slippery promises of political independence. In Sumatra they found Dr. Achmed Soekarno, the leading figure of the nationalist movement. Soekarno had been arrested by the Dutch in 1940 for the third time and exiled to Sumatra Although he had adequate reason to hate the Dutch, there is no indication that he was in any sense pro-Japanese. Indeed, the Dutch admit that he asked them to evacuate him from Sumatra because of his anti-Japanese record. The Dutch, however, decided to leave him to the tender mercies of the invaders, who offered him an important post if he would cooperate and may well have threatened him with a dire fate if he would not. The well-known intellectual Dr. Susilo and two hundred other prominent Indonesians who refused to collaborate were killed by the Japanese.

Soekarno's assumption of the presidency of the Java Central Council in 1942 initiated a period of uneasy and mistrustful collaboration. The Japanese exerted pressure on the nationalists to provide economic and political support; the nationalists insisted that the Japanese pay off on the promise of independence which they dangled before the people. Indonesian nationalists claim that Soekarno, under the very nose of the Japanese secret police, began organizing guerrilla bands as early as 1943, telling the Japanese the bands would be used to resist Allied landings. Radio Tokyo admitted that Japanese-trained Indonesians had fired on Japanese forces "by mistake." As the Japanese faced defeat in the first half of 1945, they were forced to yield more and more to the nationalists in the hope of gaining military support.

The capitulation of the Japanese in August, 1945, immediately brought a nationalist uprising; the Indonesian Republic was established on August 17. The Japanese dropped the reins and allowed the nationalists their head, knowing that the results could only be embarrassing to the victorious Allies. In an incredibly brief time the Indonesians dominated Java and began to operate the public services and to arm Indonesian troops with weapons seized from the Japanese. Three radio transmitters and the nationalist paper Merdeka blared both anti-Dutch and anti-Japanese propaganda. Indonesian seamen on Dutch ships struck in ports all over the world. In the islands the movement acquired such momentum that Soekarno and other leaders frequently seemed to be borne along on it rather than to be directing it. They have found it hard to control young racial-minded Moslem fanatics, who, incited probably by the Japanese, are trying to start a "holy war" against Dutch and Eurasian "infidels."

The Indonesian National Committee, the high command of the nationalist forces, is dominated by Holland-educated Socialist intellectuals led by Vice-President Dr. Mohammed Hatte. The left is represented by Raden Iwa Koesoema Soemantri, Minister of Social Affairs. Soemantri was Indonesia's delegate to the Comintern in 1925, studied at the Eastern Peoples' University in Moscow, and is the author of "The Peasants' Movement in Indonesia." Soekarno himself holds no very clear-cut politico-economic views. At least one or two members of the committee have clean records of resistance to the Japanese.

The nationalists are making a strenuous effort to capture world opinion and isolate the Dutch. Soekarno has invited the Indian leader Pandit Nehru, Foreign Minister Evatt of Australia, Mme Chiang Kai-shek, and General Carlos Romulo to visit Indonesia and judge conditions for themselves. Dr. Hatte has demanded that Dutch troops be withdrawn until the question of Indonesian independence can be reviewed by a competent United Nations committee.

Large sections of the colonial and labor worlds have responded. In Singapore 7,000 dock workers paralyzed the port in sympathy. Transportation of Dutch soldiers, armaments, officials, bullion, and records was seriously delayed by a series of Australian strikes. Nineteen Australian trade unions refused to load, repair, or supply ships destined to suppress the Indonesian nationalist movement. Chinese and Indian seamen joined striking Indonesians in refusing to man them.

The reaction to all this on the part of the Dutch has been compounded of fear, fury, and frantic disagreement. They know that Indonesian independence would convert Holland into a third-rate power and bring to an end tens of thousands of profitable colonial jobs. They see Indonesian graduates of Dutch prisons in positions of power and daring to disbelieve Queen Wilhelmina's 1942 pledge of eventual dominion status. They feel a growing sense of frustration at having to rely on British forces and American equipment. And they disagree violently among themselves on how to regain their empire. The stiff-necked aristocrat Jonkheer van Stargenborgh Stachouwer resigned as Governor General of the Netherlands East Indies in protest against negotiations with the nationalists. More farsighted colonial officials admit the necessity of negotiating and concede that the Indies should obtain dominion status in twenty or thirty years. These, however, are attacked as "leftists" or publicly contradicted.

When he first landed in Java, Sir Alexander Christison, commander of the British occupation forces, declared somewhat surprisingly that it was not the British intention to pull Dutch chestnuts out of the fire. Because of their own difficulties with Moslems elsewhere, the British were inclined to be conciliatory with the Javanese Moslems, particularly in view of nationalist strength, the weakness of available Allied forces, and the explosive potentialities of the entire colonial situation. "You must meet with these chaps and give them a clear-cut statement of future status," Sir Alexander said to Dutch officials. Subsequently, in fear of the spread of the nationalist contagion and eager to weld their Western European bloc, the British became friendlier to the Dutch. "To support—or tolerate—local nationalist movements in this hour of confusion would lose Britain the friendship of its nearest neighbors," the influential London Economist asserted.

American policy in Indonesia has been characterized by the Hindustan Times, published by Gandhi's son, as "utter moral cowardice." When Soekarno protested against the use of American equipment to suppress the Indonesian independence movement, Secretary of State Byrnes suggested only that American labels be removed from the equipment. This seemed a far cry from the ringing words of President Roosevelt in April, 1943: "We know that the day of the exploitation of the resources and the people of one country for the benefit of any group in another country is definitely over."

In the Wind

EDUCATION: The University of Minnesota is offering a course in scientific and technical Russian. The prospectus says, "The publication of numerous important scientific contributions in Russian makes it essential for scientists in this country to have at least some rudimentary reading knowledge of the Russian language."

GUIDANCE: "My point is," said Paul Mallon in a discussion of the atomic bomb on October 9, "we should not be guided politically by scientific advice."

BARGAIN BASEMENT: The United Ships Corporation, New York, has Canadian corvettes for sale. "For a minimum of $29,000 each," says an advertisement, "in quantities of ten, we offer you these famous vessels costing originally over $650,000 each."

FORTISSIMO: Editor and Publisher's special supplement on syndicated columns lists Dorothy Thompson's "On the Record" under Music.

POPULARIZATION: Hearst's San Francisco Call-Bulletin of October 6 announced serialization of Sinclair Lewis's "Cass Timberlane" "in easy-to-read picture-strip form."

TEAM! TEAM! TEAM! A chapter of the Alumni Association of Georgetown University has been established in Tokyo.

SACRIFICE: The Combined Resources and Production Board announced on October 20 that per capita purchases of civilian goods and services in the United Kingdom fell 15 to 20 per cent below the 1938 level during the war, but in the United States and Canada rose 10 to 15 per cent.

O. C. S.: "Chicago department stores," said the Wall Street Journal of October 25, "don't know what to do about former salesmen who went into the services and became captains, majors, and lieutenant colonels. 'You can't expect them to be happy selling socks or shirts,' says one merchant. The stores feel kind of cheated, too. They say it was their training that taught the salesmen how to sell themselves along the road to success in uniform."

EXPLANATION: H. R. Cullen, chairman of the board of regents of the University of Houston, Texas, in an address on October 19 said the trouble with the country "is a misunderstanding, not between capital and labor, for we are all capitalists, for to own a house, a cow, a farm, a home, is to be in possession of capital; so the misunderstanding must be between the masses of people and corporations."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. One dollar will be paid for each item accepted.]

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

Who's Killing What Goose?

MR. TRUMAN'S broadcast homily to capital and labor on the restraint of appetites, will not, I fear, end the present wage-price deadlock and usher in an era of industrial peace. The President declared that full maintenance of war-time wage incomes would not be possible and warned labor not to press its claims too far lest it kill the goose that lays the golden eggs. On the other hand, he reminded business that its prosperity depended on a broad market for its wares and pointed out that reduced pay envelopes must serve to restrict demand. There was, he suggested, a margin available, at least in many industries, to provide a moderate increase in wages without a corresponding rise in prices.

This statement, while bestowing a partial blessing on present wage demands, does not carry us much nearer a solution to the problem of what wages industry can afford to pay. Clearly, no short and easy answer is possible, for industries vary markedly in their circumstances. But one thing is certain —unless business as a whole accepts price levels predicated on the employment of a high proportion of their productive capacity, post-war prosperity is going to be short-lived.

What does a corporation like General Motors mean when it insists that it cannot pay a 30 per cent increase in basic wage rates if it is denied the right to raise prices? Does it mean that, no matter how many cars it sells, it will lose money; or does it mean that its margin of profit on a low output will be reduced below what it considers a reasonable amount? In the brief presented by the United Automobile Workers to support its current claims against General Motors, a number of estimates are offered to show how the company's profits vary with volume. Given 1942 model prices and an increase of 15 per cent in material costs over 1941, production, it is suggested, would reach the break-even point at only 29 per cent of capacity, at present wage rates. If wages were raised 30 per cent, the break-even point would be 40 per cent. In other words, profits would begin to accrue at a very modest production level.

I cannot vouch for the accuracy of these figures, for although they have obviously been carefully prepared by experts, only General Motors itself has all the necessary data on costs, and it guards its secrets tenaciously. But even if there is a 25 per cent error—making the real break-even point, after a 30 per cent wage increase, about 50 per cent of capacity—General Motors' position appears amply protected without any increase in prices. For it must be remembered that once the break-even point has been passed, profits increase much faster than production. This is because the biggest factor in costs in a mass-production industry is overhead charges, and the more units that are produced the more thinly these costs are spread.

Not unnaturally, every business seeks to keep its break-even point as low as possible by setting a price which will enable it to avoid losses even if demand proves disappointing, and which will allow a rising margin of profit if sales are large. Reporting to the War Production Board earlier this year, sixty-five industries provided estimates of post-war capacity and the production level at which they would break even; sixty-one of them placed this point at less than 80 per cent of capacity, fifty-one at less than 70 per cent, thirty, including automobiles, at less than 60 per cent, and fourteen at less than 50 per cent.

Price-makers who aim at low break-even points automatically limit the market by attacking purchasing power at both ends. By keeping wages at lower levels and fixing prices at higher ones than would be justified by capacity or near-capacity production they reduce the incomes and inhibit the spending of those groups whose buying is essential to sustain the demand for mass-produced goods.

General Motors and other firms in a similar position claim, however, that they cannot anticipate the profits of high production. In the present situation, as Business Week of October 27 explained, they "want to wait and see what labor's post-war efficiency will be and how much volume it can produce. If industry rises to the level the optimists expect, profits will spiral, probably making room for both pay rises and price cuts." These hopes are all too likely to be frustrated by a low-wage high-price policy. With take-home pay 20 per cent and more below war levels, current income of the workers will not enable them to buy an annual output of 7,000,000 automobiles and equivalent outputs of other industries making durable consumer goods.

Nor can the managers of such industries count on pent-up demand and stored-up purchasing power to provide buoyancy for sales even though current income lags. When pay envelopes suddenly grow slim, men do not rush to spend their savings; they continue to make do with old cars or refrigerators and postpone purchases of desirable but non-essential goods, particularly in the face of high prices. In "Price-Making in a Democracy" (Brookings, 1944) Edwin G. Nourse gave the following advice to business:

> To attain sound adjustment, management must in its own interest be alert to hold prices down to a point where full product can continuously be taken off the market by current purchasing power. . . . If the price is set tentatively at a level so high as to be profitable with the volume of sales 20 or 30 or even some greater percentage below the war level or post-war full-scale rate, then that is the volume of sales and employment and use of invested capital which will be realized. If price-makers think they can ignore or defer the period of adjustment of their prices to an efficiency cost basis while they garner in the accumulated "easy money," they will have made the task of real adjustment more difficult, if not, in any full sense, impossible.

In other words, only by deliberately aiming for high volume can price-makers insure the generation of sufficient purchasing power to maintain that volume. By setting their sights for a large margin of profits instead of a large output they are all too likely to miss both targets. If the golden goose of private enterprise is in danger, it is far more because of the erratic shooting of its keepers than because of labor's designs upon its neck.

KEITH HUTCHISON

The People's Front

ON HIS recent return from London, where he attended a Catholic celebration, Monsignor Casimiro Morcillo, Auxiliary Bishop of Madrid, assured Franco of the continuing support of British Catholics. Monsignor Morcillo himself and with one or two exceptions the entire Spanish Catholic hierarchy are staunch supporters of the Generalissimo's regime. In his pastoral of September 3 the Spanish Cardinal Primate had urged the people to rally behind Franco and had denounced the "anti-Spanish" campaign abroad. The Bishop was greatly relieved to find that in Britain, at least, true friends of Spain had not been taken in by the propaganda of "Free Masons and reds" about concentration camps, executions, the Blue Division, and the activities of Nazi agents.

The Tablet, Britain's most influential Catholic weekly, has been consistently pro-Franco. In this country his most respectable organ, the influential Jesuit weekly, America, recently published an attack on the Spanish Republicans that outraged even so deeply religious a group as the Basque exiles. Devout Catholics but good Republicans, the Basques have not forgotten the hundreds of priests who died before Franco's firing squads.

The Vatican has been as useful an ally of the Franco government as was the now defunct Axis. No doubt when Franco falls, the Holy See will advance all sorts of subtle arguments —its archivists will miraculously dig up "hitherto unpublished documents"—to prove that this charge is untrue. The beautiful hands of Pope Pius XII, which blessed the Axis forces and the victorious American troops in turn, will describe the same graceful gesture of benediction when the first Basque delegation from the restored Spanish Republic visits Rome.

But it will require more than benedictions and musty documents to make the world forget the Pope's many pronouncements in praise of Franco. On several occasions in 1939 Pope Pius congratulated Franco on his "glorious Catholic victory." In 1943 he hailed "the happy resurgence" of the faith in Spain. And although in his Christmas message of 1944 His Holiness mentioned in alphabetical order the other nations meriting praise for their "brotherly love and charity," he preceded the entire list with Spain and its "head of state." To my knowledge the Pope has never uttered a single word of protest against the Franco repression.

The frequent reports that the Vatican favors the return of the Spanish monarchy do not contradict its consistent support of Franco. What the Vatican fears above all is a democratic victory in Spain. It does not seem to realize that only a strong Republican government can assure freedom of religion; that only under a republic could the church regain the respect of the Spanish people, for then it would be rigidly excluded from interference in the political life of the nation.

The Vatican believes that in the present situation a monarchy offers greater guaranties of security than the decaying Franco regime. At the same time, however, it realizes that the monarchy lacks popular support—a weakness which the Republican forces could exploit to good advantage. For that reason it would like to see a kind of merger between the Franco forces and the royalists: Don Juan would play the role of "constitutional" monarch, backed by the Falangist bayonets which made it possible, as Pope Pius so eloquently said in a message to Spain shortly after the end of the Spanish war, for "Christ [to] triumph in the schools and . . . the Church rise up out of the smoking ruins to infuse the Christian spirit into your laws, your institutions, and all the manifestations of official life."

The Vatican's Spanish policy is only one part of its large and ambitious foreign program. It has emerged from the war one of the important world powers, enjoying all the advantages of that position and none of its disadvantages. Accorded an almost unique elasticity of speech, the Pope adopts now a liberal tone, as in his New Year's address to the Roman nobility, now a "trade-union" approach, as in his address last March to the Christian Workers' Association of Italy—but all the time goes on using the language of reaction to Franco Spain.

Progressives everywhere have assumed a peculiarly timid attitude toward the Vatican—an attitude rooted in their reluctance to be regarded as anti-Catholic. And the Vatican has astutely exploited the popular misconception that to attack clericalism is to attack the Catholic faith or the church. I have just gone through the issues of a well-known British liberal weekly for the past six months. On almost every subject it has spoken with admirable courage and independence. But I did not find a single article, not even a passing comment, on the activities of the Vatican. As a matter of fact, a British daily created a sensation last year by publishing a Low cartoon, Neutrality in Rome, which showed a cardinal dispatching a message of congratulation to Hitler while another hawked an anti-Russian issue of the Vatican News. The United Press commented, "It is believed to be the first time that a British daily newspaper has carried an anti-Vatican cartoon." Indeed, the Vatican enjoys a kind of diplomatic immunity which the British Foreign Office and the State Department have good reason to envy. Each time the leaders of the Big Three have met, the papers have printed many inside stories, personal attacks, and canards. Yet Archbishop Spellman has made several trips to Europe, and we have still to learn the real purpose of his visits.

I have no unfriendly feeling toward the Catholic church. Thousands of Spain's best Catholics are on the side of the Republican government in exile. Spain is a Catholic country; it will doubtless remain a Catholic country; the Spanish Republic is resolved to protect the rights of Spain's Catholics. But the Catholic faith is one thing and the Vatican is another. And in Spain as elsewhere the Vatican is today in the service of reaction.

DEL VAYO

BOOKS and the ARTS

Karl Shapiro's Poetics

ESSAY ON RIME. By Karl Shapiro. Reynal and Hitchcock. $2.

"ESSAY ON RIME" is an attack upon the character of modern poetry and upon the author's own poetry, as Shapiro says with modesty. This modesty would be less distressing were it not uncalled for, and were it not a repudiation of Shapiro's own attitudes and practice as a poet.

The essential vagueness of Shapiro's attack is such that any attempt at an exact formulation of it must omit some ambiguous qualification or apology. To state directly what is actually diffuse and contradictory, Shapiro has discovered a threefold confusion in modern poetry. In prosody, the modern poet depends too much upon scansion by count of ear, which Shapiro confounds with such devices as Cummings's typography and with his own misunderstanding of Bridges's analysis of Milton's blank verse. In language, the modern poet makes a false use of conversational diction, abstract nouns, and like devices—a criticism which is too general to mean very much. In belief, the failure is disbelief, the effort to find beliefs, and an acceptance of the doctrines of Freud — accusations which are soft impeachments indeed. What Shapiro desires, and what he regards as the peak from which poetry has declined, is again hard to say, although in one passage he asks, "Where is the literature/ Of nature, where the love poem and the plain/ Statement of feeling?" and he repeatedly expresses his dislike for "verse of the mind," a distaste which must include Lucretius, Dante, Donne, Pope, Coleridge, and lesser lights.

The wrongness of this new work extends from the writing as such to the governing motives of the entire poem. In particular, the versification is in a rhythm as crude as a rocking-chair's, and the phrasing is full of such items as "traumatic shattering shock," "gross indecency," "brave kids," and "the golden doors of Hopkins' heart." And then in describing the nature of modern poetry Shapiro commits countless errors of fact and interpretation. A passage from Marianne Moore's profound poem about poetry, the ironic remark, "I too dislike it," is cited by Shapiro to show that Miss Moore literally dislikes poetry. Freud's therapy is said to be "deterministic" and "deductive." Poe is called "the Lenin of the Symbolists." Hart Crane's death is attributed to the religion of art. "Finnegans Wake" is said to be an exercise in "Freudian philology." And we are told that Blake's lyrics are left unread for the sake of his "Prophetic Books." These details would not matter too much except for the purpose they are meant to serve.

The declared purpose of showing the decline of modern poetry none the less permits Shapiro to praise greatly a few authors—Joyce, Eliot, Auden, and other modern poets. The fault is said to be with the imitators of these great authors, though the imitators are making use of the masters' inventions. If it seems contradictory to praise the master for qualities for which the follower is censured, and the whole of modern poetry condemned, the explanation is that Shapiro's praise is really half-hearted and ambiguous. "Ash Wednesday" is a great poem, and "Ulysses" is a great work, too. But for "the breakdown" in language "Joyce is as much to blame as any man"; "the price he paid for greatness is too dear," a statement which means less and less the more it is scrutinized, unless it means that "Ulysses" ought not to have been written.

When Shapiro speaks of criticism—by which he means only "self-dependent pride in thought, act, and invention" —and when he attacks intellectuals who practice criticism—which turns out, after all, to be elucidation and evaluation of and commentary upon works of art—the bias and the crucial weakness of his attack seem to become plain. The worst consequence of such attacks as these—Shapiro's is not the first, or the last, or essentially different from that of Van Wyck Brooks or of J. Donald Adams—is that the false and vicious seesaw of attack and defense is forced upon everyone. To object to this kind of attack upon modern poetry is far from being prepared to deny the excesses and limitations of modern poetry. To feel that Shapiro's anti-intellectualism and philistinism are foolish does not mean that one has to justify the serious defects of the intellectual and the bohemian. In his previous volume, in a poem entitled "The Intellectuals," Shapiro wrote, "I'd rather be/ A milkman" and "I'd rather be a barber" than an intellectual, forcing one to wonder what is so wonderful about being a milkman—not that one has anything against milkmen. In this new work he condemns intellectuals more than anyone else, which suggests powerfully that the attack on criticism is a fear of critics, and the hatred of the intellectual a fear of the intellect. There is no other explanation of his horror of glosses, commentaries, translations, and the analysis of poetry. The truth is that the modern poet, critic, or intellectual is not so inferior to the milkman as this depressing and disappointing book makes out.

DELMORE SCHWARTZ

Study of the Jews

A PARTISAN GUIDE TO THE JEWISH PROBLEM. By Milton Steinberg. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $3.

WHEN Dr. Steinberg put "partisan" in his title he instantly showed the scrupulous tolerance that characterizes this study. No one involved in the Jewish problem can remain non-partisan; the only approach to reason is through announcing one's prejudice at the outset. This study embraces everything from the arguments for assimilation to the methods for a rejuvenation of Judaism. Every type of Jew is presented, from the orthodox Jew to the Jew who has only a sense of belonging to a social group, with perhaps a tenuous memory of ritual stimulated annually by the news photographs of Yom Kippur. There is an analysis of the sick soul of the Jew, his self-hatred as a result of centuries of persecution—a characteristic studied by Freud even while

PRESS • THE UNIVERSITY OF NORTH CAROLINA PRESS • THE UNIVERSITY OF NORTH CAROLINA PRESS • THE INTERNATIONAL CARTELS

By ERVIN HEXNER

Stimulating, authoritative, here is an illuminating story of the international cartels in the period immediately before the beginning of the war. With over 100 case studies.
November 24, $6.00

THE MANSIONS OF VIRGINIA

By THOMAS T. WATERMAN

The first complete study of Virginia's most beautiful houses, illustrated with floorplans and over 350 halftones. November 17, $10.00

OIL AND DEEP WATER

By KAJ KLITGAARD

"When a seaman of the old school comes face to face with modern conditions on the sea, some amusing things are likely to happen . . . the story loses nothing in the telling."—LINCOLN COLCORD, N. Y. Herald Tribune $2.50

READING AND SPEAKING FOREIGN LANGUAGES

By H. R. HUSE

A stimulating discussion of modern methods of teaching languages, with a strong argument in favor of reading rather than speaking as a method of teaching. $2.00

THE HUMANITIES AND THE COMMON MAN

By NORMAN FOERSTER

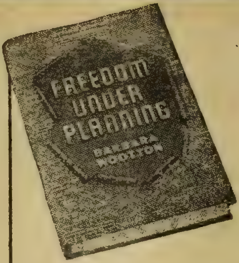
A re-examination of the naturalistic and utilitarian trends in higher education and a plea to have the humanities dominate the entire university program. $1.50

FOREVER GROWING

By PAUL GREEN

A famous playwright's key to harmonious living. $1.50

At your bookstore



FREEDOM UNDER PLANNING

By BARBARA WOOTTON

"DEBUNKS the generalities of Hayek ... should be read by every citizen who is interested in economic progress and democracy."—MORDECAI EZEKIEL

"If I were teaching economics again, I would consider it one of the first five books that had to be read . . . the best thing of its kind."—LEON HENDERSON $2.00

MEXICAN VILLAGE

By JOSEPHINA NIGGLI

"I CAN ONLY describe the book as enchanting . . . The stories, in themselves, have the classic quality of Isak Dinesen's Seven Gothic Tales, yet taken as a whole they make a complete narrative."—MARJORIE KINNAN RAWLINGS

"Comes as a gusty surprise ... here is the fine old art of colorful story-telling at its best . . . I recommend it sincerely as the best novel published in the past two years."—BETTY SMITH

"First-rate writing and deeply interesting . . . Miss Niggli is a writer to be watched."—WILLIAM MCFEE, New York Sun. Illus. by Marion Fitz-Simons. $3.00

MEMORIES OF AN OLD-TIME TAR HEEL

By KEMP PLUMMER BATTLE

Edited by W. J. Battle

A GREAT North Carolinian's vivid picture of fifty years of North Carolina life — from the 1830's to the 1880's. "It is a rich dish that Kemp Plummer Battle has provided."—Norfolk Ledger-Dispatch
Illustrated, $3.00

THE UNIVERSITY OF NORTH CAROLINA PRESS • THE UNIVERSITY OF NORTH CAROLINA PRESS • THE UNIVERS he was himself unwittingly its victim. There is an answer offered, in a positive and progressive Judaism. And finally there is a remarkably good section on Zionism, interesting not only because it stresses the rebuilding of land and character, but because it points out that the movement's greatest contribution to society may yet prove to be the wide experience of the Jewish colonies in cooperative and communal living successfully integrated with private ownership.

Dr. Steinberg himself is a "reconstructionist," a disciple of Mordecai Kaplan, who defines Judaism as an "evolving religious civilization." Both men find Jewish life compounded of religion, culture and civilization, and peoplehood, all organically interwoven, and point out that Jews can live as Jews through even a remote realization of any one of these factors, but that the full creative life is built upon a well-proportioned realization of them all. I do not feel as strongly as Dr. Steinberg the need for ritual, but then, Dr. Steinberg is a rabbi, and I am not a synagogue-goer. Yet I share his liking for the Oneg Shabbat—a Sabbath custom evolved in Palestine, consisting of an assembly for lectures, discussions, music, and group singing. I believe that while religion carried our ethic for many centuries, this ethic can now develop through human rather than deified sanctions, through human authority for social progress.

Perhaps Dr. Steinberg underestimates the positive Jewish feeling of many of us who find no niche in the Jewish community life, which, as he points out, is so badly organized. At one point, for instance, he quotes a study in which Jewish authors were asked about the role of Jewishness in their creative lives. Only two were found who "regarded Judaism as actively meaningful to them."

OXFORD BOOKS

FEDERALISM AND REGIONALISM
IN GERMANY
THE DIVISION OF PRUSSIA
By Arnold Brecht

The de-centralization of Germany politically and economically is one of the major problems confronting the Allied Military Governments today. To help you understand the complexity of this problem, the circumstances which have created it and the possibilities of solving it, a high official in the pre-Hitler Prussian government here discusses the crucial question in its historical perspective, and makes cogent recommendations for the future. Maps. Appendices.

At all bookstores • $2.50

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS
114 Fifth Avenue, New York 11

I was not included in this study, and a number of writers spring to mind who should have answered in the positive, simply by the evidence of their work: what about Irving Fineman, Henry Roth, Ben Hecht, Daniel Fuchs, Albert Halper, all of whom have written out of this background?

Dr. Steinberg's cultural orientation is offered as an answer to those who believe Jews must either assimilate or live in ghettos. "I sing Negro spirituals, American ballads, and Hassidic and Palestinian folk songs with equal ardor. On the Fourth of July I set off fireworks and attempt to transmit to my children an appreciation of the significance of the occasion. With equal earnestness I kindle Hanukkah lights and discuss with them the meaning of that festival. At no time am I conscious of a strain between the two worlds."

He is clear in his understanding that Jews must be in the front ranks of the movement "toward economic security for all." Aside from their special interest in eradicating the economic roots of anti-Semitism, Dr. Steinberg points out that Jews "must put themselves behind every well-considered program that seeks, within the framework of the democratic process, to humanize the economic order . . ., for theirs is most immediately the heritage of the prophets and sages who centuries ago first cried out against communal iniquity. . . . The tradition of the Jews unites with their self-interest in making the good society very intimately their concern."

This is soberly and cautiously put—Dr. Steinberg is more passionate in writing about Palestine—but it touches the practical and ideal basis of Jewish behavior.

MEYER LEVIN

Peace and Law

THE PRICE OF PEACE. By Sir William Beveridge. W. W. Norton and Company. $2.

LET'S TALK ABOUT THE PEACE. By Henry G. Alsberg. Hastings House. $2.75.

EUROPEAN MANIFESTO. By Pierre de Lanux. Creative Age Press. $2.

BOOKS like Alsberg's and Beveridge's fill me with despair. They are so quietly, so incontrovertibly right. All readers will coolly nod approval; and then they will go on indorsing, supporting, or at least condoning the policies which Alsberg and Beveridge have so luminously shown to be disastrous. And this means you, member of The Nation's intelligentsia.

There is nothing flashy and nothing cryptic about either book—just plain, straightforward discussion. The tone is very much the same. Alsberg professes to address a G. I., carefully explains technical terms, and uses an occasional bit of slang. Beveridge might be addressing the House of Commons, a Rotarian meeting, or a Bankers' Institute. The frivolous and the sophisticated had better leave these books alone.

Both books were written before the fiasco of the London Conference of Foreign Ministers, before the Potsdam meeting of supermen, before San Francisco, and even before Yalta. But the issues have not changed, and the books re-

The novel the GI's discovered

DARK RAINBOW

By GERALD BUTLER

"A shocking book; that is it gives a violent jar, but I think it is the most powerful and in some ways the best book on my list."—Time & Tide. $2.50

THE EINSTEIN THEORY OF RELATIVITY

A TRIP TO THE FOURTH DIMENSION

Text by* LILLIAN R. LIEBER
Drawings by* HUGH GRAY LIEBER

Authors of The Education of T. C. Mits. $3.00

THE TASK

A COLLECTION OF POEMS BY

ROBERT BHAIN CAMPBELL

"The rich, poetic record of man's continual personal growth, of an ever broadening identification with the essential struggles of our time."—The New Masses. $2.00

RADIO DRAMA IN ACTION

TWENTY-FIVE RADIO PLAYS OF A CHANGING WORLD

Edited By ERIK BARNOUW

An important function of radio today is to increase public knowledge and understanding. Assembled in this volume for the first time are the contributions of twenty-five of the leading dramatists to this field. Among them are NORMAN ROSTEN'S stirring story of the Red Army, the enduring patience of the Chinese dramatized by PEARL BUCK, and STEPHEN VINCENT BENET'S triumphant Christmas story. $3.00

THE FARMER'S LAST FRONTIER

By FRED A. SHANNON

A Pulitzer Prize winning historian has written the most comprehensive account of agricultural developments during the years between the Civil War and the close of the nineteenth century. "Excellent."—Russell Lord.
Illustrated, $5.00

At all bookstores

FARRAR & RINEHART

THEY FINISHED THEIR JOB —
LET'S FINISH OURS

VICTORY
LOAN

BUY A BOND TODAY!

main as timely as when they were first planned. The essential idea is simple: you can have peace only on the basis of law, among the nations as well as within each nation. And the law must be equal for all, or it is not law. An order established on force is not peace, for the only meaning of force is the threat of war. Therefore any juridical distinction according to power, any privilege granted to the Big Five, is war. It may be bloodless war, if the victim submits without a struggle, as Czechoslovakia did after Munich. But injustice does not become legitimate because it is overwhelming.

The "price of peace," according to both, is the renunciation of absolute sovereignty and the substitution of collective security for private—that is, national—armaments. In a liberal state the individual is "sovereign," although not independent; he is "the captain of his soul," and cannot be coerced except when he is interfering with the freedom of others. All are equal in the eyes of the law. In a liberal World Commonwealth the same juridical equality of all members, great or small, should prevail. It was promised in advance by the Connally resolution, pledged anew by Cordell Hull, reaffirmed in the Preamble of the San Francisco Charter. But in a daze which is partly confusion, partly hypocrisy, partly weariness we turn our backs upon international law and revert to Bismarckian "realism," "blood and iron," "might is right," "power politics," "the Big Three."

Sir William protested in advance (March 7, 1945) in a fine letter to the London Times. Later developments have not invalidated his argument. He was pointing the right way; we took the wrong turn; but he is still pointing the right way. The latest development, the atomic bomb, has strengthened his thesis. He is at present advocating, I understand, the World State now. San Francisco was but a futile gesture—as all who attended felt at the time. Even without the Big Five poison, it would be obsolete before it came into effect. Our work is still ahead.

From the historical point of view Sir William Beveridge's book is the richer. Chapter III, The Lesson of Experience, is a masterly summary. Alsberg's gives a more comprehensive survey of the problems we have to face. It is, indeed, in twenty-five easy "lessons," a first-class Primer of World Affairs. The author dares to tackle, for instance, the question of population pressure, which most of us seek to evade. Malthus was right in the main: if population kept increasing in geometric ratio, however small the ratio, the world would eventually turn into a solid mass of humanity—which is absurd. There must be a check; war, pestilence, famine are not the most humane solutions. Alsberg considers the problem solved so far as the white race is concerned. He hopes that the Hindus and Chinese will reach the same state of equilibrium when they are fully industrialized. In the meantime he would provide an outlet for them, particularly in Brazil. I do not know whether this particular solution will prove sufficient; I do not know whether there is any effective solution; but the problem should not be shunned.

Alsberg strongly and ably advocates a Federation of Europe west of the Curzon Line, and including England. As I noted in reviewing Chamberlin, everyone is driven willy-nilly to that solution, which was foreshadowed by Roosevelt and Churchill. If Europe is Balkanized, torn between Russian and English influences, it means war. If Russia and its friends

The Nation Associates

cordially invite you to attend a

Dinner Forum

on

The Challenge of the Atomic Bomb on the occasion of the 80th Anniversary of

The Nation

Monday, December 3, at 6.30

at

Grand Ballroom, Hotel Astor

Couvert $7.50 • Dress Optional

Speakers:

Dr. Herbert Vere Evatt
Foreign Minister of Australia

Professor Harold Laski
Chairman, British Labor Party

Professor Leo Szilard
University of Chicago

Mrs. Franklin Delano Roosevelt

Freda Kirchwey

Leon Henderson
Chairman

The dinner forum is the concluding session of a 3-day Conference of The Nation Associates on "What is the Answer to the Atomic Bomb?"

Convenient Reservation Form

THE NATION ASSOCIATES, Inc.
20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

Please make .... reservations for me for the dinner of Monday, December 3, at $7.50 per person.

NAME ....

STREET ....

CITY .... ZONE... STATE...........

Please make checks payable to The Nation Associates, Inc.

in this country should oppose European union, they would hasten it—but against Russia. War again, but a war which might turn into a crusade of the pluto-democracies against communism and result in the triumph of reaction. The solution would be for the West and Russia to reach a friendly agreement. It is not beyond the reach of statesmanship. If we have no guide but distrust and fear, "realism" will take its course. And we should be realistic enough to know where such realism leads.

I am informed that the International Relations Clubs, thanks to the Carnegie Foundation, have distributed among the colleges many copies of "European Manifesto," by Pierre de Lanux. A wise move. Lanux is a good world citizen and a good European. He has worked for years in the Paris office of the League of Nations; he may be said to be, with Coudenhove-Kalergi, the heir of Briand's spirit. He too wants an integrated Europe. He urges particularly that the liberated nations, which have so deeply suffered, should have a voice in the settlement. If they were overrun, it was on account of our lack of foresight, of our neutrality and isolationism. Our record gives us no authority to reconstruct Europe; and the European peoples have not forfeited the right to shape their own destinies. "United through the tragic fate of Nazi subjugation and a common underground, ten European nations—140,000,000 people—form the nucleus of the New Europe."

ALBERT GUERARD

BRIEFER COMMENT

A Satisfying Human Tale

THE READERS of such an autobiography as Marianne Oswald's "One Small Voice" (Whittlesey House, $2.75) ask themselves, if they are honest, "Would I find the story interesting if it were not by and about a famous person?" The answer for this book is—no doubt about it—yes, you would, any reader would. For, in the first place, the book is written, as gifted people occasionally do write a language not their own by birth, with a freshness and originality which give it great charm. Her father had a "beautiful secret face"; her feet "looked proud in their new shoes"; the butcher and his wife wore "white, blood-drunk aprons"; "like the cut end of a pound-cake, everything had crumpled up; Catherine was the last raisin of my childhood"; "the chairs, the desk, seemed to yawn with loneliness."

But even without the especially savory taste of the English in which this touching story is written, it would attract and fascinate readers. It is intensely personal, first-hand, and authentic; yet the theme is classic, sure-fire, folklore—the immortal Cinderella, the Ugly Duckling, the ignored youngest son.

Not literally the youngest son, for the sorrows of the violently emotional little Lorrainer of Sarreguemines who tells her story come from the disappointment of her family that she was not a boy. But literally Cinderella because of a wicked elder sister, overbearing and selfish, who continually pushes the sensitive, highly gifted younger child away from the glass slipper of success and fulfilment which really fits the dancing feet of the child genius, not her own—middle-class and clumsily trampling over other people's feelings.

The book that charts the full development of

USSR FOREIGN POLICY

By Victor A. Yakhontoff

Author of The Chinese Soviets, Over the Divide and Eyes on Japan

A lucid review of the Soviet Union's foreign policy since its beginning, based on official Soviet documents, speeches by great Russian leaders, and material not hitherto available in English.

At all bookstores • $3.50

Coward-McCann Inc.

Sunday, November 18:

FIRST CONFERENCE ON AMERICAN-SOVIET CULTURAL COOPERATION

At the Engineering Societies Building,
29 West 39th Street, New York City

Panel Sessions, 2:00 to 5:00 P.M.

Music — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Honorary Chairman; Aaron Copland, Chairman; Elie Siegmeister, Leonard Bernstein, Olin Downes, Marc Blitzstein

Theatre — Margaret Webster, Chairman; Cheryl Crawford, Harold Clurman, Norris Houghton, James Gow, John Martin

Literature — Dr. Arthur Upham Pope, Chairman; Howard Fast, Mark Slonim, Alexander Kendrick, David Burliuk, John Hersey

Evening Program, 8:00 P.M.

Edwin S. Smith, The Honorable Helen Gahagan Douglas, Charles J. Child, The Hon. Pavel P. Mikhailov

Presentation of — Two arias from "War and Peace" by Sergei Prokofieff. (American Premier, Courtesy of Leeds Am.-Rus.) Poems by Vladimir Mayakovsky and Konstantine Simonvov. Excerpts from new Soviet plays

Tickets: $2.50. Evening session only: $1.50

National Council of American-Soviet Friendship
114 East 32nd Street, New York, N. Y., MU. 3-2080

There's no better gift!

THE NATION for your friends
52 TIMES A YEAR for only $3

You can give The Nation as a gift to as many people as you wish at the special rate of only $3 each. And with it goes the usual greeting card. You can renew your own subscription now or whenever it expires at the regular yearly rate of $5, or if you want to make a real saving, you can renew for two years for $8 or three years for $11. Just fill out and mail the order form below.

GIFT ORDER FORM

THE NATION ASSOCIATES, Inc.
20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

Please send gift subscriptions of one year of The Nation to my friends as indicated below, at the special gift rate of $3 each.

☐ Also renew my own subscription to The Nation at the regular rate for .... years.
☐ Don't renew my subscription now.
☐ Remittance enclosed. ☐ Please bill me.

My name is ....
Street ....
City .... Zone & State..................

REGULAR RENEWAL SUBSCRIPTION RATES
One Year $5 Two Years $8 Three Years $11
For Foreign and Canadian subscriptions add $1.00 a year for extra postage.

→ List Gift Subscriptions Here ←

Name ....
Street ....
City .... Zone & State......................
Gift Card should read from ....
☐ Send Gift Card to me for mailing.

Name ....
Street ....
City .... Zone & State......................
Gift Card should read from ....
☐ Send Gift Card to me for mailing.

Name ....
Street ....
City .... Zone & State......................
Gift Card should read from ....
☐ Send Gift Card to me for mailing.

11-10-45

Yet no, not literally Cinderella, friendless as Aschenputtel was, save for the brief glimpse of the good fairy at the end. The wild-hearted child who became the great diseuse had a friend who gave her the sweetest, warmest, most creative love and understanding. Few characters in any book have in them a more utterly adorable character than Catherine the cook. She shared life richly with the small Marianne, and she opened before her, as a woman can for a little girl, door after door, through which later the Cinderella of this tale went through to fame; and to better than fame, to the ability to stir other human hearts, as Catherine stirred hers, to pity and love for the unfortunate.

As in nearly all autobiographies—I suppose psychiatrists know why this is so—the story of the childhood years is more appealing than the later part. Yet the last few chapters handle with brevity, skill, and good taste the rather awkward position of an ugly duckling who has to describe his own transformation into a stately and acclaimed white swan; of a Cinderella who must describe her own success at the ball.

"One Small Voice" should be on the shelves of all those interested in the growth of children, of all those who like a satisfying human tale—and, as a matter of course, of all libraries. DOROTHY CANFIELD

. . . Ergo Sum

ACCORDING TO REPORT, M. I. T. has invented a thinking machine; and simultaneously, across the Charles River from M. I. T., Houghton Mifflin has issued "The Practical Cogitator" by Charles P. Curtis, Jr., and Ferris Greenslet ($3). New England is determined to do our thinking for us or to prod us into doing it for ourselves.

The way in which the "Cogitator" does this is by presenting under about a dozen headings some five hundred pages of extracts from philosophers, poets, jurists, and other articulate men. The anthologists have stressed the practical by choosing passages that deal with difficulties in the life of mind or that suggest techniques and conclusions. They keep the reader going, moreover, by an exquisite balance between old and new, familiar and novel, long and short, didactic and witty. Like all miscellanies, the volume is meant for the bedside shelf, but unlike them it is thoroughly indexed. So that if one does not read from first to last without skipping, one can readily find one's favorite essayist and see "what they chose from him," or indulge the equal pleasure of finding out what anyone can possibly have to say about, say, pompiérisme—which, by the way, the editors quite misconstrue.

Messrs. Curtis and Greenslet are on the whole so admirably eclectic that it is carping to ask the usual "Why this? Why not that?" Yet in one or two instances a question in that form intrudes itself upon the mind of the most docile co-cogitator. For example: why no Samuel Butler—surely a practical fellow; why not more of Bagehot, his kindred contemporary? Weren't there more artists who could think? Again, New England is heavily represented in this collection, and this is quite proper, but O. W. Holmes, Sr., deserved a bigger place and for something better than a calendar sentiment about love. Indeed, for my taste, he could usefully replace with his own wisdom most of his son's rather facile skepticism.

Which reminds me of one very practical conclusion that this book has made me reach: the widespread admiration for our great American lawyers as thinkers and literary men is misplaced. Off the bench they are third-rate at best and write like solid citizens; it isn't fair to exhibit them side by side with James, Whitehead, and Confucius. J. B.

Shinto Shown Up

THE AMERICAN PUBLIC is now armed with two more books of distinct value in the continuing campaign against retaining the institution of the Japanese emperor. Willard Price's "Japan and the Son of Heaven" (Duell, Sloan, and Pearce, $2.75) is a breezy, readable attack on the emperor myths in the refreshing tradition of journalistic debunking. It is so replete with amusing, irreverent, and sometimes spicy stories that its translation and publication in Japan might do a lot to dispel the aura of sacredness which years of indoctrination have formed around the throne. It suffers, however, from one serious defect: the author overemphasizes the importance of the emperor and slights the more fundamental question of the future of the ruling oligarchy, of which the emperor is the most effective instrument. Robert O. Ballou's "Shinto, the Unconquered Enemy" (Viking Press, $2.75), a study of the religious and political origins and development of Shintoism, is a more academic but no less valuable contribution to the campaign against state Shinto. A large part of the book is given over to a very useful selection of key Shinto texts. ANDREW ROTH

STAGE PLAYS

MICHAEL TODD Presents
UP IN CENTRAL PARK
Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS Lyrics by DOROTHY FIELDS Music by SIGMUND ROMBERG
BROADWAY THEATRE, Broadway at 53rd Street. Matinees: WED. & SAT.

"DESERVES ITS GREAT SUCCESS!"—Nichols, Times
Rodgers and Hammerstein present
MADY CHRISTIANS • OSCAR HOMOLKA
in JOHN VAN DRUTEN'S
I REMEMBER MAMA
from Kathryn Forbes' "Mama's Bank Account"
with JOHN TETZEL • ADRIENNE GESSNER • RICHARD BISHOP
MUSIC BOX 45th Street, West of Broadway. Phone: Circle 6-4636
Eves. 8:35 Sharp. Mats. Thurs. and Sat. 2:35 Sharp

The New Statesman and Nation
England's Leading Weekly Review
may now be obtained through
THE NATION
20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.
Yearly subscription $6.50 including postage
SPECIMEN copy on request

MOTION PICTURES

RKO NOW
Manhattan
ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST.
86th ST.
58th ST. near Lex.
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENT
RIVERSIDE
23rd ST.
Bronx
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL
Westchester
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS
"Most Urgent Motion Picture Now on the Nation's Screens."—PM
'PRIDE of the MARINES'
starring
JOHN GARFIELD
ELEANOR PARKER • DANE CLARK
Inspiring post-war drama of a crippled soldier and his readjustment to normal life
From Book by ROGER BUTTERFIELD
A WARNER BROS. FILM
—and—
'CRIME INC.' TOM NEAL
Brooklyn
BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYOU Coney Island
Queens
Keith's FLUSHING
Keith's RICH. HILL
STRAND Far Rockaway
"Fascinating Spy Film" —Herald-Tribune
"Highly Dramatic" —N. Y. Times
'THE HOUSE ON 92ND STREET'
William EYTHE • Lloyd NOLAN • Signe HASSO
Exciting and Authentic Pictures of FBI Technique Used in Capturing German and Japanese Spies
—and—
'DIVORCE' Kay FRANCIS Bruce CABOT

Paramount Presents
Eddie BRACKEN Veronica LAKE
"HOLD THAT BLONDE"
WITH
ALBERT DEKKER • FRANK FENTON
GEORGE ZUCCO • DONALD MacBRIDE
NOW PLAYING PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

"An exciting film—with humor and a light macabre touch." —Crowther, N. Y. Times
20th Century Fox presents Rene Clair's
AND THEN THERE WERE NONE
Agatha Christie's masterpiece of suspense!
Plus a big in-person stage show
Now Playing ROXY 7th Ave. at 50th St.

Films

JAMES AGEE

CONFIDENTIAL AGENT" is a surprisingly serious translation of Graham Greene's thriller about a Spanish Republican who came to England to negotiate a coal deal for his government and ran into a kind of nightmare cartoon of the cruelty, treachery, stupidity, and hopelessness of the period. The film's intrepidity in calling Sp—n, and even F–sc–sm, by their full right names would have been easier to appreciate in 1938 or so. Yet this is in some ways an exciting and good picture, the best attempt yet, though still inadequate, to make the most of a Greene novel. Charles Boyer, imaginatively cast, gives the agent a proper balance of incongruous frailty, incompetence, tragic responsibility, and moral courage; Lauren Bacall is still amateurish and she is about as English as Pocahontas, but her very individual vitality more than makes up for her deficiencies. The various capitalists, workers, fascists, thugs, scientific idiots, idealistic imbeciles, and perfidious undergrounders of Greene's fable are played with unhoped-for edge and earnestness, with especially vivid performances by Katina Paxinou, Peter Lorre, and a young girl, new to me, named Wanda Hendrix. Even Greene's somewhat mawkish metaphysic of universal mistrust is undertaken rather than discarded. In several scenes — Lorre's ugly aria of fear, Hendrix's death, Boyer's horrible parting scene with Paxinou —the players bear down and the camera bores in with an intensity which suggests the sense of liberty, even in matters irrelevant to censorship, which freedom from the Hays code can bring. The most interesting failures in the movies are failures in pace, atmosphere, and visual brilliance. It should have been possible to tell the story in about two-thirds the time taken, without skipping or slighting anything or seeming at all to hurry; and in spite of some very good sets and a number of beautiful shots, Greene's greatest talent —which is, I think, with the look and effluence of places, streets, and things —is not once even approximated. This is odd, because in these respects Greene achieves in print what more naturally belongs in films, and in a sense does not write novels at all, but verbal movies. I don't entirely like to think so, but he may have proved that certain kinds of movies anyhow are better on the page than they can ever be on the screen.

"Spellbound," Alfred Hitchcock's surprisingly disappointing thriller about psychoanalysis, is worth seeing, but hardly more. A psychiatric adviser appears among the credits, and with enough toe-dancing through the labyrinthine rationalizations of dramatic (and box-office) license, it is possible to imitate the faint ways in which the advice may have been followed. But I felt that the makers of the film had succeeded in using practically none of the movie possibilities of a psychoanalytic story, even those of the simplest melodrama; and that an elaborate, none-too-interesting murder mystery, though stoutly moored to the unconscious, merely cheapened and got in the way of any possible psychological interest. To quite an extent the psychological pretensions cluttered up the murder mystery too. Ingrid Bergman plays the scientist and wears glasses to prove it; Gregory Peck is the troubled layman. Both are ornamentally effective-looking —so much so that in spite of some bits of pretty good playing it was impossible to disidentify them from illustrations in a slick-paper magazine serial, and more hopeless still to identify them with living people. There are some frightening shots of the kinds of striated whiteness which mysteriously terrifies the patient—the mark of fork-tines on a table cloth, for instance; the remembrance of the initial trauma is excitingly managed; and in one crisis of mental dereliction, in which the camera flicks its eye forlornly around a bathroom, you get a little of the unlimited, cryptic terror which can reside in mere objects. But these are practically the only suggestions of the hair-raising movie this had every right and obligation to be. As for the dream designed by Salvador Dali, it is as frankly irrelevant to dream reality, and so to criticism for its lack of reality in that direct sense, as Markova is for not growing a four-foot larynx for "Swan Lake." The trouble is that this decision in favor of unreality was mistaken in the first place. In the second, the dream is none too good in its own terms. James Cruze did one many times better, twenty years ago, in "Hollywood," probably without even considering calling in an outside specialist, far less a psychiatric adviser. But then I doubt that they could have thought of hiring Dali in the first place if they had been at all wise to the possibilities of their subject. "Spellbound" is just so much of the Id as could be safely displayed in a Bergdorf Goodman window.

Records

B. H. HAGGIN

TOSCANINI'S great performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony may yet be recorded to his satisfaction; but it hasn't been so far; and the vacuum hasn't been filled by the Stokowski version, which falsifies the work, or even by the Weingartner version, which gives an effective and moderately well-recorded statement of the first two movements, but a perfunctorily ineffective and poorly recorded statement of the last two. Nor has it been filled now by Columbia's new recording (Set 591; $8.50) of a performance by Ormandy with the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Westminster Choir, Stella Roman, soprano, Enid Szantho, contralto, Frederick Jagel, tenor, and Nicola Moscona, bass; the one to acquire of the three available.

The performance is unusually straightforward for Ormandy: he seems to have set out to play the music with strict obedience to the directions of the printed score, and with strict maintenance of tempos (the one bad example of his usual practice is the slowing-up of the third movement at the end of side 10, which is followed by a disproportionate speeding-up at the beginning of side 11). But that is all he has achieved: a statement of the sounds of the work, without continuity of relation or impetus in their succession, and without communicative power. Even as such it is preferable to Stokowski's monkey-business; and the better recording may make it preferable to the Weingartner version. For this is Columbia's most successful recording of the Philadelphia Orchestra thus far—the first to achieve an over-all sound of the orchestra that is natural, clear, and bright, and without the stridency of earlier recordings. One fault is the weakness of woodwinds as against the rest of the orchestra—for example on sides 3 and 4; and the weakness of orchestra as against chorus and soloists in the last movement (the sound of the chorus is a little harsh in fortissimos). Another fault—which will inconvenience those who play the set with a record-changer—is the differences in volume-level from some sides to the next, and in some instances the changing volume-level on one side. And a couple of sides in my review copy wavered in pitch.

Moscona's tremolo makes it almost impossible to know what notes he is singing; but the other soloists sing their parts adequately; and the chorus is excellent.

Even before the scarcity of records caused by wartime shortages of materials and labor I received complaints from readers remote from the big cities about the difficulties caused by Victor's and Columbia's method of distributing records. Thus the first letter which this column's favorite correspondent wrote, early in 1941, was a complaint about his experiences in a North Carolina university town—experiences that went back as far as 1935. His family had a camera business; and it dealt directly with the Eastman Company's own warehouse, which filled its orders within a week or ten days. Victor and Columbia, on the other hand, distributed their records to retail dealers only through intermediate jobbers with exclusive franchises for their regions, who played safe by stocking not the entire catalogue but only the best-sellers and the recent issues. If the retailer ordered something the jobber did not keep in stock, the jobber in turn had to order it from the Victor or Columbia factory; and then, my correspondent reported, it took never less than a month to arrive, more often took two months, sometimes took six, and sometimes never arrived at all. The reason for this, it developed, was that the factory itself did not maintain a stock of the entire catalogue to take care of orders as they came in, but preferred to wait for orders to accumulate before it pressed the copies to fill them.

Moreover the set might arrive with a broken or scratched or otherwise defective record; and then there were the same procedure and delay with the replacement. I heard a great deal about that even from friends in New York—from one friend in particular who after two years had still not received replacements for two defective records in a couple of extra-expensive Columbia "society" sets. And it is about this that I have been getting the bitter complaints recently: now it is impossible to get a replacement at all. My North Carolina correspondent, back from the war, mentions in a letter about recent experiences in record-buying that just before he went into the army, in December, 1942, he broke one record in the Glyndebourne Festival recording of "Così fan tutte," which he asked his dealer to replace, and which is still unreplaced.

All I can offer is sympathy, and if my readers want more they had better complain not to me but to Victor and Columbia.

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

We Are Infected

Dear Sirs: It is very well to get the refugee Jews settled in Palestine or any place in which they can be assured of the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. But why try to do it in a way that seems to commit civilization to legendary tales of Abraham and a Promised Land, which appear to modern minds as irrational and as productive of evil as Shintoism and emperor-worship?

There is a much worse side to it. It is an ignominious hiding of the fact that the great American nation is behaving even worse than the Arab effendi and with much less excuse. We have so much land, and that the richest on earth, that we pay farmers a bonus for not using it. Next to the Australians, we are the worst land-hogs in the world. We could settle all the Jewish refugees of Europe in Arizona and give them a home with all the advantages of Palestine and in doing so add to the nation's wealth and self-respect. We will not do it because we are badly infected with the worst moral pestilence from which the world suffers—a racism that amounts to emotional insanity.

ERNEST M. WHITESMITH

Canon, Ga., October 23

The Snafu System

Dear Sirs: In the September 1 issue of The Nation there was a little note to the effect that the navy's punched-card system was unable to distinguish between service ashore and service afloat. By this date it is probably obvious that the system is practically of no use in aiding demobilization.

When the rate of Specialist (I), or punched-card operator, was frozen at the end of the war, none of us doubted the wisdom of the move, believing that we could be very valuable in demobilizing the fleet. Previous experience with the navy should have made us less gullible. The moon has set, and the Pleiades; time passes, time passes, and we lie alone. I have not done any work since the war's end. The average work week for our 250 enlisted men is about 24 hours. This includes the low-point men working and the high-point men writing letters, reading, being ordered out of the office whenever there is a threat of the higher brass visiting, and getting a good suntan.

A study of the Specialist (I) rate was made at the request of the Bureau of Personnel. Of course I don't know the complete results, but on our local scene there are only 3 men of the 250 who are eligible for discharge. Early in September about 40 rated men were flown out to us from Washington, with an A-1 priority. On the other hand, about 60 men from a neighboring installation were sent back to the States. Even Whitehead's and Russell's logic won't help here. You must use the SNAFU system.

I've spent nearly three years in the navy, and I'm eligible for discharge on points. I'll be a lot more valuable to the country back in school than out here, where I draw $170 a month cash for doing nothing. What can be done about it? SP (I) 1C

Pearl Harbor, October 23

The American Air

Dear Sirs: To my horror I am attacked from time to time—as a result of the autumnal season, which reminds me of this-time-last-year—by bouts of nostalgia for the campaign, which I hated cordially at the time. Nostalgia for "what will tomorrow bring?"—for the state of flux—and, most astonishing of all, for the Americans! Who would have believed it?

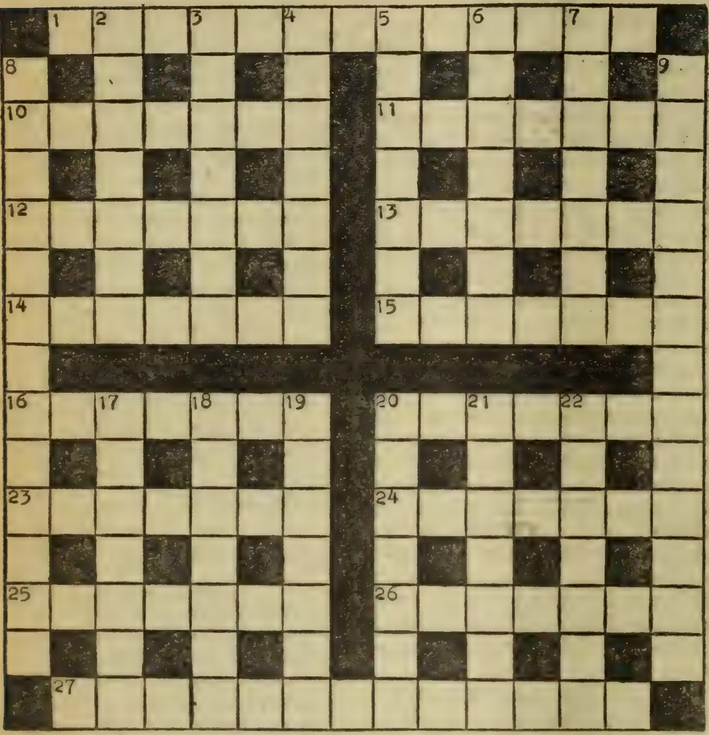
I was washing for dinner last evening when in walked from out of the night a man of about thirty-five, dressed in the uniform of a United States sergeant. I was delighted to see a G. I. again, and spoke to him warmly, when something in his manner did not seem right, and I tumbled to the fact that he was a Dutchman dressed, as many of them are, in an American uniform. My disappointment was extreme. And what surprised me, too, was that I had been so very glad in the first instance to see an American.

In Normandy, and also in Belgium at the time of the Rundstedt offensive, we were on the United States flank, and the G. I.'s called on us every day and

BOOKS FOUND FREE!
WHAT BOOKS DO YOU WANT?
We quote lowest market prices. No charge for locating Hard-to-Find and Out-of-Print Books. All books, OLD or NEW, mailed POST-FREE.
SEARCHLIGHT BOOK NATION
22 East 17th Street, New York City

Crossword Puzzle No. 134

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 All of their music is by handle (hyphen, 5-8)
10 He is usually heard from at open meetings
11 "My starveling bull, Ah! Woe is me! In ------- full How lean is he!"
12 Spanish city famed for its Alhambra, built by the Moors in the 13th century
13 No smoke without fire—except when things do this 14 Heads!
15 What can't be cured must be this
16 Literally, its name means "beautiful lake"
20 He fought with Pilgrim in the Bunyan tale, and sounds like a bad 'un
23 Smaller, flatter and less dangerous than an iceberg
24 A Night in Shakespeare
25 More commodious
26 Son of Sir Rowland de Boys, in As You Like It
27 Gee-gees, but in no sense the stable variety (hyphen, 7-6)

DOWN

2 Known as ""Coeur de Lion," he spoke no English, knew nothing of England, and spent only nine months there during a ten-year reign
3 A free translation of this old greeting might be, "Everybody welcome!" (two words, 3 & 4)
4 Self-styled "master race"
5 Admits being past its heyday, hence the deadlock
6 Always followed by a concord in music, or should be 7 A regular visitor could be no ruder
8 England's favorite Gilbert and Sullivan operetta (two words, 3 & 10)
9 Familiar nursery tale the French know as Le Petit Chaperon Rouge (hyphen, 3-6-4)
17 A musical direction to organists
18 Act with a careless, swaggering, frolicsome air
19 Invaded and occupied
20 Lost city of Syria, afterwards rebuilt under the same name
21 "My name is John Wellington Wells; I'm - ------ in magic and spells" (two words, 1 & 6)
22 "Millions for -------, but not one cent for tribute"

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 133

ACROSS:—1 GUNPOWDER; 6 PATTI; 9 BONE DRY; 10 LANTERN; 11 OBVERSE; 12 NOODLES; 13 NED; 15 UNHAND; 17 MAUSER; 18 UTICA; 19 ROWING; 22 NATURE; 25 ATE; 27 FIGURES; 28 LORRIES; 30 NIAGARA; 31 STUDIED; 32 DELVE; 33 THEODORUS.

DOWN:—1 GOBBO; 2 NINEVEH; 3 OLD IRON; 4 DRYDEN; 5 ROLAND; 6 PANDORA; 7 TREBLES; 8 INNISFREE; 14 EXIST; 15 UNREFINED; 16 DUG; 17 MAN; 20 WAGTAIL; 21 NARRATE; 23 AGROUND; 24 UNIFIER; 25 ASKANT; 26 ELYSEE; 29 SIDES.

---

drank with us, and traded coffee for eggs, which they did not have the art of scrounging. Also, on my trips to Paris, I was sometimes pulled out of the mud, and literally out of the snow, by G. I.'s; and the presence of this huge army on our left (3½ G. I.'s to every Tommy) was constantly felt from Bayeux to Westphalia.

But now Ike has gone from us, and we are isolated once again in our separate zones.

What is it about the Americans that attracts me? Is it the men themselves? They are often dull, and, generalizing, an average British Squaddy has more individuality, is more of a person (often an executive, or a character, or a man with a point of view), than a G. I. What suddenly made me homesick when I saw that this apparently American sergeant was a Dutchman was perhaps the quality of great width and breadth, of size and expanse, that the United States army had and ours did not. This was not a matter of numbers but of freedom—something of a wider air, a more distant, less defined horizon.

Do you get me at all? The way they drove their trucks, for example; the way they looked a bit lost wherever they were. They did not settle in, get their feet under the table, as our men did. They wandered. They drifted rather, restlessly. They came into our camp, were ten times more charming and generous than an Englishman, noisy yet courteous; then they moved off again. And though their camp might be only five kilometers away, you had the impression they were going back one hundred miles, and that France, Belgium, Germany became one vast prairie in their presence.

BRITISH INTELLIGENCE OFFICER
Hamburg, October 15

CONTRIBUTORS

DELMORE SCHWARTZ is the author of "Shenandoah" and "In Dreams Begin Responsibilities."

MEYER LEVIN has written two novels of Jewish life, "Yehuda" and "The Old Bunch."

ALBERT GUERARD, professor of comparative and general literature at Stanford University, is the author of "Europe Free and United."

DOROTHY CANFIELD is a well-known novelist and critic. Among her books are "The Deepening Stream" and "Fables for Parents."

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 161 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • NOVEMBER 17, 1945 NUMBER 20

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 509

EDITORIALS

Russia and the Bomb by Freda Kirchwey 511
German's Drifting Economy 513

ARTICLES

John L.'s Monkey Wrench by Alfred Friendly 514
Scientists of the World, Unite! by Richard Schlegel 515
The Scandal of the Waterfront by Maurice Rosenblatt 516
Terror in Bolivia by José Antonio Arze 519
Fair Play for the Nisei by Leonard Bloom 521
In the Wind 522
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison 523
The People's Front by Del Vayo 524

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

The Pursuit of James by James Grossman 525
Bronzeville, U. S. A. by Bucklin Moon 525
Briefer Comment 526
Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling 530
Art by Clement Greenberg 533
Music by B. H. Haggin 534

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 535

CROSSWORD PUZZLE NO. 135 by Jack Barrett 536

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor J. KING GORDON
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL
Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]
European Editor: J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO
Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON
Director of Nation Associates
LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL
JONATHAN DANIELS
CAREY MCWILLIAMS
REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

GENERAL ARNOLD'S STRIKING FINAL REPORT ON the operations of the Army Air Forces prefaces as grisly a picture of the next air war as we have seen drawn. Unlike many a traditional military leader, General Arnold believes that a country should prepare for the next war by preparing for the next war—not the last one. And in the next war, allowing for vast improvements in aerodynamics, methods of propulsion, and electronic control, "aircraft, piloted and pilotless, will move at speeds far beyond the velocity of sound, well over seven hundred miles per hour," "small amounts of explosive materials, as in atomic bombs, will cause destruction of many square miles," and "true space ships" will range far beyond the earth's atmosphere to launch their atomic missiles at effective distances from their targets. He admits our experience in this war has shown that efficient methods of defense against bombing attacks "are most difficult to attain." He suggests that there might be some security in the dispersal of our cities and in a world-wide intelligence service which would give us some warning. The United Nations Organization might be of some help, but, on the whole, he is convinced that the only sure defense is in overwhelming air superiority and in the "maintenance of a strong peacetime military organization." It is the honest report of a brilliant professional soldier. In its way it is as competent an analysis as General Marshall's report. But, like the Marshall report, it develops its own refutation. There is no national defense against the air war Arnold describes. And the search for national security through military preparedness is an invitation to national suicide, as Professor Schlegel suggests in his article elsewhere in this issue. The only security for our nation, for our world, is international security. The sooner we get that firmly into our heads, the sooner we shall take the next important steps toward world peace.

*

THE SLAUGHTER OF HAPLESS INDONESIANS AT Surabaya is the most painful example of the dangerous trend of British policy in Asia. In London sixty left-wing Labor M. P.'s have denounced the use of British troops to "restore Dutch and French imperialism in the Far East." Australian labor, with government support, has blacklisted all Dutch military supplies for Indonesia and has denounced the British Labor government for its "strikebreaking action against its brother labor movement in Australia." In deciding to back the principle of imperialist solidarity with unlimited force, instead of insisting that the Dutch authorities negotiate with the Java nationalists, Britain's Labor government has embarked on seas which may wreck it. But our own government has also a responsibility which cannot be dodged by removing American tags from tanks used to crush Indonesian insurgency. In his Navy Day speech Mr. Truman declared: "We believe that all peoples who are prepared for self-government should be permitted to choose their own form of government." [Point Four.] "We shall refuse to recognize any government imposed upon any nation by the force of any foreign power." [Point Six.] Are these principles to be applied to Indonesia, and if not why not?

*

THE DECISIVE VICTORY IN HUNGARY OF THE Smallholders' Party—it won 191 seats in Parliament while the Communists won 52 and the Social Democrats 55—has been variously interpreted as a triumph of democracy, a protest against Russian domination, and proof that Hungary has "gone right." But a consideration of the makeup of the victorious party indicates that such interpretations have only a limited validity. The Smallholders' Party is a catch-all which includes both liberal and conservative elements. It thus provides a haven not only for reactionaries of the defunct Horthy regime but for the fearful middle-of-the-roaders who wish to turn neither right nor left. Moreover it is a "safe" party for peasants who mistrust politics as "the trickery of the gentlemen" and for agricultural workers—never organized by the predominantly urban left parties—who are still convinced, in spite of the secret ballot, that their choice will somehow be known to "the authorities." Add to this the fact that all parties had agreed, before the election, to the continuance of a coalition which, we may be sure, will continue to get along with Russia, and it becomes apparent that the victory of the Smallholders' Party was something less than a clearcut indorsement of a specific "conservative" program. The cruel truth is that what Hungary needs most is food, clothing, and fuel. Presumably all parties agree upon the precedence of this "program" which cannot be carried out without the aid, and the mutual agreement, of Russia and the Western powers.

*

THE DEMOCRATIC VICTORY IN NEW YORK CITY, statistically so sweeping, actually provides little cause for encouragement for the party politicians. Although William O'Dwyer was elected Mayor by a record-breaking plurality of 685,175, the most significant feature of the balloting was the large number of voters who expressed their dissatisfaction with the party nominees either by not voting or by breaking party ranks. Both O'Dwyer and Judge Jonah Goldstein, the Republican-Liberal-Fusion nominee, finished well behind their tickets. On the other hand, Newbold Morris, running on the No Deal ticket with Mayor LaGuardia's backing, received a larger vote than the Republican, American Labor, or Liberal parties. So while Tammany is celebrating its return to office after twelve years in exile, the results in no sense demonstrated the strength of the Democratic organization. If the coalition that elected LaGuardia in the three previous elections had remained intact, the Democrats, on the basis of the votes cast, would have suffered a worse defeat than in 1941. And this despite an extremely light registration which would normally have played into Tammany's hands. Responsibility for breaking the coalition is shared by all the groups concerned, but the decision to run Judge Goldstein, a Tammany graduate, on a "Good Government" ticket is generally believed to have been dictated by Governor Dewey as part of his 1946 campaign strategy. Goldstein's miserable showing is a severe blow to Dewey's prestige and will undoubtedly reduce his chances for reelection. The voters also administered a striking rebuff to the Liberal and Fusion parties for having participated in the deal. The Liberals, who rolled up 307,000 votes for Roosevelt in 1944, polled a scant 123,000 for Goldstein despite an extravagant campaign. Goldstein's vote on the Fusion ticket was less than 9,000. Although the American Labor Party with 260,000 votes retained a larger share of its 1944 strength in supporting O'Dwyer, it made a better showing where it ran its own candidates than it did in coalition with the Democrats. Despite their compromises, the four independent parties together polled 790,000 votes, only 40,000 fewer than the Democratic total. Had they united on a strong candidate, they could have defeated both major party machines.

*

ELSEWHERE THE OFF-YEAR ELECTIONS FAILED to reveal a significant national trend. The Detroit results are extremely disheartening. Richard Frankensteen, vice-president of the U. A. W., waged a vigorous campaign with the backing of the Political Action Committee against Mayor Jeffries, who has an unenviable record of inaction on labor, housing, and race issues. Running alone against the combined forces of the political machines, big business, and the "hate" groups headed by Gerald L. K. Smith, Frankensteen might have won had it not been for a spurious red scare and an anti-Negro whispering campaign instigated by his opponent. The Detroit setback was counterbalanced by the triumph of moderately progressive Democrats in Pittsburgh and Cleveland. Republicans profess to be encouraged by unexpected local victories in New Jersey, up-state New York, and Connecticut, but they conspicuously ignore the striking Democratic successes in Albany, Ithaca, and Utica and the Socialist triumph in Bridgeport. Although the upsets reveal no particular pattern, they suggest a healthy independence on the part of the voters which may turn out to be significant in 1946 or 1948.

*

W. W. NORTON WAS MORE THAN A PUBLISHER OF great distinction. He was also a man whose generous liberal sympathies were expressed through a wide variety of public activities. He was a busy person, constantly preoccupied both with the demands of his firm and with his duties in the National Association of Book Publishers and, later, as chairman of the highly effective Council on Books in Wartime. But none of these commitments interfered with his devoted interest in certain liberal causes, such as the fight for a democratic Spain. As commander of the Willard Straight Post of the American Legion, he was one of the men chiefly responsible for its magnificent record. The Nation knew him as an interested and helpful adviser; he was, from its beginning, a member of The Nation Associates. His unexpected death last week was a grievous shock to his friends, and his loss will be felt in many widely diverse circles.

BEGINNING ON DECEMBER 1 AND CONCLUDING with a dinner on December 3, The Nation Associates will conduct a forum to consider the most important aspects of atomic power and its control, including the pressing question of our relations with Russia. Last week we outlined the plan of the meeting and mentioned a few of the men and women who have agreed to lead the discussion. We can add this week the names of several persons whose knowledge and point of view should be particularly valuable. Among the new participants are Judge Thurman Arnold, who will talk about the relation of monopolies to the development of atomic energy; Boris Pregel, head of the Radium and Uranium Corporation of Canada, whose contribution to the bomb project was as great as that of any single person, but whose primary interest is now in the social and economic implications of the new discovery; Stuart Chase, economist and frequent contributor to The Nation, whose interests lie in the same direction; Jerome Frank, jurist and political philosopher; Lieutenant Cord Meyers, Jr., veteran of the war and aide to Captain Stassen at the San Francisco Conference; Lieutenant Kingman Brewster; James B. Carey, Secretary-Treasurer of the C. I. O., who will analyze labor's responsibility and stake in the control of atomic energy; and L. N. Ridenour, professor of physics at the University of Pennsylvania and chief radar adviser of General Spaatz in the ETO. The plans for the forum have aroused even wider interest than we expected; applications for admission to the sessions as well as the dinner are pouring in. The importance of this response is evident since the purpose of the forum is public education—followed by public demand for a wise policy in Washington. For this reason above all others we urge the full participation of Nation Associates and other Nation readers. A detailed announcement appears on page 531.

Russia and the Bomb

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

[This editorial article is the first of three which will present the position of The Nation on certain aspects of the atomic-bomb issue. Next week J. King Gordon will consider the problem of international control, including the relationship of the large and small nations. Taken together these editorials will, we hope, offer a framework for discussion at the sessions of the forum to be held on December 1-3 by the Nation Associates.]

THAT Russia should be given full information about the atomic bomb is so evident that the question no longer seems arguable. The obvious objections have been answered with devastating finality in the last few weeks by many scientists and a few public men. They have proved beyond question that not even the narrowest concept of national security will be served by secrecy. Since this is so, the longer the matter is discussed the worse for all of us, for the debate itself generates poisons out of which, if they are not soon neutralized and washed away, the next war—the Atomic War—will certainly come.

Our secrecy policy, restated only the other day by President Truman, would have been accepted without question in other circumstances. A new weapon of ordinary dimensions, according to traditional practices, is kept for the use of the country that perfects it; only in the course of actual warfare would the secret be shared even with a trusted ally. The war was over almost immediately after the bombs hit Hiroshima and Nagasaki. And nothing that has happened since then has increased official American or British trust in our Russian ally. What more natural, therefore, than to sit tight on the secret of the bomb, particularly in view of its unprecedented destructive power?

Natural, but futile, and therefore stupid. For the destructive power of atomic explosion is exactly what makes an attempt to monopolize it more dangerous than the bomb itself. It is not merely a new weapon. It is a weapon which gives the nation controlling it the power of life or death over any other nation. This is a situation which in its essence is intolerable. At the same time, as the nuclear scientists have patiently explained, it is a situation impossible to perpetuate. Put those two facts together in proper proportions and you have the makings of the greatest explosion on earth.

Many people, I believe, were temporarily deceived by the restraint exhibited by other nations in discussing America's monopoly on total destruction. It seemed at first as if our allies, grateful for the sudden ending of hostilities and awed by our overpowering display of energy, creative ability, and cold cash, were prepared to accept us as the appointed trustees on earth of the released power of the universe. Even Russia said not a word. But soon, very soon, the reaction began, and it has been growing steadily in many parts of the world; its most important manifestation has been a solid, total deadlock in our relations with Russia. It is that deadlock which strangled the Foreign Ministers' conference in London and kept Russia out of the meeting of the Far Eastern advisory commission in Washington. It is that deadlock which has brought Prime Minister Attlee to the White House.

But what of it?, some of the arguers may still ask. Suppose Russia doesn't like it, what then? Didn't Mr. Churchill have the answer when he said that even during the war Russia had shown little inclination to share its military secrets with its allies, and would hardly hand over the secret of the bomb today if it had it? This position might be worth considering—though at best it betrays a rather juvenile approach to a grimly adult problem—if the United States were permitted the freedom to decide which Mr. Churchill and Mr. Truman and most of our military leaders assume for purposes of debate. The scientists have ruthlessly snatched away that freedom. We can't keep the secret because every advanced nation already knows all we know about atomic energy and how to release it, and even our last reserved area, the sacred American "know-how," will be conquered soon.

This is accepted fact; neither General Marshall nor Mr. Truman would think of disputing it. What, then, do they hope to gain by hiding our technical knowledge behind barred gates and building stock-piles of hatred and suspicion abroad? What do they hope to gain by legislation creating a federal dictatorship over all atomic investigation, as well as production, and making the interchange of scientific information in the field of nuclear experiment impossible under threat of criminal prosecution? What is it all about, if Russia and Sweden and France, and perhaps Spain and Argentina, will be able to make bombs within the next five years?

The answer is a complex one. Chiefly, they hope to gain time. And in the time gained, they hope to do two incompatible things: first, accumulate a lot of improved atomic bombs so that we can maintain our head-start in destructive power; and, second, create some sort of international control to take charge of the situation when other nations finally get around to manufacturing bombs themselves. This sounds, perhaps, too silly to be taken seriously, but it is the only explanation so far publicly offered for our policy of secrecy. If you suggest that secrecy plus bomb-production makes difficult the achievement of that mutual trust—especially with Russia —on which any effective international control must rest, you will be fobbed off with the theme that ran through Mr. Truman's unfortunate Navy Day speech: The bomb is a sacred trust; everyone in the world believes us and knows that we will not violate that trust. The only catch is that the premise is inaccurate. How inaccurate, can be best realized if for a moment one imagines that Russia possesses the secret of the bomb and has announced in the same pious words its determination to hang on to it. Would we decide forthwith to drop our efforts to make a bomb of our own? Would we accept Russia's protestations of good will? The questions answer themselves, and demolish at the same time the position of those who hope to build a structure of international trust on a foundation of Anglo-American (though chiefly American) monopoly of atomic power.

Only one explanation of our policy would make sense. A short period of secrecy would be worth the cost if we intended to start an offensive war against Russia or if we expected Russia to attack us in the immediate future. In either case our temporary monopoly would give us an overwhelming advantage; we could destroy Russian cities and industries without fear of retaliation and quickly bring the Soviet Union to total defeat. But this, the one sensible explanation for our present policy, paradoxically makes no sense whatever. For in spite of our bluster and our camouflaged designs on strategic bases, and our shocked objections to other nations' similar designs; in spite of a few generals and Congressmen and newspaper editors who, accepting war with Russia as inevitable, argue with a sort of maniac's logic that it had best come soon while we have the upper hand; in spite of all this, the United States is not going to attack Russia. And Russia is not going to attack us, bomb or no bomb. One can be certain that no disagreements Moscow may have with any major power will be allowed to develop to the point of war as long as Russia is desperately struggling to restore its shattered economic life and rebuild its cities. The Soviet Union needs peace even more than we do.

In fact the reality is exactly the opposite and the danger a very different one. Since the chance of our being involved in war in the next two or three years is remote, the possession of the bomb-secret is a positive disadvantage and the bomb becomes a weapon aimed at ourselves. If we don't intend to use it first, we are creating suspicion without any compensating benefit. By the time other nations have made bombs of their own, the international situation may have so deteriorated as to make certain a war in which we shall be the attacked, not the attacker, and our guarded secret, our "sacred trust," will ironically have been one of the chief factors in producing the breakdown.

The position I have put here is not only supported by most liberal opinion in America; the British press, from left to right, accepts as a prerequisite to all further international action the necessity for conquering Russia's distrust by giving it the secret of the bomb. Presumably the Prime Minister will convey to the President that point of view and the various reasons for it. He must persuade Mr. Truman that those advisers are wrong who recently urged that Russia should not be let in on the secret "until the various peace settlements have been finally determined." Their insistence that the bomb gives the United States and Britain "dominance in current discussions" has been disproved by events. The contrary is the case. Only if we approach Russia with the secret (not the bomb) in one hand and our proposals in the other will the proposals be taken at their face value. At present they make a funny noise when we drop them on the conference table.

A decision to give the bomb to Russia would immediately shift to new ground the other urgent problems facing the powers. It would not solve those problems. The differences between Russia and the West are real differences; they existed long before the first bomb was dropped and they would still exist if Russia had the secret. But the bomb has intensified them and stalled efforts to solve them. Mr. Molotov opened the way to a new attempt to overcome those differences in his speech last week. He stated clearly but moderately Russia's intention to develop the bomb through its own efforts, he offered a detailed explanation of Russian policy, domestic and foreign, and he emphasized the desire of the government for close cooperation among the Big Three. "Expressions of good intentions are not enough," he said. "The Soviet Union has been and will continue to be a reliable bulwark in the defense of peace and the security of peoples, and is ready to prove this not in words but in deeds."

If Attlee and Truman want to put Molotov's promise to the test, they can easily do so. The bomb is not a bargaining counter to be used to extract from Russia concessions which would serve the national interests of Britain and the United States. It must be given freely. But in giving it, the Western powers would have a right to assure themselves and the world that Russia will accept genuine international control of atomic power and will cooperate in converting the machinery of peace to the demands of the new age. Much needs to be done to the structure of the United Nations Organization and to the rules under which it operates before it can be trusted with powers of atomic control. Russia must be ready to accept such chances, as must the Western powers themselves.

If the necessity to give Russia the secret of the bomb is self-evident, there are subsidiary questions of vast importance that require detailed consideration. Many dangers could be avoided if the conferees in Washington would settle the secrecy issue quickly and get on to those other matters. For the secret is only an obstacle; the real problems lie on the other side.

Germany's Drifting Economy

IN TWO recent reports General Eisenhower has painted a dark picture of Germany and warned of an approaching economic crisis. Industry remains practically dead, communications are tenuous, unemployment is increasing as more men are released from prison camps, there is a tremendous lack of shelter, disease and infantile mortality are mounting, food is scarce and threatening to get scarcer, millions of refugees are drifting about the country, and the danger of disorder is growing. General Eisenhower is, moreover, describing conditions as they are in the American zone, which is probably more nearly self-sufficient than the other zones. There the normal ration level is 1,550 calories daily compared with a usually accepted minimum health standard of 2,000. In the French zone, Anne O'Hare McCormick reports on the authority of French officials, the ration is only 1,250 calories.

Malnutrition and horrible living conditions are, of course, all too common in Europe today. Up to now, at least, the Germans have probably been better off than most of the peoples they victimized. At the end of the war they had reserve stocks of food and were certainly the best-clothed people on the continent. But in western Europe, at any rate, reconstruction is beginning to move ahead and living conditions are slowly but noticeably improving. Germany, on the other hand, appears to be at an economic standstill. This year's harvest was poor and even if next year's is better the problem of getting food from the farms to urban consumers is going to prove formidable. For inflation is already so far advanced that money transactions are being abandoned for barter, and unless some industrial production is revived to provide a means of exchange for farm produce, only a thin flow will come into the market.

To a very great extent the Germans have only themselves to thank for this state of affairs. Their Nazi rulers, whom they applauded so fervently in the days when Hitler's victories were bringing in a stream of loot, deliberately left as their legacy to the world a state of anarchy in Germany. Their refusal to surrender long after they knew they were doomed, their megalomaniac attempt to provide themselves and their country with a spectacular Wagnerian curtain, these are the primary causes of the German plight.

But the Allies, who now exercise complete authority in Germany, also have their responsibilities. They are pledged not to destroy the German people and they cannot, in good conscience, adopt the laissez faire commandment:

> Thou shalt not kill, but need not strive > Officiously to keep alive.

Yet unless some plans are soon adopted to restore economic life in Germany, famine and disease may begin to solve the German problem in a way that is bound to create a strong revulsion of feeling in the democracies.

There is no need to debate at this moment whether or not the Potsdam economic plan for Germany will prove adequate in the long run. The immediate necessity is to put the Potsdam directives into effect, and particularly Article 14, which declared: "During the period of occupation Germany shall be treated as a single economic unit." But three and a half months after Potsdam General Eisenhower reports that proposals for the establishment of five central agencies, for the administration of transport, finances, communications, foreign trade, and industry, have made no headway in the Allied Control Council. Thus no common policies have been adopted and, with the four occupation zones more or less sealed off from each other, the fragmentation of the country continues. There is little exchange of goods between the different parts of the Reich, and the nervous system of an extremely complex economy remains paralyzed. Unless steps are taken either to restore that economy on a national basis, or to begin reorganization on the assumption of permanent partition, Germany is likely to be reduced to an economic slum. The Allies may well be faced with the alternative of allowing millions to starve or providing relief on a gigantic scale.

The immediate cause of the deadlock appears to be the determination of the French, who were stupidly excluded from Potsdam, to use their veto power in the Allied Control Council to block all unification measures until the future of the Rhineland has been settled to their satisfaction. Their ultimate objective appears to be the permanent fission of Germany and they regard any steps to restore centralized administration as laying a basis for the restoration of German power once the American and British occupation forces withdraw. In any case they want to make certain that the Ruhr and Rhine industrial districts are integrated with the economy of western Europe.

Intermingled with this question is that of reparations. If the Ruhr is to be detached from the Reich, the status of its heavy industries becomes a matter for new debate. According to the Potsdam plan, only those plants essential for the maintenance of a modest standard of living in Germany are to remain; the rest are to be distributed as reparations or destroyed. Russia, already impatient at delays in determining its share of reparations, is unlikely to make concessions to France which would add potential economic strength to the western bloc it professes to fear, while reducing the amount of industrial materials available for reparations. A compromise between French and Russian views is possible if, as has been reported, Russia is willing to support internationalization of the Ruhr under four-power control. It is far from certain, however, whether the British, who are now in possession, would agree to this solution.

On the agenda of the next meeting of the Big Four—France must not be left out again—the unsettled problem of the Ruhr should be given high priority. For that is not a question within the competence of the Allied Control Council in Berlin, whose functions are confined to the implementation of the Potsdam directives. But immediate responsibility for preventing Germany from falling into a state of economic chaos does rest on the council, and it cannot allow matters to drift while the Allied foreign offices argue about long-range policies.

—o—

I. F. Stone's first dispatch from Palestine has been delayed. We shall carry a first-hand report from him next week.

John L.'s Monkey Wrench

BY ALFRED FRIENDLY

(Labor editor, the Washington Post)

Washington, November 12

MIXING up the place cards of the delegates to the Labor-Management Conference, a prankster could occasion infinitely meaner fist fights by confining his seating rearrangements to the labor table than by redeploying the industry men among the union representatives. The bitter feeling of the labor delegates toward one another is the tragedy of the conference and the thing that may wreck it completely. The chance of reconciling differences between "labor" and "management" on important procedural and mechanical aids to industrial peace is vastly better than the chance of obtaining agreement on anything among the labor leaders at the conference.

While the management delegates are happy enough to watch John L. Lewis and the A. F. of L. smash the C. I. O.'s drive to commit the conference to President Truman's declaration that "wage increases are imperative," they may be pained at the prospect of the sabotage extending to the other objective. For the management men, with a few exceptions, really want better machinery for handling industrial disputes, and the great majority of the union conferees want it too. The disagreements on details and even those on the fundamentals of peace-time organizations to minimize labor conflicts are such that reasonable men could reach a compromise on them and work out some fairly satisfactory solutions. But Lewis, allied to the A. F. of L. in a sensationally chummy entente and thus controlling a majority of the labor votes at the meeting, is driven by something other than reason. His consuming hatred of Philip Murray gives him a unique and undeviating singleness of purpose.

Now, at the end of the first week, it seems probable that the Lewis–A. F. of L. coalition will smash any proposal, good, bad, or indifferent, that comes from the C. I. O. side. If this analysis is correct, it means that the opportunity of the conference for achieving one of its two major goals—the much-needed replacement of the War Labor Board with other machinery, government or bi-partite—will be destroyed.

Hopes that the conference would succeed in its other primary purpose—commitment of labor and management to the Administration policy of negotiating "substantially" higher wages without too serious a change in present price levels—were never anything to bet on, and what little prospect there was, was irretrievably lost on the first day. Management made it clear that it was utterly opposed to even a mention of the nasty subject of wages. Bill Green took the ball and ran in the same direction. Injection of the issue of wages into the conference, he said, would make its failure "a foregone conclusion." When Murray proposed the maximum objective he could possibly hope for from the conference—that it urge all management and labor to resume collective bargaining within the framework of President Truman's scarcely radical proposal that higher wages were necessary—the majority was already committed against him.

Lewis's carryings-on in this matter show that he has lost none of his skill. After a couple of days of build-up, in which he emphasized that he and the A. F. of L. were as one in all things, and in which he made Green as pathetically happy as the sissified schoolboy suddenly taken under the protective wing of the bully who has been tormenting him, Lewis had his chance to blast Murray's proposal. It came at a session of the conference's executive committee, where Murray's resolution was under consideration. Lewis played a supremely clever game. In a speech to the committee, which he agreeably recast a few hours later for the press, he denounced the resolution as "feeble" and "namby-pamby," thus taking an unassailable position in the eyes of workingmen. But at the same time he delivered what Ira Mosher, president of the National Association of Manufacturers, described as one of the finest defenses of free enterprise he had ever heard. In one blow Lewis struck at Murray's most vulnerable point, the C. I. O.'s necessary reliance on government support, and endeared himself to the business group.

Just before the war Lewis had showed signs of taking this tack, of cuddling up to industry on the theory that he and business could understand each other, that they were cut out of the same cloth, that they were both ruggedly individualistic and could slug it out fair and aboveboard, with no dirty holds applied in the clinches by that sneak partisan the New Deal. Last week he went the whole hog on this approach. And industry is going to love it.

Get rid of government controls, Lewis urged. Let's not bargain under the limitations of the wage-price policy. "The limitations I favor are those of free enterprise and free competition. . . . We are opposed to the corporate state and its manifestations as incorporated in the C. I. O.'s resolution." President Truman says he wants to lift controls at some time, "but I'm not so sure the C. I. O. intends that."

At this point Murray's resolution is clearly lost, and the only question is how much capital he can make of the fact that half of labor and all of industry at the conference are repudiating a call to collective bargaining under the terms of Mr. Truman's national wage policy. In General Motors and United States Steel Murray has two devastating illustrations of his contention that such collective bargaining has, indeed, been rejected by management.

As for the other goal of the conference—creation of procedures and mechanics helpful in labor troubles—it is still too early to write off the session completely. Something may be worked out in committees where Lewis is not on hand to revile the C. I. O. However, Lewis won his fight to sit on the executive committee, which passes on the reports of all the working committees, and he is thus in a spot where, to use a good labor term, he can stir up a Mulligan. There are few takers for bets that he won't.

Scientists of the World, Unite!

BY RICHARD SCHLEGEL

(Of the research staff of the Palmer Physical Laboratory at Princeton University)

THE application of physical science has reached a vicious climax in the atomic bomb. The ideal of offensive warfare, a weapon of total destructiveness against which there is no defense, has been realized. And we, having just emerged from a struggle to maintain reason and humanity in the world, now find that we are the generation which will determine whether or not our civilization has the wit to keep itself alive.

Two facts should be clear to all. First, that the atomic bombs used so far are of "baby" size in respect to destructive power compared with those which can be—and perhaps have been—manufactured. Second, that the industrial capacity and wealth required for manufacturing the atomic bomb can easily be overestimated. Uranium is required, but the United States has no monopoly on that—rather, the indications are that our deposits are smaller than those of many other nations. The method of manufacturing the fissionable isotope required for an atomic bomb is very simple, as a reading of the Smyth report* will tell one. To be sure, an understanding of nuclear physics is necessary, and some old-fashioned engineering must be applied to carry out the new processes. And we gather from the Smyth report that some ingenious technology is involved in the actual fashioning of the bomb. But other nations too have nuclear physicists and engineers. Since the Smyth report outlined the method of producing the required fissionable material, any group working on atomic energy now knows at least one right path. As far as physicists of other countries are concerned, perhaps there never was any secret about the fundamental processes. The only "secrets" now are probably those of detailed manufacturing techniques, and any industrial nation can be expected to work out such details for itself.

The unearthly destructiveness of the bomb and its potential availability to all nations are two components of our crisis; the third is the historical fact that nations have always periodically waged war upon one another, using the strongest weapons at hand. We cannot change the fact that men know or will know how to build the bomb. Our contemporary urban world can be saved only if there is no use of atomic energy in war. The prime question facing us today is whether or not we can save ourselves from being blown to bits.

It is becoming clear to a large part of the American public, and to many of our legislators and officials, that international control of atomic power must be achieved within the next few years, before every nation in the world with any claim to military power has its own supply of atomic explosives. The temporary military advantage which we enjoy because we have already built atomic bombs should give us strength and confidence to lead the way to such control, and—in all realism—to urge any recalcitrant nation to join the control organization. How this organization shall be formed, how it shall function, what will be the details of international inspection and control of atomic-power installations—these are problems which in the next one or two years will test the ability of the nations to meet the crisis. We are fortunate to some extent at least in that the atomic bomb came to a world which had already experienced the San Francisco conference and the formation of the United Nations Council A hopeful new beginning had been made in world cooperation.

If the nations give up the right to use atomic power for military purposes, they to a large extent give up their right to make war. For modern war is not fought as a rough international game, within the bounds of certain rules. Rather, every conceivable resource of destruction is employed. If possession of atomic-energy weapons is the exclusive prerogative of an international authority, every nation will be inferior to the supreme military power of that authority. Thus international control of atomic energy is equivalent to the creation of an international governing body to which the individual nations have surrendered their sovereign right to make war. In effect, the international control of atomic power will bring a world authority which can enforce universal peace.

To achieve this in the next few years will be difficult indeed, but the alternative may be fearful enough to force even the least imaginative to desire the world authority. It is literally true that all other issues, domestic and international, are of small importance compared with the problem of atomic-energy control. The leaders of all nations must act with a passion for unity that transcends the fears of individual nations—must act so, that is, if any nations are to survive.

It is perhaps fortunate for the world that scientists are probably more international-minded than any other professional group. They can be expected to be on the right side in the coming critical months. Scientists are not politicians or statesmen, and we would not expect them to be responsible for the detailed organization of an international authority. But clearly scientists must serve as advisers to an atomic-energy control body and to a large extent determine its policy, since it is they who understand the possibilities and dangers of atomic power, as well as the requirements for development and manufacture. I suggest that an international scientific council be established for the purpose of advising the international control authority.

The council would consist of representatives of an organization of all scientists working on atomic energy—or perhaps eventually an organization of competent scientists generally. The elements of such an organization already exist in the United States, for the "Manhattan District" workers at Chicago, Oak Ridge, Columbia University, and Los Alamos have formed associations—and have also, incidentally, made a plea for international control of their product. These associations are now being drawn together into a national federation of atomic scientists which, with similar groups of men who have worked on atomic power in Canada and England, could serve as the framework of the international organization. Russian nuclear physicists and other scientists engaged in the problem would be expected to join at the earliest possible date. The goal, of course, would be for qualified scientists from all the nations to belong.

---

* "Atomic Energy for Military Purposes." By Henry De Wolf Smyth. Princeton University Press.

Beyond its advisory capacity, the international organization would have great power in that its members would be the guardians of the working knowledge of atomic energy. Since scientists, as I have said, have usually a more international point of view than other men, they could be relied on to develop their strongest loyalties to the welfare of mankind in general and not to be swayed by nationalistic interests. It is imperative that such a group should not take part in political and economic conflicts. If there should be a breakdown in the international political organization the scientists could withhold the use of atomic-power weapons from all nations. One can hope such a code and tradition of conduct would grow up among this group that the world could trust them to do everything possible to prevent the military use of atomic power.

It is my belief that the existence of an international scientific council such as I have described would greatly increase the confidence of the peoples of the world in the international control body, and that the declared policy of the scientists not to allow their weapons to be used in warfare would give people everywhere a sense of security. Further, the organization would have great value as a symbol and example in these days of first strivings for "one world." The actual setting up of a world scientific council would require the support of statesmen. Its formation could presumably be discussed in connection with the planning for an international atomic-power control authority. As has been pointed out, some provision must be made for an advisory body of scientists which will work with the control authority. Existing plans for a scientific office to be attached to the United Nations Organization might be utilized to some extent.

One of the most important functions of the proposed scientific organization would be to insure that laboratories and libraries remain free and open to all throughout the world. Secrecy about actual manufacturing details connected with atomic bombs might be in the interest of international security. But the May-Johnson bill now before Congress shows how far non-scientists, though well intentioned, might go in blocking fundamental scientific communication and research in order to preserve a specific manufacturing secret which they considered vital.

With the military use of atomic energy under international control, and to a degree under the guardianship of scientists themselves, we could face the "atomic age" with bright hopes.

The Scandal of the Waterfront

BY MAURICE ROSENBLATT

(Former editor of the City Reporter; a special agent for the army's criminal-investigation department until a month ago)

THE longshoremen's strike in New York, labeled in the headlines another heart-breaking defeat for 35,000 American dock workers, stands as the most promising attempt of recent years to rid the city of its waterfront scandal. The root of that scandal, an archaic system of hiring called the "shape-up," is a device, like the poll tax, which for all its simplicity has complex and far-reaching effects.

At one time the shape-up was everywhere the accepted method of longshore hiring. It dates back to the days when men carried cargo from the pier to the ship's hold. A foreman at a pier entrance at hiring time sizes up the longshoremen standing around in a wide semi-circle, chooses the huskiest, and turns the rest away. The system is bad because the shape-up takes place at all the piers at the same time, and in consequence labor supply cannot be adjusted to the demand. Moreover, the opportunities afforded for favoritism are subtle and many.

On the West Coast Harry Bridges's International Longshoremen's Union did away with this system, established a central hiring hall, rotated available jobs, and gave the longshoremen a chance to live like decent citizens. In Liverpool and most other modern ports the shape-up is a thing of the past. But in the port of New York it is still used, indefensible as it is. In New York, though machinery does the lifting, and experience and skill count for more than muscle, the hatch boss still scans the men in the shape-up and selects his workers. The chosen may work a couple of hours or well into the next day. Few jobs could be more haphazard. Scattered over the waterfront, the men are ignorant of when and where they will be needed. In war time this often meant that ships went unworked and cargoes unmoved while idle longshoremen unsuccessfully sought work a few blocks away. In normal times a surplus of labor is almost inevitable at all points.

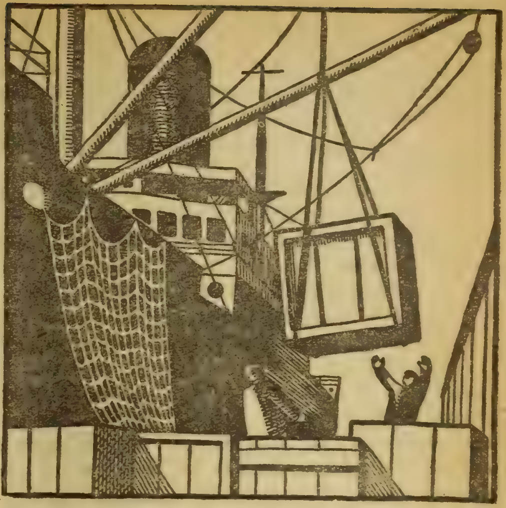
The power of the hiring foreman is absolute. Upon his nod depends the longshoreman's bread and butter. To secure his favor the men have often kicked back to him a share of their wages, an ancient practice described by the Maritime Labor Board as extortion that men are forced to pay for the right to work. In certain locals before the war the kick-back was the expected thing, like the social-security tax. Dock workers report that the custom is reappearing.

Tribute is often exacted in more devious ways. In some parts of the port longshoremen are required to borrow money, whether they need it or not, in order to be hired. The District Attorney's office prosecuted two loan sharks of an I. L. A. local who were making $200,000 a year in this way. A prudent longshoreman will patronize a certain barber shop, grocery, or bar, or he will gamble and lose, in order to get work. There have been cases, during hard times on the Brooklyn waterfront, of a foreman who fancied a longshoreman's wife or daughter and took the liberty known historically as the droit de seigneur.

The shape-up and its evils have been tolerated and even defended by the International Longshoremen's Association (A. F. of L.). Held tight in the grip of its lifetime president, Joseph P. Ryan, who receives a salary of $20,000 a year, the I. L. A. lacks the administrative hierarchy of other unions and is governed by a compact group answering directly to the president. With the locals' delegates on Joe Ryan's pay roll, the association's New York District Council is as independent of the rank and file as was ever Hitler's Reichstag. Of the forty-one locals involved in the strike several have no headquarters; no accurate membership or financial records are kept; and the initiation fee of $100 may be shaved down by bootleggers to $30. Members are expelled on Ryan's verbal order; a copy of the I. L. A. constitution is a collectors' item.

Under Ryan's rule I. L. A. locals have been invaded by racketeers with political protection. Gangsters in Brooklyn locals, unable to find employment for all members ready to pay the kick-back, have regularly sent men to Hoboken, and had them hired while New Jersey men stood helplessly in the shape-up. When the racketeers started placing their clients along the Manhattan waterfront the rank and file protested angrily to Eugene Sampson, president of their local, who said, "What do you want me to do about it? Get my head cut off by those Brooklyn mobsters?" The sums obtained by mulcting longshoremen were indicated by Assistant District Attorney Hanley when he said that "one gangster, namely Tony Romeo, alias Tony Spring, received a personal profit of from $25,000 to $50,000" from I. L. A. Local 929. Sluggers, ex-convicts, Christian Fronters have always found lucrative berths along the waterfront and won preferential positions in the I. L. A. A steady undercurrent of violence and sudden death exists, though it is rarely noticed in the newspapers—five men have been killed in the past eight years in the struggle for the plums of Local 824.

Any attempt to change conditions is stifled in this deadly atmosphere; leaders of any such attempt have been murdered. In 1939 Peter Panto led 1,200 longshoremen in a rank-and-file movement against gangster domination and the kick-back and other extortion rackets along the Brooklyn waterfront. He was threatened by Emil Camarda, a shadowy I. L. A. official who dominated six Brooklyn locals. Panto disappeared mysteriously on July 14, 1939. District Attorney William O'Dwyer intimated that Murder, Inc., was responsible and promised prosecution as soon as the body was found. Panto's body, tied with a rope and encased in lime, was found near Lyndhurst, New Jersey, on January 29, 1941. No one has ever been convicted of this crime, nor has the District Attorney's office ever satisfactorily explained its special handling of Camarda or certain angles of the investigation. The grand jury specifically referred to this case in its recent charge of "gross laxity, inefficiency, and maladministration" in the Brooklyn District Attorney's office during Mr. O'Dwyer's incumbency. O'Dwyer's reply that he was "concentrating on murders and not kick-backs" was hardly adequate.



Before the war 76 per cent of the longshoremen, according to a survey made in 1939, earned an average weekly income of less than $25—and paid kick-back and tribute. Their hourly pay is deceptively high, for the total number of hours worked is low. The shipping industry has the longshoreman caught in an economic nutcracker. The loading companies contract to do loading by the ton but hire longshoremen by the hour. It is to the companies' interest to move as much tonnage in an hour as possible, which leads to a constant speed-up, overloading of slings, and disregard for safety. From 1928 to 1938 the speed-up increased 66 per cent for handling coffee, 200 per cent for steel pipe, 300 per cent for bananas. And of course accidents increased accordingly; one insurance expert reports that 37 cents of each pay-roll dollar goes for accidents.

A report on New York's waterfront jungle made by a Mayor's Committee in 1916 concluded as follows: "Present conditions of waterfront employment in New York mean poverty, intemperance, dependency, insanitation. We cannot measure these effects; they permeate the life of the city. They make it a less efficient and more costly traffic terminal than it might be, and reduce general prosperity. It is time this condition was ended." This was written before Murder, Inc., and the big-time racketeers had added their twist to the situation.

The strike last month was a revolt against this world and its ruler, Joe Ryan.

The first stoppage occurred on the night of October 1, when the men on six Manhattan piers refused to load nets containing more than one long ton, and shipping officials ordered them to leave. Longshoremen complained that overloaded nets, containing perhaps 7,000 pounds, sometimes broke and scattered bags of cement or sugar, causing injury or death.

The word spread: "Don't go back to work; there's a strike on. Everybody's quitting." The news traveled by the waterfront grapevine around Manhattan, jumped the East River to Brooklyn, and crossed the bay to Staten Island, Hoboken, and Newark Bay. By October 3 the entire 250-mile waterfront was gripped by the most paralyzing strike in the history of the port.

Leaderless, without any preparation or strike call, 35,000 longshoremen quit work and tied up 300 ships. Men scattered among forty-one locals were prompted by some common inner urge to rebel. They were convinced that the new two-year contract just negotiated by Ryan was full of jokers: a forty-hour week would be worthless to those passed over in the shape-up; the vacation provision was hedged with conditions; and none of this touched their real problems. There was the feel of money in their pockets and a new spirit of independence in their hearts. "Nobody is going to ram a phony contract down our throats," they told reporters, recalling how previous contracts had been forced on the membership.

On October 4 the first Rank and File Committee was chosen at an open-lot meeting of eight Brooklyn locals. In the beginning it remained anonymous, telephoning Mayor LaGuardia that if it came forward, "Joe Ryan's goons" would beat it up. William E. Warren, a thirty-two-year-old newcomer in the I. L. A., was elected chairman largely on the basis of his ability to speak convincingly—and in English. With his previous union experience limited to paying dues, Warren was catapulted to the leadership of what the New York Times called "the city's most puzzling and confused maritime strike." What did the strikers want? "At first," Warren said, "everyone wanted the moon—regular wages, rest periods—but then we got down to figuring what had a chance." Their demands simmered down to a limitation of the sling load to 2,240 pounds, minimum four-hour work shifts to end the "split-shift" hiring of men for odd hours, two shape-ups daily instead of three, extra pay for working during mealtimes. "There was no talk of joining the C. I. O.," a committeeman reported; "the longshoremen simply want to have some say inside the I. L. A. The reason we didn't ask for a hiring hall is because that would make everybody think we wanted to join Bridges and the C. I. O."

The National Maritime Union watched Joe Ryan's troubles with obvious pleasure. Sailors helped the Rank and File Committee with mimeographing, advised them to hire a hall, instructed them in the fundamentals of striking. The N. M. U. contributed $2,500, and other C. I. O. maritime unions gave support. Sailors received orders to cut down steam and walk off any ship where "phony" longshoremen appeared. On the docks clashes with Ryan's men were followed by angry protest meetings in front of City Hall. Harry Bridges arrived and played a conspicuous part in the C. I. O.'s press conferences. Two years ago Joe Ryan had told an interviewer, "I'm only waiting till this war is over so we can slug it out with Harry Bridges"; it looked as if the long-awaited contest was at hand. But while C. I. O. members were vociferous on the picket line, their leaders scrupulously maintained that the longshoremen should clean their own house. "Stay in the A. F. of L. and fight for your rights," their leaflets urged.

From the first Ryan denounced the walkout as an "outlaw" strike. His henchmen called the strikers to meetings and "recommended" that they go back to work. The men showed an airy disregard for I. L. A. etiquette by ignoring the recommendation and voting to stay on strike. Realizing that confusion can be a potent weapon, Ryan announced in the press that the strike was over, but still the men didn't cross the street when the shape-up whistle blew. Ryan toured the Brooklyn docks, stronghold of the strike. In Prospect Hall he tried to address 2,500 members but was hissed from the meeting amid jeers of "No contract—no work."

On the publicity front he was more successful. Fanned by the fear that the return of soldiers was being slowed, public opinion turned against the strikers. Ryan, lashing out with long-accumulated venom, said the Communists were behind the strike. The press took their cue from him and plunged into an orgy of exposés of "C. I. O.-red" plots to capture the East Coast. Newspapers which had been shrieking that C. I. O. organization of the waterfront would be tantamount to a Soviet beachhead seized on the arrival of Harry Bridges as final proof of the "Red Move to Rule Distribution in U. S." Ryan succeeded in sidestepping any blame for the strife and became the man who was doing most to save his city from the invader. With the bulk of the press spreading his propaganda, he could afford to be patient.

On October 14 Mayor LaGuardia proposed an arbitration plan which called for a return to work and an immediate vote to determine whether Ryan or the Rank and File Committee should represent the I. L. A. in wage negotiations. The strikers accepted the plan; the shippers were non-committal. Ryan roared like an angry bull and said the Mayor's plan was "the silliest thing" he ever heard of. It was the first time a public official had questioned his right to speak for the membership. The New York A. F. of L. Council denounced the plan as "outrageous" and prepared to throw its resources behind Ryan.

The drift back to the docks began; each morning more hungry men glumly joined the shape-up. By October 16 7,000 were back. The Rank and File Committee charged that strike-breakers were being imported to pad the figures. On October 18 the Shipping Association considered the strike broken and reopened negotiations with Ryan. The next day the Rank and File Committee ordered its men to work. While the press crowed, one dejected striker said, "That's the thanks one gets! I've been fighting Ryan's gang since the last war; so now they say I'm a Communist. Will it take another war to get him out?"

As peace came to the docks, Joe Ryan surveyed his union. His victory was only on the surface. Inside, the I. L. A. was boiling. After a meeting with the shippers he presented a new contract; on October 25 only 800 out of 35,000 men had agreed to accept it. The membership had never been consulted about contracts prior to the strike and now took grim satisfaction in rejecting Ryan's best offer. They repeated that he "had better" obtain the minimum sling load and some of their other demands "or the strike might be on all over again."

The Rank and File Committee, reorganized under John Berg, a longshoreman for thirty years, Charles Anderson, and James Glasgow, went to court to prevent Ryan from signing any contract until longshoremen had an opportunity to vote. On October 25 Supreme Court Justice Carroll Walter issued an injunction forbidding Ryan to enter into any agreement with the shipowners. The men jubilantly distributed leaflets saying, "We have won a great victory! King Joe can't sign any phony contract with the shipowners behind our backs."

Ryan broke the strike and forced his C. I. O. rivals to retire. But the great body of longshoremen are no longer inert. Today Ryan is tied by a court order, immobilized by a membership which won't "get in line," harassed by a rank-and-file organization with connections in Boston, Philadelphia, and Baltimore. He must know that the fight is just beginning.

[A second article by Mr. Rosenblatt will dissect Joseph P. Ryan, central figure in the waterfront conflict.]

Terror in Bolivia

BY JOSE ANTONIO ARZE

(Head of the Bolivian Party of the Revolutionary Left; now a political exile)

Santiago, Chile, October 22

THE terror in Bolivia is as great as in Argentina, but it has failed to arouse equal indignation in the United States because less is known about it. The newspapers have only occasionally referred to some of the more blatantly repressive measures, such as censorship of the press, the castor-oil treatment of political prisoners, political murders and kidnapings, and imprisonment in regions so unhealthy that the victims sicken and die. The persecution of democratic elements reached a climax in November, 1944, when a number of outstanding civilians and army officers were beaten to death at police headquarters in La Paz and two anti-fascist senators, Luis Calvo and Felix Capriles, were assassinated. The remaining members of the opposition in Congress then fled for their lives to neighboring countries.

Three months ago President Villarroel decreed a general amnesty. A few days later he induced the Argentine government to send a number of Bolivian exiles in Buenos Aires to distant Argentine provinces, where they are still being held. Farrell has admitted that this action was taken at Villarroel's request. Opposition deputies who wished to return to Bolivia from Chile were refused passports by the Bolivian consul, on instructions, he said, from La Paz. When Dr. Walter Alvarado, a member of the Partido de Izquierda Revolucionaria (P. I. R.), accepted the amnesty as genuine and returned to La Paz from Santiago, he was jailed immediately. Among some forty Bolivians sent to dread Coati Island on Lake Titicaca are Dr. Demetrio Canelas, editor of the Daily Los Tiempos and former Minister of Foreign Affairs; Professor Faustino Suarez, of the American Institute of La Paz; and Alberto Crespo and Mario Cornejo, prominent journalists.

On August 30 the International League for the Rights of Man sent a cable of inquiry to President Villarroel giving the names of many persons reported to be held in prison without trial and requesting an explanation. It said in part: "We assume, Mr. President, that since your government operates under the Bolivian constitution, which guarantees political freedom, since you yourself have twice decreed political amnesty, and since Bolivia is one of the signatories of the Act of Chapultepec and the United Nations Charter guaranteeing human rights, you will agree that the public of the United States and other democratic countries concerned with the maintenance of such rights is entitled to an accurate and frank statement on a matter properly of international interest." On September 17 Villarroel's secretary cabled the League: ". . . Your information from the Chilean press is completely false. I suggest that you seek information from more reliable sources." Actually the league's charges, as was pointed out by John D. Pearmain, its director, were based on reliable information from democratic elements inside Bolivia and from exiled Bolivians in Latin America and the United States.

FAILURE OF THE REGIME'S ECONOMIC POLICIES

Before the present regime achieved power it noisily promised to take energetic action against foreign imperialism and to improve the living conditions of the workers. But after two years the power of foreign capital is greater than ever, and there is evidence that Villarroel and his Finance Minister, Paz Estenssoro, have agreed to keep their hands off large enterprises as long as the owners abstain from political activity. The cost of living has steadily increased. With the 1930 figure taken as 100, the index was 700 in October, 1940, the last date for which statistics are available. No ceiling prices have been set, and no effort has been made to control the steadily increasing inflation. Nearly 50 per cent of the national budget is absorbed by the army and a small number of top officials. Graft has reached an all-time high.

Mining and agriculture are controlled by the same small group of owners as before December, 1943. The government has not fulfilled its demagogic promise to put them under national control. All that it has done is to disorganize them completely, to the special detriment of the small and medium mine-owners and farmers. The Bolivian economy rests largely on tin production, which accounts for about 80 per cent of the dollar value of the country's total exports. In January, 1943, on the recommendation of the United States Bohan mission, a Bolivian Development Corporation was established, with funds provided by the Export-Import Bank and the Bolivian government. Its purpose was to improve agriculture, roads, industries, and the like in order to counteract the distress bound to result from the devaluation of mineral products, a process that has already begun. To head this organization the government appointed an army officer completely lacking in the knowledge and experience necessary for directing the country's economic reconstruction.

Indians make up about two-thirds of Bolivia's total population and are a terribly depressed group. The regime claims that it is seeking a solution for this problem, and this year sponsored an Indian Congress at La Paz. But when certain Indians, mistakenly believing that the government truly wished to emancipate them from feudal bondage, started a campaign against landlord abuses they were persecuted as "Communists."

AN ANTI-LABOR FASCIST STATE

Since the day it took power the present Bolivian dictatorship has tried to create a corporative labor movement in the Argentine style. It has utilized the services of police agents disguised as labor leaders and has bitterly attacked the Bolivian Labor Union, an affiliate of the Confederation of Latin American Workers (C. T. A. L.). Several months ago the government suddenly changed its tactics and decided it would be expedient to seem to make concessions to the C. T. A. L. As a result Bolivia was represented at the Paris labor conference by two delegates belonging to the fascist Movimiento Nacionalista Revolucionario (M. N. R.).

While Villarroel was making these dubious concessions to the C. T. A. L., the record reveals that in the past eighteen months many members of the Bolivian Labor Union, including former Minister Waldo Alvarez, Donato Flores Gironda, Aurelio Alcoba, and Paco Careaga, have been subjected to the infamous castor-oil treatment or imprisoned in pestilential Coati. Germán Reinaga, an ardent Bolivian democrat, died this year as a result of the terrible conditions in his place of confinement.

The Argentine Group of United Officers (G. O. U.) financed the military coup that brought the Villarroel dictatorship to power. This was disclosed by the United States State Department in February, 1944. Relations between the Argentine government and its Bolivian satellite have continued to be extremely cordial. The Argentine government has agreed to invest 100,000,000 Argentine pesos in Bolivian railway projects and 15,000,000 pesos in the Bolivian oil industry. Strengthening the economic bonds between the two governments is the identity of political purpose—the maintenance of a totalitarian dictatorship.

Logically enough, Spain and Argentina recognized the Villarroel government a few days after the December, 1943, coup. Most foreign countries, however, at first declared a diplomatic quarantine against it. Villarroel, aware that he must obtain their approval, was quick to issue pro-United Nations statements, but he never implemented them.

The United States recognized the Villarroel regime in June, 1944, largely as the result of a report submitted by Avra Warren, who had been sent to Bolivia as a one-man investigating commission. Warren stated that Villarroel had promised to expel the leaders of the M. N. R.; and the M. N. R. Cabinet ministers were, in fact, advised to resign. But the minute recognition was granted, they were recalled. Moreover, in December, 1944, Paz Estenssoro, Minister of Finance and founder and leader of the M. N. R., represented Bolivia at the Mexico City conference. Carlos Montenegro, who has never concealed his admiration for the Nazis, was given an embassy post in Mexico City. Augusto Céspedes, editor of the M. N. R.'s official organ, the anti-Semitic La Calle, was given a similar post in Paraguay. José Escobar, La Paz chief of police during the November massacres and largely responsible for them, was sent to Washington in May, 1945, as a member of the Bolivian Military Purchasing Commission and is still there. Members of the M. N. R. were delegates to the San Francisco conference. The admission of the Argentine delegates aroused heated discussion, but the Bolivian delegates, representing an equally illegal regime, were seated without argument.

MR. WARREN'S MISTAKE

United States recognition of the fascist Bolivian regime alone has enabled Villarroel to survive. It was granted after Mr. Warren, unable to penetrate beneath the regime's façade, failed to interpret the Bolivian situation correctly to the State Department. He had every opportunity to find out the truth. In a conversation in La Paz in May, 1944, a month before recognition was granted and while he was examining the situation, I gave him the relevant facts. In the preceding January, I told him, the P. I. R. had vainly attempted to induce Villarroel to include some P. I. R. members in the government and to adopt an anti-fascist program. Early in March the government began to persecute the P. I. R. leaders. Many, including myself, were seized and kept on Coati Island during the month of March. Government repression of democratic elements was going on at the very moment of our talk; I had just received a report from a physician who had treated several persons in a deplorable condition from the castor oil they had been forced to take at the headquarters of the Calama regiment.

The government's claims of labor support were, I assured Warren, entirely false. The only "labor leaders" backing the government were disreputable police agents. under such conditions, I said, the P. I. R. felt obliged to continue in the opposition and to organize an anti-fascist front in conjunction with other democratic parties.

General elections had been scheduled for July, and I suggested that it would be advisable to withhold recognition until shortly afterward. Democratic countries should grant recognition only to a Bolivian government chosen in genuinely free elections.

Mr. Warren said nothing. But since I knew that his mission was extremely delicate, his silence did not disturb me. The following month La Razon, a daily published in La Paz, carried a summary of Mr. Warren's report to the State Department. It contained a number of astonishing statements: for example, that both the P. I. R. and the labor unions support Villarroel's government; that Villarroel would become President with or without elections; that the M. N. R. members of the Cabinet were to be expelled. Immediate recognition of the Nazi-Fascist Villarroel government was granted, with great lack of foresight on the part of the State Department, two days before the July 2 "elections." As a result Villarroel's position was enormously strengthened.

THE ANTI-FASCIST COALITION

Within Bolivia the anti-fascist opposition is waging unremitting war against the dictatorship. The P. I. R., founded in July, 1940, as a Marxist party with no international affiliations, was the moving force behind the coalition of anti-fascist parties formed in May, 1944, and known as the Bolivian Democratic Union (U. D. B.). Co-founders of the coalition with the P. I. R. were the Genuine Republican Party, the Socialist Republican Party, and the Socialist Party. A representative of the Liberal Party has recently joined. The five-point program of the U. D. B. calls for: (1) the eradication of Nazi-fascism and complete solidarity with the United Nations; (2) the restoration of the constitution and genuine political freedom; (3) full protection for the working classes and free trade-union activity; (4) an immediate and practical program to reduce the cost of living; (5) organization of a Board of Planned Economy that will place national resources at the service of the country.

The U. D. B., like the Argentine Patria Libre, has an underground movement which is carrying on the struggle despite all repression and espionage. The exiled committees and the underground organization are working together for a peaceful restoration of democratic liberties. We do not want a putsch; we do not want civil war. We want a peaceful transition to democratic government. If the United States, which is so generously giving moral support to democratic elements in Argentina, would extend that same moral help to the people of Bolivia, the cause of democracy would be immeasurably strengthened in Perón's puppet state.

Fair Play for the Nisei

BY LEONARD BLOOM

(Assistant professor of sociology, University of California, Los Angeles)

THE War Relocation Authority is committing suicide. And though it is a leading candidate for the title of America's most unpopular war-time agency, its announced intention of putting an end to its existence is causing deep concern to persons who want justice for Americans of Japanese ancestry.

The WRA has performed onerous and difficult tasks for three and a half years. It was born of the correct assumption that the army got into the wrong business when it evacuated a segment of our population on the smallest of pretexts: there was no historical justification for the initial act and no precedent except in fascist states for the administrative procedure that was developed. The agency was staffed by a confused and varied personnel—sincere and able individuals who wanted to see the best made of a bad situation, faithful routine government workers, and some out-and-out racists who looked upon the evacuees as criminals in a prison.

But by and large the WRA has gained the strong support of fair-minded Americans. On the West Coast especially people have felt that it was trying honestly to protect the interests of the evacuees. Attempts of groups who had engineered the evacuation to establish military control of the camps were strongly opposed. Attacks on the agency by Dies, Rankin, and company gained it supporters. The general feeling was that about the only way to help the evacuees was to help the WRA. Thus its efforts to relocate the population of the camps and restore them to normal life in the American community received vigorous backing from various organizations of citizens who recognized the evacuation for the tragic event and the ugly precedent it was. When belatedly the restraining orders were lifted and general resettlement on the Coast became possible, these organizations and many anonymous individuals worked hard to find jobs and houses for the "returnees."

On July 13 the WRA, always under diverse pressures, declared that it would liquidate its centers at intervals between October 15 and December 15. No adequate survey had been made of housing conditions or of jobs, but the camps were to close on schedule, like a military operation: the directives are disconcertingly reminiscent of the days of evacuation. What if the residents of the center are not ready on the closing date, if their plans are not complete, or if they are unable to obtain housing? The WRA says they have had time enough to get ready. If they don't know where they want to go, they will be sent back where they came from. If they are penniless, they need not worry; the WRA supplies a train ticket and $25, and their home communities must provide relief.

By the middle of 1944 about 30,000 persons, most of them young and resourceful American citizens or financially secure persons, had moved out of the camps to new locations, chiefly in the Middle West. More than 62,000, including 17,000 at the Tule Lake segregation center, remained in camp. By September 1, 1945, the total camp population had been reduced to 49,000, and in an article in the Progressive of September 24, Dillon Myer, head of the WRA, indicated that the departure rate from camps was 1,100 per week. This meant that the rate of removal that had been achieved under great pressure was not yet sufficient to meet the closing dates.

Many things have happened since the spring of 1942 which are simply ignored in the WRA's plans. When the Japanese Americans left their homes, most of their businesses, properties, crops, and work opportunities were liquidated at a loss that has not yet been measured but must amount to several hundred million dollars. The sections where they formerly lived have been filled up by war workers, many of whom belong also to minority groups. For example, in Los Angeles, which is probably the crucial area of adjustment, the Negro population has more than doubled, and the districts available for racial minorities have, if anything, been constricted. Some sections which formerly contained large numbers of Japanese Americans, such as Terminal Island with its pre-war colony of 3,000, have been taken for military installations or war plants. In short, the WRA is not sending back the evacuees to pre-war conditions but to communities badly disorganized by the war.

The housing situation has not improved since the end of the war, and the number of jobs has of course declined. The several thousand Japanese Americans who thus far have come to the Coast are housed in substandard "temporary" quarters. The few residential properties still owned by Japanese Americans have already been reoccupied. It has just been learned that the WRA is planning to house 3,500 returning evacuees in barracks in the Los Angeles area. These barracks would have all the disadvantages of camp life and none of the amenities of the present camps, which have been made livable and functioning communities by the hard work of the inmates. The barracks would not be easily accessible to transportation or to schools, and health facilities would be grossly inadequate. There is no evidence that the county school and health officers were even consulted in the matter. As a crowning indignity the financial costs of maintenance would have to be borne by the returned persons or, if they were indigent, by the county.*

Responsible people on the Coast want to see the Japanese Americans return and justice done. Conscious of the guilt of the region, they want to see a plan set up that will have a chance to work. Such a plan, they believe, must include the following provisions:

1. Extension of the life of the WRA, with at least four centers remaining in operation, until resettlement can be conducted on a reasonably individualized, planned basis.

2. The eventual establishment of a separate center, preferably at Manzanar, for indigent old persons. Such segregation may have the appearance of cruelty, but by relieving younger Japanese Americans of the burden of aged dependents it would greatly facilitate their economic reestablishment.

3. Adequate financial aid; this can be justified on the ground that the evacuees were paid at the exploitative rate of $12 to $19 a month for full-time work.

4. Planned resettlement on the West Coast to be regarded as a regional task and to include the provision of housing, jobs, and other facilities. At least 1,200 public housing units should be built in Los Angeles alone. In no case should these units be in large segregated blocks, for such a system would foster racial prejudice and obscure the fact that the difficulties confronting Japanese Americans are simply a badly aggravated form of the difficulties confronting all minorities. As a general rule, Japanese Americans should be distributed among the housing projects so that they do not form more than 15 per cent of any project's population. If segregation should be permitted, one of the few desirable by-products of the evacuation, the destruction of "Little Tokyos," would be lost.

To salve the conscience of America resettlement must be successful, and this requires a full mobilization of governmental and community agencies. Japanese Americans must be urged to resettle, and resettlement must be made feasible. To thrust unready persons into communities ill-prepared to receive them will simply cause more needless suffering.

In his article in the Progressive Mr. Myer said that if it were not "planning to close the centers on successive dates between October 15 and December 15, the WRA now would be living in a nightmare of plans to house thousands of American citizens and aliens at government expense for a long time." The WRA may not be having a nightmare, but it is giving one to many Americans of Japanese and other kinds of ancestry.

In the Wind

MAYFLOWER DESCENDANTS take note: "Equality is the arch-foe of liberty. Equality cuts down the peak and summit of ambition to the valley of the commonplace," Sidney Samuels, Fort Worth attorney, told the Waco, Texas, Junior Chamber of Commerce on November 1. The Waco News-Tribune reported his address thus: "Asserting that not only the governments of Europe but also our own government are endeavoring to proclaim the unworkable hypothesis that all men are created equal, Samuels told the Jaycees that in adopting this doctrine the governments are trying to drag genius to the masses. 'This doctrine is none other than the doctrine of socialism,' he said. Tracing the history of socialism, Samuels said that it had its roots in the establishment of the Plymouth colony in America."

ECONOMICS: "California olive-crop pressure groups," said the Wall Street Journal of November 5, "have both barrels trained on the OPA for more immediate relief. They're aiming for at least a 10 per cent increase in wholesale prices, which would shoot retail prices up about 20 to 25 per cent. One packer frankly admits the situation has its funny side. 'Here on one side,' he said, 'we're trying to convince the OPA that olives are specialty luxury items, and a price increase wouldn't raise the cost of living or affect many people. But then we turn around to persuade the public that olives are a necessary everyday food item and not just an extra luxury or a decorative relish.' "

HERESY: W. H. Gerhauser, president of the American Ship Building Company, told a recent meeting of the American Merchant Marine Conference in New York that government shipbuilding should supplement private work in peace time, in order to keep the private yards going.

SOCIETY NOTE: White and Negro guests were entertained together for the first time at a reception by the Third District Democratic Women's Club of Louisville, Kentucky, on October 31. The reception was for the victorious candidates in the Democratic primaries of August. "This departure from custom," said the Courier-Journal, "is due to the candidacy of W. W. Beckert, Negro, who is running for alderman."

WHITE MAN'S BURDEN: We have just received a copy of an official bulletin signed by Colonel Harry F. Cunningham, assistant chief of staff, Fifth Air Force, dated August 15. "We, the conquerors," it says, "have the obligation to impress our superiority upon the conquered enemy. The enemy is an Oriental. . . . Such a demonstration of superiority requires that the shirtless legions which have driven forward from Moresby to Okinawa must now find their shirts and wear them. . . . The Pacific Ocean must remain, what it now is, an American lake, just as American and just as purely and singly American as—for example—Cayuga Lake in New York, Cass Lake in Minnesota, Great Salt Lake in Utah."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. One dollar will be paid for each item accepted.]

---

* As proof is read, the closing of some centers and the establishment of barracks housing have become faits accomplis. This has aroused strenuous public opposition.

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

Mr. Baruch Muddies the Waters

BERNARD M. BARUCH occupies a unique position in American public life. He has acted as unofficial adviser to a succession of Presidents, he is a frequent and popular witness before Congressional committees, he is credited with the inspiration or composition of numerous public documents. Washington correspondents have built him up into an almost legendary figure. They find wonderful copy in the economic elder statesman who sits on the bench in Lafayette Park dispensing the wisdom of ripe experience, and whenever he chooses he can be sure of the headlines.

Mr. Baruch, in short, has become a national oracle whose utterances exert a strong influence on public opinion. This is a position of great moral responsibility, and it is surprising therefore to find him dropping into a discussion of inflationary dangers an ill-considered and irrelevant paragraph suggesting that loans to foreign countries should be used as an ideological weapon. In a letter to Representative Albert Gore, written for publication, he declares:

> We must be careful, when we give aid to other countries, that this aid is not used to nationalize their industries against us, to destroy our own competitive system, which, I think, should be preserved. England, Czechoslovakia, France, and other countries are nationalizing or about to nationalize their industries. Russia has totalized herself—one buyer and one seller—and is totalizing all countries coming under her aegis.

What is the purpose of this statement if not to sabotage the financial negotiations with Britain, which at last seem to be nearing a conclusion? Mr. Baruch is saying that Congress should not approve a loan to Britain unless the government of that country abandons its mandate from the electors and agrees not to nationalize any industries without American permission. Obviously neither Britain nor France nor any other sovereign nation is going to accept a loan on such terms. And as Walter Lippmann has already pointed out in the New York Herald Tribune, the refusal of credit to Socialist governments will not delay but hasten the process of socialization. Without American credit the countries of Western Europe, and Britain in particular, cannot reestablish their international trade on free lines. They will have to systematize their present makeshift barter arrangements and socialize the whole business of exporting and importing.

Britain does not need dollars to buy out its coal operators and nationalize the mines, but it could very well use part of an American credit for reequiping those mines with modern American machinery, a task which has proved beyond the imagination and resources of private enterprise. If credit is denied for that purpose, however, it does not mean that the mines will not be nationalized or that the British government will be unable to secure American machinery for them. What it might mean is that the necessary dollars would be found by barring imports of less essential American goods.

Painful as the idea is to many, America has to face the fact that a large part of the world is now committed to considerable measures of collectivism. If credits are to be given only to simon-pure adherents of private enterprise, the world will have to make do without American financial assistance and America will have to get along without much foreign trade.

I don't think this is really Mr. Baruch's objective, though he does suggest that the United States may not at present have any surplus available for export. For the main theme of his letter to Mr. Gore is the danger of inflation unless full production is rapidly achieved. Since foreigners need dollars to spend on American goods, loans to them add to effective purchasing power at a time when increasing wages and decreased taxes are also exerting an inflationary pressure. There is something in this argument, although Mr. Baruch, I think, has overlooked the deflationary factors which are also present, such as the decline in take-home wages.

What is not in dispute is that the proper cure for inflation is production and more production. Paradoxically, one reason for the delay in its application is fear of deflation. Business men apparently don't feel confident that demand will absorb the product of capacity operations and consequently, as I pointed out last week, are attempting to set a wage-price pattern which will safeguard their profits at a good deal less than full production. In these circumstances any assurance of future export markets should prove a boon to those key industries which, once war-time shortages have been made good, can hardly hope to maintain a satisfactory volume on domestic orders alone. However, some attention must be given to present foreign needs in order to attract future foreign custom.

To do Mr. Baruch justice, he has not advocated any embargo on exports. What he proposes is that a national inventory be made to determine how much production must be allocated to the home market in order to avoid inflation, and what would then be available for reconstruction in Europe and Asia. This sounds reasonable enough, but such an inventory cannot be completed in a few weeks as Mr. Baruch suggests. Moreover, as he indicates, it implies a system of priorities necessitating the retention of many government controls and the reimposition of others.

Logically, Mr. Baruch's proposal, therefore, calls for planned distribution and more government interference with business. But logic, or at least consistency, is not Mr. Baruch's strongest point, for immediately after his disapproving aside on foreign collectivism we find him telling Mr. Gore: "We cannot go on depleting our soil and mineral resources as we have in the past seven years without tragic results to our whole economy and national life. A study of our resources and modern scientific methods to replenish them must be undertaken quickly." A sensible observation, although exception might be taken to the suggestion that waste of national resources is a recent development. Actually it has been going on merrily for some three hundred years, and no government has yet found a way to check it without interfering with private enterprise. What do you suggest, Sir Oracle? Can we reconcile conservation with property rights, and if not which should be sacrificed?

KEITH HUTCHISON

The People's Front

Montreal, November 12

EVERYONE of us is aware of the rich resources of Canada and the role it has played in this war. First in nickel, first in platinum, first in radium, and the greatest producer of food in the United Nations, Canada, remote from the battlefield, was able to work from 1939 to 1945 without fear of having its war effort interrupted. But one must come here and talk to Canada's leaders and to the man in the street to realize fully how the country's military and industrial contribution to victory has increased the people's confidence in themselves. It is not the irritating arrogance of the nouveaux riches or a delusion of grandeur based upon a transitory boom. It is simply a conviction of what Canada can accomplish and of the future that awaits it. I was in Ottawa the day the news came that the Canadian Prime Minister had been invited to attend the Washington conference on the atomic bomb with President Truman and Prime Minister Attlee. Everyone has the feeling that Canada would be better off as one of the lesser great powers than as one of the greater middle powers.

The first to benefit from this rise in international status has been Prime Minister Mackenzie King. His standing in the country is higher today than it was before the war. I would not venture to judge his popularity: it would be difficult to find a man so long in a position of authority in a democratic regime who is less gifted with those qualities that usually draw the masses. His interventions in Parliament are always ponderous, and his voice over the radio is a tiresome monotone. There is nothing stirring or brilliant about his personality. However, during the twenty-five years, except for short periods, that he has governed Canada, he has shown an exceptional capacity to grapple with major crises. Although far from a leftist, he has been drawn into the great socializing current which is spreading through the world as a result of the war. When he was young he was a member of the Fabian Society, and he still carries over from those days a certain progressive nostalgia.

It may be difficult to replace him as Prime Minister; one discerns no great figures about him, although the Member of Parliament for Westmount and present Defense Minister, Douglas Abbott, has gained considerable prestige in the last few months and many people talk of him as the coming man.

The intelligent leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, M. J. Coldwell, entitled his book about political developments in Canada "Left Turn Canada." But as a matter of fact the trend of the country toward the left is rather slow. It will be a long-drawn-out process, and the progressives of Canada are confronted with a hard task. Not that I am allowing myself to be influenced by the results of the recent elections. The twenty-eight C. C. F. members who were returned to Parliament, although less numerous than was expected, form an impressive group; and Coldwell is unquestionably the best speaker in the House. I spent several hours with the C. C. F. delegation at a luncheon which they gave for me, and the discussion was interesting and varied. Their means of publicity are limited; they have, for example, only one daily paper besides several provincial weeklies. The press as a whole is against them, and undoubtedly the C. C. F. is adversely affected by the strong opposition to all forms of nationalization prevailing in the United States. Worse than the warning against all forms of social control emanating from American business is the position taken by most American labor leaders. I heard members of the C. C. F. complain that Green and Murray come to Canada and praise free enterprise. From a Gallup poll taken while I was in Montreal it appeared that the advocates of nationalization were losing ground.

Great hope is placed in the Socialist experiment in the province of Saskatchewan, where a daring and competent Socialist Prime Minister, T. C. Douglas, can, if his plans are successful, provide the C. C. F. with better arguments in support of its program than any words. Last year Saskatchewan was leading all the Canadian provinces in the amount of cash income derived from the sale of farm products. The increase in livestock production was also remarkable.

The Saskatchewan venture is an intelligent and courageous undertaking in every way. Under the supervision of the government qualified scientists are translating into actual industrial and agricultural practice the discoveries of research workers at the university. The labor code is the best on the continent. An educational plan is being carried out which provides an annual equalization grant of $615-000 to be distributed among poorer communities to improve their standards. The new government Department of Reconstruction and Rehabilitation has announced that returned veterans will be settled on farms large enough to be operated profitably. Land has been provided to settle about a thousand returned men immediately. "We cannot wait until we have groups of these men marching down the street and delegations coming here," Mr. Douglas said last February in his speech to the legislature.

After eighteen months of Socialist administration Saskatchewan is today one of the most progressive sections of the American continent. It has come close to its goal of complete socialized health service for everyone. Though the provincial debt was reduced by $13,000,000 in the first year, the slogan of C. M. Fines, the provincial treasurer is: "As long as we are in power we will never balance a budget on poverty and misery." It will be intensely interesting to watch the development of this first modern experiment in socialism in a continent where free enterprise seems so powerfully intrenched.

DEL VAYO

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Pursuit of James

THE QUESTION OF HENRY JAMES: A COLLECTION OF CRITICAL ESSAYS. Edited by F. W. Dupee. Henry Holt and Company. $3.75.

MR. DUPEE might almost have called his admirable selection of twenty-six pieces about James "The Question of Criticism," for surely this intense critical focus from 1880 until today on so richly complicated a subject, employing such a diversity of methods—parody, old-fashioned literary appreciation, textual analysis, Freudian interpretation, the casual essay, the poem of homage—must tell us as much about criticism itself as about its subject. The function of criticism, if we can draw any inferences from this volume, is not to bring in a unanimous verdict or even a clear answer: James is damned by V. L. Parrington and Van Wyck Brooks as a pitiful fugitive from the harsh, bracing reality of America to a European dream world, and is praised by T. S. Eliot and Edna Kenton for improving his native quality and giving it its real chance precisely by his transplantation to Europe; the appraisal of his work ranges from the ferociously contemptuous dismissal of Thomas Beer to the deeply felt reverence of Percy Lubbock; according to Stuart Sherman he is an aesthetic idealist adoring beauty and absolutely nothing else, the most interesting parallel to his later novels being Pater's "Marius the Epicurean," while according to Jacques Barzun he is, with his moral attitude and addiction to violent plots, a writer of melodrama whose allegiance never swerved from Balzac.

Some of these contradictions are so fundamental, such different things are seen, as to suggest that if there is any question of judgment it is the critical eyesight and not James's text that is to be judged; his text seems at times to serve wonderfully like the chart in the oculist's office, which is read not for its contents but for what it reveals about those who read it, and we, the amateurs—who else can do it for us? —must make whatever ultimate professional judgment is now to be made.

Much more than an exploration of the nature of critical vision, valuable as that is, can be had from these contradictions. James himself is in Mr. Dupee's phrase "such a living tissue of contradictions" that he handsomely rewards the play of different minds, so long as they are imaginative, on his text; what are apparently the most irreconcilable differences, such as—to give but one example—those of Stuart Sherman and Mr. Barzun, are sometimes the most profitable. Sherman seems justified in his view by the absolute, because unspoken, assumptions made as to the value of the artist's dedication in James's novels and tales about artists, Mr. Barzun in his by the violence of the stories about worldly greed and passion; the two critics are at first impression so apart because they are in such different worlds of James. But R. P. Blackmur in his exciting piece in this volume bridges the gap between these two Jamesian worlds: in the figure of the literary artist James has a ready-made puppet that can appear very white or very black by the mere mention to the reader of the nobility of the good writer or the flunkeyism of the bad one. "Thus," as Mr. Blackmur shrewdly puts it, "the author of a fiction about an artist has all the advantages of coarse melodrama without losing any of the advantages of high tragedy"—and we are suddenly in the purely aesthetic Paterian realm seen by Mr. Sherman, and there exactly by the method of Balzacian melodrama so brilliantly stressed by Mr. Barzun. (By truncating Mr. Blackmur I have had to omit the beautiful logic of his own demonstration that the later stories of James about the great world are the final fruit of the parables about artists.)

As there is no single answer, there is no single critical method that is the best for getting at James. Methods that would seem to be inappropriate turn out extremely well: Conrad's magnificent "historian of fine consciences" is at once an instance of how much of so large a subject can be "put into the nutshell of a phrase" and of how amazingly right the critic can be who sees in his author only his own image; Frank Moore Colby, for all that he shows that too familiar American phenomenon of a good mind gaily resisting any intensity of creative insight, nevertheless by the very gaiety of his own resistance has sharp intimations of the "guilty" secrets hidden in "darkest James," secrets not unlike those that Edmund Wilson has shaken out of "The Turn of the Screw" by standing it, with the help of Freud, on its head.

James in the end—there was always something of the artful dodger about him—eludes his critics. This is an ineluctable rule of the game, for if he could have been caught at all he would never have been worth their try. He leaves them, however, not empty-handed but loaded down with a wealth of spoil, not the least part of which is the profusion of fine things they have themselves created to aid in their—and our—pursuit of him.

JAMES GROSSMAN

Bronzeville, U. S. A.

BLACK METROPOLIS. By St. Clair Drake and Horace R. Cayton. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $5.

THE Negro has been in America for more than three hundred years, but in all that time we have learned very little about him. Perhaps this is because he is our guilty conscience, the proof of our failure; in order to excuse ourselves we have built around him a legend. We have said that he was ignorant, but denied him adequate educational facilities; that he was a criminal, then segregated him in crowded slums which produced more crime; that he was lazy and shiftless, while shutting him off from all but the most menial jobs; that his family life was irregular, only to hold back from him the human dignity that makes for permanent family relationships. And when, in spite of all this, he managed to fight his way up and out into the main stream of American life we told ourselves that he could do this because of an admixture of white blood.

Thus for eighty long years we have been creating what we now know as the Negro problem. In our futile effort to solve it we resemble an ignorant man looking for a patent medicine to cure a disease no one has as yet diagnosed. In need of a blueprint, we are still trying to build a house from the roof down, and each time it crashes to the ground we look at one another in amazement, then begin over again.

Certainly no single book can solve the race question. But "Black Metropolis," a deeply penetrating study of the Negro community in Chicago, is one of the very few books known to this reviewer which shows any real conception of what that problem is—shorn of all the mumbo-jumbo of race relations and the fumbling efforts of the good white folks who want to do right but insist on maintaining the status quo.

In the latter part of Richard Wright's "Native Son" Bigger Thomas is talking to Max, his lawyer: "Really I never wanted to hurt nobody. That's the truth, Mr. Max. I hurt folks 'cause I felt I had to; that's all. They was crowding me too close; they wouldn't give me no room. Lots of times I tried to forget 'em, but I couldn't. They wouldn't let me."

After reading Mr. Drake's and Mr. Cayton's book we know everything there is to know about the background that molded Bigger Thomas. Bronzeville, as the South Side of Chicago is called by Negroes, is perhaps the most typical segregated area in the North. Less sophisticated than Harlem and with more rigid boundaries, it is bursting at the seams from the pressure of 350,000 permanent residents and an influx of transients lured to the North by the promise of better jobs. It is an area of high rents and living costs and a low value on human life. It is a boiler which has too much steam up. Knowing this, we stand by ineffectually, hoping that somehow our witch doctors will mumble the magic words that will allow the steam to escape before the boiler blows up in our faces.

Yet in Bronzeville is hope as well as despair. City workers, professional men, artists—a varied middle-class life we have never suspected—live in this city within a city. Always there is a wall between Bronzeville and the outer world, a wall different only in thickness, as Mr. Wright has so often told us, from similar walls in Memphis or Jackson. That wall is what keeps Negroes from being Americans, and Americans from being free men.

To say that Mr. Drake and Mr. Cayton have created another "Middletown" may seem too facile a comparison, but it is one which is richly deserved. Few communities have ever been put under a more searching or relentless inquiry. "Black Metropolis" is a rare combination of research and synthesis, a book to be deeply pondered. It offers no short cuts or magic solutions, but it contains the clearest picture of what it means to be a Negro in America that I have ever encountered. It is realistic and far-reaching, probing where other books have glossed over, interpreting where others have merely stated generalities. No one who reads it intelligently can ever believe again that our racial dilemma can be solved by pushing buttons, or by gradual processes which may reach four or five hundred years into the future.

The lengthy introduction by Richard Wright deserves a review in itself; it is always germane to the subject, almost a part of the book. It is what the commentary of a documentary film should be. Introduction and book together form the most informative and readable treatment of the malignant racial growth from which America is suffering that I have ever read, not excepting Gunnar Myrdal's monumental "American Dilemma."

BUCKLIN MOON

BRIEFER COMMENT

The Sorry Prospect

MONOPOLY IS NOT a satisfactory word for the subject of David Lasser's "Private Monopoly" (Harper, $3), and the author is the first to say so. It will be too bad if readers shy away from it as a too familiar subject, for Lasser has done an excellent job of presenting and documenting the faults of the politico-economic system dominated by big business.

Combinations in restraint of trade are only one manifestation of the business philosophy which looks for profit primarily in the margin between cost and selling price instead of in volume of sales. Small firms are in general even more addicted to that philosophy than large ones. Competition is no skeleton key to all the problems of an economy of abundance.

Lasser has selected and assembled the most significant evidence collected during the last ten years by the Temporary National Economic Committee, the National Resources Planning Board, other Congressional investigations and government departments, and independent economists and reporters. The result is a thoroughly depressing but important picture of the state of the capitalist economy, national and international. The author's proposals for "democratization" as a solution of the problems he presents are well-reasoned and sensible, but he does not leave the reader with too much hope that they can be carried out.

A capitalist economy could be made to work for the general welfare, given sufficient intelligence and good-will, and it has advantages over any other system in terms of democracy and individual freedom. "Private Monopoly" details the faults which must be overcome. It does not give much assurance that they will be.

CHARLES E. NOYES

A Living Process

THE LATE CARL L. BECKER was one of the truly wise men of our generation. He was historian, philosopher of history, and political philosopher, whose special interest it was to find a firmer foundation for democratic life and who had come to the significant conclusion that eighteenth-century thought was an inadequate basis for the continued growth of democratic thought and the constant readjustment of the democratic process.

In a posthumously published series of lectures titled "Freedom and Responsibility in the American Way of Life" (Knopf, $2.50) he sums up his conclusions so perfectly that they well might have been the intended summation of his life work. "The nature of freedom and responsibility is such that they cannot be discussed," he declares, "still less dealt with to any good purpose, separately." The eighteenth century had equated democracy with the assertion of inalienable rights. Becker shows that the rights and liberties must be exercised with a higher sense of responsibility for the common good; otherwise the community is forced to abrogate them in the interest of justice. "The owners of English cotton mills in the 1830's," he writes, "enjoyed freedom of contract as a cherished liberty; but for the anemic women and children who contracted to work in the mills because the alternative was starvation, it was a species of wage slavery."

While Becker emphasizes the importance of character in the operation of democracy ("the preservation of our freedom depends less upon the precise nature of our Constitution and laws than upon the character of the people"), he does not belong to the moralists who would solve political issues by moral means only. He is constantly looking for the best possible political instruments for the preservation of both justice and liberty. He is certain that the eighteenth century was wrong in assuming that an unmanaged economy would make for justice, and he nicely debunks the privileged classes of today who use that creed for their own ends. He understands that collectivism finally destroys freedom, but is also certain that there must be increasing control of the economic process in the interest of justice.

He is critical of all uncritical devotion to written constitutions and to cherished forms of the past because he understands that democratic life is a living process which requires constant readjustments to new situations. Becker is in short the kind of guide whose loss one regrets the more deeply in a day in which interested dogmatists speak unctuously of the "American way of life," while they seek to preserve some special privilege or evade some obvious responsibility of their power. REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Psychology and Politics

THE SOCIAL REFORMISM of Dr. Samuel Lowy in "New Directions in Psychology" (Emerson, $3) is based on what might be called the "argument from neurosis." His book indicates that a simple concern for the individual personality involves an alienation from contemporary political practice. The study of a number of uprooted persons, for example, convinces him that the forced migration of masses amounts to large-scale spiritual murder. He records, on the basis of his analytic experience in a Slovakian town, that even among persons hostile to Jews in everyday and political life "anti-Semitic sentiments only rarely constitute the content of free association." Anti-Semitism is, in this view, not very deep in the psyche but merely a convenient symbolic expression of repressed hatreds which are produced in family and social situations.

Dr. Lowy's suggestions aim at the elimination of aggressive impulses, the freeing of the personality. Here he is confronted by the polarity that plagues every libertarian movement. How encourage spontaneity in the individual when the only apparent fulcrum of major change in a complex society is the state machinery, the apparatus of authority? Dr. Lowy insists that "men can be forced into such spontaneity," that freedom for adults requires certain inhibitions to be imposed by state force. Herbert Read, who contributes

Historians and reviewers praise

The Age of Jackson

by

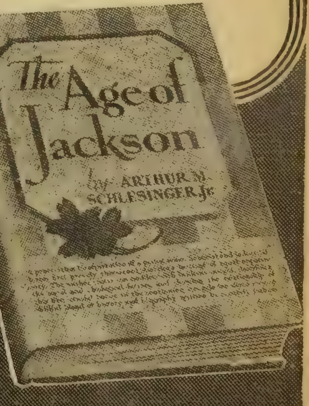
ARTHUR M. SCHLESINGER, Jr.

Marquis James, Pulitzer Prize biographer of Andrew Jackson: "Many will understand better the causes that engendered, the forces that sustained and the aims that triumphed under the aegis of a leader who has lately left us and whose mark on American life is so like that of Jackson."

Charles A. Beard: "It represents the results of painstaking research in Jacksonian sources, many of them hitherto neglected; it is written with verve and is firm in judgment."

Merle Curti, in The Nation: "...a triumph of historical scholarship, analysis and interpretation ... throws much new light on a host of Americans, well-known and less well-known, who come to life in remarkable portraits that are both brilliant and sensitive."

At all bookstores • $5.00



The Age of Jackson
by ARTHUR M. SCHLESINGER, Jr.

L B

LITTLE,

BROWN

& COMPANY

a rather reluctant introduction to the book, notes that the authoritarian state is itself a projection of masochistic and aggressive neurotic symptoms. He argues that the solution of mass neuroses must be in the direction of "an inner accord between individual morality and spontaneous group activities. . . . The way lies through reciprocity and mutual aid, not through coercion and external authority." Dr. Lowy is "practical," but his means exactly contradict his ends; Read is a "whole-loafer" and his logic pure, but his means are seemingly hopeless. The stalemate of an era.

The sources of Dr. Lowy's thinking are admittedly eclectic; he uses with equal approval Freud, Stekel, Adler, Fromm, Horney, and Mannheim. He is closest, however, to the sociological, anti-instinctivist school represented by the last three, though he has neither the historical grasp of Fromm and Mannheim nor the lucidity of Horney. His style is laborious and repetitious. Sentences that open promisingly too often close on truisms and commonplaces. One suspects, from Dr. Lowy's limited venture, that an analyst less sentimental, more selective and relevant, and happier in style might add a suggestive dimension to political thinking. Considering the state of political life, the psychoanalyst may be better fitted than the practicing politician to diagnose and offer cures for our communal ills. NATHAN GLICK

HOW CAN THERE BE PEACE
BETWEEN LABOR and MANAGEMENT?

Helpfully discussed for executives of today and tomorrow in HUMAN LEADERSHIP IN INDUSTRY

THE CHALLENGE of TOMORROW

by Sam A. Lewisohn
President, Miami Copper Company

A challenge, a warning and a guide to executive leaders to assume the full responsibility which is theirs for improved human relations in industry. Its timely message throws helpful light on the tense issues which the national Industry-Labor Conference will soon confront.

LAWRENCE W. APPLY, Vice President, Vick Chemical Company: "It involves a deep and practical comprehension of human nature, reactions and mental processes which few can afford to keep out of their lives. A wide reading of this book by executives and workers will mean better human relations in this world of affairs."

C. S. CHING, Director, Industrial and Public Relations, United States Rubber Company: "Mr. Lewisohn has made an excellent contribution to the thinking in this field." $2.00

At your bookstore or from

HARPER & BROTHERS

Voice of India

INDIA, land of four hundred millions: hub of the British Empire: best potential customer for American goods.

Millions of Asia watch developments in India with interest and anxiety.

Solution of the Colonial Problem will depend upon its solution in India; so will the peace in Asia.

Americans must know facts about India. Here they are in VOICE OF INDIA, presented and interpreted by five of India's most authoritative spokesmen in America.

Single copy—20¢ Yearly subscription—$2.00

National Committee For India's Freedom
1129 Vermont Avenue Washington 5, D. C.

China's Basic Problem

FOR YEARS NOW we have been hearing that the basic cause of China's stagnation was its feudal system of land ownership and utilization. But it has been difficult for a Westerner to understand how the traditional agrarian relationship impeded progress. Farm tenancy we understand; but since the proportion of tenancy in China is not much greater than in some of our Middle Western states, it is clear that tenancy alone does not account for China's poverty and backwardness. A detailed picture of a traditional Chinese village with all its economic relationships is necessary before we can grasp the nature of the Chinese problem. Such a picture is provided in a remarkable sociological study of three Yunnan villages by Hsiao-Tung Fei and Chih-I Chang entitled "Earthbound China" (Chicago, $3.75). This readable book, a Chinese rural "Middletown," tears away the veil of Oriental mystery and reveals the traditional Chinese social and economic structure in sordid detail. We are helped to understand the curse of landlordism, for example, when we find that even the petty landlord—the largest landholding in one village was only about four acres—rarely does any work. Since nearly a third of the population of some villages are in the petty-landlord class, the social waste of the system is apparent. Well over half of the families in each of the villages studied either possessed no land or had less land than they needed for self-support. All the villages had more workers than could be effectively used on the amount of land available, and so some of the landless were compelled to seek other means of support. In the traditional village the only other source of income of any importance is handicraft production. As in other countries this is carried on in sweat shops. Near the cities the surplus population is drawn off by emerging industry, but only a fraction of Chinese villagers live near enough to cities to be affected by large-scale industrial development. As the authors point out, China's greatest need is for the development of small local industries, preferably cooperative in character, which can utilize the surplus labor that exists in every village.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

An Economic Survey

PEP (Political and Economic Planning), whose researches in British economic problems are attracting increasing attention, has done well to sponsor a study, "Economic Development in Southeast Europe" (Oxford, $3) by a group of experts drawn from all the countries covered—Poland, Czechoslo-

THE Nation
FOR YOUR FRIENDS

There's no better gift!

52
TIMES A YEAR
FOR ONLY $3

You can give The Nation as a gift to as many people as you wish at the special rate of only $3 each. And with it goes the usual greeting card. You can renew your own subscription now or whenever it expires at the regular yearly rate of $5, or if you want to make a real saving, you can renew for two years for $8 or three years for $11. Just fill out and mail the order form below.

GIFT ORDER FORM

THE NATION ASSOCIATES, Inc. • TWENTY VESEY STREET • NEW YORK 7, N. Y.

Dear Nation: Please send gift subscription of one year of The Nation to my friends as indicated below, at the special gift rate of $3 each.

☐ Also renew my own subscription to The Nation at the regular rate for .... years.
☐ Don't renew my subscription now. ☐ Remittance inclosed. ☐ Please bill me.

My Name is..
Street ....
City.. Zone & State..

Regular Renewal Subscription Rates: One Year $5 • Two Years $8 • Three Years $11
For Foreign and Canadian subscriptions add $1.00 a year.

LIST GIFT SUBSCRIPTIONS HERE

Name ....
Street ....
City........................ Zone & State....................
Gift Card should read from..
☐ Send Gift Card to me for mailing.

Name ....
Street ....
City........................ Zone & State....................
Gift Card should read from..
☐ Send Gift Card to me for mailing.

Name ....
Street ....
City........................ Zone & State....................
Gift Card should read from..
☐ Send Gift Card to me for mailing.

Name ....
Street ....
City........................ Zone & State....................
Gift Card should read from..
☐ Send Gift Card to me for mailing.

11-17-45

vakia, Austria, Hungary, Rumania, Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, and Greece. By eschewing politics the participants were able to find much common ground in regard to such problems as nutrition, agriculture, industrial development, transport, marketing, and capital needs. Their aim has been to present the known facts—the book contains valuable statistical material—and to make tentative recommendations for projects in which the various countries might cooperate for mutual benefit.

K. H.

Behind the German Curtain

"THE CURTAIN FALLS" by Count Folke Bernadotte (Knopf, $2) is an unpretentious, highly interesting account of the last days of the Third Reich, a serious contribution to the inside story of the Nazi collapse. Since the totality of this collapse prevented most of the leading figures from leaving behind their own versions for the use of the historians, Count Bernadotte's contribution is especially valuable. Bernadotte went to Germany as representative of the Swedish Red Cross to obtain the release of Scandinavian prisoners from German concentration camps, and thus obtained the privilege of witnessing the downfall of the Nazi gods from inside the Reich. He did not see everything—Hitler and Goebbels remained hidden to the Swedish observer—but he saw Ribbentrop and Himmler, whose first surrender offer was transmitted through him. Two of Himmler's closest advisers, Kaltenbrunner and Schellenberg, who appear as Himmler's bad and good angel in Bernadotte's account, permitted him startling glimpses behind the falling curtain. The macabre scenes that he reproduces, with their revelation of the triviality and cowardice of the Nazi leaders, make the reader wonder how such petty men could have succeeded in deceiving so many people in so many countries long enough to bring the world so close to the abyss.

JOSEPH BORNSTEIN

LOUIS ADAMIC'S

A NATION OF NATIONS

The colorful story of our various national groups, showing how each has helped to make our country great. A new and exciting kind of history which for the first time rounds out the story of America and brings these groups into proper focus. A NATION OF NATIONS is a book that Americans of all national, racial and religious backgrounds will be reading and referring to for decades to come.

With 16 pages of photographs

At all bookstores • $3.50

HARPER & BROTHERS

FICTION IN REVIEW

CHRISTOPHER ISHERWOOD'S "Prater Violet" (Random House, $2) is not only a very short novel which is yet the most completely novelistic novel I have read in a long time, but also the most charming novel I have read in a long time which yet reverberates with the widest and deepest meanings. Nor are these the only scores on which Mr. Isherwood's new book contradicts the present-day order of literary things and is a lovely achievement. It is a book written in the author's own person, yet utterly without ego; it is a novel about movie writers which is yet a novel about the life of every serious artist; it is a book without a political moral, but a profound moral-political statement; it is gay, witty, sophisticated, but wholly responsible. It is even a novel by a member of that small coterie known as the younger British intellectuals, and yet neither a coterie novel nor a novel nurtured in the shadowy recesses of the worried intellect, but a novel about intelligent, attractive people living familiar, interesting lives.

The story of "Prater Violet" is deceptively slight. The time is 1934, the place London. Isherwood is invited to write the scenario and dialogue for a musical movie of old Vienna, about a flower vendor in love with a disguised prince. The director who has been engaged for the film is a Viennese, Friedrich Bergmann, a man "with the face of a political situation, an epoch . . . the face of Central Europe," and with a Central European sense of political realities. To Isherwood's considerable daze at finding himself writing dialogue for "Prater Violet"—the novel's title is taken from the film—is added the rich confusion of daily intimacy with this collaborator; Bergmann is a person of great human proportions—voluble, weak, vain, robust, deep-feeling, dramatic, amusing, devoted, loving and lovable. In the midst of the shooting of the movie, the newspapers report the Vienna uprisings. Bergmann and Isherwood have their emotions about the fate of Austria, and their emotions about their job. The movie gets finished, it is a great success, and Bergmann gets a contract from Hollywood.

But the story that Mr. Isherwood tells is merely the pebble in the lake, from which his novel ripples out in ever-widening circles of implication. In what we might call its first circle, "Prater Violet" is a novel of narrative and social observation, and light, incisive humor about modern personalities. In its next circle, it is a study in sensitivities—it confronts the sensitive poet with the sensitivities of the movie craft, the sensitive foreigner with British insularity. Then, in a further circle, it is a study in dedication—a very wise insight into the quality of devotion which any job must exact, even the job of making a shoddy movie, if it is to be meaningful to the person doing it. In a still farther circle, it is a study in the relation of the individual to society, particularly in the relation of the politically conscious man, who is still not a political man, to political action; and it is here, of course, that "Prater Violet" will be most suspect to the liberal reader accustomed to the raising of banners of public allegiance, because Mr. Isherwood refers all conduct back to private sources. Finally, it is a novel about man's relationship to himself—a subtle, bold assertion that life has no need of justification from our usual modern moral values, that human affection is enough to support it.

The word "human" is important. We have been told that Mr. Isherwood has joined the Aldous Huxley-Gerald Heard group of California mystics, and that for some years he has been living a monastic life and working on a translation of the Bhagavad-Gita. Were we not acquainted with these biographical facts, we would not guess them from "Prater Violet," which is a thoroughly worldly book, unless perhaps from its informing emotional tone, which struck me as remarkably innocent of the contemporary social and personal guilts. But totally unlike the culminating principle of, say, Mr. Huxley's recent novels, the life-principle on which Mr. Isherwood takes his quiet stand is accessible to the least mystical of us: it is nowhere made to draw its strength from beyond the naturalistic universe; and, even more important, it is in no way based in negation. Just as I think we can measure the efficacy of Mr. Isherwood's life-principle by the pleasure he gives us with the book which embodies it, I think we can attribute our pleasure in the book to the gusto and liveness with which Mr. Isherwood's characters have their being in this faulty world of ours. For instance, we compare the Bergmann of "Prater Violet," with his poetry-making, his curiosities, his wonderful reenactments of the Reichstag-fire trials, to the analogous father-people in Aldous Huxley's last novels, to discover that the author of Bergmann is not at all concerned, as Mr. Huxley is, to make the father-person a saint. Bergmann is no emasculated savior in the protection of whose love the merely mortal young man plays out his mean sexual game. He is allowed not only his full humanity but his full manhood; and as a consequence Mr. Isherwood's novel has a dignity and an intimation of true tragedy which are always finally missing from Huxley. If, that is, it is out of his knowledge of God that Mr. Isherwood has come to, or confirmed, his knowledge of man, it is still man to whom his novel, in the end, gives godhood.

And, indeed, I suspect that it is to his acceptance of the common humanity of man, to what I see as his worldliness and not to his unworldliness, that Mr. Isherwood even owes the quickness and warmth of his prose. It is very much the fashion these days to write "simply." Mr. Steinbeck does it, Mr. Hersey does it, at another extreme Katherine Anne Porter does it. In the Steinbeck-Hersey tradition simplicity is the passport of social virtue; and while I do not question the good-will of these writers, I question whatever underlies their good-will which produces a prose so heavy with condescension to the people with which it deals. On the other hand, the simplicity of Miss Porter's prose, however skilled and tasteful her prose is, is the simplicity of the over-conscious artist; Miss Porter does not condescend to her subject, but she does assert herself over it. But the simplicity of Mr. Isher-

The Nation Associates

announces its

Annual Forum

on

WHAT IS THE ANSWER TO THE ATOMIC BOMB?

December 1, 2, 3, 1945
Hotel Astor, New York

Is Security Possible With the Atomic Bomb?

Should We Share the Secret of the Bomb With the Soviet Union?

Who Should Control the Bomb on the Domestic Level—on the International Level?

Is World Government the Answer?

These are among the questions which the Forum will seek to answer. Leading these discussions will be:

Judge Thurman Arnold
Lt. Kingman Brewster
James B. Carey
Stuart Chase
M. J. Coldwell
Rep. Helen Gahagan Douglas
Thomas K. Finletter
Judge Jerome Frank
Lt. Cord Meyer, Jr.
Walter Millis
Edgar A. Mowrer
Boris Pregel
Prof. L. N. Ridenour
Prof. Henry De Wolf Smyth

Speakers at the Dinner Forum on Dec. 3 include:

Dr. Herbert V. Evatt
Foreign Minister of Australia
Prof. Harold Laski
Chairman, British Labor Party
Dr. Leo Szilard
Metallurgical Laboratory, University of Chicago
Mrs. Franklin Delano Roosevelt
Freda Kirchwey
Leon Henderson, Chairman

Reservations for the dinner at $7.50 per person and admission cards for the Conference may be secured at the offices of:

THE NATION ASSOCIATES
20 Vesey Street New York 7, N. Y.

MOTION PICTURES

Manhattan
ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST.
86th ST.
58th ST.
near Lex.
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENT
RIVERSIDE
23rd ST.

Bronx
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

Westchester
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

RKO NOW

"The Drama You've Been Waiting For."
—New York Times

'MILDRED PIERCE'

— Starring —

JOAN CRAWFORD

JACK CARSON • ZACHARY SCOTT

Based on JAMES M. CAIN'S Best-Seller

— And —

CHARLIE CHAN in 'SHANGHAI COBRA'

NOTE! 'MILDRED PIERCE' will be shown as a single feature in the following theatres:
COLISEUM, 81st ST., 86th ST., 58th ST., RIVERSIDE, 23th ST., FORDHAM

Brooklyn
BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT REPUBLIC
TILYOU
Coney Island

Queens
ALDEN
Jamaica
Keith's
FLUSHING
Keith's
RICH. HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway

"Most Urgent Motion Picture Now on the Nation's Screens."—PM

'PRIDE of the MARINES'

starring

JOHN GARFIELD

ELEANOR PARKER • DANE CLARK

Inspiring post-war drama of a crippled soldier and his readjustment to normal life

From Book by ROGER BUTTERFIELD
A WARNER BROS. FILM

—and—

'CRIME INC.' TOM NEAL

20th Century-Fox presents

THE DOLLY SISTERS

Starring

BETTY GRABLE

and

John PAYNE • June HAVER

....ON STAGE...

CARL RAVAZZA • BEATRICE KAY

GOMEZ and BEATRICE

Extra! MAURICE ROCCO

Now Playing ROXY 7th Ave. at 50th St.

Notice to Publishers

The CHRISTMAS BOOK NUMBER of The Nation will be dated December 1. Advertising deadlines: November 16 for space reservations and copy to set; November 21 for final OK's and complete plates.

The NATION
20 Vesey Street New York 7, N. Y.

wood's style is a reflection neither of condescension nor of assertion. It is the style of a free and generous creative intelligence, most happily balanced between self-tolerance and tolerance of others.

It would be a pleasant comment on our present literary culture if one could be certain "Prater Violet" would get the reading it deserves. Properly, there should be several books as good as this each season; and the publishers of this one, just by the way, should not feel impelled to veer between advertising it as a "satirical" novel and announcing it, on its dust jacket, in terms of "fascist terror," "opportunism and appeasement," and Europe's "bath of blood": such a distortion of the whole attitude of Mr. Isherwood's book is culturally all too significant. But fearful that it will not reach its audience through the usual channels—one influential critic, for example, has already reported his doubt that it was worth writing—I for once wish to urge a novel on at least the readers of this column. For, small as it is, "Prater Violet" suggests, better than any book of the last three years, the charms and satisfactions which some few of us still ask for from current fiction but which current fiction so persistently refuses us.

DIANA TRILLING

MOTION PICTURE

Paramount Presents

Eddie BRACKEN Veronica LAKE

"HOLD THAT BLONDE"

In Person! FRANK SINATRA

Extra! Jan Savitt and his Orchestra

NOW PLAYING PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

STAGE PLAYS

Kermit Bloomgarden & George Heller present

DEEP ARE THE ROOTS

A New Play by ARNAUD d'USSEAU and JAMES GOW
Staged by ELIA KAZAN

FULTON THEATRE Forty-sixth Street West of Broadway. Circle 6-6380.
Evenings 8:40. $4.20, $3.60, $3.00, $2.40, $1.80, $1.20 Matinees Wednesday and Saturday. $3.00, $2.40, $1.80, $1.20. Tax inclusive.

"DESERVES ITS GREAT SUCCESS!"—Nichols, Times
Rodgers and Hammerstein present
MADY CHRISTIANS • OSCAR HOMOLKA
in JOHN VAN DRUTEN'S

I REMEMBER MAMA

from Kathryn Forbes' "Mama's Bank Account"
with JOHN TETZEL • ADRIENNE GESSNER • RICHARD BISHOP
MUSIC BOX 45th Street, West of Broadway. Phone: Circle 6-4636
Eves. 8:35 Sharp. Mats. Thurs. and Sat. 2:35 Sharp

MICHAEL TODD Presents

UP IN CENTRAL PARK

Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS
Lyrics by DOROTHY FIELDS
Music by SIGMUND ROMBERG

BROADWAY THEATRE, Broadway at 53rd Street. Matinees: WED. & SAT.

Art

CLEMENT GREENBERG

AFTER the Fauve color explosion there came around 1907-08—when Cézanne replaced Van Gogh and Gauguin as the dominant influence—a gradual sobering of the palettes of the younger avant-garde painters in France. By 1914, when analytical cubism was in full flower, Picasso and Braque were turning out pictures whose color ran no wider gamut than that between black, brown, and gray-white. Matisse was using monumental dark shapes to construct some of his greatest masterpieces; even Chagall's color was relatively somber in this period; while Derain, Vlaminck, and Segonzac were returning the emphasis from hue to value. Those artists who still kept their color high generally lowered its intensity and dulled its finish—with the notable exception of Modigliani. Yet something of the rawness of Fauvism still lingered: an imprecision, a renunciation of crispness of finish and of tangible paint quality. The refinement of cubist and post-cubist painting was not to begin until around 1918, when the discovery and adumbration of that which still constitutes the essential elements of modern style were completed.

There were, however, one or two exceptions besides Modigliani—prominent among them Roger de la Fresnaye, who as soon as he had absorbed all that he wanted or could absorb of Picasso's and Braque's developing cubism proceeded to render it elegant, decorative, and cheerful. It is from De la Fresnaye, one of the secondary figures of the cubist movement, that a good deal of the academicism of post-cubist art takes its departure. He was not the first to put pure, high color into cubism, but he was almost the first to put it in flat, in roughly blocked-out shapes, and one of the first, along with Delaunay, to explore the possibilities of cubism as quasi-abstract decoration.

De la Fresnaye anticipated the softening and prettifying of cubism. Endowed with a feminine sensibility, he was quick to grasp the point of the new style and, in grasping it, to suppress all the struggles and resistances through which it had originally been developed. But even so, he came so early that he could not avoid a certain minimum of struggle. He was in his own way a pioneer, and he had for a time to grope and stumble; he was clumsy, he made errors, and he failed to understand completely what he was doing. The evidences of the struggle are in two big canvases, "The Artillery" and "Conquest of the Air," executed in 1911 and 1913 respectively—the latter was to be seen at a fine show of De la Fresnaye's paintings, drawings, and sculpture at the Buchholz Gallery through November 10—in which cubism is used as a decorative façade rather than as a means of transforming space integrally.

It was in the still life that De la Fresnaye, restricting his data to inanimate, manufactured objects, finally revealed his full powers. Organized around the oppositions of straight lines and relatively exact curves and circles, with clear, fresh color applied so thinly that the white priming of the canvas underneath becomes a tonal ingredient in itself, his paintings of the period 1913-14 achieve in their delicacy one of the early culminations of cubist style. Yet even in these he betrays now and then the still insecure hold he had on the elements of that style. Thus the roll of paper in "Le Diabolo," being presented in accurate perspective and somewhat strongly modeled, jumps out of context and clashes with everything else in the picture; while in the "Still Life with Cylinders" the pasted strips of white paper are arbitrary and their function could just as well have been performed by white paint.

De la Fresnaye was gassed at the front in the First World War and died of the after-effects in 1925, at the age of forty. Whether he had much left to say is doubtful, harsh as it may sound to say so. From 1917 on his work had beat a steady retreat from the positions he intrepidly occupied at the beginning of his career. What was lacking was a surplus of energy above and beyond that embodied in his taste, superlative as that was.

The same may be said, mutatis mutandis, of Stuart Davis, whose life work to date is surveyed in a one-man show at the Museum of Modern Art (through February 3). The nature of Davis's gift is startlingly like that of his contemporary and compatriot Alexander Calder, and their careers run closely parallel. Both have made modern art cheerful; both needed a trip to Paris and the absorption of French influence on the scene in order to find themselves; provincials in relation to the School of Paris, both show that eminent capacity of provincials for tasteful adaptation and also the felicity permitted by the un-obsessed mind. The felicity and taste of these two artists is, as a matter of fact, prodigious. Of the fifty paintings in Davis's exhibition, no more than three or four actually fail on their own terms; and I was struck by a similar evenness in Calder's one-man show at the Modern Museum two years ago.

Davis is a natural painter. Two town scenes—"Gloucester Street" and "Gloucester Terrace"—painted in 1916 at the age of twenty-two under the influences of Van Gogh and Gauguin, demonstrate that he had his gift under control almost from the beginning; his chief problem was simply where to direct it. And it is an open question whether anything Davis has painted since then is intrinsically superior to these two canvases, which are original in the same way De la Fresnaye's cubism is original: they generalize and make immediately pleasing what more seminal artists produced at the cost of strain and frequent error.

Davis early came under the influence of cubism, which he, again like De la Fresnaye in the beginning, appropriated as a decorative method at first. By 1928, however, he had painted a full-fledged abstract picture, "Eggbeater No. 3,"

LANGUAGE IS POWER

. . . Forge ahead, win special assignments, promotion, better job in global peace time opportunities through ability to speak a foreign language

MASTER A NEW LANGUAGE quickly, easily, correctly by LINGUAPHONE

The world-famous Linguaphone Conversational Method brings voices of native teachers INTO YOUR OWN HOME. You learn the new language by LISTENING. It's amazingly simple; thousands have succeeded. ◆ ◆ 29 LANGUAGES

Send for Free book, Call for Free demonstration

LINGUAPHONE INSTITUTE
81 RCA Bldg., New York 20 • Circle 7-0830

Courses in MAGAZINE WRITING

fiction • non-fiction

The Magazine Institute, a private school owned and operated by successful writers and editors, offers practical, up-to-date training in story and article writing. You work in your own home. Every assignment you send in is returned with detailed criticism.

EXPERT INSTRUCTION. An experienced writer or editor takes you in hand, answering all your questions, helping you find the type of work for which you are naturally suited. Before long you are writing in your own home fiction stories, essays, short sketches, whatever you are best fitted to do.

Send coupon today for free catalog which tells about opportunities in magazine writing.

The Magazine Institute, Inc. Dept. 911-C
Rockefeller Center, New York 20, N. Y.
Please send catalog, without obligation to:

NAME ....
ADDRESS ....
....
(Confidential. No salesman will call.)

which helped establish the American inflection of post-cubist abstract style for the next ten years. In 1928, also, Davis went to Paris, where he painted a series of street scenes in which two-dimensional calligraphic patterns inclose flat planes in pastel shades. These represent in my opinion the most important work he has yet done. There is no great force behind them, they rely on hints from almost every contemporary member of the School of Paris—yet they are of their kind perfect. And they evoke the time and place in which they were turned out as little else of that period still does—that is, they are period and yet not limited aesthetically by being so. They are exquisite minor art, sufficient unto their moment and without a thing to say to the young artist who comes seeking examples; yet they will remain.

Since 1933 or so Davis's painting has become more and more abstract and at the same time decorative to the point where it is hardly easel-painting any more. He has invented an idiom of his own, influenced as far as I can see by the diagrams of radio-set hookups—a calligraphy of zigzags, circles, and broken curves laid against flat, solid shapes in uniform color. This idiom he manipulates with varying success, one year better, the next year worse, but nothing has yet equaled his work of 1928-29. The moral is the same as in De la Fresnaye's case: taste is not enough for a lifetime of art.

The only salvation I can suggest for artists such as Davis, Calder, and De la Fresnaye is that society give them fixed, exactly defined tasks that require them to fit their cheerfulness and discretion into the general décor of modern life in a systematic way. Let Davis and Calder create an atmosphere in which to move, not solo works of art. There are the examples of Boucher and Fragonard, whose spirit their own resembles.

TALKING RUSSIAN
BEFORE YOU KNOW IT

Пáпа кепт кам   Papa kept calm

Both sentences are pronounced alike; but one is in Russian characters. That's the secret of this unorthodox little book by Morris H. Swadesh which teaches you Russian the effortless way—by simplifying the biggest obstacle, the alphabet. This is the "Army" method which the author has been teaching so successfully to the armed forces.

Illustrated with cartoons, $1.75
At all bookstores

HENRY HOLT & COMPANY

BOOKS FOUND FREE/0S
WHAT BOOKS DO YOU WANT?
We quote lowest market prices. No charge for locating Hard-to-Find and Out-of-Print Books. All books, OLD or NEW, mailed POST-FREE
SEARCHLIGHT BOOK NATION
22 East 17th Street, New York City

WIN THE PEACE!
BUY VICTORY BONDS

Music

B. H. HAGGIN

IT WAS saddening to hear the somewhat frayed condition of Maggie Teyte's voice during most of her first Telephone Hour broadcast; and astonishing to hear the lovely voice of the recordings suddenly reappear at the end of the broadcast in "Oft in the Stilly Night." So at her first New York recital: in the opening group by Méhul, Monsigny, Mozart, and Gluck, the voice was painfully worn throughout its range; then she left the stage and returned immediately to sing the Letter from Debussy's "Pelléas et Mélisande" as though with a different voice—one with texture, color, warmth. I thought at first that the difference was due to the low range and declamatory style of this piece and the Debussy songs that followed it; but the improvement continued in the songs of Duparc and Fauré: it was not a young voice, but an old one that preserved an extraordinary amount of its earlier beauty and flexibility, and revealed its age only in an occasional toneless or metallic high note.

What, then, was the explanation? The mere fact of walking off the stage and back? "Yes, precisely that," answered someone who knew from experience. "It isn't until you walk off the stage the first time at a concert that the awful tension of walking on the first time is relaxed; then you are at ease for the rest of the concert." As he spoke I recalled occasions when I had heard Szigeti scrape and scratch his way through the several movements of an opening sonata, then leave the stage and return immediately to play with serenity of style and beauty of tone. And I recalled also some of Caruso's testimony on the subject in letters to his wife.

Those letters, as Diana Trilling said in her review, are extremely moving human documents and fascinating revelations of the behind-the-façade operations of a musician's career. The torment of walking on the stage for a first group is bad enough for a pianist or violinist; but from Caruso we learn that it is even worse for a singer, since the instrument of his performance is so much more immediately affected by his physical and nervous condition, and so much less subject to his control. One of Caruso's most extraordinary letters tells us how a performance of "Marta" in Mexico City began:

> I went to the theater in a very bed conditions. There I tried my voice and I was surprised of the lightness. Then I was a little quite with my nervs but the headache were there in bak of my head. The performance beginned and from my dressing room I heard how the first scene goes. Nobody knowed the part. . . . I heard that the soprano and the mezzo makes lots of fault and that makes me nervos because I tought at my duets, terzetti e quartetti. The second scene, the market, beginned and the corus went out of kee and the public show his malcontento in wissly terribly. I went out with the baritono and he beginned with a very wrotten voice . . . I beginning my larghetto and with my surprise my voice were without brillancy but my experience let the public applaude at the end of my solo very much. . . . But I was not satisfied . . .

And how it ended:

> There comes the third act were is the romance. Ah, dearie, I dont know where I found such a voice! I never sing that aria so beautifully and there were a demonstration delirante . . . After comes the concertato where I have the famous frase, Marta a te perdonne Iddio. I sung such frase with many feelings and intensity, that everybody public and artists cry . . . The emotions were so great in everybody that was explenid as I never sung in my life like that and I communicated to the public all my feeling with a voice over uman . . .

That is something to be considered by the New York critic who once slipped into the seat behind me for the second of an opening group of four Schubert Impromptus at a Schnabel recital, wrote busily during the third, and was gone by the fourth. And by other critics for whom this is standard practice. (But they are fairness itself in comparison with the critic who, kept at home by grippe, wrote a review of a Szigeti recital on the basis of his wife's report on the opening sonata.)

To get back to Maggie Teyte: She returned to sing the Letter from "Pelléas" not only with a different voice but with a communicative power that she had not achieved in the preceding songs with the help of a lot of coy pantomimic showmanship. In the songs that followed, which she did seriously and with superb art, there was a considerable amount of dramatic pointing up in the phrasing, which threw the vocal line out of relation with the delicately sensitive piano contexts provided by George Reeves.

This dramatic pointing up produced a strange performance of Voi che sapete from "The Marriage of Figaro" at the first Telephone Hour broadcast. The singing was very jerky and staccato, possibly with the idea of conveying the boyish characteristics of Cherubino. If that was the idea, I would say that what Mozart intended to convey about Cherubino is conveyed in the music sung in the normal flowing style in which he undoubtedly intended it to be sung.

Correction: In the seventeenth and eighteenth lines of the sixth paragraph of the record column of November 3 "couple of hundred thousand shellac records" should have read "couple of hundred or thousand shellac records."

CONTRIBUTORS

JAMES GROSSMAN is a lawyer living in New York City. He has contributed essays to the Partisan Review and The Nation.

BUCKLIN MOON, who grew up in the South, is author of "The Darker Brother" and an editor of "A Primer for White Folks," recently published.

CHARLES E. NOYES is an editor for Press Research, Inc., a Washington newspaper service.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR, a contributing editor of The Nation, is professor of Christian Ethics at Union Theological Seminary. Among his books are "The Nature and Destiny of Man" and "The Children of Light and the Children of Darkness."

NATHAN GLICK is a young New York writer.

JOSEPH BORNSTEIN was for many years managing editor of the Tagebuch in Berlin and later became editor-in-chief of the Pariser Tageblatt.

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

Not the Jews Alone

Dear Sirs: The Ben-Horin article, Have the Arabs a Case? in The Nation of October 20 was an excellent one. The shameful betrayal of the covenant entered into by the British government with the Jewish people is the tragedy of our day.

The cause of Palestine is not merely the cause of the Jews but of every honest liberal. You will serve the cause of America, of humanity, and all decent people everywhere if you will place this article on the desk of every Congressman, every Senator, and every member of Parliament in the English-speaking countries. SAMUEL WOHL

Cincinnati, October 25

Rank-and-File Victory

Dear Sirs: Speaking for a number of longshoremen who have read your editorial Victory for a Racket in the issue of October 27, I wish to thank you. It is encouraging to us who have been swamped in a flood of press lies and misrepresentations to find friends in the field of journalism and opinion who are prepared to state our case honestly and fairly. We wish to express our gratitude to you for pointing out that the real issues in the longshore dispute, the just economic demands and the fight for a free, democratic union government, were all but obscured by "King" Ryan's cries of "red" and "C. I. O.," which were so eagerly seized upon by the press. The frenzy with which the press "went to town" on us can hardly be regarded as anything less than a deliberate attempt to discredit and wreck the Rank and File Committee of the longshoremen.

However, thankful as we are for your fair-minded approach, we do have certain criticisms to make of your editorial. We feel that the general tone, including the title, Victory for a Racket, gives the impression of total defeat of the rank-and-file movement. This is not true. The fact is that the men have already forced Ryan and the shipowners to grant an important demand—two shape-ups a day instead of three. They have also forced arbitration on the other principal demands—limitation of sling loads to 2,240 pounds and 22-man gangs instead of 20. Arbitration in Ryan's hands is dangerous since it is conceived as an attempt to arrive at a settlement of the longshore dispute without consultation with the I. L. A. membership. But the men mean to force an honest presentation of their demands. Such a presentation can only mean victory for the rank and file, not for Ryan's racket.

On September 30 Ryan declared that the demands of the men could not be negotiated. That he was forced to resume negotiations on these very demands is no small victory in itself. The fight for these demands and the fight for a democratic union are not two separate problems. It is precisely in their struggle for better working conditions that the longshoremen shook Ryan's throne. When these economic demands are won, it will be clearer than ever to the men that "King" Ryan, like other despots, must yield to the inexorability of progress.

The longshoremen have won the first round. Whether the men win the rounds to come in their fight depends upon the support you and your readers can offer—not the least of which is financial—as well as on their own efforts. No, not Victory for a Racket, but Victory for the Rank and File.

LEON GOODELMAN, Public Relations,
Rank and File Committee

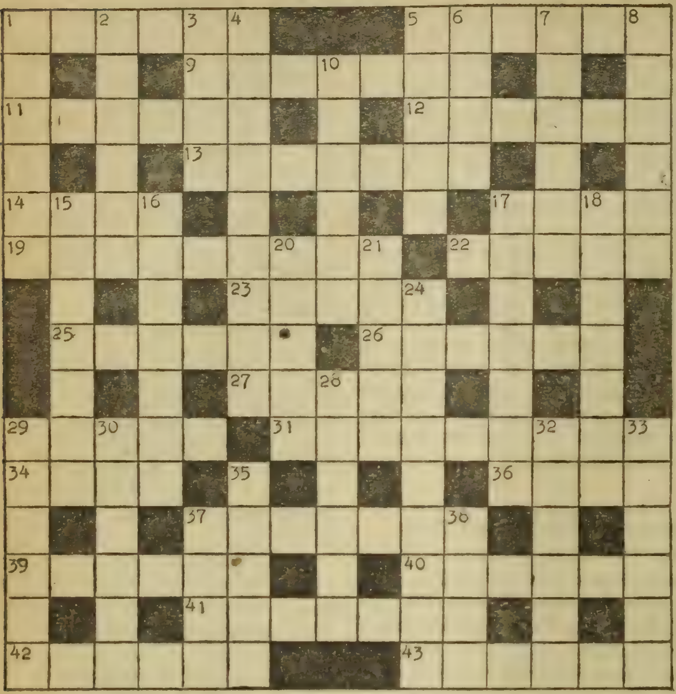
New York, October 31

Bavaria's Catholics

Dear Sirs: In his article What Happened in Bavaria, in The Nation of October 20, Saul K. Padover supplies some very valuable information, and of course every liberal must share his evident satisfaction over the forced resignation of the Schäffer government and the appointment of Dr. Wilhelm Högner as Minister President of Bavaria. As Mr. Padover explains, the Bavarian People's Party encouraged Hitler at times in the past—I should like to add, previous to 1924. The party has also committed other political sins, some of them less excusable than the consent, given under duress, to the "empowering law" of 1933, which Mr. Padover cites as the principal incriminating evidence. Moreover, some people from the extreme right wing of the B. V. P. had always had close contacts with the Nazis, which was the main reason why under the Schäffer regime so many Hitlerites could worm their way into the government machinery or pro-

Crossword Puzzle No. 135

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 His Round Table seated 150
5 European capital where they first danced the mazurka
9 Saucy native of China (hyphen, 3-4)
11 Favorable regard
12 Ira and Ted make a speech
13 Painter who superintended the building of St. Peter's, Rome
14 Very French, this
17 The only safe place for a celibate?
19 Art is oral (anag.)
22 Yesterday was recently and tomorrow will be soon
23 What we're all growing
25 Alas, Ma has gone all Oriental 26 Interfere
27 The reason perhaps why demonstrations do not always open harmoniously
29 The newspaperman's beat
31 A person of no importance
34 "'Tis so much to be a king" (hidden)
36 The seer turns out to be Irish
37 The second coat button (two words, 4 & 3)
39 Servant to Aimwell, in Beaux Stratagem, and an amusing fellow
40 'Art'ful bird
41 Actually, the animal is brown (two words, 3 & 4)
42 Epic of national life
43 Possesses the world's second best harbor

DOWN

1 Wards off what might be vaster
2 Stagger—and with only one tot!
3 May be sure it's a consumer
4 "There's a long, long trail a-winding"—but this isn't it (two words, 5 & 4)
5 Adam's ale
6 Found in aniline dyes
7 Ascended in a measured way
8 It doesn't sound a very powerful publication
10 Had bee in it, so chop it off
15 Search thoroughly
16 The king of cheeses, though it was never made here
17 Explosive that looks like brown vermicelli
18 Mantles (anag.)
20 I am at the head of fifty men on the Eastern front
21 Fruit first grown in Northern India
24 Turncoats
28 Tied up
29 It's simply an Arabic term for "desert"
30 Grease-gun's less violent relative
32 British general of the Cromwellian period
33 From year to year
35 Being this by a bull might well make you go red
37 Associated with a Peer in the operetta
38 The only answer we could get out of Ryan

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 134

ACROSS:—1 ORGAN-GRINDERS; 10 HECKLER; 11 PASTURE; 12 GRANADA; 13 SMOLDER; 14 NODDLES; 15 ENDURED; 16 ONTARIO; 20 ABADDON; 23 ICEFLOE; 24 TWELFTH; 25 ROOMIER; 26 ORLANDO; 27 ROCKING-HORSES.

DOWN:—2 RICHARD; 3 ALL HAIL; 4 GERMANS; 5 IMPASSE; 6 DISCORD; 7 ROUNDER; 8 THE GONDOLIERS; 9 RED-RIDING-HOOD; 17 TREMOLO; 18 ROLLICK; 19 OVERRAN; 20 ANTIOCH; 21 A DEALER; 22 DEFENSE.

tect themselves from being removed.

But Mr. Padover greatly overstates his case by leaving out the other side of the balance sheet. There has always been a wing of the party which was strongly anti-Nazi, and between 1924 and 1933 this wing was on the whole dominant. One may say much against Cardinal Faulhaber, who is by no means a believer in democracy, but it would be ridiculous to call him a Nazi or a friend of the Nazis; yet Faulhaber has a very strong influence in the Bavarian People's Party. As late as the spring of 1933 the B. V. P. government of the state of Bavaria made a gesture of defiance against Nazified federal government and was deposed by storm troopers; several of the leaders of the B. V. P. had to pay dearly for their resistance.

Many Bavarian priests, almost without exception supporters of the Bavarian People's Party, suffered or died in Hitler's concentration camps. The anti-Hitler revolt which occurred in Munich just before the entry of the American troops seems to have been organized largely by B. V. P. supporters. A party of that record cannot be treated as a "compromised party." No democracy can be built up in Bavaria without the Bavarian People's Party, which still is probably the strongest political group in that state (see Eisenhower's latest report). It was a great mistake to intrust exclusive power to the B. V. P.; it would be equally wrong to deny it a share in the government, except perhaps for a very short "purging" period.

The Bavarian problem epitomizes the great difficulty of dealing with political Catholicism in Europe, because on the one hand Catholicism is a genuine popular force which is often socially progressive, and on the other hand it frequently has indirect—and in some countries direct—ties with fascism. Mr. Padover's failure to distinguish between the essentially democratic and the near-fascist group in the Catholic movement of Bavaria makes his article, in spite of its merits, a poor basis for framing a policy.

CARL LANDAUER

Berkeley, Cal., October 27

Far Eastern Material

TO OUR READERS: The Nation is anxious to chronicle accurately and fully the resurgent democratic, nationalist, and progressive movements of the Far East. Consequently we should appreciate greatly the receipt of newspapers, clippings, leaflets, party programs, biographical sketches of leaders, and descriptive letters. Address: Far Eastern Editor, The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 161 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • NOVEMBER 24, 1945 NUMBER 21

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 537

EDITORIALS

A United Defense Policy 539
British Policy Breaks Down by Freda Kirchwey 540
The Bomb Is a World Affair by King Gordon 541

ARTICLES

Jewry in a Blind Alley by I. F. Stone 543
Burma: Objective Freedom by Andrew Roth 544
Strategic Bombing—An Autopsy by Alan Barth 546
Joe Ryan's Kingdom by Maurice Rosenblatt 548
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison 551
The People's Front by Del Vayo 552

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall 553
The Forms of Liberalism by Reinhold Niebuhr 553
Yenan by Andrew Roth 556
Brief Comment 559
Drama by Joseph Wood Krutch 562
Films by James Agee 562
Records by B. H. Haggin 563

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 136 by Jack Barrett 564

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor J. KING GORDON
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

European Editor: J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates
LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS
CAREY MCWILLIAMS REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

"THE RESISTANCE OF EUROPE IS VERY LOW," wrote C. L. Sulzberger in a dispatch from London to the New York Times of November 13. "Tuberculosis is rife. The very young and the very old especially are beginning to die in droves as the autumn leaves fall." Mr. Sulzberger's article served as an introduction to two pages of reports providing details of living conditions in all parts of Europe. In only a few countries is it possible to say that the situation is improving; in most of them people face a winter of cold, malnutrition, and a high incidence of disease. It will be a miracle if no epidemics break out; if they do, they will be hard to control. The Times survey, a notable piece of newspaper enterprise, added potent arguments to those brought forward the next day by President Truman in a message to Congress requesting an additional appropriation of $1,350,000,000 for UNRRA. Present funds available for relief work will be exhausted by the end of the year, the President pointed out, and with the liberation of China UNRRA's operations had to be vastly extended. But before Congress can act on this request, it must pass on the bill appropriating $550,000,000 in completion of the initial American pledge to UNRRA, a matter about which it has been bickering for weeks. In the House the Republicans succeeded in attaching a rider forbidding use of any of the funds in countries where censorship hinders American correspondents in writing about UNRRA's activities. This maneuver has been condemned by Senator Vandenberg in terms which we trust will shame his fellow Republicans. "I am unable," he said, "to make mercy an arbitrary hostage to the lifting of the iron curtain at this tragic moment in human history. . . . The iron curtain is in the control of governments. It is the people in these areas who die for want of bread."

*

THE FRENCH ASSEMBLY UNANIMOUSLY CHOSE General de Gaulle as interim President of the Republic because it recognized that he had received a strong vote of confidence from the people at the elections, and because no other French personality appeared able to form a government. But this unanimity hid acute political divisions which quickly became apparent when the General sought to form a government representing the three major parties in the Assembly—the Communists, the Socialists, and the Mouvement Republicaine Populaire. The Communists, the largest of the three, considered they were entitled to nominate the holder of at least one of the three chief Cabinet posts, the Ministries of Foreign Affairs, War, and the Interior. De Gaulle took the position that the actual selection of ministers was his sole prerogative. Moreover, he was unwilling, as he said bluntly in a broadcast to the French people, "to confide to them [the Communists] any of the levers that command foreign policy: the diplomacy that expresses it, the army that sustains it, and the police that protect it." To do so, he suggested, would be to orient French policy toward Russia and defeat his aim of maintaining a position of equilibrium between the East and the West. Outraged as the French Communists are at what they regard as a reflection on their patriotism, they can hardly deny that, on foreign policy at least, their line is determined in Moscow. Thus the French crisis illustrates once again the difficulty of political combinations involving a party with external allegiances.

*

AS WE WRITE NO WAY OF BREAKING THE deadlock appears in sight. With the balance of political forces as they are in France, it would be difficult to organize a government which excluded the Communists. The Socialists and the Mouvement Republicaine Populaire together command a bare majority in the Assembly, and the former, moreover, are anxious not to drive the Communists into opposition, where, free of administrative responsibility, they would be able to devote all their energies to tightening their grip on the French working classes. But a Socialist-Communist coalition would also function uneasily. On domestic issues the two parties are in broad agreement, but they differ on foreign policies, and as rivals for the leadership of the left they are intensely suspicious of each other. Moreover, such a combination would automatically exclude De Gaulle, and a government without the General, certainly the most popular figure in France, is unthinkable. As we went to press the Assembly, against Communist opposition, asked De Gaulle to renew his efforts to form a government giving "equal representation to the three parties." This move might be considered either as support for the General's position or as a hint to meet Communist demands. It seems hardly likely to end the crisis.

*

THE HYPOCRISY OF AMERICA'S CHINA POLICY has never been more clearly revealed than in the recent series of official statements designed to defend our intervention in that country's internal struggle. Secretary Patterson, for example, asserted that there was "no danger of our troops becoming involved in civil war in China," but added that the areas seized by American troops would be turned over to Chungking forces and that if the Chinese Communists resisted, the Americans would "react with vigor and success." He defended the dispatch of American marines to key points in North China on the ground that they were needed to disarm the Japanese, but Ambassador Hurley contradicted this a day later by admitting that the Americans were sent to prevent the Japanese from surrendering to the Communists. Similarly, although the American embassy in Chungking denied reports that the United States was planning to equip seventy Chungking divisions or that a $64,000,000 loan had been granted for the purchase of American arms and ammunition, General Wedemeyer, also in Chungking, admitted that this country was prepared to arm thirty-nine divisions. An independent dispatch from Kunming states that 35,000 tons of American ammunition, guns, and equipment had been handed over to the Kuomintang authorities under Lend-Lease, while another report told of the presentation of a large number of American planes to Chiang Kai-shek, including enough transport planes to meet all of Chungking's needs for the next five years. And as if this evidence of intervention were not sufficient, General Wedemeyer declared that the possibility of increased military aid for the Kuomintang was being discussed at a higher level, presumably in Washington.

*

MEANWHILE, THE FUTILITY OF OUR COURSE in China is daily becoming more apparent. The Chungking forces are not going to be able to take North China and Manchuria from the guerrilla armies unless American troops help do the fighting. Such action would not only be indefensible; it would be dangerously provocative. One can imagine the sort of reaction it would provoke in Moscow. Athough Russia has maintained strict neutrality toward the Kuomintang-Communist struggle, it would be wrong to confuse neutrality with indifference, particularly where Manchuria is concerned. The Sino-Soviet pact showed that Stalin was ready to meet the United States halfway in an effort to bring about stability in China. But Ambassador Hurley's policies have destroyed the basis of that understanding, imposing upon this country the necessity of finding a new way out. Withdrawal of foreign troops, both American and Russian, and the termination of arms shipments to China are essential first steps toward establishing a new internal balance in China and preventing the civil war from becoming an international test of power.

*

THE RISE OF NEW NATIONALIST LEADERS IN Indonesia has had the good effect of bringing into sharper focus the issue of independence versus imperialism. Leadership has passed to those who either refused to work with the Japanese or worked actively against them, eliminating the false issue of collaborationism. That issue was false, because, unlike collaborators in Europe or the Philippines, Soekarno and many of his followers who worked with the Japanese did so as part of the struggle for national independence. During the war, the Dutch themselves recognized this, refusing to denounce Soekarno as a Quisling even when it was suggested by American political-warfare specialists. Perhaps Soekarno's main fault has been his failure to recognize fully the need of disciplined popular forces as the foundation for a successful independence movement. The new leadership is made up of level-headed, young Socialist militants. Premier Sutan Sjahrir is a Holland-educated lawyer who became a labor leader at the age of twenty-three and was exiled soon afterward to the notorious Tanah Merah concentration camp in New Guinea. During the war he refused to take any office under the Japanese and since the war's end has led the fight against the opportunistic wing of the Indonesian Socialist group. The Minister of Internal Security, Amir Sjarifuddim, who has the difficult but essential task of imposing discipline upon the Japanese-incited racialist nationalists, was a leader in the wartime anti-Japanese underground. Imprisoned, tortured, and condemned to death for his activities, he was saved only by the ending of the war. These new leaders are clearly anxious to negotiate an agreement ending the present bloodshed. But they are not prepared to abandon their demand for independence in exchange for the Dutch offer of "home rule," which they suspect, with reason, to be merely the old imperialism in a new package.

* * *

THE UNITED STATES COURT OF CLAIMS HAS AT last ruled upon the hysterical act of Congress which banned three individuals, by name, from employment in the federal government. President Roosevelt, Secretary Ickes, Attorney General Biddle, and others, The Nation among them, called this act unconstitutional and odious when it was adopted two years ago; their judgment has now been vindicated by the court. The valuable services of the three individuals—Robert Morss Lovett, Goodwin B. Watson, and William E. Dodd—have, of course, long since been lost to the government; and the men themselves were forced to endure, in war time, an unwarranted reflection upon their loyalty. They deserve amends from the legislative body which inflicted so grave an injustice. They were proscribed by Congress for nothing more than the exercise of a constitutional right, the expression of opinion. Accused by the Dies committee, they were convicted without trial. Thus the action of Congress partook of all the essential characteristics of a bill of attainder. And worst of all, perhaps, it entailed a gross usurpation of executive authority. We hope that Congress will appeal the decision to the Supreme Court—so that it can receive a definitive confirmation of the rebuke administered by the Court of Claims.

* * *

OUT IN LOS ANGELES, WHERE NEW COMMITTEES to support good causes spring into existence every day, the National Committee for Radio Freedom has been formed, with former Congressman Thomas Ford as chairman. Support for the legislation introduced by Congressman Celler will be the committee's major project. Sorely needed at the present time, this legislation would stiffen FCC requirements for license renewals, insure sustaining public-service programs at good listening hours, place broadcasting companies on a public-service basis, and guarantee the right of any legitimate sponsor to buy time on the air. It is high time that opinion was organized in support of radio freedom. Not only is the proposed legislation needed immediately, but such a committee can perform an invaluable function by keeping public attention focused on the work of the FCC, some of whose recent decisions have been extremely disturbing. The new commitee was not born in Los Angeles by mere chance or as a by-product of the evangelical climate of Southern California. It first developed as the Emergency Committee on KFI, to protest the decision of Earl C. Anthony, owner of Station KFI, to take local commentators off the air. Certain of these commentators, such as John B. Hughes, had large radio audiences on the Coast and were universally respected for their integrity and candor. Southern California wants them back on the air; and it wants them on Station KFI. The need for organized public action was further emphasized in Los Angeles recently when Messrs. Jack and Harry Warner, smarting from their recent defeat by the Conference of Studio Unions, began to interfere with the broadcasts of Sam Balter, still another popular commentator.

* * *

WASHINGTON CROSSED THE DELAWARE NEAR Trenton, New Jersey, as every D. A. R. knows. Last week in the same locality United States District Judge Philip Forman crossed the D. A. R. He calmly informed the chairman of the Americanization committee of the local chapter that "the action of the national body of the D. A. R. in restricting the use of its hall in the capital at Washington against Negroes was the kind of policy that could not be reconciled with the doctrines of American citizenship" and suggested that "unless the chapters desiring to participate in [naturalization] proceedings would repudiate the action of their national body their introduction would be embarrassing to the new citizens, the court, and the D. A. R. itself." The logic of Judge Forman's remarks seems to us irresistible. As for his statement that new citizens may be embarrassed by the D. A. R.—instead of vice versa—it deserves to be illustrated by Helen Hokinson.

* * *

BERNARDO SAENZ, A SPANISH REPUBLICAN soldier, can no longer patch together the rags he has been wearing since he escaped into France after the civil war. Pablo Martinez, who lost his left arm in the fight against fascism in Spain, has recently returned to France from the Nazi death camp at Mathausen and faces the coming winter without an overcoat. These men are typical of the 150,000 Spanish Republican refugees in France who have known little but privation and war since 1936. Their physical condition is far below normal. And the winter of 1945-46 will be harder on them than on most other people in Europe: for the official relief agencies, set up to help the citizens of ravaged countries, can do nothing for these nationless men, women, and children. The Spanish Refugee Appeal, in an effort to save as many of them as possible, is conducting a clothing campaign to extend through December. The Unitarian Service Committee will handle the distribution in France. Clothing should be sent to the Spanish Refugee Appeal Warehouse, 715 Second Avenue, New York 16, N. Y.

A United Defense Policy

THE chief reaction of ordinary citizens to the current brawling over unification of the armed services is likely to be one of sorrow that outstanding generals and admirals should descend to such fishwifely levels in debate. We may well feel that a prime argument for unification can be discerned in this very squabbling over unification. When our military leaders differ so publicly and so virulently over a major issue of military policy, shouldn't they be unified in order to prevent their differences from hamstringing the national defense?

Manners apart, the weight of common sense and good citizenship still falls on the army's side of the dispute: that is, on the side of unification now, with coequal chiefs of land, sea, and air arms under a chief of armed forces responsible to a civilian Secretary of National Defense. The only consideration in the minds of military leaders should be the safety of the nation; that is the common interest that should make unification a sensible and worthy procedure. The navy's spokesmen have protested too much: they have allowed the impression to arise—and it must be erroneous—that they are more interested in the navy than they are in national security. Single sentences remain in one's mind: one recalls General MacArthur's "Success in the art of war depends upon the complete integration of the services," and General Marshall's "The national security is a single problem, and cannot be provided on a piecemeal basis," and one sets these statements over against Admiral King's "The navy has a right to its own Cabinet member," and that even more fantastic dictum, "Any step not good for the navy is not good for the nation." Someone should whisper in the Admiral's ear that nobody, really, is concerned about the navy's right—to a Cabinet post or to anything else; what people are concerned about is the national defense, and how the navy fulfils its duty of contributing thereto.

By far the strongest, clearest, and most convincing presentation of the case for unification has been made, as one had suspected it would be, by General Eisenhower, who reveals himself more and more to be that unusual phenomenon, a military statesman. General Eisenhower disposed of the opposition arguments with forcefulness and logic. The navy says the job is too big for one civilian secretary; what about the President's job?, Eisenhower inquires. The navy says one branch would be subordinated to another; Eisenhower points to "the unified, balanced force" which defeated Germany in the West. The navy says the chief of armed forces would favor his own former branch; Eisenhower reminds us that he himself was once an infantryman.

On the positive side, Eisenhower sees several advantages in unification which must be constantly emphasized: a well-rounded military program, in which each arm is considered simultaneously with the others, all are administered under a single direction, with unity in doctrine and training, unified research and development, and the elimination of duplication, overlapping, conflicts in procurement of men and matériel, and hasty improvisation when an emergency arises. Eisenhower's final point deserves underscoring; it establishes the fact that he is calling for a change not because he is enamored of organization as an end in itself, but because he knows the tools best suited to the job of modern warfare: "Finally, there is no such thing as a separate land, sea, or air war; therefore we must now recognize this fact by establishing a single department of the armed forces."

Congress would do well to listen to this man, who understands better than most, and from personal experience, the imperative necessity of unified command instead of joint bickering.

THE WAR CRIMES TRIAL

The Nation will publish in early issues special cabled correspondence from Nürnberg by Peter de Mendelssohn, journalist and novelist.

British Policy Breaks Down

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

IT IS inevitable that Zionists, commenting on Mr. Bevin's Palestine statement, should make what capital they can out of the broken pledges of the British Government throughout the past twenty-five years and of the Labor Party within the past five months. For both are sensational and provide effective moral ammunition. But in the end the Zionist case will stand or fall on more realistic grounds. As long as British foreign policy is based on a determination to preserve the Empire, Palestine will continue to be treated, not as a moral issue, but as a piece in the whole imperial design.

The hope that animated most of us when British Labor took power was quickly extinguished. We did not suppose that the Attlee government would abandon the Empire. But we dreamed briefly of a new policy which would seek for security not through the old by-ways of intrigue and appeasement but along the high road of international cooperation. The San Francisco conference, under British pressure, had made a farce of the trusteeship idea. But the idea was sound and Labor, taking office two months later and faced with urgent post-war problems of colonial readjustment, had a chance to tackle the issue freshly. It could have called a conference of the leading colonial powers, together with Russia and the United States, and undertaken a realistic appraisal of the situation in those parts of the globe where imperial interests clash with one another and with the rights of the people who live there. The chance was lost. The Labor Government chose to continue the old methods, and today we see the results in Palestine—and in Surabaya.

Let no one be confused by the apparent contradiction involved in shooting down Javanese nationalists and supporting Arab nationalists. There is no contradiction; both are expressions of a single strategy: to suppress those elements which threaten the dominance of the ruling groups to whom the Colonial Office looks for cooperation in maintaining British control. The Arab League was not created as an instrument of Arab nationalism; it was invented—and subvented—by Britain to serve British purposes in the Middle East during the war. If the League and Arab political leaders generally are developing ideas of grandeur it is because they have learned that blackmail pays, especially when it is dressed up in high-sounding sentiments. Britain is hedging on its promises to the Jews not because it has been converted to Arab views on Arab rights in Palestine, but because Arab leaders have promised to make trouble if those promises are kept; and Britain wants to avoid new trouble in an area as important and unstable as the Middle East. It is true that the Jews are also beginning to show signs of anger; riots have been suppressed in Tel Aviv and tension is growing. Faced with growing disillusionment, responsible Jewish leaders may be unable to check violence, and the power of the extremist minority is likely to increase. But by and large the Jews are not a major menace: their loyalty, their patience, their civilized procedures, and their basic dependence on British power all tend to weaken their strategic position.

The British are afraid of the Arabs, and with reason. The League is no longer a source of security. It is openly planning the expulsion of British influence and control from the whole Middle East, as it has successfully expelled French influence and control (with the aid of British arms!) from the Levant states. Faced with this threat, what can the Foreign Office and the Colonial Office do but continue to stall and betray their promises and try more and bigger appeasement? The alternative would be a new approach to the whole problem of Empire defense.

Mr. Bevin's Palestine proposal is proof that the Labor Government is not ready for that. The Committee of Inquiry is little more than a new wrinkle in an old policy. This is not the first time necessary action has been delayed by the launching of an investigation; the device is as old as governments. The new feature introduced by Mr. Bevin is the participation of the United States—and it is an important innovation. For it insures powerful support for conclusions which, ironically, were largely anticipated by the Foreign Secretary in his statement announcing the committee. By accepting the plan on British terms, Mr. Truman has, we fear, walked into a trap, as the Zionists charge.

He can only retrieve the situation and live up to his own and his country's pledges by altering as completely as possible the frame of reference in which the Committee of Inquiry is to operate. He should insist upon his original proposal that 100,000 homeless European Jews be transferred to Palestine. The British turned down the request, but that was before the committee had been agreed upon. They would find it difficult to refuse if Mr. Truman backed his proposal with firm guaranties of American help in handling the transfer and insuring the safety of the refugees. In any case, it is cruel nonsense to leave the Jews in German camps while new investigations are undertaken. We already have the careful reports of Dean Harrison and Judge Rivkin to verify the known fact that most of these persons look to Palestine as the only hope of survival for themselves and their children.

The President should also make sure that the inquiry into the problem of Palestine is unhampered by Mr. Bevin's ready-made prejudgments. If the United States is to accept responsibility for helping to solve that problem it must not go in with its hands tied. The only obligation it can afford to assume is the obligation to see to it that the terms of the Balfour Declaration, as elaborated in the British Mandate, and officially recognized by acts of Congress in 1922 and 1925, is duly carried out. In other words, the establishment of a Jewish National Home and the encouragement of Jewish immigration should be assumed, as a starting point. From there on, the inquiry should take the form of a brand-new examination of the place of Palestine in the intricate design of Middle Eastern relationships. It should consider, without prejudice, what kind of control can best be applied in a region where the interests of great powers, strategic and material, make external control of some sort inevitable. In view of America's own growing interests in the Middle East and its new international obligations, such an inquiry should be pursued without too much regard for existing colonial practices. We have an opportunity to do what Britain, tied to its burdensome past, has failed to do; we can make a new start.

Obviously British policy has broken down, whether the Labor Government will admit it or not. The old tactic of buying protection from greedy ruling cliques has sensationally failed. Perhaps the Middle East as a whole should be put under international control; perhaps the Levant states and Palestine might be joined in a federation under United Nations trusteeship. Perhaps a different solution altogether would emerge from a fresh study of the problem. But it is certain that the results of imperialist intrigue—now bloodily visible in Palestine—can be eliminated only if the powers are able to cooperate in new methods of regulation which will provide security for their legitimate interests and at the same time encourage the frail beginning of social progress, popular enlightenment, and self-government.

The Bomb Is a World Affair

BY KING GORDON

CAPTAIN Harold E. Stassen, in a recent speech before the Academy of Political Science, urged "placing the control of the atomic bomb definitely on a world level." The other courses open to the nations now possessing the bomb were to maintain a policy of secrecy and suppression or to open our records to the other United Nations without attempting to bring control of the bomb under a world authority. The consequences of the first course are vividly set forth in the original terms of the May-Johnson bill. Simply to share the secret would probably result in other nations' making bombs; it would remove the threat of the atom bomb as a unique instrument of Anglo-American power policy, it would not remove the threat of the bomb to our civilization itself. In outlining his proposal Captain Stassen assigns to the United Nations Organization the responsibility for control through an Atomic Bomb Commission, set up by an amendment to the United Nations Charter. After establishing an international air force armed with a limited number of atomic bombs, the United Nations would destroy the remaining bombs in existence, and forbid the manufacture of atomic bombs by any nation. The Atomic Bomb Commission, composed of distinguished scientists, would have full powers of inspection to see that no nation violated the ban. But scientific research devoted to the full development of atomic energy for peacetime uses would be carried on freely.

The details of the proposed World Stabilization Force raise some doubts: if we are to have international air policemen, an atom bomb is not a very good substitute for a nightstick. If we can manage to suppress the manufacture of atomic bombs as instruments of national policy it would seem wise to eliminate their use as punitive weapons in the hands of an international force. But Captain Stassen's main position is indisputable. Unlike Dr. Einstein's proposal for Big Three world government, his plan of control would be based upon the United Nations Organization. It is broad enough in scope and concept to meet a mighty problem. It provides a practical alternative to the suicidal program of competitive armament on which the United States and their chief allies seem to be embarked today.

A brief examination of Captain Stassen's proposal sets useful bounds to a discussion of the international control of the atom bomb. There is no doubt that the determined effort of the nations which own the bomb to hoard its secret has increased distrust among the nations which were united in a victorious war effort. The bomb, of course, has been only one of a number of factors that have led to the waning of international good will since the San Francisco conference. In half a dozen areas widely scattered over the earth, local infections are being aggravated and dangerously extended by the conflicts of rival power systems and the exigencies of imperialist consolidation. Germany, the Balkans, the Middle East, Indonesia, China, all present critical problems which are being resolved not primarily in the interests of the inhabitants, or on the level of international responsibility, but in the interests of the great powers. These problems accentuate distrust among the nations and provide a bad foundation for attempts to deal with atomic control through international mechanisms. It has been this distrust that has driven us back to the inveterate folkways of national sovereignty, national security, national defense—concepts which in the world of the atom bomb have very little meaning. It has permeated the thinking of our military leaders as they urge preparedness and present horrific pictures of the next air war. It has plotted out advance naval and air bases far into the zones from which conceivable aggression might come. It has inspired our policy of guarding the secret of the bomb and sowed panic over the prospect that others might steal the secret from us or arrive at it themselves—as undoubtedly they will—within a few years.

If Russia was disturbed by the American policy of strict bomb monopoly, it must have been even more disturbed by its exclusion from the conference between the three nations possessing the secret of the bomb's manufacture. For the purpose of the conference was to discuss means of international control of a weapon that admittedly could not long remain the secret of one nation or group of nations and against which there was no effective defense. It would have been a wise and statesmanlike move for Mr. Truman to invite the Soviet Union as well as Great Britain and Canada to Washington, as we proposed editorially last week.

But, having admitted basic errors in policy that have tended to heighten rather than lessen international distrust, what about the statement itself? I must confess that I differ with certain commentators who see in it only a maneuver to put Russia on the spot or a plot to blow up the embryonic structure of the United Nations. It is true that the statement carries no assurance that the secret of the bomb will ever be shared; in fact, it indicates that it probably will not be. This in itself is no disaster, although in the present state of international confidence it does, of course, underline our distrust of the good intentions of other nations. What is more important, however, than immediate sharing of the secret is an efficient method of controlling the bomb and, if possible, eliminating it altogether. The Washington statement proposes a very specific plan for removing the control of the bomb from the hands of one or three nations and placing it in the hands of an international body, the United Nations Organization. The first step toward this control is the setting up of a commission to submit recommendations to the United Nations Organization—

> (a) for extending among all nations the exchange of basic scientific information for peaceful ends
>
> (b) for control of atomic energy to the extent necessary to insure its use for peaceful purposes alone
>
> (c) for the elimination for national armaments of atomic weapons and of all other major weapons adaptable to mass destruction
>
> (d) for effective safeguards by way of inspection and other means to protect complying states against the hazards of violations and evasions.

It is arguable that the statement should have announced clearly that the bomb's secret would be handed over to an international body. Certainly the language could have been simplified and carried a more ringing challenge. Certainly Russia should have been included in the discussion. But it is irresponsible to suggest that the conference proposed no method of international control or was aimed at sabotaging the United Nations. It is quite possible for the United Nations Assembly to set up an atomic control commission at its January meeting. The first step can be taken within the next few weeks while the preparatory executive committee is meeting in London: if instructed by their governments, representatives of the major powers can place the business of constituting the commission at the top of the agenda of the Assembly. (And in the diplomatic conversations which will inevitably coincide with this preliminary meeting Russia's opinions should be fully consulted.) If the matter is not taken up by the preparatory committee, it can be raised directly in the Assembly or the Security Council. There has been some demand for a Big Three meeting to deal with this and other crucial matters before the Assembly meets, and this, too, might still be arranged. But on the other side, there is much to be said for regarding the United Nations henceforth as the international body primarily intrusted with international decisions. There is no better way to build the prestige of the U. N. O. than to put it to work. There is no better way to reduce its authority than to by-pass it on every important crisis.

The Washington statement provides that when the control of atomic energy is firmly vested in the United Nations commission, the manufacture of atomic bombs will cease and the manufacturing plants of all nations will be open to inspection. Some have raised a question as to the feasibility of such inspection, but sound scientific opinion holds that it can be carried out satisfactorily. Of more crucial importance is a willingness to submit to inspection by all the United Nations. Here, quite obviously, the veto power by members of the Security Council cannot operate. No nation can be exempt from inspection or every nation will feel insecure. It is safe to predict that it is on this question that the first important fight for recognition of a genuine international authority will be fought out in this and other countries. It is on this concrete and limited issue that liberals had better be prepared to rally their forces.

The setting up of such international control will admittedly go only a small way toward restoring confidence between nations. And it may be that even this amount of progress will be delayed by existing rifts and suspicions. We have learned that there is no easy or clearly marked road to peace. In a recent speech on atomic control Beardsley Ruml insisted that three programs had to be embarked on simultaneously—a long-term program directed toward the establishment of world government, an intermediate program in active support of the United Nations Organization, and a short-term program making use of diplomacy, public and private, to reduce existing international tensions. Mr. Ruml gives the world about twenty years in which to lay a solid foundation for realizing the long-term objective. Perhaps Mr. Ruml is an optimist, but he thinks it can be done.

Jewry in a Blind Alley

By I. F. STONE

Jerusalem, November 15

I CAME to Palestine unhappy, and during the first few days I became even unhappier trying to figure out solutions of the problems involved; but the longer I have been here the happier I have come to feel despite all that has happened and may happen in the next few days.

I stayed five days in Egypt visiting with many Egyptians and spending some time in a village near Cairo. I was able to see the sharp contrast in cleanliness and health between the Egyptian villager and urban poor and the Arab villager and urban poor in Palestine. I felt happy that the coming of the Jews had helped rather than hurt the Arabs.

I was deeply moved by my visits to the colonies here. From Gevulot, in the far south of the Negev desert wastes, to glorious Minara, 3,000 feet above the Upper Jordan on the far northern edge, I saw young Jews from every clime and country reclaiming the land and making something for themselves and their children under conditions which are truly heroic. This sense of consecration and common effort in the Jewish community must powerfully attract all who prize human courage, devotion, and idealism. I was not at all surprised to hear of two cases of non-Jewish demobilized British soldiers, formerly in service here, applying for admission to membership in the Jewish Kibbutzim, or communal settlements.

I felt happy to see that despite difficulties which from abroad appear insuperable there was a great and growing community here, and in visits both to Arab villages and neighboring Jewish colonies I saw evidence of good relations between the two peoples. I feel a huge reservoir of goodwill between the Arab and Jew which can be tapped; and I have not sensed in talks with Arabs either in Palestine or in Egypt, despite their differences, any feeling of race hatred or dislike of Jews as a people.

But at the cost of unpopularity perhaps in the Jewish community of America I wish to say as strongly as I know how that the new Bevin statement is only the latest indication of the blind alley into which Palestinian Jewry is being led by the failure to achieve any political understanding with the Arabs. And I wish to say just as strongly that political agreement will be impossible so long as a single Jewish state in Palestine is demanded.

We have been carrying on a campaign in America on the basis of half-truths, and on this basis no effective politics can be waged and no secure life built for Yishuv. It is true that the Arabs have benefited by the Jews coming to Palestine, and it is true that there is plenty of room here for several millions more, but I cannot find a single Jew who can find a single Arab who favors a Jewish state in Palestine! It should not be hard to understand the natural dislike of any human being for being ruled by another people or his unwillingness to trust himself to such rule.

There is only one way in which a Jewish state here could be sold to the Arab world and that would be as part of a general settlement of Anglo-Egyptian and other Arab problems which would satisfy the aspiration of the Arabs for self-development and federation. That was what made Zionism acceptable in earlier days to the wise and far-seeing Feisal and other Arab leaders, but Britain's failure really to keep the promises given to the Arabs has made the Arabs naturally hostile to the promises given to the Jews. The Bevin statement is only another chapter in the record of broken promises to both.

The most significant point to be noted in the Bevin statement is that while consultation is assured the Arabs concerning any further Jewish immigration in accordance with the White Paper, not a single solitary word is said about a promise to consult with the Jews on the other major item in the White Paper—the undertaking to the Arabs that a start would be made in setting up self-governing institutions in Palestine within five years. I could not help noting also that in Egypt, if it were not for anti-Zionist political agitation, the British would be confronted immediately with a demand for a basic settlement of Anglo-Egyptian problems, including the Sudan, Suez, and British occupation.

It is true that the Jews are in a terrible position, on the one hand asking to be beneficiaries of British imperialism and on the other serving as its lightning rod. Two political axioms seem to be completely forgotten by Jewish world leadership. One is that politics cannot be played unless one has alternatives; one cannot bargain unless one can obtain similar wares elsewhere. The other is that in politics one saves favors for those one must win over and does not waste them on elements already in one's pocket. So long as the Jews are dependent on Britain with no alternative policy for an agreement with the Arabs, the Jews are helpless. Incidentally the Arabs are also helpless until they reach some agreement with the Jews, because just enough will be given both sides, as by Bevin, to keep both dissatisfied and embroiled. Let us remember that as long as there is no solution of the Arab-Jewish problem, Britain has an excuse to keep ample troops near the Suez Canal. I realize this does an injustice to the subjective intent of many British leaders, but it is politically true none the less.

I understand, after being in this part of the world, why the Jews must fight against the conversion of Yishuv into what the Royal Commission of 1937 called "one more cramped and dangerous ghetto." Consignment to minority status in an Arab state is a violation of pledges made to the Jews, fulfilment of which they have a moral right to demand. But I understand too why the Arabs in Palestine, who are also human beings and who also have historic rights here, are prepared to fight against any subjection to a Jewish state.

I know there are other Arab states, while there is only one possibility for a Jewish state; I know that proposals to divide Palestine into two national states, put forward several times by Jewish sources, have fallen on stony ground. Nevertheless, despite present public utterances by the leadership on both sides, I think that a division on these lines, with two national states created on a parity principle, is ethically right and politically feasible and would be acceptable to a great majority of Jews and Arabs if it were imposed from above by Anglo-American or United Nations decision. Certainly only on this basis can Arab-Jewish political understanding be reached.

I heard much talk in London against partition. I think it ducks the fundamental and inescapable question of the Middle East. For the Arabs, the removal of the Jews would be a calamity. I am convinced that the Jews have already contributed much and can in the future contribute even more toward the development of the Arab world. The Arabs are a great people with great potentialities. For the Jews, conversely, the basic problem here is to get along with the Arabs, to win them by helping them and by demonstrating a sincere desire to live together on an equal basis. This is a nobler and politically sounder goal than any narrow Jewish nationalism. If Britain and America wish peace with justice in this part of the world, with the Jew and Arab both here, I am convinced the solution lies in this, the only escape route from divide et impera.

Burma: Objective Freedom

BY ANDREW ROTH

(Author of "Dilemma in Japan")

IN THE midst of the war, when Burma was still the bastion of the Japanese position in Southeast Asia, two men of seemingly opposed views met while nervous guards tried to keep the secret of their meeting from the Japanese. One was Major General Aung San, commander of the Japanese-sponsored Burma Defense Army; the other was Thakin Soe, the leftist political leader of Burma's energetic anti-Japanese forces. As a result of this meeting the most virile elements of Burmese nationalism were fused, Japanese rule was overthrown ahead of schedule, and the British government was confronted with a challenge infinitely more direct and forceful than that of pre-war days.

Before the war the Burmese people were hewers of wood and drawers of water in a land whose riches were siphoned off by others. Petroleum—Burma's most important mineral resource—was the preserve of three giant British concerns. Another handful of British concerns monopolized the valuable deposits of tin, tungsten, silver, lead, and zinc. While the British were intrenched in large-scale enterprises, smaller firms were in the hands of Indians and Chinese, while Indian chettyars (moneylenders from Madras) dominated the field of rural usury and owned a large part of the most fertile agricultural lands.

After Burma was separated from India in 1937, its government was somewhat liberalized but no less firmly controlled. There was a carefully rigged and circumscribed legislature chosen by an electorate limited to one-fifth of the population, but all important powers were reserved for the British-appointed Governor.

The nationalist movement which rose to challenge these conditions first became a significant force in the '30's. Well-to-do Burmese, resentful because the economic cream was being skimmed by non Burmese, supported the Myochit (Patriot Party) of the unscrupulous U Saw. Despite its name, the Sinyetha (Poor Man's Party) appealed to the lower middle class and was led by a dainty opportunist, Dr. Ba Maw, who became an open fascist during the Japanese occupation. Both parties were purely parliamentary groups, with no mass following. By far the most important nationalist organization was the Dobamma Asiayone (Our Burma Association) whose members were generally called Thakins (Masters) because they claimed that Burmans should be the masters of their own country. Its original base was among Socialist-influenced students, but it subsequently proclaimed itself the party of the peasantry and workers and attempted to recruit members in those classes. It showed its greatest pre-war strength in 1938 when the oil workers of Yenangyung struck and the Dobamma organized demonstrations and a general strike in their support. The British were able to suppress these actions with guns and lathis (metal-tipped wooden batons) and the arrest of the leaders. This setback cast a pall of disillusionment and demoralization over the nationalist cause.

Japanese agents, keenly aware of nationalist moods, chose this strategic moment to dangle alluring offers before the Dobamma leaders. They had had little difficulty in taking into camp the unscrupulous opportunists U Saw and Ba Maw. But the Japanese were particularly interested in the influential Dobamma and dangled before its leaders promises of extensive funds, a Japanese-equipped Burmese army, and immediate independence in return for collaboration in the coming war with Britain.

This offer was resisted by Thakin Soe, Than Tun, and other leftist leaders of the Dobamma, who claimed that independence could only be won by organized popular struggle. But their voices were silenced by their imprisonment by the British, and the decision to accept Japanese aid was carried by the faction headed by Aung San. Aung San was an intense young nationalist who had risen from leadership of the 1935 student movement to the position of general secretary of the Dobamma. He and his followers were too impatient to tolerate the setbacks and repression of 1938-39 and looked toward short cuts to freedom. In 1940 Aung San and thirty-one other nationalists arrived in Tokyo to accept Japanese terms and received military training. After a few months he returned to Rangoon, where under the very nose of the political police he recruited supporters to pave the way for the ejection of the British. After laying the groundwork he left Burma and marched back with the Japanese as a major general at the head of the Burma Independence Army.

The people of Burma, bitterly anti-British and misled as to Japanese intentions, hailed their Independence Army as "liberators" and helped them harass the bitter Anglo-American retreat. The Burmans spontaneously organized local self-government committees, and in some areas big landlords were forced to distribute uncultivated land among poor peasants.

But soon the Burmese realized the deception which had been perpetrated upon them. The Japanese, who had promised that independence would be granted immediately, now followed the footsteps of their British predecessors by saying, "Independence is impracticable now. Sometime after the war." The Burma Independence Army was cut down to the Burma Defense Army and denied arms previously agreed upon, while the nationalists never received even 1 per cent of the funds promised them by the Japanese. The Burmese middle class, a portion of which had hoped to preempt the position of the British, Indians, and Chinese, was completely squeezed out by Japanese Zaibatsu concerns, impoverished by Japanese-sponsored inflation, and looted by Japanese soldiery. The Japanese were unable to purchase Burma's rice or supply it with cloth and other consumers' goods. In some districts poverty-stricken peasants were forced to plow their fields stark naked, lying flat behind bushes to cover their shame if they heard the footsteps of strangers. Burmese morality was revolted by the sexual bestiality of the Japanese soldiers, who seemed to know only two sentences in Burmese: "The Japanese are fighting for Burmese freedom," and "Are there any young girls around here?"

As a result of this swelling torrent of anti-Japanese feeling the left-wing nationalists who had opposed the deal with the Japanese gained swiftly in popularity and influence. In 1942 Thakin Soe, Than Tun, and other leftists broke out of the jails, where the British had left them to the tender mercies of the Japanese, and began the building of an anti-Japanese underground variously called the Burma Patriotic Front or Anti-Fascist League. A leading young intellectual, Thein Pe, was sent to India to make contact with the British forces, but the government in exile of Sir Reginald Dorman-Smith refused any liaison.

When it became apparent that Major General Aung San had grown thoroughly disillusioned with the double-dealing Japanese, Thakin Soe—who before the split of 1939 had shared the leadership of the Dobamma with him—risked his life to meet him secretly and save him from complete demoralization. Thakin Soe convinced him that Burma's place was fighting alongside the Allies against Japanese military fascism. Won over, the impatient young General wanted to go into the hills to organize guerrilla activity. He was persuaded, however, that he could be more useful by utilizing his official position to convert the Burma Defense Army into an anti-Japanese army and simultaneously defend the people against Japanese atrocities.

This meeting inaugurated an incredible period in which, under the very nose of the Japanese kempeitai (secret service), the Burmese army and other organizations were converted into anti-Japanese centers. The army was particularly ripe for such a conversion, for it was made up for the most part of patriotic, if misguided, nationalist elements. General San began a hurricane campaign to rouse his army. He sent out secret circulars that no soldier should allow a Japanese to search him while carrying anti-Japanese publications without San's own permission. If the Jap persisted he was to shoot him and seek the protection of his commander. An increasing number of cases occurred in which Burmese soldiers killed Japanese molesting Burmese girls and were hidden or protected by army headquarters. Than Tun took the post of Minister of Agriculture as part of the plan of anti-Japanese mobilization and secured Japanese assent to the organization of peasant unions on the plea that they would be useful for increasing food production and labor recruitment. Actually they became important centers for the distribution of anti-Japanese literature, anti-hoarding campaigns, and the killing of small isolated groups of Japanese soldiers. The Pongyis (Buddhist monks) allowed their monasteries to be used as secret munition dumps, and in the Arakan a Buddhist priest, U Pinnyathaina ("Learned Lion"), led the anti-Japanese movement. Finally, in 1944, British headquarters gave its grudging and unpublicized recognition to the Burma Patriotic Front, with the consequence that guerrilla activities were coordinated with activities at the front.

When the British Fourteenth Army launched its Burma offensive last winter, synchronized guerrilla operations began, culminating in a general uprising by the Burma Defense Army under General Aung San's command. Japanese communications were harassed day and night, and the British forces enabled to advance at the rate of fifteen to twenty miles a day. Burma's capital, Rangoon, fell into the hands of the guerrillas two days before the British marched in to the plaudits of thankful Burmans.

Burma now confronts the British authorities as one of their thorniest colonial problems. The evidence indicates that the Burmans are ready for a rapid transition to independence. They have a unified nationalist leadership under young and virile but mature persons. The Burma Patriotic Front has 200,000 members embracing all the important patriotic groups and has deep roots in all sectors of the country. Its leader, General Aung San—who turned down a commission as major general in the British army—has emerged at thirty-one as a national leader of unprecedented popularity. Under the Patriotic Front's guidance, Burmese Buddhists and Christian Karens have learned to live and work together. Burma has the second highest literacy rate in the Orient, largely as a result of the efforts of Buddhist monks. And although two extensive military campaigns and three years of Japanese occupation have seriously injured the country's economy, the Patriotic Front has worked out a concrete and comprehensive restoration program which compares most favorably with the complementary British plan.

Thus in Burma the British have an unparalleled opportunity to make good their repeated promise to facilitate self-government. But virtually every action so far taken has underlined a contrary intention. Even the limited electoral participation enjoyed before the war has been suspended until 1948. The Patriotic Front has been badgered and harassed in every conceivable manner: its meetings have been suppressed, its buildings requisitioned, its paper stocks confiscated, its members maltreated and arrested. The press has been censored to eliminate all mention of its anti-Japanese exploits and its contacts with the Indian nationalist movement cut off. Instead of selecting proved anti-fascists, men who served the Japanese as informers and spies have been favored for civil-affairs posts. In Mandalay the British appointed as Deputy Commissioner the man who was responsible for the capture of the local anti-Japanese leader and his subsequent inhuman torture and death. And although on October 16 the British government announced that an advisory Executive Council would be appointed "as widely representative as possible of public opinion," Sir Reginald Dorman-Smith rejected the Patriotic Front's request for important posts on that body. All they have now is Sir Reginald's assurance that eventually they will receive "the same degree of freedom as Great Britain herself."

Perhaps it would be wise for Sir Reginald to recall what he said in October, 1943: "Politically minded Burmans will be wondering just what our intentions are. Do we really mean to lead them on to the goal of full self-government, or have we some reservations at the back of our minds which will mean that self-government will always be round the corner and never an accomplished fact? . . . Neither our word nor our intentions are trusted in that part of the globe. . . ."

Strategic Bombing—an Autopsy

BY ALAN BARTH

(Of the staff of the Washington Post)

Washington, November 15

IT IS unlikely that any military operation in history has been subjected to a more detached and searching review than the strategic-bombing campaign against Germany by the British and American air forces. General H. H. Arnold's final report as chief of the Army Air Forces, recently released, gives a detailed account of American air operations in the European theater. The effectiveness of these operations, and also of the R. A. F.'s, in carrying out the strategic purposes of the Allied command has been penetratingly analyzed in a report by an independent civilian committee composed of economists and experts in several industrial fields. Organized at the instance of President Roosevelt as the Strategic Bombing Survey, it was afforded every facility for investigation. It inspected hundreds of German plants and cities, examined masses of German statistical records, and interrogated thousands of Germans, including military and political leaders. Its members declare that they were free from any sort of army coercion or censorship, and, indeed, the candor of their criticism is testimony to their independence.

"Allied air power," their report concludes, "was decisive in the war in Western Europe." It liquidated the Luftwaffe—so completely that German air generals responsible for operations in France stated that on D-Day they had only eighty operational planes with which to oppose the invasion. In the months after D-Day it pulverized German industry to such an extent that by the time the end came that industry was incapable of supporting any major military effort. The R. A. F. and the U. S. A. A. F. between them dropped 2,697,473 tons of bombs in the course of the war. They killed about 305,000 German civilians and wounded some 780,000 more. The morale of the enemy, the will to war, was gradually sapped by this pounding; and although stringent police control kept the German people from any overt rebellion, widespread apathy, defeatism, and disillusionment contributed substantially to the ultimate collapse of the Reich.

These were the positive—and obvious—accomplishments of air power. The defects in our employment of it, less well known, form an interesting and useful part of the civilian strategic-bombing report. "We saw that mistakes had been made," General Arnold's report acknowledges. "Strategic bombing was a new military weapon, and we had to learn many things as we went along, but we took pride in the job as a whole." Whether air power alone could have forced the capitulation of Germany, as some enthusiasts contended, remains a matter for conjecture. It was never directed toward this end. Dominant in Allied strategy was the decision to invade the Continent in the spring of 1944, and all the air forces based on England were used to prepare the way for the invasion. Not until after it had taken place were the heavy bombers free to attack in full force the heart of the German war economy. Of the total tonnage of bombs dropped on Germany only 17 per cent fell before January, 1944, and only 28 per cent before July, 1944.

"The city attacks of the R. A. F. prior to the autumn of 1944," the civilian report notes, "did not substantially affect the course of German war production. German war production as a whole continued to increase." As for the vaunted precision bombing of our air forces, the same report discloses that "while accuracy improved during the war, in the over-all, only about 20 per cent of the bombs aimed at precision targets fell within this target area."

Some of the targets were ill-chosen. In selecting bombing objectives both the R. A. F. and the U. S. A. A. F. had the conviction that they ought to strike blows the impact of which could be immediately felt in the front lines. These blows would have been more effective, as was learned later, had they been aimed at more remote nerve centers. Attacks on submarine pens and constructions yards, for example, "accomplished little," according to the civilian survey. Although our raids on German aircraft plants inflicted much damage to the plants themselves, "production was not knocked out for long." General Arnold is somewhat at variance with the survey on this point. He says that Speer, the Reichsminister for Armaments and War Production, "estimated that he could have made 30 to 50 per cent more fighter planes" but for our bombing. However, it was in air combat, not in the factories, that the Luftwaffe's real strength was shattered. The great raids on Schweinfurt, planned to demolish the vital ball-bearing industry, had no "measurable effect on essential war production," declares the survey—and this despite terrible losses to our own planes and pilots.

Moreover, we overlooked objectives at which we should have struck. Because of inadequate or mistaken intelligence we assumed that the German electric-power system was so highly developed as to make raids upon it futile. In point of fact, however, it was in a precarious position, and highly vulnerable, from the very beginning of the war. Fears that its condition would be discovered were discussed and recorded in the minutes of the German Central Planning Committee. According to the survey report, "The destruction of 45 plants of 100,000 kilowatts or larger would have caused a loss of about 8,000,000 kilowatts, or almost 40 per cent.... Had electric generating plants and substations been made primary targets as soon as they could be brought within range of Allied attacks, the evidence indicates that their destruction would have had serious effects on Germany's war production."

The failure of intelligence here was due in good part, of course, to our lack of any comprehensive intelligence system during the pre-war years. We simply did not know the fundamental facts about the German economy. But it was also due to the army's failure to enlist the services of the ablest researchers and technicians available. More could have been deduced from the little that was known.

Before the blitzkrieg was unleashed, we underestimated German power, and afterward, spurred by hobgoblin reports like Lindbergh's, we grossly exaggerated it. The most striking finding of the strategic-bombing survey is that the German war effort was managed with almost incredible inefficiency. Germany's Maginot Line was a blind faith in blitzkrieg. So confident were the Nazi leaders of a quick victory that they never prepared in any real sense for total war. There is no doubt, says the report, "that until the defeat at Moscow German industry was incompletely mobilized, and that in fact Germany did not foresee the need for full economic mobilization. German arms production during 1940 and 1941 was generally below that of Britain. . . . Studies of German man-power utilization show that throughout the war a great deal of German industry was on a single-shift basis, relatively few German women—less than in the first war—were drawn into industry, and the average work week was below British standards."

Paradoxically, the weakness of the German war effort contributed to its strength. Because the German war economy was substantially undermobilized, it was resilient under air attack. As war plants were damaged, factories producing civilian goods could be converted to war production; plants and machinery were plentiful and incompletely used. No doubt this had a good deal to do with the failure of our strategic bombing to cut production figures until toward the end.

One sample of German inefficiency not disclosed by the survey is worth reporting. The Reich with its conquered territories had a steel-producing capacity of about 40,000,000 tons. It never achieved this capacity; the highest production reached in any year was 34,000,000 tons. But in the course of two years about 15,000,000 tons of fabricated steel was lost—through hoarding and padded inventories and faulty records. Had our own WPB been guilty of such fantastic incompetence, the tumbrils would surely have rattled through the streets of Washington.

In Germany there was no check on inefficiency. For there could be no criticism of those responsible for it. Not only was the press silenced, but in the hierarchy of the government no individual dared to blame his superior. The survey investigators found no memoranda in the German files which so much as suggested errors of judgment or of administration. Perhaps this is an elementary and ineradicable defect of dictatorships—that they leave no room for self-correction. Democracies may blunder; but they are not incapable of learning.

Once the Luftwaffe was knocked out of the air and the Allied bombers could strike at will, the cumulative effect became terrible. They hit the German synthetic oil plants and in short order brought the Wehrmacht to immobility. "The German experience suggests," the survey reports, "that even a first-class military power—rugged and resilient as Germany was—cannot live long under full-scale and free exploitation of air weapons over the heart of its territory."

But the air weapons employed in the European war were in no more than an adolescent stage of development. General Arnold predicts a future—not remote by any means—in which there will be rockets similar to the German V-2 with a speed of three thousand miles an hour and greatly improved range and accuracy, and space craft moving outside the earth's atmosphere to launch rockets loaded with atomic power. He recommends as our primary defense against such weapons the maintenance of air superiority, but that affords only the most dubious sort of security.

"No war will be started," says General Arnold in the concluding part of his report, "unless the aggressor considers that he has sufficient superiority in weapons to leave his adversaries in a state of ineffective warmaking capacity." The weakness in this hypothesis is that an aggressor has the advantage over a peaceful people—the advantage of devising weapons for the destruction of specific targets. There is not much assurance of superiority or security in abstract defense. Even inferior atomic bombs, moreover, might obliterate our cities before we could use our superior types to snuff out our enemies.

Among the defense measures which General Arnold suggests is to "redesign our country for minimum vulnerability to atomic-bomb attack." He notes, however, that "complete dispersal of our cities and moving vital industries underground on a sufficiently large scale would be overwhelmingly expensive." Merely to present this as a possibility is to illumine the dilemma with which air power, plus the bomb, has confronted us. Are we to seek escape from what we have created by burrowing beneath the surface of the earth? Do we no longer dare to live within sight and reach of our fellow-men? If air weapons now have just reached adolescence, there had better be control over their maturity.

Joe Ryan and His Kingdom

BY MAURICE ROSENBLATT

(Former editor of the City Reporter; a special agent for the army's criminal-investigation department until his recent honorable discharge)

[The background of the recent dock strike was described in the preceding issue of The Nation. On New York's waterfront, kingdom of the leech and the thug, some 35,000 longshoremen walked out. They were rebelling against Joseph P. Ryan, president of the International Longshoremen's Association, charged with being the king-pin of a dictatorship which uses terror to exploit the men. Basic to this system is the shape-up method of hiring, a haphazard procedure which places an oversupply of casual labor at the mercy of the foreman. Ryan denounced the strike as a Communist plot; after eighteen days the men returned to work, their strike unwon, but their defiance has profoundly shaken the power of Ryan and his allies.]

ON AN autumn night twenty-six years ago a lank, strong, red-faced man with fiery eyes shouldered through a crowd of Hoboken longshoremen in St. Mary's Parish Hall, his heavy fists whacking those who tried to bolt from the hall. It was a meeting of the rank and file of the International Longshoremen's Association, and Joseph P. Ryan, vice-president, was supporting the claims of T. V. O'Connor, president, who had appeared uninvited with his henchmen. The men were angry, for the meeting had been called in protest against O'Connor. The next day, under the headline "Vice-President of I. L. A. Held as Result of Riot," the Hoboken Journal reported that Joseph P. Ryan was held in $1,000 bail for inciting to riot.

In the following years his big fists and barking voice, and his unswerving loyalty to the ruling cliques of the waterfront, won Ryan steady advancement in the union's hierarchy. He still uses practically the same methods. Only the externals have become elegantly transformed for Joe Ryan. A Persian rug on top of a rose carpet covers the floor of the office where the president of the I. L. A. rules the affairs of his union's 90,000 members.

Joseph Patrick Ryan looks considerably younger than his sixty-two years. He was born in Babylon, Long Island. He left school at the age of twelve and moved to the Chelsea district of Manhattan—he is proud of being a "Chelsea boy." He got work papers at fourteen and became a stock boy, clerk, street-car conductor. He was a married man with a family when in 1912 he turned to work on the docks, six days a week for $18. Joining Local 791 of the I. L. A., he became its financial secretary in 1913, by which he earned one dollar a meeting. In 1916 the job became a full-time one at $30 a week. Ryan takes the attitude today that if people consider his present $20,000 a bit high they should not forget the lean years. Since he has been in the blue chips his family has lived appropriately; his three daughters are college graduates.

Ryan impresses one as a hardened veteran of the battle for possessions and power who will defend his gains with blunt defiance. In appearance he is the popular stereotype of the longshoreman—solid as a river barge, bull-necked, heavy-fisted. His red hair is close-cropped, sharply parted. His ruddy complexion suggests that he does not skip his rubdown at the New York Athletic Club; the useful hands are now carefully manicured. Here is conscious physical strength carefully draped in expensive clothes styled for the executive type. He admits a weakness for gaudy, painted ties.

More than anything else, Ryan enjoys expensive food and lots of it. "I like good food of all kinds and I think my longshoremen want me to have it," he told a reporter when rationing was at its height. He often goes to Cavanagh's restaurant, where some of the finest food in the city is served at de luxe prices. Surrounded by his aides and political henchmen, he can be seen there stowing away caviar and other delicacies. He once confided that his taste for rare food dated back to his days on the docks when crates of imports would crack open and the longshoremen would help themselves. He is reported to abstain from tobacco and liquor.

Besides the Athletic Club, Ryan is a member of the Knights of Columbus, the Elks, and the Holy Name Society, and he is a bountiful trustee of the Shrine Church of the Sea. Although he seems to scorn people who cannot make their way in life, he is open-handed, peeling off large denominations from the fist-sized roll he carries. He has not lost the common touch: he likes to walk along the waterfront in the morning when the shape-up is forming; sometimes he stops to talk with a longshoreman. Dinner time, however, will find Joe Ryan on the other side of the tracks. The presidents and vice-presidents of the ship companies have all met him socially and have commented that he seems to have the situation under control.

There is no Huey Long exuberance about Joe Ryan; nor has he a Napoleonic complex. Think of him more as a machine politician who believes he is helping his brother as well as himself. Alert, shrewd, pugnacious, with strenuous convictions and loyalties, Ryan does not forget a friend or an enemy. His speech is as flat as the New York sidewalk. He avoids the flowery oratory of other old-line union leaders, uses practical words, and gets his exact meaning across. He has a quick temper but nerves of steel—during the recent dock strike if he was at all perturbed he did not show it. Ryan is convinced that he only wants to help the men of his union when he hires ex-convicts, defends the shape-up, or is named president for life, but this conviction does not alter the fact that as the result of his acts the longshoremen and their families lead sordid, impoverished lives. Their union president is secure for life, but the men never know whether or not they will work tomorrow.

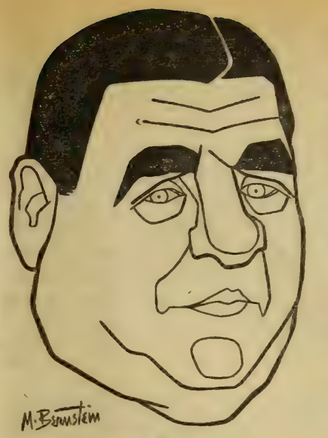
Ryan became the fourth international president of the I. L. A. in 1927. At the 1943 meeting he arranged to be named president for life at $400 a week. To give this procedure the proper democratic window-dressing, he had a Negro, George W. Millner, named vice-president for life. Their designations, Ryan said, would stand "as an object lesson to the entire labor movement that unity can be achieved . . . we're going to show that actions like ours can settle this serious problem of racial and color differences." He would not have accepted the life job, he added, if a Negro had not been accorded the same honor. The Negro vice-president was to be paid $75 a week.

A three-story building on West Eighteenth Street displays a brass plate—"Joseph P. Ryan Association." Here Ryan plays pinochle with his lieutenants, and here, away from the official headquarters of the I. L. A., the substance of waterfront policy is determined. The club is "private" and "social," and ordinary longshoremen are not observed going in there. An outgrowth of a Democratic political club, it has a considerable voice in choosing the Congressman from the district.

Ryan has long had easy access to the powerful figures of the Democratic Party and the shipping world. Ten-dollar-a-plate testimonial dinners in his honor have been attended by 2,500 people annually, the money going to the Joseph P. Ryan Association's charities. Notables such as Jim Farley and Sam Foley, the Bronx district attorney, are often in evidence. Always present are the multitude of lesser Tammany leaders and representatives of Mayor Hague's Jersey City machine. Their power in many cases hinges on a close working alliance with the waterfront boss. These politicians, like the shippers, want no new deal on the waterfront, and they have been able to protect the "loading racket" from any government interference.

On both the New York and New Jersey waterfronts the law has been on the side of the I. L. A. leadership. Members of the police force can be counted on to take a table at a Ryan dinner. During the October strike the police were openly hostile to the rank and file despite Mayor LaGuardia's order to avoid favoritism. They required the strikers to have a license to picket in the Chelsea district and fraternized with loyal Ryan men while menacing others. There has always been a close working agreement between the union's local officials and the neighborhood police captains; union members who have disputes, even peaceful ones, with officials have often found themselves in the police station.

Some disciplinary jobs cannot be turned over to the cooperating police. Ryan has been praised by port authorities for doing a public service by hiring ex-convicts; actually, these men are useful for "policing" inside the I. L. A. Two incidents may be cited to illustrate the role of the criminal element in the I. L. A. Cleveland Bisell, a writer for the Shape-Up, a rank-and-file paper campaigning against Ryan and racketeering, was assaulted by one Frank Savio. Ryan appeared in court as a character witness for Savio, who received a sixty-day suspended sentence. After this the union made Savio foreman on Pier 14; later he turned up on the police blotter as a loan shark extorting money from other longshoremen. Edward Kelly, a new hiring foreman on Pier 51, refused to "play ball" with the waterfront racketeers when picking his men from the shape-up. Kelly was severely beaten by John Dunn and Joseph Hughes. Dunn's record included three years in Sing Sing for robbery, and arrests for homicide, gun carrying, assault and robbery. He had then settled down to run the I. L. A. on the lower North River piers, though he was not even a member of the union. Testifying for him were Peter G. Hussey and Walter B. Holt, both vice-presidents of the I. L. A. Hughes, who assisted Dunn in the assault, was made the boss checker by the union on Pier 51. He had first brushed with the law in 1925, when a grand-larceny charge was dismissed. In succeeding years he had been arrested and discharged for homicide (1928), robbery (1928), carrying a gun (1933), felonious assault (1934), disorderly conduct (1934), safe-cracking (1938). In 1935 he served a prison term for possession of gas bombs and receiving a stolen car.



Joseph P. Ryan

In the 1930's Ryan waged ceaseless passionate war against the C. I. O. It was more than a matter of principle when, in 1934, Harry Bridges staged a successful revolt and took the entire West Coast away from the I. L. A. and into the C. I. O. Bridges, fighting against deportation on charges of being a Communist, became the symbol of everything Ryan hates. Today Ryan unhesitatingly brands anyone he does not like as a "red"; he firmly believes Communists control the C. I. O. and that the A. F. of L. will be doomed if it does not take swift, harsh measures. Ryan has dedicated himself to cleaning the Communists out of the labor movement, and his crusade makes him a popular and much-quoted labor leader with many newspapers. His warnings and denunciations have received careful and complete coverage, and he has been able to count on widespread press support—a decisive influence in the October strike.

In 1938 Ryan's pronouncements on politics were carefully examined by American nationalist and Coughlinite leaders seeking a public figure who was anti-British, isolationist, anti-Communist, and unmistakably identified with labor. At that time Merwin K. Hart, an energetic propagandist for Franco, was attempting to fuse the myriad anti-democratic, pro-fascist cells into a unified isolationist bloc, backed by vast political and financial resources. Hart established a liaison with Ryan, and on November 29, 1939, Ryan spoke for Hart in Madison Square Garden. On the program were the vigilante-minded George U. Harvey and Representative Martin Dies, whose topic was The Insidious Wiles of Foreign Influence. Subsequently the Christian Front increased its activities along the waterfront, and Coughlinite personalities appeared with I. L. A. membership cards. On the day before Pearl Harbor the sympathetic Daily News quoted Ryan as saying that he opposed "injecting the United States into wars of foreign countries."

With the war the scandal of New York's waterfront became no longer a secret. After the Normandie burned at its pier a PM reporter, Edmund Scott, revealed that he had purchased a bootlegged I. L. A. membership card and had been acting the role of saboteur for a week before the fire. Anyone could get on the docks, discover ship sailings and cargo contents, and commit acts of sabotage. The best aid to the saboteur and spy was the shape-up, which thwarted even the simplest security measures. Facts piled on facts. Crews discovered bad loading at sea; survivors brought word that U-boat captains knew what ships to expect and had detailed knowledge of their cargoes. Notorious pro-Nazis, including Baron von Wrangell, were employed as pier guards. Christian Mobilizer James Stewart was found in the I. L. A.

There was no single port authority to enforce security and efficiency. Neither local nor federal agencies nor any branch of the armed services had the final say. Clearly, the East Coast required a shipping coordinator similar to the shipping "czar" of the West Coast, Wayne Morse. Ryan and the shippers immediately realized that such an appointment would jeopardize the status quo of the waterfront; a coordinator would abolish the shape-up, the inefficient organization of loading, and all the other dismal but profitable features of the harbor jungle. On March 9, 1942, leading shippers, including John Franklin, president of the United States lines, and Roger Lapham of the American Hawaiian Steamship Company, met secretly with Ryan to plan their Washington lobby against a coordinator. A powerful, two-pronged attack on the proposal was to be launched by the shippers and the union. But in case the public demand should be overwhelming, they had a candidate of their own to suggest in Joseph P. Kennedy, ex-ambassador to Great Britain, whose isolationist-tinged sentiments, anti-C. I. O. record, and association with the big shipowners made him a "safe" choice.

Called upon to explain the condition of the waterfront by the New York Central Trade and Labor Council, Ryan replied, characteristically, that all public controversy on the matter should be prohibited for the duration since it only served to give information to the enemy. The shape-up, he declared, was more "efficient" than a central hiring hall. To the press he stormed that the clamor for a shipping coordinator was really a Communist-inspired campaign to smear the good name of the I. L. A.

Ultimately Ryan and the shipowners had their way, and the federal government never succeeded in setting up an over-all authority on the East Coast. The port muddled through under a patchwork of government agencies at an unknown cost in time, money, and lives. It was not until the eighteen-day strike in October that public attention was again focused on the waterfront.

At the present time the Shipping Association and Ryan are attempting to arbitrate a contract. William H. Davis, former chairman of the National War Labor Board, is the arbitrator, appointed by Secretary of Labor Schwellenbach. Ryan is basing his own proposals for the new contract on the demands of the rank and file—demands which provided the spark for the October strike and which Ryan then insisted could never be obtained. Unless the men's points, including the limitation of the sling load to 2,240 pounds, and the twenty-two-man loading gang, are considered favorably, acceptance of the arbitrator's findings by the membership cannot be guaranteed. However, no matter how favorable the new contract may prove for the longshoremen, the basic issue of the strike, the question of democracy inside the I. L. A., is beyond the scope of the present proceedings, and Joe Ryan will remain the man in possession of the waterfront.

Public indignation over conditions on the waterfront is not sufficient. Nothing resulted from the war-time protests and headlines demanding reform because Ryan, flanked by political and financial lobbies, made a deeper impression in Washington than did the public's alarm. It will take indignation plus organization to effect a clean-up.

Many citizens are rightfully concerned about the banner which will lead New York's 35,000 longshoremen to freedom; they fear lest the alternative to Ryan be extreme radicalism. Labor, like nature, abhors a vacuum, and obviously the longshoremen will adopt a slogan and a leader. The rank and file, since they are fighting against a well-established dictatorship, must have outside support to win. Being realistic, the men will follow whoever arms them for the fight with money, technical aid, community backing. As one rank-and-filer said: "I don't care who helps us so long as we are helped and can get rid of King Ryan."

This has ceased to be an intra-union dispute. The basic question is: Do the boundaries of the city of New York include the waterfront? If they do, constitutional rights, fair labor practices, and law and order should be upheld there. Otherwise, a broad perimeter along the 250-mile harbor frontage will be ruled in feudal style by a labor baron in conjunction with shipping companies, racketeers, and politicians. Both Dewey and O'Dwyer, when holding the office of District Attorney in New York and Brooklyn respectively, knew the facts. Mayors of the city have been filing surveys on shocking waterfront conditions since 1916. Hitherto public officials have been either too craven or too impotent to face the waterfront combine. The individual citizen remains, as in all things, ultimately responsible and powerful; it is he who must now recapture the waterfront. Clearly his first step should be to insist upon a straight declaration of policy from the new Mayor. Mr. O'Dwyer has stated that the city's most urgent problem is crime. He cannot do better than start his war against crime by attacking one of its citadels in New York.

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

Is America a "Have-not" Nation?

LAST week, in discussing Bernard M. Baruch's proposal for a national inventory, I referred to his fear that the United States was depleting its natural resources so rapidly as to endanger its national existence. So far as minerals are concerned, the situation has been documented by Secretary of the Interior Harold L. Ickes in the December issue of the American. Mr. Ickes not only shares Mr. Baruch's fears but, as is his wont, shouts about them with all his lung-power. He declares:

> The prodigal harvest of minerals that we have reaped to win this war has bankrupted some of our most vital mineral resources. We no longer deserve to be listed with Russia and the British Empire as one of the "Have" nations of the world. We should be listed with the "Have-Nots" such as Germany and Japan. . . . To prevent the decline of the United States as a major military and industrial power, and to maintain our high standard of living, we must take immediate positive action to maintain our known mineral resources.

At this point I feel impelled to exclaim: "Steady, Harold! Let's look at this question calmly. You may rightly feel that the people need to be stirred up, but alarmist statements of this kind are dangerous grist for imperialist and nationalist mills."

Actually, the figures Mr. Ickes himself supplies indicate that the mineral position of this country is not yet desperate. For one thing the United States has hardly begun to use up its coal deposits, and although the cream has been skimmed from its original wealth of iron ore, there are still enormous quantities of medium-to-low-grade ore. True, this is more costly to utilize, but I don't know of any country in the world that has an inexhaustible supply of ore of the purity of the best Mesabi deposits. Britain, which must import a large proportion of its iron ore, has to get along with a much lower average grade than is used in this country, with the result that for each ton of steel smelted about 25 per cent more coal is required than for a ton of American steel.

How about oil, which is perhaps Mr. Ickes's chief worry? The United States has, he tells us, proved reserves of 20 billion barrels compared with a production last year, the wartime peak, of 1.7 billion. Thus even allowing for a considerable drop in consumption now that huge fleets of bombers no longer have to perform daily missions, it would appear that, without some major new discoveries, domestic supplies of oil will be running low in fifteen to twenty years. Nevertheless, the United States still has 36 per cent of the known oil reserves of the world—not too bad a share for a country with under 7 per cent of the world's population. Moreover, many oil authorities do not share Mr. Ickes's pessimism. They point out that American reserves today are higher than at the end of the last war. Domestic resources, according to the American Petroleum Institute, are "sufficient to meet the demands of this and the next generation of Americans."

Assuming, however, the wisdom of supplementing local production by imports as a conservation measure, this country is very fortunately placed. The most highly developed foreign oil fields lie in the Caribbean basin, in Mexico, and, more importantly, along the northern rim of South America. These fields are largely controlled by American corporations, they are accessible for cheap water haulage, and they lie within a zone where the strategic defenses of the United States cannot be easily penetrated. The position of this country in regard to copper, lead, and zinc, basic metals the domestic production of which is proving unequal to demand, is rather similar. Alternative sources of supply are available in this hemisphere and to a large extent under American financial control.

In painting his picture of the United States as a Cinderella, Mr. Ickes suggests that its sister great powers, Russia and Britain, are far better endowed by nature. We do not know much about new Soviet discoveries in the past few years or to what extent they compensate for mines ruined, some perhaps irretrievably, by the Nazis. The most recent study of Russian geography published in this country, "The Basis of Soviet Strength," by George B. Cressy,* states: "No other country has so great a variety of minerals, and only the United States is richer. At the same time it is well to note that among these many deposits are some low-grade ores, especially copper and aluminum, which have doubtful value if operated on the basis of strict capitalist accounting." Proved oil reserves in Russia are large, though not so large as this country's; coal and iron-ore deposits are plentiful and well spread through the vast expanses of the U. S. S. R.; among the non-metallic minerals, phosphate and potash are particularly abundant. On the other hand, Russian resources of nickel, tin, and certain other strategic minerals are very inadequate.

Mr. Ickes talks of the British Empire as a "have" nation in contrast to the United States, but it is rather misleading to treat the Empire as a unit. Britain itself is poor in every important mineral except coal, and even its coal occurs mainly in narrow seams which make production costly. Most of Britain's iron ore, practically all of its copper, lead, zinc, tin, mercury, manganese, and almost all other vital minerals must be imported from overseas. The Empire, of course, produces many of them, but the three richest mineral-producing areas —Canada, Australia, and South Africa—are fully independent dominions. Their products are just as available to the United States as they are to Britain; in time of war, in fact, Canada's very great resources form a magnificent reserve for this country. As for the mineral output of the colonies proper —Rhodesian copper, Malayan tin, New Guinea bauxite, for example—they can be purchased in time of peace by American consumers on exactly the same terms as by British consumers.

In the light of such facts, Mr. Ickes's picture of America's relative poverty seems to me rather overpainted and his sounding of the tocsin a little too vigorous. But as regards the need for conservation, I am with him entirely. Next week I hope to discuss his proposals for guarding and extending mineral resources and to take up a point he has omitted —the relation of conservation to the tariff system.

KEITH HUTCHISON

---

* Whittlesey House, $8

PUBLIC LIBRARY

The People's Front

Mexico City, November 13

THE meeting of the Cortes has drawn a clear-cut line between those who are ready to make an all-out fight to reestablish the Republic and those who want a compromise. The two policies, which were in conflict during the last stage of the Spanish war, were again in conflict last week in Mexico. Two names, Juan Negrín and Indalecio Prieto, symbolize these two policies. It is false to say that Negrín represents a pro-Communist tendency and Prieto a genuine Socialist tendency. Negrín represents resistance, Prieto capitulation. It is time that the friends of the Spanish Republic in the United States should know this.

Between August 27, when the Giral government was formed, and November 7, when the Cortes met, many things happened that have not appeared in the American press. One of the most important was the change in the position of the Communists. They had refused to enter the Giral government, and for the same reasons that dictated the refusal of the parties grouped around Negrín—because they felt that a government headed by Giral lacked the qualities necessary to direct the fight against the fascist Spanish regime. A few weeks later the Communists opened negotiations to enter the Giral government. This did not involve a breach of faith since they notified the other opposition groups of their intention. It was a change of policy, nevertheless.

When the Cortes met, the Communists had already discovered that Giral now did not want them. The Cabinet had succeeded in bringing to Mexico City from France, England, and Latin America more than the number of deputies—one hundred—required for a quorum, and it felt sufficiently strong to get along without the Communist votes.

Thus the Cortes convened with the opposition forces aligned as they were at the time the Giral Cabinet was formed. Prieto saw in this situation an opportunity to overthrow the government. On the opening day our Socialist group, the Ruiz Funes Republicans, and the Communists declined to support the government but carefully phrased their statements so as not to cause any serious damage to Republican institutions. On the second day of the session Prieto delivered the most destructive and anti-Republican speech that has been heard on the Republican side since the end of the Spanish war. Put in a few words, Prieto declared that it was madness to expect anything from the Spanish people, in the grip of such a regime of terror as Franco's; that the nations that really have something to say about the Spanish question are not interested in the reestablishment of the Republic; that the situation in Spain must be brought to an end regardless; and that therefore it was a nuisance to have a President and a government of the Republic in exile. Prieto continued that he would vote to support the government but without engaging his group permanently. If it developed later that a less rigid institution than a government was better fitted to solve the Spanish problem, his group would consider itself free to act. It was manifest that what Prieto wanted was to overturn the government and restore his former Junta de Liberación. It was also clear that he was willing to compromise on the issue of the Republic itself.

The effect of the speech was terrific. All Prieto's taunts and imprecations against General Franco, delivered with emphatic gestures and in a voice that sounded like cannon-fire in the small meeting room of the old Palacio Municipal, failed to allay the general indignation. The president of the Cortes had to declare a recess for half an hour. Giral was seen to walk out on the balcony overlooking the beautiful Cathedral Square, and he remained there alone for some time in order not to be spoken to by anyone. He knew that it was only necessary for one of the leaders of the opposition to rise and address a question to the Prime Minister, and the government would immediately fall. At that moment its life was in Negrín's hands. Negrín walked over to speak to Giral and advised him not to reply to Prieto's challenge; he told him that when the session resumed we would declare that while we maintained all our reservations about the make-up of the government it could count on our support. The opposition saved the government. It may seem strange, but it was logical. Negrín was not going to take advantage of Prieto's attack to destroy everything he had done for the Republican cause since he came to Mexico City.

The situation changed after the meeting of the Cortes was adjourned. The Prieto group, which had publicly pronounced itself in favor of compromise and surrender, has two members in the government, one of them, Fernando de los Rios, holding the important position of Minister of Foreign Affairs. Furthermore, it is known that Prieto, although he did not specify in his speech with whom an agreement could be reached in Spain, does not exclude the possibility of a monarchist restoration. Confronted with such a grave situation, our Socialist parliamentary group on Tuesday presented to President Martínez Barrio a statement denouncing Prieto's policy of surrender and the monstrous fact that two members of his faction are retained in the government, informing the President that he would be held completely responsible for what might happen, and giving notice that if he did not act promptly we would fight for the liberation of Spain by all the means at our disposal.

The negotiations for the formation of a "Council of Resistance" have been resumed. Our future policy is quite clear. We shall continue to seek the recognition of the government by the United Nations, since recognition would mean acceptance of the Republic as an institution rather than approval of any particular leader or Cabinet. But since we have no confidence in the ability of the present government to overthrow Franco and reestablish the Republic, and no confidence even in the loyalty to the Republic of some members of this government, we shall also continue our fight. And either the Giral government will change some day or it will be left isolated and abandoned like the old Polish government in London.

DEL VAYO

BOOKS and the ARTS

NOTES BY THE WAY

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

I'M GLAD TO NOTE that La Liberté won out over Mush Mush at Jamaica last week, if only by a head. And I liked the description of La Liberté as a little filly which "had won three of four starts in sprint races, but whose breeding promised success over a route." This coincides almost exactly with Benedetto Croce's view—"History is the Story of Liberty"—and it is cheering to have a philosopher's theory confirmed, and so snappily paraphrased, by a racing reporter on the other side of the world. Especially at a time when, in spite of all the talk about liberation, liberty is winning very few races (and vice versa).

FASHION NOTE: On page 12 of the morning Times I read again that Britons may expect fewer clothes than ever. On page 3 is a glamorous advertisement of "Imported Suits from England" of fine Saxony wool. English women will wear trade balances this season.

THE CURRENT ISSUE of Poetry is mainly devoted to the poets and poetry of the Resistance in France. It includes an interesting account of the whole development, entitled The Conspiracy of the Poets, by Pierre Seghers. It was he who founded in 1939 Poètes Casqués, a publication edited by soldiers who were all poets. It was published, against greater and greater odds, throughout the occupation, and the best talents of France found expression in its pages.

Translations of fifteen poems are given, and while they appear to be passable, one keeps wishing to refer to the originals. I don't see why they could not have been included.

CULTURAL NOTE: "Get more out of life with good books," reads a leaflet from Woolworth's, and there follows a list of books which includes not only best-selling novels and thrillers but such aids to the good life as "The Joke Teller's Joke Book," "Astrology for Everyone," a cook book, and "The Home Book of Party Games." As far as I am concerned, however, the most intriguing item on the list is "The Complete Dream Book" and the accompanying blurb: "Discover the meaning of your dreams. Interpretations of over 1,500 dreams will help you avoid dangerous situations, pick your fortunate days, predict your luck in love." And all for 69 cents, which is a good deal less than the current rate for old-fashioned psychoanalysis.

IN THE ISSUE of November 5, P. I. Prentice, publisher of Time, took his readers into his confidence and explained the use of the word "KOMING" in the preparation of copy. "Every news writer," he said, "is likely to discover in mid-story that there are dozens of details about which he needs more information than he has on hand." A Time writer caught in this predicament merely types in the word KOMING, and "there are sometimes as many as twenty KOMINGS in the first draft of a story." "It once cost us $300," he continues with pride, "just to make sure that the highest price ever paid for a magazine article up to then was $30,000. . . ."

It's very impressive, and I was fascinated by the samples Mr. Prentice gave of the questions which are fed into Time's research mill by its correspondents in the field. I think I liked best the double query datelined Los Angeles, which reads as follows: "Rechecking length of atomic age according to Paramhansa Swami Yogananda. Is it 100 or 1,000 years? Also: Are fleas bad in all Southern California or just in some sections?" Time's fevered, passionate search for the Fact, which can only be compared in its intensity to an early Christian's search for the truth; its belief that all facts are created equal; its readiness to spare no expense in bringing a fact, however small, to bay—all are summed up in that conscientious query about Paramhansa Swami Yogananda and the distribution of fleas in Southern California.

CYRIL CONNOLLY thanks me for defending him against the sneers of Orville Prescott and informs me that he weighs exactly 180 pounds. From another source I hear that "The Unquiet Grave" has sold 20,000 copies in England in an inexpensive edition—which would seem to indicate that English readers at least are not outraged by French quotations in French.

SOME DISCHARGED SOLDIERS are still in uniform. It seems they "haven't a thing to wear."

The Forms of Liberalism

THE LIBERAL TRADITION. By William Aylott Orton. Yale University Press. $3.50.

THIS scholarly analysis of the history of the liberal tradition aroused in one reader at least a tremendous initial enthusiasm which was gradually dissipated as concluding chapters failed to maintain the profundity of insight promised in the earlier chapters. Professor Orton begins by distinguishing between the conservative and liberal political traditions. In the former there is reverence for the past, appreciation of organic forms, communal unity, and constitutional continuity; in the latter the emphasis is upon liberty and progress. One feels that he is not completely committed to the liberal tradition and that he is prepared to show that American liberalism might well borrow some of the virtues of true conservatism.

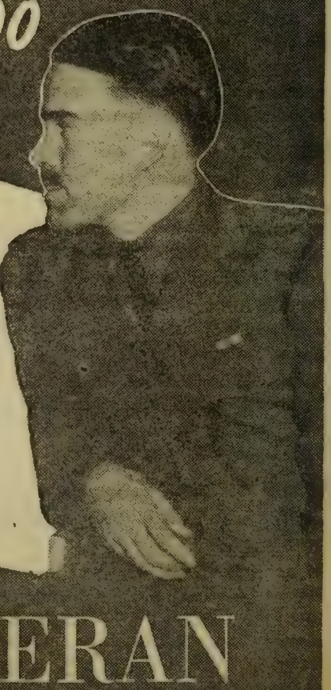
"In America," Professor Orton rightly observes, "the term liberal is being used to cover policies ranging from nineteenth-century laissez faire to dictatorial collectivism." One could go farther and say that in America what is known as conservatism is a decayed form of liberalism. It makes devotion to liberty a screen for a policy the real intent of which is to prevent economic power from coming under the control of political and communal restraint. The left, on the other hand, is inclined to espouse collectivist programs without recognizing the danger of totalitarianism in them. There is no true conservatism in this country, for no political group has a genuine understanding of the organic processes of history or a desire to guard them from the corrosive effect of the ever-increasing technical instruments of modern civilization.

Professor Orton seemed destined to make a new contribution to the assessment of these important political tendencies, first, because he is properly skeptical of the kind of "progress" which liberal theory presupposes to be a guarantor of increasing political virtue, and, secondly, because he understands that liberty alone is an inadequate goal in life. "Liberty," declared Lord Acton, "is not the means to a higher political end. It is itself the highest political end." "Liberalism," wrote Ramsay Muir, "is a belief in the value of human personality, and a conviction that the source of all progress lies in the free exercise of individual energy."

Professor Orton seems, in the earlier chapters of his work at least, not to accept this kind of individualism as adequate. "Liberty without community and community without liberty," he declares, "each is subhuman." He even understands that the individualism of bourgeois culture helped to lay the foundation for modern tyrannies by producing atomic individuals whose lives were not disciplined by any of the organic forms of social life and who therefore became rootless and aimless "masses" coerced by tyrants into an abortive communal unity. "We can now see," he declares, "why the theory and practice of individualism gave so great an impetus to the rise of a monistic and tyrannical form of social organization."

All these profounder elements in his analysis seem to be lost when he moves from diagnosis to prescription. He laments the decimation of the British Liberal Party without recognizing that its individualism had become irrelevant in a day in which an impoverished nation was bound to emphasize the interests of the whole community and could no longer believe with Ramsay Muir that the exercise of individual initiative would of itself guarantee social justice. It may be observed in passing that the political distance between the two major parties in Britain is less than that between our right and left because both parties in Britain accept, from different presuppositions, the idea that the community must manage the economic process and not depend upon its automatic harmonies. Our own right and left, on the other hand, represent different forms of liberalism which have little in common because the one does not understand the perils of injustice under a system of economic liberty and the other is not fully cognizant of the perils of tyranny in a program which ultimately compounds political and economic power.

Professor Orton's own, and it seems to me inadequate, solution for the problem is to deny the legitimacy of the laissez faire conception of liberalism on the ground that it did not make liberty the primary end of policy but regarded liberty "as a means to the end of economic progress" and then to go back to the "truer and older liberalism which held that liberty was the supreme political end-period." He thinks that this is a more spiritual and valid conception than the idea that freedom is pragmatically justified by its fruits. "Despite the most obvious clashes of interest, ordinary people," he writes, "believe that freedom of action will lead to so-



He speaks for 14,000,000 voices that America has never heard before!

Charles G. Bolté—a founder and leader of the American Veterans Committee—has written one of the first great post-war books, a message to America from the veterans of this war. This is what the new veteran wants, and how he intends to get it. This is a key to America's future, presented with the clear, uncompromising honesty of a man who knows what he fought for, speaking for men who haven't finished the fight yet. At all booksellers $2.00

THE NEW VETERAN

REYNAL & HITCHCOCK

ARE EISENHOWER'S VICTORIOUS GENERALS LOSING THE PEACE?

An Eye-Witness Account of U.S. Bungling in Germany That Is the Business of Every American SOMETHING is rotten in Germany. By General Eisenhower's own word, armed revolt looms as a distinct possibility. And now comes the first full account—by an official American observer—of how woefully we are misgoverning Germany.

William Bayles saw confusion, discord and disorganization. What's worse, the Germans see it too—and as U. S. stock falls, Russian prestige rises with the efficient help of a government that knows what it wants, and gets it.

There can be no doubt about it—we are throwing away the peace. But why? Where does the fault lie—with the fraternizing GI, or with the power-loving brass hats? Why does food rot while people starve? Whose blunders lost us the services of Germany's best scientists? What is the true story of relations between U.S. and Soviet officials in Germany?

For the answers to these and other vital questions—as well as for an over-all picture of how not to govern a conquered nation—read "Our Political Failure in Germany."

READ IT in the December Issue of THE AMERICAN MERCURY

—one of two issues you can have FREE with a year's subscription.

Our Political Failure in Germany is only one of the 17 articles, essays, features and stories that fill the more than a hundred pages of the December MERCURY. Bill Douglas, American is an enlightening portrait of the Supreme Court Justice who would be President today if it weren't for three men. In Workshop of the Unconscious a Yale professor tells you how you may turn over your problems to your subconscious mind to solve, while you occupy yourself with other things. Veterans and Union Rules takes up a knotty question—shall we permit young veterans to displace family men who have spent years on their jobs? The Funny Side of the Polls relates some bizarre experiences of the people who take opinion polls—but leaves you with the comfortable feeling that Americans by and large are thinking soundly. Other articles well worth reading include The Famine in Europe . . . Labor Is Big Business . . . Fact and Legend About Palestine . . . Employment for the Handicapped . . . Behind the London Fiasco . . . The Male Change of Life.

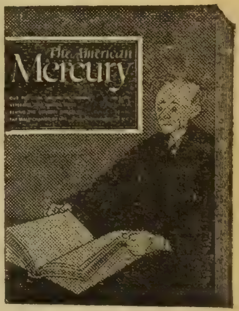
We could list half a dozen more titles from the December MERCURY, all equally intriguing—yet there is nothing special about this issue. It is typical of those which MERCURY subscribers enjoy each month. It offers a fair sample of THE MERCURY's lively, penetrating, courageous and forward-looking discussions that range over the worlds of politics, economics, literature, the arts and sciences. But it can give you only an inkling of the nearly 300 stimulating articles, essays, stories, poems, reviews and biographical sketches that you can enjoy in a year of THE MERCURY.

Read The Mercury at our risk

We invite you to treat yourself to many hours of good reading by becoming a Trial Subscriber without risk or obligation. Return the coupon below with $3—the regular yearly subscription rate. We will enter your subscription for 14 months. Read the December and January issues. If we have oversold you . . . if THE MERCURY fails to live up to your highest expectations . . . simply cancel your subscription and we will refund the full $3!

Two months with our compliments

But if you find THE MERCURY a source of rich enjoyment, you can read it for 14 months for the regular cost of 12. Could anything be fairer? You read THE MERCURY for two months — and whether your verdict is thumbs up or thumbs down, these issues cost you nothing. Tear out and mail the coupon now, so that you may receive the December MERCURY promptly.



TRIAL SUBSCRIPTION

THE AMERICAN MERCURY
570 Lexington Avenue, New York, N. Y.

I accept your invitation. Enter my subscription as a Trial Subscriber, for 14 months. I enclose $3—the regular rate for one year. (Check here ☐ if you enclose $5 for 26 months.) After reading the December and January issues, if I wish to cancel my subscription you will refund the full price immediately and without question.

Name..

Address..

City..................................Zone..................State..............

The Nation Associates

announces its

Annual Forum

on

WHAT IS THE ANSWER TO THE ATOMIC BOMB?

December 1, 2, 3, 1945
Hotel Astor, New York

Is Security Possible With the Atomic Bomb?

Should We Share the Secret of the Bomb With the Soviet Union?

Who Should Control the Bomb on the Domestic Level—on the International Level?

Is World Government the Answer?

These are among the questions which the Forum will seek to answer. Leading these discussions will be:

Judge Thurman Arnold
Charles G. Bolte
Lt. Kingman Brewster
James B. Carey
Stuart Chase
M. J. Coldwell
Rep. Helen Gahagan Douglas
Thomas K. Finletter
Judge Jerome Frank
Professor I. A. Getting
Lt. Cord Meyer, Jr.
Walter Millis
Edgar A. Mowrer
Boris Pregel
Prof. L. N. Ridenour
Dr. Boris Shishkin
Prof. Henry De Wolf Smyth

Speakers at the Dinner Forum on Dec. 3 include:

Dr. Herbert V. Evatt
Foreign Minister of Australia
Prof. Harold Laski
Chairman, British Labor Party
Dr. Leo Szilard
Metallurgical Laboratory, University of Chicago
Mrs. Franklin Delano Roosevelt
Freda Kirchwey
Leon Henderson, Chairman

Reservations for the dinner at $7.50 per person and admission cards for the Conference may be secured at the offices of:

THE NATION ASSOCIATES
20 Vesey Street New York 7, N. Y.

cial and international harmony. Where do they find ground for this assurance? They find it in themselves. . . . In free personal relationships men achieve community by keeping material interests in their place."

Unfortunately a modern community, or any community for that matter, is something more than "personal relations." Its justice and order must be contrived. Institutions must be constantly invented, changed, and adapted for the purpose of preserving as much community as possible within the limits of freedom and as much freedom as possible within the limits of community.

Professor Orton's answer is too simply libertarian to be adequate for a problem the breadth of which he has profoundly illumined in his own thought.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Yenan

THE CHALLENGE OF RED CHINA. By Gunther Stein. Whittlesey House. $3.50.

WHEN I first saw Gunther Stein he was in the lobby of the plushy Hot Springs Hotel surrounded by an enthralled audience of delegates to the international conference of the Institute of Pacific Relations. His listeners included some of the top Far Eastern experts in the Allied governments, men who had access to a wide range of highly confidential government reports. Yet they listened avidly and asked many questions, for Mr. Stein was able to give fresh and expert testimony on a subject which all present recognized as the touchstone of a stable Far Eastern peace.

It was January, 1945, and Mr. Stein had just reached the United States after five months in the Communist-led Border Regions of North China. Although Washington was fairly well informed about the hotly debated developments in that area, Far Eastern experts were interested in Stein's reactions, since twelve years of reporting from the Far East for the Christian Science Monitor, London News Chronicle, and Manchester Guardian had established him as one of the soundest and best-informed observers in that area. Unlike most correspondents, he had been trained as an economist. Although liberal in his own outlook, he was known to be friendly with high Kuomintang personages and therefore not likely to be uncritical in his approach to Yenan.

Mr. Stein was questioned and cross-questioned by his audience, and was able to satisfy everyone because his intensive investigations in the Yenan area had been specifically designed to probe all the accusations and test all the praise that had been heaped upon the Chinese Communists and their "new democracy."

Today all America can read the results of Gunther Stein's probing in his timely book. It is foreign reporting at its best, combining mature analysis, long perspectives, and living human portraiture. Less uncritical than Harrison Forman's report and more satisfying than the books of Edgar Snow, it has the same compelling interest. The high lights are many: Stein interviews Wu Pei-hsiao and the ex-Trotskyist Wang Shih-wei, for whom the Kuomintang had held a "memorial meeting" in Chungking after proclaiming that they had been killed by the Communists. He got the reactions of Jobs For Everyone!

A Daily Paper For All America

PM

A Progressive National Daily Offers Out-of-Town Readers an Outstanding Mail Subscription Bargain

The $2 Cloth-Bound Edition of Best Seller

"SIXTY MILLION JOBS"

By Henry A. Wallace

With PM delivered direct to your home by mail . . . for $4.00

The issue that sparks our hopes for a lasting peace is the supreme challenge of jobs for all . . . reviewers call Henry Wallace's practical and dramatic blueprint a "passionate statement of a remarkable American's basic philosophy" . . . "simple and direct with very little evidence of dreaming" . . . must reading! And you'll want to follow PM every day to dig deep behind the headlines for the broad picture of the unfolding employment situation . . . PM will keep you abreast of the news that affects every man, woman and child.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Please send Henry Wallace's "SIXTY MILLION JOBS" plus PM by mail for the periods specified.

Name ....

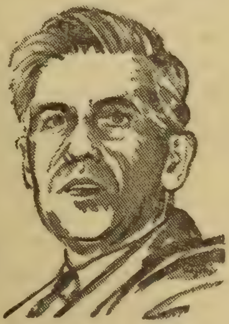
Street ....

City .... Zone ...... State ....

Please check the subscription offer desired which includes the book.

Ten (10) weeks daily and Sunday ☐ Fourteen (14) weeks daily only ☐ Thirty-five (35) weeks Sunday only ☐

The newsstand price is 5 cents daily and 10 cents Sunday



Send with $4, check or money order (no cash please) to PM, Box 81, Times Square Station, New York, N. Y. These rates apply only to the U. S. A. and possessions, exclusive of New York City. No mail subscriptions accepted for New York City. (J-NA)

CHRISTMAS ☆ ☆ ☆ BOOKS

Bertrand Russell Among the Sages
By Sidney Hook

"The Bostonians"
By Louise Bogan

Pilots, Man Your Planes
A Poem by Randell Jarrell

Notes by the Way
By Margaret Marshall

Reviews

DELMORE SCHWARTZ
"Little Friend, Little Friend" . . . by Randall Jarrell
JAMES GROSSMAN
"The Trollopes" . . . by Lucy and Richard Stebbins
DAWN POWELL
"This Petty Pace" . . . . Drawings by Mary Petty
KEITH HUTCHISON
"Years of Victory: 1802-1812" . . . by Arthur Bryant
MILDRED ADAMS
"Perplexities and Paradoxes" . . by Miguel Unamuno

Short Reviews
by
Lionel Trilling, Marguerite Young, Harold Lazarus, Ralph Bates, and others

Drama by Joseph Wood Krutch
Music by B. H. Haggin

A Selected List of the Books of 1945 will appear in the issue of December 8

NEXT WEEK
in
THE Nation

wealthy landlords, prosperous merchants, and Michael Lindsay, the young English non-Communist liberal who has spent four years in the Communist-held area. From this varied but converging testimony there emerges an authentic picture of the area and an explanation of why the Japanese were never able to conquer it and why Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek can overwhelm it only with the aid of a dozen American armored divisions.

The truth is that the Border Regions have the most popular, most nearly democratic administration yet attained in China. There is free suffrage, and the Communists limit themselves to one-third of the seats. There have been democratic agrarian reforms, but the rich landlord is satisfied because he has been more than compensated by infinitely lower taxes. Confident of the superiority of their own Marxist outlook, the Yenan authorities have permitted considerable freedom of thought and criticism. It is true that there is no organized competition, but that is because the Kuomintang has lost all influence as a result of its pro-Japanese policies in the area and its refusal to compete on a popular level.

The Chinese Communists were not always as enlightened as they are now. At one time their program was aimed almost exclusively at the poorest peasants, and they insisted on firm political control. But all trained observers agree that they have broadened and mellowed. It is true that their leadership is Marxist and their eventual aim communism, but it is also true that they are absolutely committed to the thesis that China cannot reach even socialism without a long intervening period of democratic capitalism. And one of the best guaranties against a resurgence of extremism and sectarianism is the fact that there has been a marked shift in the social composition of the Communist Party. Nine-tenths of its present 1,200,000 members joined after 1937, and most of them are moderate "middle peasants" who joined because they wished to support the struggle against the invader and the reforms of the "new democracy."

American ultra-conservatives, misled by Ambassador Hurley and blinded by their morbid fear of Russia, hope to wipe out even the moderate reforms of Yenan. Had they been genuinely interested in democracy and the well-being of China's four hundred millions, they could have insured against an extremist development by supporting and building up the democratic elements in the Left Kuomintang and the Democratic League. Instead, our military force has been placed at the disposal of the most corrupt, anti-popular, and feudal elements. It seems difficult to believe that the conscience of America—enlightened by such excellent studies as Stein's—can tolerate such an egregious development.

ANDREW ROTH

The New Statesman and Nation
England's Leading Weekly Review
may now be obtained through
THE NATION
20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.
Yearly subscription $6.50 including postage
SPECIMEN copy on request

BRIEFER COMMENT

Americana, South

THE UNIVERSITY PRESSES are giving us, with increasing frequency, volumes of regional history and biography which both entertain and, in the aggregate, add to our knowledge of the past. Three recent volumes dealing with life in the nineteenth-century South are illustrative.

In 1826, at the age of eighteen, Seargent S. Prentiss graduated from Bowdoin College. A year later he went to Natchez, Mississippi. From then until his death in 1850 he was prominent as a lawyer, an orator, and a public servant. Dallas C. Dickey has written a careful, competent biography of this transplanted Yankee who represented Mississippi in Congress and played a national role in the Presidential campaigns of 1840, 1844, and 1848. Its title is "Seargent S. Prentiss, Whig Orator of the Old South" (Louisiana State, $4).

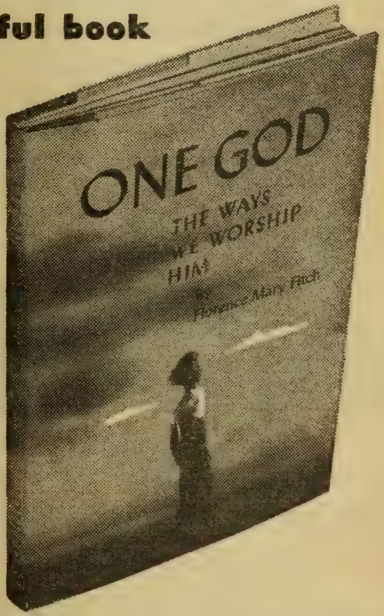
Professor J. H. Easterby has given a scholar's attention to the many and varied accounts, letters, diaries, and miscellaneous papers of Robert Allston. "The South Carolina Rice Plantation—as Revealed in the Papers of Robert F. W. Allston" (Chicago, $5) is a fascinating and important contribution to our economic history, providing many illuminating sidelights on the political and social life of the half-century prior to 1868.

Kemp Plummer Battle, lawyer, statesman, business man, and educator, wrote on his eighty-first birthday, "I begin the writing of my memories. My ambition is to do more than chronicle my personal history. I wish to throw light on the history of the state during my time . . . and the changes in our institutions." Not quite completed at the time of his death, his autobiography has now been edited by his son, William James Battle—"Memories of an Old-Time Tar Heel" (North Carolina, $3). The former president of the University of North Carolina wrote even better than he had hoped; this book is a gold mine of social history, and is so completely charming as to be the despair of any reviewer who has to describe it briefly. RALPH ADAMS BROWN

Too, Too Superior

A. L. ROWSE, author of "The Spirit of English History" (Oxford, $2), says in his preface that he has written with two aims: "First, to make the story of our people intelligible . . . to make clear . . . the factors and forces which have made our history what it is. Second, within the very restricted confines at my disposal to include everything that is really essential to the understanding of that story" (his italics). To accomplish all this in 144 pages, to paint on so small a canvas an impressionistic version of the rich and varied tapestry of English history that would convey some sense of its color and meaning, requires a genius that Mr. Rowse manifestly does not possess. He cannot be blamed for that; but he has to his credit some excellent studies of the Tudor period, and had he taken more pains with this book, he might have ended up with something better than an epitome of the more commonplace English school textbooks.

Over 120,000 children are learning to understand each other through this wonderful book



ONE GOD explains the ceremonies and beliefs of the Protestant, Catholic, and Jewish religions in simple words and inspiring photographs that every child can understand. It notes the differences between the three faiths with fairness and impartiality—but stresses the fact that they are different ways in which we Americans all worship the same God.

ONE GOD is teaching our children to deal with people of religions other than their own in a truly American way—not with ignorance, but with knowledge; not with bigotry, but with understanding.

"I wish this book could be placed in the hands of every child in this country. Then we would be rearing a generation that knows not prejudice and hate."
—Rev. John Haynes Holmes

ONE GOD

THE WAYS WE WORSHIP HIM

by FLORENCE MARY FITCH

Photographs selected by Beatrice Creighton

$2.00 at all bookstores

LOTHROP, LEE & SHEPARD CO., 419 FOURTH AVE., N. Y. 16

STUART CHASE

With unmatched wit and brilliance, Stuart Chase in his new book shows you—Mr. and Mrs. American Citizen—what foreign trade means to you.

Not gold, not ledgers, not "balances," but stuff—goods and services going out and coming in to make life better for human beings.

Here is a timely theme presented with pungent clarity by a writer all America understands.

TOMORROW'S TRADE

$1.00 at all bookstores
THE TWENTIETH CENTURY FUND

Buy* All the Bonds You Can . . .

VICTORY LOAN

Keep* All the Bonds You Buy

In condensing his material Mr. Rowse all too often becomes a cataloguer expressing himself in clichés, and his interwoven generalizations and judgments are apt to be conventional to the point of triteness. Summing up nineteenth-century English poetry, for instance, he tells us: "The age had its representative poet in Tennyson, the laureate of the Victorians, superb craftsman and artist, a magician in words, a belated Merlin. Later Victorians found themselves more faithfully mirrored in Browning: the strain of the age, the breakdown of the older certainty movingly expressed in Arnold, the note of rebellion and defiance in Swinburne."

A believer in "progress," Mr. Rowse is one of those optimistic historians who find that nearly everything turns out for the best in the long run. And for a Cornishman, a Celt, he seems to have absorbed a fair share of the complacency usually supposed to be an Anglo-Saxon contribution to the character of John Bull. Writing of the "large class of landless laborers" created by the inclosures of the eighteenth century, he says: "Fortunately for them, the concurrent development of industry absorbed them, with some ups and downs of adjustment; so that a considerable internal migration from the country to the new industrial areas was an underlying feature of the new century." Some later references to the realities of the Industrial Revolution hardly redeem this smug dismissal of a long nightmare of human degradation from which Britain has not yet fully recovered.

Mr. Rowse's history was written at the request of the British Council, a semi-official organization devoted to the diffusion of British culture. It will not, I fear, prove an acceptable export. Its overtones of superiority, unconscious though they may be, are all too likely to irritate the foreign reader. For Americans, at any rate, "The Making of Modern Britain" by J. B. Brebner and Allan Nevins (Norton, 1943, $2.50) may be recommended as a more readable short history which achieves perspective despite the manifest affection of its authors for their subject.

KEITH HUTCHISON

One Small Question

THE PROBLEM of the atomic age is well stated in "Modern Man Is Obsolete," by Norman Cousins (Viking, $1): man is as ill-equipped to accept its potential blessings as he is to control its present dangers. The remedy is offered—a world government. The one small question is just how we are to bring about this world government. The answer is not satisfactory: where there is a will there is a way. The instinct for survival must be stimulated. We must convert National Man into World Man. How? How? I remain the "gloomy dean." With the atomic bomb in our hands, and a short space of time between survival and annihilation, we are asked to reeducate two billion people by crying to them, World Government or Death! And yet, what other solution is there than some form of world government?

BENJAMIN HARROW

NOTICE OF CHANGE OF ADDRESS

Nation subscribers should give at least three weeks' notice of a change of address, indicating the old as well as the new address.

STAGE PLAYS

Kermit Bloomgarden & George Heller present
DEEP ARE THE ROOTS
A New Play by ARNAUD d'USSEAU and JAMES GOW
Staged by ELIA KAZAN
FULTON THEATRE Forty-sixth Street West of Broadway. Circle 6-6380.
Evenings 8:40. $4.20, $3.60, $3.00, $2.40, $1.80, $1.20 Matinees Wednesday and Saturday. $3.00, $2.40, $1.80, $1.20. Tax inclusive.

"DESERVES ITS GREAT SUCCESS!"—Nichols, Times
Rodgers and Hammerstein present
MADY CHRISTIANS • OSCAR HOMOLKA
in JOHN VAN DRUTEN'S
I REMEMBER MAMA
from Kathryn Forbes' "Mama's Bank Account"
with JOHN TETZEL • ADRIENNE GESSNER • RICHARD BISHOP
MUSIC BOX 45th Street, West of Broadway. Phone: Circle 6-4636 Eves. 8:35 Sharp. Mats. Thurs. and Sat. 2:35 Sharp

MICHAEL TODD Presents
UP IN CENTRAL PARK
Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS
Lyrics by DOROTHY FIELDS
Music by SIGMUND ROMBERG
BROADWAY THEATRE, Broadway at 53rd Street. Matinees: WED. & SAT.

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

Money-Saving Magazine Combinations

THE Nation

with Harpers Magazine You save $2.50	$6.50
with Consumers Union You save $1.50	$7.00
with Harpers Magazine and Consumers Union You save $3.50	$9.00
with Free World You save $1.50	$7.50
with Saturday Review You save $1.50	$8.50

All club combinations listed are for one year, and may be mailed to different individuals and addresses. Canadian and foreign postage extra.

THE NATION by itself

1 Year $5 2 Years $8 3 Years $11

Servicemen's Rate $3 a Year

Canadian and Foreign Postage—$1 a year extra

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

I want to subscribe to The Nation, or the following Nation magazine combinations as listed below:

____

____

____

☐ Remittance enclosed. ☐ Bill me.

NAME ______________________________

STREET ______________________________

CITY __________ ZONE ______ STATE __________

11-24-45

MOTION PICTURES

RKO NOW

Manhattan
ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST.
86th ST.
58th ST. near Lex.
HAMILTON 125th ST.
REGENT
RIVERSIDE
23rd ST.
Bronx
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL
Westchester
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

"An Enchanting Musical" —N. Y. Sun
"Songs Ripple Infectiously" —PM
RODGERS & HAMMERSTEIN'S
'STATE FAIR'
DANA ANDREWS • JEANNE CRAIN
DICK HAYMES • VIVIAN BLAINE
In TECHNICOLOR • A 20th Century-Fox Picture
— And —
'Circumstantial Evidence' Lloyd Nolan Michael O'Shea

Brooklyn
BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYOU Coney Island
Queens
Keith's FLUSHING
ALDEN Jamaica
Keith's RICH. HILL
STRAND Far Rockaway
Manhattan
COLONIAL

"The Drama You've Been Waiting For." —New York Times
'MILDRED PIERCE'
— Starring —
JOAN CRAWFORD
JACK CARSON • ZACHARY SCOTT
Based on JAMES M. CAIN'S Best-Seller
— And —
CHARLIE CHAN in 'SHANGHAI COBRA'
NOTE! 'MILDRED PIERCE' will be shown as a single feature in the following theatres: Colonial, Strand—Far Rockaway

"A nostalgic musical" . . . Cameron, News
20th Century-Fox presents
BETTY GRABLE in
THE DOLLY SISTERS
John PAYNE • June HAVER
with
. . . . ON STAGE . . .
CARL RAVAZZA • BEATRICE KAY
GOMEZ and BEATRICE
Extra! MAURICE ROCCO
Now Playing ROXY 7th Ave. at 50th St.

"A touching tale of personal grief and courage." . . . —Crowther, N. Y. Times
JOHNNY in the CLOUDS
A Two Cities film released by United Artists
Now Playing WINTER GARDEN B'way & 50th St.

Drama

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

"THE RUGGED PATH" (Plymouth Theater) is Robert Sherwood's first play since "There Shall Be No Night." The latter, you may remember, concerned itself with the heroic fight for freedom put up by the Finns against the aggression of Soviet Russia. The new play, you will not be too surprised to hear, deals with the case of an honest editor who lost his job in the spring of 1940 because he insisted upon proclaiming the duty of our country to support these same Russians in a struggle which had somehow become not against but for liberty and democracy.

Mr. Sherwood is hardly to blame for either the rapidity with which events have moved or the confusions produced. If he changed his opinions he changed them with the nation, with The Nation, and, incidentally, with the present reviewer. But there is, nevertheless, something faintly ridiculous in the juxtaposition of two successive plays so downright and so incompatible. That something is, morever, relevant to the whole question of the playwright and his relation to times like these. It is so easy to argue that he must treat of our deepest concerns and that our deepest concerns are obviously political. But it is equally easy to see that recently at least none of his attempts to do so have been particularly happy.

Less than a decade ago when the world was not so grim as it is today Mr. Sherwood could solve the problem to the satisfaction of a practical playwright by making "Idiot's Delight" merely a good show. Essentially the solution achieved this season by, let us say, the authors of "Deep Are the Roots" is the same. But Mr. Sherwood is now too serious to be satisfied with nothing more than that kind of success, and "The Rugged Path" fails on its own level because, I think, it is merely more serious without really being serious enough.

A play as important as the author wants this one to be would have to be founded upon some conviction too fundamental to be shaken by local events possible in the near future, upon truths which could survive mere political realignments. It might, for example, concern itself with the problem of living in a world so at the mercy of violent and unpredictable events that it is perfectly possible for a man as intelligent and sincere as its author undoubtedly is to revise over night the deepest convictions he is able to articulate. The ultimate tragedy of our lives lies in the fact that such revisions are possible. But it is not with this tragedy that "The Rugged Path" deals. The play is, on the contrary, thoughtful only as a good editorial is thoughtful, and like a good editorial it might easily become any day as outmoded as "There Shall Be No Night" became at the moment when the events with which the new play deals began to unfold.

All criticism is to some extent impudent, and the ultimate in critical impudence is achieved when the critic undertakes to explain an author to himself. That impudence I must risk in order to declare my firm conviction that Mr. Sherwood's plays have always lagged one pace behind his own ever-increasing seriousness. By his own confession he wrote the highly diverting "Reunion in Vienna" in order not to think of certain things which troubled him. By the time he had got to "The Petrified Forest" and "Idiot's Delight" he could no longer wholly disregard them, and in "There Shall Be No Night" he thought that he had gone completely over to responsible seriousness. Actually, however, he has never permitted himself to go beyond journalism, and I risk the assertion that his present concern with specific political issues is as much an "escape" from deeper questions too puzzling and too painful to think about as "Reunion in Vienna" was an escape from the relatively more serious things even then struggling in his mind for recognition.

To say this seems to me more important than to say the obvious things about the play he has actually written, these obvious things being merely that an excellent performance by Spencer Tracy hardly succeeds in lifting it above its usually pedestrian level and that its effective passages, of which there are several, strike one as being rhetorical rather than poetic. Mr. Sherwood seems to be saying what he believes and what he believes the world ought to hear, but he also seems to be saying it with the sincerity of an honest publicist, which is very different from the sort of sincerity only to be achieved by the writer who is writing not off the top of his mind but out of its painful depths.

Few recent writers taking off from a contemporary problem have done more, and I can cite only Maxwell Anderson's "Key Largo" as even a half-successful attempt to get beyond journalism to some more than journalistic truth. But that does not change the fact that the real defect in almost all our so-called serious plays is simply that they are not in any dramatic, or poetic, or philosophical sense serious enough.

Films

JAMES AGEE

"THE LAST CHANCE" was made by Lazar Wechsler, in Switzerland, during the war. It is the story of the attempt of some derelict English and American soldiers to shepherd a polyglot group of refugees across the mountains from Italy into Switzerland. Most of the players are amateurs; some of them virtually reenact their living roles as refugees. With minor exceptions the performances, or the ways in which nonperformances are put to good use, are excellent. Some of the character conceptions, symbolizations, and melodramatic passages are over-obvious, high-flavored, and stagy, but none of the weaknesses of the film more than superficially vitiate its desperate courage, humaneness, and intensity, or its over-all eloquence. Nor does it strike me as dated: the world it tries to epitomize has changed, since the film was made, more for the worse than for the better. I am therefore more interested in Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer's attempt to give it regular feature-film circulation; I only wish I could believe that it will please, and arouse, any sufficient part of the general American audience.

Glad as I am, in some respects, that Metro plans to put a number of European films into broad circulation, I feel it may turn out to be a mixed blessing. I don't know, but think it reasonable to assume, that the effort is being made as one part of breaking down European tendencies to lock theaters against American films. If this is so and the reciprocal circulation gets going at all strong, I am afraid we shall have to expect more harm than good; that American films will become, more than ever before, vapid, safe advertisements of our well-known way of life—even touched up or supervised, perhaps, by the State Department; and that European films will become more and more "American" in style and content; and that it will on the whole become harder than before, not only here but in Europe, to make films that are worth making. I agree with anyone who insists that movies can be international in style and content; but for every good foot of internationalization I would expect a hundred bad, and would expect it even if that were not the way the money is stacked. Moreover, since intimate specification is even less dispensable to most good art than generalization, I believe that most of the best films, like most of the best of any other art, are and would always have to be developed locally, and primarily for local audiences.

"My Name Is Julia Ross," a mouse-among-cats thriller, shows bewildered Nina Foch, who thought she was merely a new secretary, trying to escape from Dame May Whitty and George Macready, who insist that she is respectively their daughter-in-law and wife, and who do their best to drive her to madness and suicide. The film is well planned, mostly well played, well directed, and in a somewhat boom-happy way well photographed—all around, a likable, unpretentious, generally successful attempt to turn good trash into decently artful entertainment. I have to add that I was not scared or even excited nearly so often as it was obvious I should be; but I suspect the deficiency was not the film's, but was temporary, and my own.

Records

B. H. HAGGIN

THE best of Victor's November releases are a number of operatic recordings on single discs; and one of the best of these is Pace, pace, mio Dio from "La Forza del Destino" sung by Zinka Milanov (11-8927; $1). This singer has one of the most beautiful soprano voices of today, but one that she hasn't always under control; so that I have heard her go through most of a performance of "Don Giovanni" with a terrific tremolo, and then in one of the scenes of the second act suddenly begin to produce the steady, clear tones that are so beautiful, and that are also exciting in the way they are controlled and manipulated into inflected phrases. In Pace, pace most of her singing is of this beautiful and exciting kind, with only a few tones clouded by tremolo. The orchestral accompaniment provided by Frieda Weissmann is good; and the performance is well-recorded. On the reverse side, unfortunately, is Voi lo sapete from "Cavalleria Rusticana."

Milanov's singing is excellent also in the Mira, Norma duet from "Norma" (11-8924; $1); and with a properly matched alto voice there would have been a performance to rival the Ponselle-Telva version. But instead of the blending of two lovely voices on the old record we get the clashing of the beauty of Milanov's voice with the harshness and tremolo of Margaret Harshaw's.

In the Miserere duet from "Il Trovatore" (11-8782; $1) we get an example of unpleasantly tremolo-ridden singing by Milanov; but Jan Peerce's singing is excellent, as it is in Ai nostri monti on the reverse side, in which Kerstin Thorborg's beautiful voice begins to sound a little worn from the tightness one hears in its production. Weissmann's accompaniments are good; and the performances are well-recorded.

As a matter of fact one is aware of strain in Peerce's singing too—not from tightness in production but from straining for volume. This is the only defect in his superb singing of Parmi veder le lagrime from "Rigoletto" and De' miei bollenti spiriti from "La Traviata." Sylvan Levin's accompaniments are outstanding in their dramatic vitality and sensitiveness to the vocal line; and the performances are well recorded (11-8926; $1).

But if Peerce forces, then what Leonard Warren does in the Toreador Song from "Carmen" (11-8744; $1) can be described only as bellowing; and it is made worse by brashly reverberant recording that also exaggerates the heavy insensitiveness of William Tarasch's accompaniment. There is something more like singing in Largo al factotum from "The Barber of Seville"—that is, some modeling of the tones for phraseological inflection; but also a very hammy imitation of a style which Warren has no real feeling for.

One singer whom Victor might have used with Milanov in the "Norma" duet is Blanche Thebom, whose fresh and luscious mezzo-soprano voice is heard in the beautiful luxuriance of Brangäne's Warning from "Tristan und Isolde" (11-8928; $1); and, on the reverse side, in two "bleeding chunks" torn out of the Fricka-Wotan argument in "Die Walküre," which I find it difficult to listen to. Weissmann's accompaniments are his best of the series; and the performances are well-recorded.

And finally Victor has put on a single disc (11-8925 ;$1) the two sides of the Farewell and Death of Boris from the "Boris Godunov" set that I reviewed a few months ago.

As for Victor's November sets, they haven't given me the pleasure I would have liked to get from them. Schumann's Piano Concerto is a work I am very fond of; and I would like the performance by Arrau with the Detroit Symphony under Krueger (Set 1009; $4.50) if the piano part were played with the simplicity of the clarinettist's statement of the lovely opening theme, instead of the mannered style of Arrau's repetition of the theme immediately afterward, and if, with all its affectation, his playing were not so graceless and his touch not so hard. Myra Hess's older recorded performance is in the same affected style; but her playing is that of a person basically sensitive to music and instrument in a way that Arrau is not. His performance of the third movement, however, is superior to hers; for he drops affectation to play the music straightforwardly and spiritedly, and therefore effectively, whereas she takes all the life out of it with her slow pace and flabby style. The over-all recorded sound of the new version is rich and spacious, but loses volume and brilliance near the ends of some sides; the balance of piano and orchestra is excel-

SOCIALISM LOOKS FORWARD

by John Strachey

"SOCIALISM will be achieved by the people banding together in the trade unions, cooperative societies, and a political party," writes John Strachey.

Here are the ideas and aims of the British Labor Movement presented by the new Assistant Secretary of Aviation in the Atlee Cabinet.

At Your Bookstore or Order Direct Through $2.00

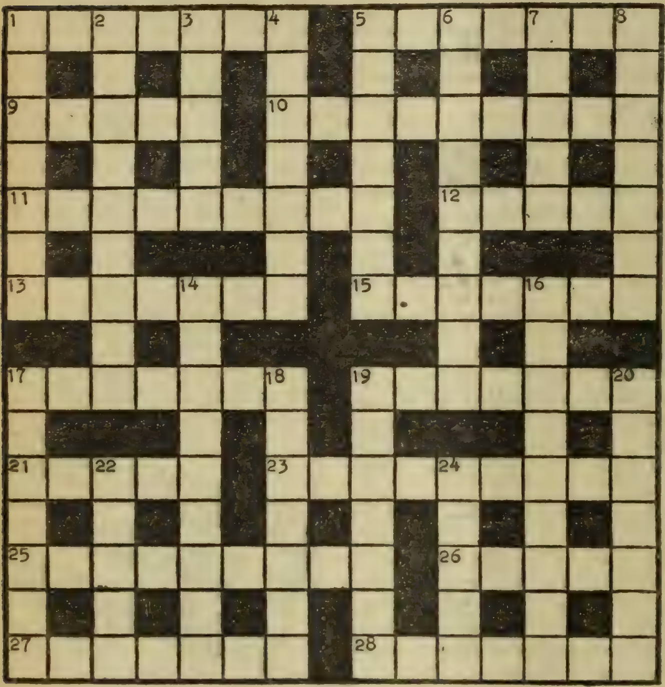
PHILOSOPHICAL LIBRARY
Publishers
15 East 40th Street
New York 16, N. Y.

BOOKS FOUND FREE!

WHAT BOOKS DO YOU WANT?
We quote lowest market prices. No charge for locating Hard-to-Find and Out-of-Print Books. All books, OLD or NEW, mailed POST-FREE.
SEARCHLIGHT BOOK NATION
22 East 17th Street New York City

Crossword Puzzle No. 136

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 Gone bad (anag.)
5 Explain
9 A rat in anger
10 Stare at us (anag.)
11 Has he something profitable to tell, or is he merely contradictory?
12 The right cereal for the police?
13 "We are such stuff As dreams are made on; and our little life Is ------- with a sleep"
15 This Shakespearean character is unlike his master, who is charming
17 Tool that is observed to worry
19 Rolling out the barrel is no treat for them
21 There's a boy in the clearing
23 Suitable headgear for a chaplain to a labor battalion? (two words, 6 & 3)
25 Known as the Virgin Queen, and as a queen was a success
26 Urban? Far from it
27 Gland that's been concerned in quite a bit of monkey business
28 She is in the money

DOWN

1 The wealthy widow begs us to have a gamble
2 Thanks, that expresses it
3 Remains of a he-ass, apparently
4 Tried a simple composition to start with 5 Otherwise typhoid
6 It might contain documents of interest to the harbor master
7 This with most is extreme
8 Rescind (anag.)
14 E. O. Despard reforms, but not for the better
16 American consul who spent most of his time in Glasgow writing Western stories (two words, 4 & 5)
17 To suggest that fruit's intended is a pure invention
18 London's fashionable part (two words, 4 & 3)
19 The outer man's principal need
20 Pays for the seats
22 Want friendship? See Amy about it!
24 Very strange

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 135

ACROSS:—1 ARTHUR; 5 WARSAW; 9 SOYBEAN; 11 ESTEEM; 12 TIRADE; 13 RAPHAEL; 14 TRES; 17 CELL; 19 SARTORIAL; 22 TODAY; 23 OLDER; 25 SALAAM; 26 MEDDLE; 27 DEMON; 29 SCOOP; 31 NONENTITY; 34 AKIN; 36 ERSE; 37 POOR MAN; 39 ARCHER; 40 DARTER; 41 RED DEER; 42 AENEID; 43 SYDNEY.

DOWN:—1 AVERTS; 2 TOTTER; 3 USER; 4 ROMAN ROAD; 5 WATER; 6 ANIL; 7 SCALED; 8 WEEKLY; 10 BEHEAD; 15 RANSACK; 16 STILTON; 17 CORDITE; 18 LAMENTS; 20 ILMEN; 21 LEMON; 24 RENEGADES; 28 MOORED; 29 SAHARA; 30 OILCAN; 32 IRETON; 33 YEARLY; 35 GORED; 37 PERI; 38 NARY.

---

lent, but the woodwinds, though audible, are weak in relation to the rest.

My even greater dislike of what Artur Rubinstein does with—or to—Beethoven's Sonata Opus 57 ("Appassionata") (Set 1018; $3.50) will, I am sure, count for very little in his mind as against the thunderous approval of the hundreds of thousands of people who packed his concerts for this display of virtuoso temperament and technique that tears apart the first movement and rips through the finale. I don't know whether the recording or the piano itself is responsible for its peculiar sound on the records; and I suppose a clear recording of what Rubinstein does in the finale would be impossible.

As for the set (1014; $4.50) of Schubert's Symphony No. 6, it gave me some pleasure with the beautiful playing of the London Philharmonic under Beecham, and with a recorded orchestral sound characteristic of English practice in the way it is clearly and cleanly defined in live but unreverberant quiet (but characteristic also in its heavy bass); but the work is one of Schubert's early, immature, and ramblingly inconsequential copies of the external forms of his predecessors. On the eighth side is the finale of Mozart's "Eine kleine Nachtmusik," which Beecham makes almost unrecognizable with one of the insanely slow tempos he goes in for now and then—for example in the first movement of Mozart's Symphony K. 201 and the minuet movement of the "Jupiter" Symphony.

RESORTS

RELAX, REJOICE with AUTUMN at
Lakecrest
On Hunn's Lake • Stanfordville, N. Y.
90 miles from N. Y. Ideal location in the heart of DUTCHESS COUNTY. Excellent accommodations. Cordial hospitality. Recordings. Library. All seasonal sports. Via N.Y.C.R.R. to Amenia, N. Y. Open all year.
WRITE OR PHONE YOUR RESERVATIONS
EVA BERG, Director Stanfordville 4108

BREEZEMONT PARK
ARMONK, N.Y.
35 MILES FROM NEW YORK CITY
"A Country Estate in the Scenic Hills of Westchester County"
The nearest of all nearby resorts. Exclusive location. Luxuriously furnished. Dignified. All sport activities. Excellent cuisine.
OPEN ALL YEAR Phone Armonk Village 955

The Rein House
Lake Mohegan 42 Miles from N. Y.
FOR REST AND RELAXATION
FISHING ON OUR BEAUTIFUL ESTATE
HORSEBACK RIDING AND GOLF NEARBY
DELICIOUS FOOD—$7 PER DAY—INFORMAL
Accommodation By Reservation Only—Dietary Laws
Mrs. M. F. Rein, Tel. Peekskill, 1747 J.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 161 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • DECEMBER 1, 1945 NUMBER 22

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 565

EDITORIALS

G. M. Strike, '46 Model 567
Economics in the Atomic Age 568

ARTICLES

The Two Nürnbergs, by Peter de Mendelssohn 569
"Negative Socialism" in Britain by Aylmer Vallance 571
Law and Legalism by Rustem Vambery 573
The People's Front by Del Vayo 575
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison 576
The Education of Evans Carlson by Carey McWilliams 577

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Pilots, Man Your Planes by Randall Jarrell 581
The Portrait of New England by Louise Bogan 582
Bertrand Russell Among the Sages by Sidney Hook 586
The Dream from Which No One Wakes by Delmore Schwartz 590
Forever England! by Keith Hutchison 594
The Trollopes at Home and Abroad by James Grossman 596
Unamuno—Last Essays by Mildred Adams 598
Psychiatry and the Soldier by Frank N. Trager 600
In Short 601
Drama by Joseph Wood Krutch 603
Art by Clement Greenberg 604
Music by B. H. Haggin 605

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 137 by Jack Barrett 608

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor J. KING GORDON
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]
European Editor: J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates
LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS
CAREY MCWILLIAMS REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

IN HIS IMPRESSIVE OPENING ADDRESS, THE American prosecutor, Robert H. Jackson, described the Nürnberg trial as "one of the most magnificent tributes that power ever has paid to reason." This set the keynote of the affair, and it strikes us as a false one. The Nazis on trial are criminals who planned and committed their crimes in broad daylight, proclaimed them, and rubbed the world's nose in them. They should be punished, and perhaps in the process it is well to dramatize their guilt by spreading on the record the documented story of their monstrous conspiracy of terror—lest the world grow forgetful or indifferent. This is good propaganda. But propaganda is not law; and the trial is riddled through with specious pretenses that the prosecutor's appeal to "reason" only accentuated. For it is not a fact that the Nazi leaders are being given "their day in court." They are being given the trappings of legality with little of its essence. This is unfortunate; first, because it presents the defendants with a broad target for technical rebuttal; second, because it brings law itself into contempt by converting a justifiable political procedure into a dubious legal one. If Germany had carried through a revolution after its defeat, punishment of the fascist "élite" would have been accomplished promptly and by political action. Since this did not happen, the criminals fell into the hands of the invading armies, and the International Military Tribunal was the result. In our opinion the proper procedure for this body would have been to identify the prisoners, read off their crimes with as much supporting data as seemed useful, pass judgment upon them quickly, and carry out the judgment without any delay whatever. We agree with Dr. Vambery's analysis of the trial printed on another page of this issue: when political acts are disguised as law, both politics and law are vitiated.

✣

THE ATTEMPT TO TURN THE PEARL HARBOR hearings into a Republican holiday has miserably failed. President Roosevelt could not answer the grotesque suggestion that he had deliberately baited the Japanese into attacking so that he could force this country into the European war. But the evidence itself refuted the slander, and the tables were completely turned when former Secretary of State Hull and former Under Secretary Welles took the stand. The story they told was the familiar one of patient negotiations, long-continued appeasement, repeated efforts to find compromise solutions acceptable to Japan, and along with these a modest show of strength intended to warn the Japanese militarists that our forbearance had limits. Keeping the fleet at Hawaii was the major part of that show. The two letters from Mr. Churchill to Mr. Roosevelt clearly indicate that he thought the President too hesitant and too conciliatory in dealing with Japan; while Matsuoka's amazing conversation with Hitler—published at Nürnberg—reveals his cold-blooded determination to precipitate war with the West in order to accomplish the last item in Japan's expansionist program. Indeed, as the record unfolds, the Republican charges appear more and more preposterous. By the time the hearings end, a contrary verdict may well have been reached and the Administration found guilty not of goading an unwilling Japan into war but rather of exercising excessive caution, which had the inevitable effect of inflating Japanese demands and multiplying Japanese aggressions.

*

WITH THE GREAT MILITARY VICTORY WON IT IS fitting that the chief architects of victory should step down, to be replaced by younger leaders who achieved stature on the battlefield. Yet one can hardly see General Marshall and Admiral King leave office without sensing a loss, or without feeling a profound sense of gratitude and respect for the intellectual grasp, the single-mindedness, the energy, and the devotion they brought to their duties. Marshall in particular is assured a high place in history. He has been called one of the finest soldiers the United States army ever produced; more likely he will stand as the finest soldier who ever produced a United States army. General Marshall's distinguished successor marked his elevation to the top of his profession by giving the American Legion convention in Chicago the most sensible and realistic arguments for universal military training that we have heard. General Eisenhower is too honest to pretend that another war will be fought as the last one was; he has the vision to call for "machinery by which the world may settle its difficulties legally and peaceably"; he is realistic enough to demand a United States strong enough to fight another war if that machinery should fail in conception or execution. The same newspaper that carried Eisenhower's speech brought news of United States submarines being armed with rocket guns right now, with the "distinct probability" of a future development in which atomic-explosive rockets will be fired from a submerged submarine. General Eisenhower knows the shape of future war. He wants universal training because in a time of "sudden and devastating raids" it would be better to have "trained and disciplined men ready to fight the conflagration, to rescue the wounded, and to rally instantly behind their leaders." In other words the army will train several hundred thousand disaster experts annually. One may disagree with the proposition, but it is refreshing to have it stated so bluntly.

*

NATIONAL SOVEREIGNTY, THAT PRICKLY RELIC of an age of wars, has come in for some rough handling during the last few weeks. The Truman-Attlee-King statement, for all its wooliness, delivered the sacred doctrine a few pointed jabs. If a United Nations authority is to have power to inspect and poke around for concealed atomic weapons in any nation then national security has ceased to be a private affair. Last week, the Tory Eden and the Laborite Bevin had their turn. The first suggested that because "every succeeding scientific discovery makes greater nonsense of the old-time conception of sovereignty" big nations had better be prepared to give up their veto rights on the Security Council. The second talked of a radical reconstitution of the United Nations Assembly to make it a directly-elected body with the Security Council responsible to it. Perhaps these English voices echo an awareness that Britain is no longer to be numbered with the great powers and consequently must press, along with the middle and smaller powers, for greater equality between nations and more authority vested in the international body. Perhaps behind them are more sinister motives. Perhaps they simply show that England has reached a political maturity that this country and Russia have not yet achieved. For the giants, misled by the more obvious manifestations of strength, view all suggestions of international understanding with suspicion and resist an authority that might curb their sovereign arrogance. Indeed, the urgent practical problem between now and January when the United Nations Assembly meets is to discover the means whereby the two greatest powers can be brought to a common ground of honest discussion and understanding. No effort must be spared to effect this. For at the United Nations meeting the test will come: it will not be a test for the survival of Russian or American or British sovereignty but the first of a series of tests for the survival of our civilization.

*

THE FRENCH POLITICAL CRISIS WAS OVERCOME by an ingenious compromise which leaves General de Gaulle's position substantially intact, but provides the Communists with the letter of their demands. De Gaulle's first attempt to form a Cabinet, after the Assembly had elected him interim President of the Republic, broke down when he refused to allot the Communists one of the three key ministries—Foreign Affairs, Interior, or War. Now he has abolished the last of these offices and made himself Chief of the Armies, which, in effect, means Minister of Defense. However, the Communists are satisfied by the appointment of one of their deputies to the new position of Minister of Armaments even though this office will be under the direct supervision of the President. In addition they have obtained one of the four new Ministries of State, whose holders are to serve as coordinators rather than administrators, together with the portfolios of National Economy, Industrial Production, and Labor. Thus they will be in a favorable position to influence the transformation of the French economic system and will bear a heavy responsibility for the tempo of industrial reconstruction. The other positions in the government are mainly divided between the Socialists and the Popular Republicans. Among the former we welcome the inclusion as Minister of Public Works and Transport of our contributor Jules Moch. At its first meeting, the new Cabinet gave a favorable reception to De Gaulle's program, which emphasized administrative and economic reform. By calling for the preparation of plans to nationalize banking and electrical power, De Gaulle pleased the three major parties, all of which have advocated such measures. But despite a smooth beginning the government is likely to run into stormy weather, particularly on questions of foreign policy and finance. The first test may come on the budget, which

M. Pleven, Minister of Finance, proposes to submit to the Assembly immediately.

✶

PRESIDENT TRUMAN'S MESSAGE TO CONGRESS urging prompt action on a program to safeguard the health of the American people deserves far more attention than it has received. Citing the appallingly high rejection rate of the army and navy as evidence that large sections of our population lack the medical and dental services which this country is technically able to provide, the President called attention to the uneven distribution of doctors and hospitals, the inadequacy of existing public-health facilities, the need for far more intensive research than is now being carried on, and the present excessive cost of medical care. Many of the detailed provisions of a broad federal health program were not included in his message, but Mr. Truman pulled no punches in aligning the Administration behind the general principles of the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill. He indorsed an inclusive medical-insurance plan covering all types of medical and dental care, that would apply to the whole population. He also called for the extensive use of federal funds to aid in hospital construction and the expansion of public-health, maternal, and child-health services. Unfortunately the President did not make his health program a "must" for 1945. Certainly no item on the calendar, with the possible excepiton of the full-employment bill, is more important.

G. M. Strike, '46 Model

IN THE good old days, strikes, like everything else in life, were simpler. The union posed a demand for better wages, hours, and working conditions. The management made a reply, and if the gap was too great both sides slugged it out until one or the other or both were hurt enough to agree to a solution. In the General Motors strike, the forerunner and prototype of many more to come during the transition period, neither the issues nor the contestants are so uncomplicated.

On the one hand, the C. I. O. United Automobile Workers are asking not merely for a wage increase, but for acceptance of a program with new and startling implications concerning prices, a theory of national economics, the workers' alternate role as consumer, and the notion that a great corporation's finances can no longer be considered a private matter, that, indeed, its operations are affected with a public interest. In making these demands, the protagonist is not the union alone; it is the great non-corporate mass of Americans. On the other hand, the opponent is not merely G. M., but a federation of America's big business enterprises. While they are combating wage increases, they are also fighting the government which supports Reuther's economic policy, and the one agency of that government, the OPA, which most effectively gores their ox. And they are further struggling to prevent two alarming innovations. The first is the idea of making public for inspection the secrets of their finances, earnings, and expenses. The second is the closing of an avenue of escape they formerly employed when a union got too strong for them—conspiring with the union to take wage increases out of the hides of the consumers.

Developments during the G. M. wage negotiations and during the first few days of the strike illustrate the new kind of battle and reveal the new issues and conflicts which will be seen in the disputes coming up in the next weeks or months.

Walter P. Reuther, U. A. W. vice-president in charge of G. M. negotiations, began discussions which proved that the old-fashioned bargaining methods of breast-beating, arm-waving, oath-taking, and tub-thumping had given way to something more adult. He began by presenting a remarkably well-written and tightly argued series of economic briefs, crammed with such compelling facts and figures that G. M. ducked most of them and the answer it made to the rest could be knocked down by a sophomore economics student. Next, and even more terrifying to the company, Reuther firmly insisted that wage increases were not to be charged to the automobile purchaser. His argument that workers are consumers, even his broader argument for the necessity of nationally increased purchasing power, were not world-shaking economic novelties, but they were pronouncements to make G. M. and American industry generally shake in their boots. Unions may have advanced the arguments before, but never so adamantly. And, finally, Reuther raised the sixty-four-dollar question, or more accurately, considering its effect on all American business, the sixty-four-million-dollar question: In settling the dispute, whether by direct negotiations, fact-finding, or arbitration, would G. M. open its books?

G. M. said no, not merely because it is afraid of the facts its books would show, but because of the principle involved. It is noteworthy that in rejecting the arbitration offer, or in failing simply to agree to arbitration in principle with criteria to be worked out later—a reply which almost certainly would have been acceptable to the union—G. M. could not make up its mind within the twenty-four-hour deadline set by the union. It does not take an unusually cynical mind to suspect that G. M. needed more time in order to do some consulting. This suspicion is strengthened by the language used in turning down the offer: "The union proposed that G. M. relinquish its right to manage its own business," and the proposal meant that "an arbitration board would assume the responsibilities of management." That such a reply is obviously ridiculous in the light of the history of arbitration is not the point. Its significance lies in the fact that the words are almost identical with those used by Sewell Avery a few days before when he rejected a union proposal for arbitration in the Montgomery Ward dispute. They echo what has been implicit in the Greyhound Bus Lines' refusal to arbitrate its strike. It is evident that in regard to arbitration, that golden solution business always extolled for the other fellow's company and for all unions, there is a meeting of minds among industrial leaders.

In General Motors, as in the rest of strike-threatened American industry, much greater issues are at stake for the employers than hourly wage increases to maintain take-home pay. Management is out to scotch the deadly heresy that prices and profits are the public's business. It is in a peculiarly strong battling position. First, the repeal of the excess-profits tax makes strikes from now until the first of next year relatively inexpensive. G. M. is in a slightly less fortunate position because of the competitive necessity to reconvert quickly, but even so the strike was ill-timed from the union's standpoint. Second, industry can count for a while at least on Congress playing its game. Although legislation may ultimately be passed that will restrict business as much as labor, Congress at the moment is anti-union. Third, industry is gambling on the new man in the White House and drawing enormous comfort from the fact that the President's closest adviser is John W. Snyder, whose instincts and acts are predictable, consistent, and conservative.

By resisting higher wages, enforced publicity of its books, and a post-war economic philosophy, industry also hopes to knock off another foe, the OPA. Its plan of campaign is based on the expectation that when the strike situation becomes sufficiently desperate and reconversion sufficiently jeopardized, the Administration will have no alternative but to lift price ceilings to the point where the OPA must collapse. Or if the Administration refuses, Congress itself will seize the long-awaited excuse to exterminate the OPA. Ben Fairless of U. S. Steel has already sounded the battle cry, stating in almost so many words that collective bargaining could be resumed if OPA were out of the picture. G. M.'s position amounts to the same thing.

In taking a stand against higher prices, Reuther is fighting the government's battle and the consumers' battle. When American consumers realize that he and like-minded unionists are working for them more effectively and intelligently than anyone since Leon Henderson and Chester Bowles, the current wave of strikes will be settled quickly and the right way.

Economics in the Atomic Age

SINCE Hiroshima there has been a tremendous outpouring of words, written and oral, on the subject of atomic energy, of which perhaps 1 per cent has been devoted to the benefits mankind might derive from this truly Promethean advance in knowledge. There are, unfortunately, all too good reasons for concentration on the evil aspects of this new fruit of the tree of knowledge, for the only practical use to which it has so far been put is destruction. And its potentialities for that purpose are so terrific that our immediate, overwhelming concern must be to prevent its use in global suicide.

Consequently, while the central problem created by the atom bomb—discussed in the last two issues of The Nation by Freda Kirchwey and King Gordon—remains unsolved, it may seem a little futile to speculate about the economic consequences of atomic fission. If means cannot be found to control the use of atomic weapons, if we are doomed to a new armament race, then research in nuclear physics will be directed toward military rather than industrial ends. Moreover, in this situation security will demand the maintenance of an iron curtain of secrecy. Freedom of scientific communication will be curtailed inside each country, and internationally it will be lost altogether. With science confined in the kind of concentration camp provided for it by the May-Johnson bill, its progress will be seriously slowed down if it is not entirely stalled.

Another consequence of failure to institute international controls for the military use of atomic energy will be that any discoveries made in its industrial utilization will be maintained as national monopolies instead of being made available for the common benefit of mankind. Thus economically as well as politically the policy of the "sacred" but exclusive trust must sharpen national rivalries and enhance national jealousies. Yet if the world could be freed from its preoccupation with the military aspects of atomic power so that scientists everywhere could cooperate in developing its peaceful uses, there would be a real prospect of easing the economic pressures which have so often proved the root causes of war.

Much needs to be done before atomic fission can be safely harnessed for industrial purposes, but potentially it offers us an inexhaustible supply of energy at a very low cost in terms of human labor. Properly applied, this energy could overcome the abysmal poverty in which the greater part of mankind stagnates today. It could be used to produce cheap fertilizer on a tremendous scale for the restoration of exhausted soils which now provide a bare means of subsistence for Asia's masses. Used for irrigation, it could make deserts fit for human habitation and so create outlets for surplus populations. By making possible cheap air-conditioning in the tropics and large scale space-heating in cold countries, it could reduce the handicaps imposed on many peoples by climatic extremes.

From the American point of view, however, the promise of increased human productivity has its ambiguous aspects. For it appears to intensify problems of overproduction and technological unemployment which are already deeply disturbing. If atomic energy adds to our capacity for producing goods, can we raise consumption to an equal extent, or will this new tool simply throw more men out of work? Dr. Abba P. Lerner has pointed out in Common Sense that there is a vital connection between the answers found to these questions and the problem of war prevention. According to Marxist dogmas, capitalist societies cannot solve the unemployment problem, since their pattern of distribution generates insufficient domestic consuming power to absorb capacity production. Consequently they are forced to attempt to solve their production problems by resorting to the outlets furnished by imperialism and war. Until America, therefore, proves its ability to combine full employment and private enterprise, Russian policy is likely to be based on the need for preparedness against eventual capitalist aggression.

We may or may not consider this thesis grotesque, but it can hardly be denied that a failure by the United States to solve its employment problem, a repetition of the boom-and-bust cycle of the inter-war years, would produce new and acute tensions, internal and external. Left to itself, private enterprise is all too likely to suffer a crisis of confidence with or without atomic assistance. Yet atomic energy could prove the deus ex machina, giving us more time to grapple with the contradictions of our economic system, if its development offered a new outlet for surplus savings and it thus filled the historical role created by steam power and later taken over by electricity and the internal-combustion engine.

To play this part, however, the exploitation of atomic energy must be freed from military trammels and kept out of the hands of private monopolies. Since the primary objective of the May-Johnson bill is security, it is a fair assumption that the control commission it sets up would be dominated by the army. Further, the logic of security would call for the stifling of independent scientific investigations and encourage concentration of research in the more easily controlled laboratories of the big corporations, which always enjoy an inside track to the Pentagon. The result would be that decisions on the industrial application of discoveries in the atomic field would be left largely in the hands of those whose interests are often best served by the suppression or restriction of inventions which threaten existing capital values.

The conclusion is inescapable. Oak Ridge, Hanford, and Los Alamos and the "know-how" they incorporate are the fruit of an investment of public funds and must remain public property. The government need not monopolize the preparation and utilization of fissionable materials, but it should make sure that no one else does so, by continuing to finance research and by undertaking whatever "yardstick" industrial operations the results of that research justify.

[This is the last of a series of editorials on certain aspects of atomic control which will be discussed at the conference called by The Nation Associates at the Hotel Astor in New York on December 1–3.]

The Two Nuernbergs

BY PETER DE MENDELSSOHN

(The Nation's special correspondent at the war trials]

Nürnberg, November 21 (by cable)

THERE are two Nürnbergs in this town, enshrouded in wintry mists and drizzling rain: one, all but forgotten by the world, is a stark, fearful reality to the citizens, who gaze on it with uncomprehending eyes; the other, now in the world's limelight, means little or nothing to the people. There is more than outward significance in the fact that two miles separate the medieval walled city, reduced to a heap of rubble by Allied air attacks, from the vast, rambling courthouse on the outskirts of the town, where under the majestic flags of four victorious powers the Allied Military Tribunal now hears an overwhelming array of evidence against twenty Nazi criminals. To one who visits both, their distance apart seems not only a matter of miles but of centuries; the difference is that of two of the world's ages. Indeed, looking down from the press gallery on Julius Streicher, square-jawed, short, bald-headed, and insignificant, resembling a suburban grocer, one finds it hard to believe that this is the man who only a short while ago ruled this town with a riding whip in his hand and a revolver in his belt and who reduced ancient and populous Jewish communities to a few pitiful souls now cared for, oddly enough, by the friendly Dr. Nürnberger. Here side by side are the beginning and the end of the story. The overcrowded tram cars which take one from the old town to the courthouse seem to rumble purposelessly through a strange, oppressive historical vacuum.

The old town lies quiet, as if it had died a hundred years ago, seemingly forgetful of its former splendor, no longer caring what flattened it to ash and rubble. I have seen most of the destroyed cities of Germany, and Nürnberg is different from all the others. I shall never forget my first view of it as I wandered through its abandoned ruins on a cold, only occasionally sunlit Sunday morning. This town breathed history while it lived, and it still manages fleetingly to suggest—in an occasional wondrous flash—the fact of its antiquity. It is perhaps a callous thing to say, but there is charm and even beauty in its ravaged face. Destroyed Nürnberg somehow isn't hideous, like other bombed cities; one doesn't associate its death with the war. It looks like a medieval walled town razed by a gigantic catastrophe, a great fire or an earthquake.

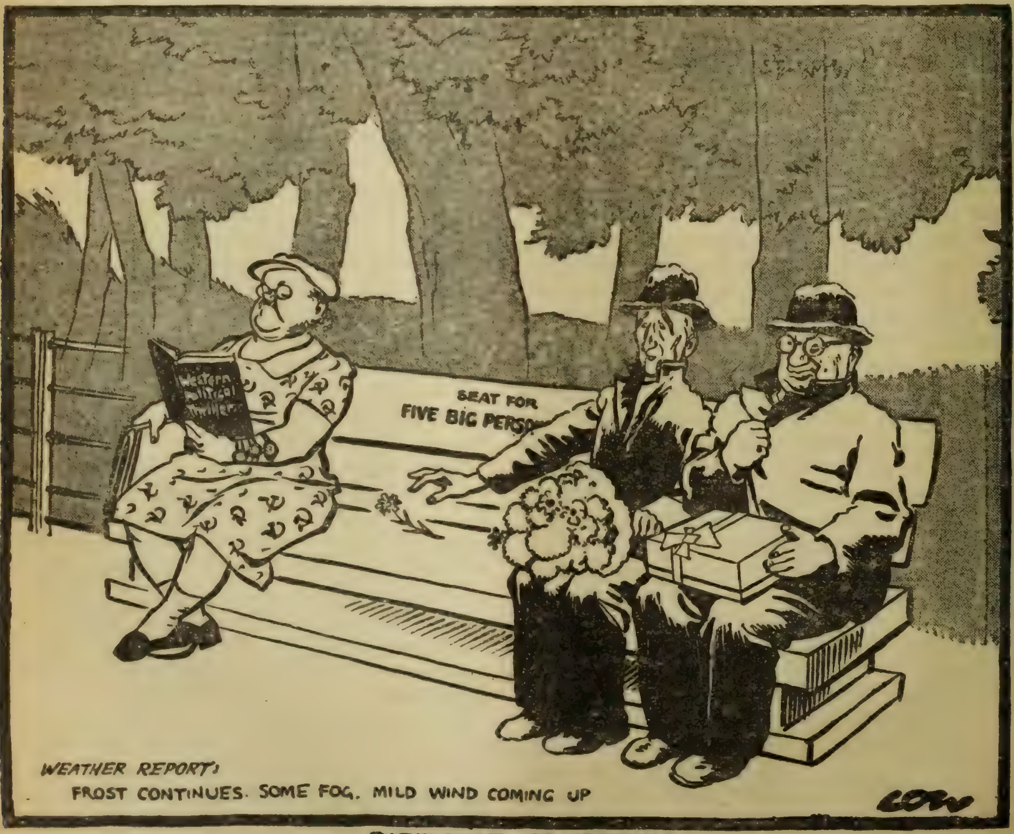
Against the immeasurable agony they caused, the twenty shabby men who sit on hard wooden benches in the courthouse facing the eight just men of the tribunal seem almost out of proportion. (They face also in the press gallery old "friends" like Shirer, Howard Smith, Louis Lochner, and Fred Oechsner, whom Göring and Ribbentrop recognized with an uncomfortable look.) Clearly, they do not measure up to the tremendous significance of the trial. One can't help feeling one would have liked to see bigger men—bigger in every sense—answer for the calamity which will be unfolded by the evidence laid before the tribunal. These are very little men, and that is perhaps what makes their conspiracy the outrageous thing it was.

Hitler, of course, isn't there. Those who are there are a ragged, spiritless, motley crew of second-rate characters. The light, if ever it shone in them, has certainly gone out. What was that light? Was it Hitler? Something undoubtedly held the group together. What the trial would have been like if Hitler had been taken alive it is difficult to imagine. In trying twenty of his closest friends and associates is the tribunal also trying him? It doesn't seem so. He seems far removed from it all. One can't help feeling that in a way the tribunal is trying the bulb and not the light, an empty cartridge and not the explosive that fired it. But the course of the trial may change that impression. It may or may not place Hitler finally in history, reveal him as he really was.

Looking at them now in the harsh glare of big searchlight lamps suspended from the ceiling, one perceives not even the dull reflection of his dynamism in the faces of these gray, tired, uninspired men. On the first day, when the long indictment was read, they apparently took things rather easily. They chatted, smiled, exchanged supercilious and facetious looks. On the second day, which began with the tribunal's rejection of an absurd and impertinent motion offered by defense counsel and ended with Jackson's hard-hitting, closely argued, and masterfully delivered address, their faces grew long and serious. But even in their littleness they are not a homogeneous group. Frick sits in the dock like a dismissed school teacher; Funk suggests a traveling salesman fallen on hard times. Schacht is clearly in a class by himself. He keeps a demonstrative distance from the others, sitting stiffly in a corner as if to indicate he is there by mistake and if the court doesn't realize that, so much the worse for the court. Papen and Neurath, white-haired and bronzed, evidently conceive of themselves as the gentlemen of the party; Seyss-Inquart, looking the second-rate suburban lawyer that he was, obviously isn't admitted to their select circle. Doenitz and Raeder, the two admirals, look like a couple of discharged street-car conductors on the dole—one can't believe that these two miserable tramps knew the first thing about naval strategy. Ribbentrop, Hess, and Göring sit together; both Ribbentrop and Göring apparently take a friendly interest in the haggard, hollow-eyed erstwhile Deputy Führer, who most of the time has his arms crossed squarely over his chest, as one remembers him sitting in the front row of the big party rallies. Hess makes the utterly lonely and God-forsaken impression of a complete cipher, but the prison psychiatrist says he is intelligent, alert, and logical in conversation. One wouldn't be surprised suddenly to find he was dead and nobody had noticed it. The once flashing Ribbentrop has aged considerably; he looks frail, his hair is thin and gray; he has a loose stooping gait which accentuates his rundown appearance.

It is Göring, in a strange light-gray uniform with shining brass buttons that looks like a cinema usher's coat, who is the star of the performance. He has the star's seat at the beginning of the front row, where he is clearly visible from all sides—except when an American guard plants himself in front of him and stares him intently in the face; this does not bother Göring at all—he stares back interestedly at the soldier's uniform. He is composed, sure of himself, behaves as if he were at home. Yet he is never supercilious or facetious like, for instance, Frank, who is far and away the unpleasantest of the lot. Göring follows the proceedings intently. To him the trial obviously isn't a good proposition, but he seems determined to see what he can make of it through civility, manners, and adult behavior. Judge Lawrence's sharp rebuff on the second day, when he tried to read the statement instead of answering guilty or not guilty, did not upset him. If given a chance, he will try again.

Wandering back to the dark, dead town at the close of the session, one still finds it hard to convince oneself of the reality of the whole affair. But it is true. Twenty little wretches who mean nothing and terrify nobody are sitting in the dock. This is the last instalment of a serial that has run twelve years too long.



Western Political Thrillers
SEAT FOR FIVE BIG PERSO
WEATHER REPORT:
FROST CONTINUES. SOME FOG. MILD WIND COMING UP
LOW

DIFFICULT COURTSHIP

"Negative" Socialism in Britain

BY AYLMER VALLANCE

(The Nation's London correspondent)

London, November 8

FIRM in the Faith, G. K. Chesterton wrote consolingly, " 'Neath no world terror's wing, apples forget to grow on apple trees." Conscious that their endeavors may all be nullified by one big bang unless the present tangle surrounding the atomic bomb is unraveled, the British Labor government conscientiously continues the cultivation of its domestic orchard—with restless Socialist back-benchers quizzing critically the sparseness, so far, of the crop. The mutineers who threatened to force a resolution in favor of an immediate increase of old-age pensions have so far been kept "below decks" by Mr. Morrison, brandishing a disciplinary pistol from the ministerial poop, but they are by no means subdued. And this week there has been a new revolt. Irritated by the discovery that legislation on big issues like the financing of housing and the nationalization of coal is not ready—so that the time of Parliament has had to be devoted during the past fortnight to a series of petty bills mostly inherited from the Coalition—Labor members have relieved their feelings by improving, in committee, the government's measure providing for a new system of compensation for industrial injuries. Mr. Griffiths, Minister of National Insurance, pleaded in vain for "loyalty" from the rebels. They stood their ground, and a number of other back-bench amendments raising the rates and "humanizing" the conditions of benefit are due for discussion.

Trivial enough in themselves, these incidents are symptomatic of a growing rift between the Ministers and their supporters in Parliament. I emphasize the last two words because in the electorate as a whole Labor voters, as witness the big Labor gains in last week's municipal elections, are still staunch in their party faith and allegiance. Parliament is peculiar in that whereas the Cabinet consists of elderly men strongly influenced in some cases by their upbringing in the trade-union movement, the Parliamentary party is definitely "intellectual" in its composition; it contains a number of relatively young men with university degrees and a keen insight into the implications of demi-semi-socialism. Their headache is not so much the months of gestation apparently required by the Cabinet before delivery of a concerted legislative plan for full employment, settlement of post-war wages, and, above all, production of houses and coal. What makes them profoundly uneasy about the present trend is the fear that we are getting a sort of negative socialism which will neither work nor let capitalism work. In other words, the emphasis at the moment is all on preventing the private entrepreneur from canalizing our limited resources in directions which would be contrary to the general interest. Thus "controlled" and disciplined, the private entrepreneur sits back and does nothing. And nothing has yet been put productively in his place.

The result is most painfully obvious in the matter of housing. Here the government's policy is rooted in the decision not to nationalize the building industry, made up as it is of a few large and a host of small contractors. Instead, the industry is held in apron strings by very stringent indirect controls. All building is subject to license, and no license is now being issued for a house costing more than $4,800. This means that middle-class building is "out." Quite properly, since the working-class need of houses to rent is infinitely greater and deserves priority. But no building contractor will of his own initiative construct a $4,800 dwelling for a working-class tenant to rent. To begin with, a contractor is so uncertain of his future costs—with building operatives agitating vehemently for a big, immediate rise in pay—that his profit on such a house, which must conform to an approved specification of materials and size, would be dubious even if he sold it on completion. And if he were to let it, he could not count on getting anything like its true economic rent.

Given the existing average level of working-class earnings, nearly half the real rent of the approved-size house, if built with capital obtained at current commercial rates, must be made good out of Treasury subsidies; and these are not available to the private entrepreneur. So he keeps his workmen, quite profitably, busy doing leisurely repairs to blitzed dwellings, and waits for the local authorities to place contracts with him to build new houses.

On the disabilities of the local authorities, the shortage of architects, surveyors, and skilled draftsmen, your correspondent has already reported. These account in part for the fact that their housing programs have still not begun to materialize. But there are additional obstacles. The local authorities do not yet know what rate of interest they will have to pay on capital borrowed for housing from the Exchequer; they do not know what form of subsidy they are to draw—or from what source they are to draw it—to make up the difference between "obtainable" and "economic" rentals; and they do not know what system they will be required to operate, fixed-price contract or "cost plus a percentage," to check the cupidity of the contractors with whom they deal.

In short, it is once more being demonstrated, as it was in the case of many war contracts, that it is much more difficult and more productive of inefficiency to place private undertakings under control than to socialize them outright. Aneurin Bevan may yet be compelled to set up a National Building Corporation—in other words, to nationalize a big slice of the building industry. So far, his "controls," right and proper as they are in intention, have merely paralyzed the building industry by removing the normal capitalist incentive.

The discovery of a substitute for that incentive in a planned economy subject to partial public control is going to become Britain's chief problem. Linked to it is another awkward question—the relationship between management and labor in non-profit-making public corporations, the type of agency which the government has chosen to develop British civil airways, external and internal, which it will probably select to run the railways under state ownership, and which most members of the Cabinet favor as a mechanism to smooth the transition from capitalism to socialism. The possibility of grave disharmony within such corporations has been illustrated uncomfortably this week by the refusal of the London bus crews to obey the fiat of the London Passenger Transport Board that standing passengers up to a dozen must still be carried in rush hours and up to eight in the "off-peak" period. The crews contended that continuance of this wartime expedient was "inefficient": it meant that fares simply could not be collected by fatigued conductors, half of them girls, in overcrowded buses. The board's attitude was that the making of running rules was their function, not to be usurped by the employees. Stranded passengers wanted to know whether this sort of conflict, at the consumer-user's expense, was to be expected in every undertaking handed over to a public corporation.

There is considerable head-shaking, too, over the fact that the dockers' strike—broken by the government with the unlimited use of troops to work cargoes—was directed against employers who in many cases were public corporations operating ports.

As I have previously emphasized in this correspondence, a government which considers that its mandate is to socialize only a small sector of the national economy is bound to be up against the problem of incentives when it tries to achieve "planning," whether it be by imposing indirect controls or by converting the directors of a private monopoly into the management of a statutory but semi-autonomous public corporation. Mr. Dalton's autumn preview of next year's budget showed that he, at least, does not ignore the need for incentives in the form of increased spending power in return for effort. Though the risk of inflation in a time of acute commodity shortage prevented him from lowering materially the onerous, and deliberately restrictive, level of indirect taxation, his modest cut of 10 per cent in the standard rate of income tax and his partial restoration of the pre-war scales of tax-free "allowances" free two million people in the lower brackets from direct taxes on their pay packets, and represent quite an encouraging relief for all incomes up to $10,000 a year. (Why he made these concessions apply even to unearned income is something of a mystery; and his failure to restore the tax-free "earned-income allowance" up to a maximum of £300 has been so criticized as a departure from the principle of "more incentives" that he will probably incorporate this further relief in the budget when it is finally presented next April.)

But can a little lightening of what is bound to be for many years a terrific burden really provide the energizing principle? The mystique of the nineteenth-century British Socialists—brotherhood, social service, "each for all and all for each"—would have an old-fashioned, high-falutin' ring in the ears of British Labor today. The worker, by and large, is out for his "rights," whether the "boss" is a public corporation or a private employer, and he expects a Labor government to see that he gets them. The entrepreneur sees too many obstacles for his liking in the way of profitable activity; like the vanished prehistoric animals he is failing to adjust himself to his new environment. And the professional administrators, Mr. Burnham's "managerial class," in the big corporations and the higher grades of the bureaucracy have been left too tired by the war to wonder whether or not history is giving them omnipotence.

In time, one trusts, the Labor government will evolve a positive plan for Socialist action to fill the vacuum which at present exists. It is not very encouraging to learn that the promised National Investment Board, whose establishment was to follow the nationalization of the Bank of England, is likely to take the form of yet another "negative" control designed to withhold capital—by a licensing system imposed on new issues—from "unessential" undertakings. But, then, this Parliament is still young; ultimately the absolute necessity of fulfilling the promise of full employment will force the government to move with greater intrepidity along the road to "positive" socialism.

The question which overshadows all these immediate domestic perplexities is the problem of the bomb. This week's debate on it in the Commons was a bitter disappointment. Applauded by the Tories, Mr. Bevin struck despair into the hearts of the Labor back benches. He did not, it is true, go all the way with Mr. Churchill, who seemed to imagine that peace could be permanently imposed by an Anglo-American alliance—provided that the United States never lost its lead in the manufacture of bigger and better bombs, sold some to Britain, and persuaded the minor countries to eschew atomic weapons and trust in the wise, kind English-speaking policeman. To that counsel of despair, which would mean the confirmation of Russia's worst suspicions and the jettisoning of the whole work done at San Francisco, Mr. Bevin did not quite lend himself. He stressed his desire to see the authority of the World Security Council gradually strengthened and his disapproval of power politics, and he disclaimed any intention of planning action "detrimental" to the U. S. S. R. in Eastern Europe. But his references to Russia—seeking to "get right across the throat of the British Commonwealth" —were undisguisedly hostile; he indorsed the view that there should be no sharing of atomic knowledge—as if there were any real "secret" left to keep—until the international relations had been improved by "time and conciliation"; and he made it plain that he was just as determined as President Truman to retain powerful national armed forces of all kinds.

Appalled by this Palmerstonian speech, to which Mr. Attlee listened in silence, Labor members were left wondering whether it led to any conclusion really different from Mr. Churchill's Anglo-American alliance against Russia, whose determination not to be left behind in the atomic race Mr. Molotov had just emphasized. For is there much future for a World Authority if two of its principal members claim the right to outdo the rest in striking power? Is there much scope for "time and conciliation" to work if an ideological line-up against one great power is already evident?

Law and Legalism

BY RUSTEM VAMBERY

(Professor of criminal law and former dean of the Law School at the University of Budapest)

JURISTS may still be wrangling over their concept of law, as Immanuel Kant accused them of doing nearly two centuries ago. There are, nevertheless, some established principles governing these allegedly indefinable rules of conduct. "Blut ist ein ganz besonderer Saft," wrote Goethe; and law, which circulates in the veins of the body politic, is a particular kind of precept. It is not merely a variety of prose divided into articles and sections. No lawmaker can afford to disregard the fundamental principles of law and jurisprudence. If he does, the enforced rules will be law only in name, as were the so-called laws issued by Mussolini and Hitler. Civilized nations have evolved these principles at the cost of millions of human lives, sacrificed in the struggle against tyranny, and no change in the substance of law should ignore them, for they are constituent parts of man's Bill of Rights and of our Western civilization.

There can be no difference of opinion about the necessity of exterminating the monsters who were responsible for the unspeakable horrors in Europe and Japan. That the Nazi and fascist leaders should be shot or hanged by the military or political power goes without saying, but has nothing to do with law. The selection of the culprits is the business of the political or military machinery. Application of a legal procedure in dealing with an unsuccessful revolution is not adequate, for, as a familiar couplet puts it:

> Treason can never prosper—What's the reason?
> If it does prosper none dare call it treason.

If an attempt is made to apply the law of a stable society to the atrocities of revolution and war in a world turned topsy-turvy, the narrow frame of law will burst without restoring the desirable order.

However, it was in defense of law and justice that the Allied forces fought and died—unless we use these terms as a euphemism cloaking imperialist interests. The law was not Polish or Dutch or French or Czechoslovak law, but the fundamental principles which are common to all civilization and which the authoritarian revolutions had flouted. Judges guided by "sound popular feeling," introduction of the principle of retroactivity, the presumption of future guilt, the collective responsibility of a racial or political group, the denial of protection to the individual against the arbitrariness of the state, the revival of tribal revenge, and the most atrocious cruelty were salient features of what Hitler's Germany understood by law. Anyone familiar with the history of criminal law knows how many centuries or rather millennia it took before the exact opposite of this Nazi theory and practice became generally recognized as an integral part of law and justice.

This historical development should not be ignored by the Allies in their endeavor to restore pre-Nazi law. Thus far the trial of "war criminals" in France and elsewhere has revealed little respect for pre-war legal principles. Unfortunately, the Indictment of the leading war criminals filed with the International Military Tribunal also exhibits characteristics reminiscent of Hitlerian jurisprudence. Of course the United Nations War Crimes Commission would not confess to the application of such homeopathic methods, but the fact seems clear. The Indictment is partly a succinct account of the events of World War II, partly a summary of the horrors perpetrated by Germans in occupied areas and in Germany itself. However, when it declares without any supporting evidence that "about" four million persons were exterminated in Auschwitz and one million tortured in Rovno and does not say who committed these unprecedented crimes, it must be regarded as an explanation of why the Allies waged the war rather than as a legal document.

In his report to the President Justice Jackson warned against the danger that the trials would become enmeshed in "doctrinal disputes, which are part of a lawyer's paraphernalia." It appears from the Indictment itself, which repeatedly refers (Sections VIII and X) to "the general principles of criminal law as derived from the criminal law of civilized nations," that the fundamental principles of jurisprudence are not merely whimsies of pettifogging lawyers or, as Lord Wright has put it, "pseudo-legal or legalistic rules having no basis in the common conscience of mankind." Observance of these principles is not merely the craft of the legal guild; the doctrine of law is not a professional artifice but the guaranty of the freedom of all the citizens.

It is regrettable that the Indictment, which conforms neither to the principles of law in general nor to the principles of international or criminal law in particular, as these are "derived from the criminal law of all civilized nations," should not be in accordance with the first principle of all justice—impartiality and disinterestedness. Prior to Hugo Grotius the victors had the "right" to punish the vanquished, but in our age it seems strange that an International Court composed exclusively of the victor powers should pass judgment on the war criminals of the vanquished. It is true, however, that one of the judges, Professor Donnedieu de Vabres, may be considered impartial, since he insisted in one of his books that the democratic states should accept the criminal policy of the authoritarian governments!

Moreover, it is the charter establishing this International Military Tribunal which "defines" the crimes for which the war criminals are going to be tried—if the words "other inhuman acts committed against any civilian population, before [how long before?] or during the war" can be termed a definition at all. According to the late Elihu Root, "If the law of nations is to be respected, the theory upon which the criminal law is founded must be adopted in respect to offenses against international law."

Thus far no authoritative attempt has been made, in custom or in general practice, to extend the precepts of international law—the sources of which are listed in Article 38 of the Statutes of the Permanent Court of International Justice—to cover the condemned and forbidden conduct of individuals. After the assassinations at Marseilles the French government suggested that the League of Nations set up an International Criminal Court, but to no avail; and as one of the greatest American authorities, Manley O. Hudson, has said ("International Tribunals," 1944, p. 186), "The time is hardly ripe for the extension of international law to include judicial process for condemning and punishing acts either of states or individuals." The jurisdiction of the International Military Tribunal can therefore scarcely be said to rest on a firm basis, since its charter, like all rules of international law, requires acceptance by the customs of all civilized nations. Even if we agree with Viscount Simon, former Lord Chancellor of England, who said on March 20 last in the House of Lords that a "properly constituted military court has jurisdiction in an occupied country to deal with war crimes," the competence of such a court with regard to "crimes against peace and humanity" is doubtful. There is no reason whatever why a German who murdered or enslaved anyone in Germany should not be tried by a German court. Lord Wright, one of the judges at Nürnberg, wrote: "We are proud that we live under the rule of law and of the legal machinery for enforcing it." I wonder whether we should be proud of the rules of procedure which the prosecutors appointed by the victor powers have agreed upon.

Even more contrary to the principles of criminal law and as unprecedented in the non-authoritarian part of the world is the determination of what should be considered "crime" by the victors, that is, by the prosecutors, as it appears from the report of Justice Jackson to the President and the definition of the "crimes" in the charter. A liberal German scholar, Franz von Liszt, termed the penal code the Magna Charta of the criminal; certainly it is the Magna Charta of the honest citizen, whom it protects against the arbitrariness of the authorities. A fundamental principle of law is that the law should decide the punishment and define as precisely as possible the acts constituting the punishable crime. But the charter not only leaves to the tribunal, as Viscount Simon expressed it, "the prodigious responsibility to select the punishment" but defines the crimes in a legally inexact, indeed in an appallingly vague, manner. Article 6, Point C, of the charter speaks of "crimes against humanity," namely, murder, extermination, enslavement, etc. Murder, which by the law is no crime against humanity but against human life, is defined very differently in the English Common Law and in the French Penal Code. Who is going to decide what was an "inhumane act" twenty years before the war? If the International Military Tribunal does so, what differentiates it from Hitler's law courts, where the judge passed sentence according to the "sound sense of the people"?

Count I of the Indictment is a "common plan or conspiracy to commit crimes against peace, war crimes, and crimes against humanity." Leaders and accomplices are "individually responsible for their own acts and for all acts committed by any persons in the execution of such plan or conspiracy." In plain language, the collective responsibility that prevailed in the tribal age of mankind is restored, in spite of the principle, recognized even by Roman law, that "a society cannot commit crimes." It took a long time for the recognition of responsibility for criminal guilt to become "the basic principle of the judicial and legal system of Western civilization in the last century" (Sutherland, "Principles of Criminology," 1939, p. 352). In violation of this fundamental principle all participants of the conspiracy are being indicted not only for their own acts but for those of other conspirators, no matter whether they knew of them or not. This is all the more reprehensible as the crime termed "common plan or conspiracy" embraces also all crimes against peace, all war crimes, and crimes against humanity.

This means, for example, that Gustav Krupp von Bohlen—or perhaps his son, who has become a criminal according to the rules of the Pentateuch, which visit the sins of the fathers upon their sons—having helped the Nazis to power and used labor for the conduct of an aggressive war, is supposed to be responsible for all murders and other horrors perpetrated by any Gestapo or S. A. man, even if he is unaware where, when, and by whom these crimes were committed.

Collective responsibility hinges on the crime against peace, which is "defined" as planning, preparing, or waging a war of aggression or participating in the planning of such war. We are not told exactly what constitutes an "aggressive war," but the facts substantiating this crime are all political and military events that occurred after the foundation of the Nazi Party in 1920. We may take it for granted that the outrageous deeds of the Nazi regime, as a report to the President assumed, offended the conscience of the American people, who "viewed the Nazis as a band of brigands." However, the United States maintained diplomatic relations with this "band of brigands" up to Pearl Harbor without, apparently, preventing the execution of "the Nazi master plan."

We are told that only acts should be punished "which have been regarded as criminal since the time of Cain." Many despots, tyrants, and dictators have indeed committed atrocities which from time immemorial have been considered crimes. But in no country has the planning or waging of aggressive war ever been tried by a law court.

Autant pis, some people may say. If aggressive war thus far has been no crime, it is certainly desirable that it should be made punishable. Whether the charter has the authority to fill this lacuna is doubtful. But such legislation cannot be made retroactive anyway—not only because Article 9 of the Constitution of the United States interdicts ex post facto laws but because all tyrants from Nero to Hitler have used retroactivity, as Professor Lauterpacht puts it, "for cloaking arbitrariness in the garb of law." But this is exactly what the Indictment is doing. One of its authors, Justice Jackson, asserts the contrary and as evidence refers to the Briand-Kellogg pact of 1928, which outlawed war, and to the Geneva Protocol of 1924 and the Resolution of the Pan-American Conference of 1928, both of which declared that war of aggression is an international crime. This argument, however, is fallacious in two ways. The Nazi Party and its subsidiary organizations, founded in 1920, became "the instrument of cohesion among the defendants and their co-conspirators" (Indictment, Count I, 4, A). In other words, the accusation refers in part to action predating the above-quoted international conventions, which declared aggressive war to be an "international crime."

Assuming, however, that the conspiracy to wage an aggressive war continued after such a war had been declared a crime. It still cannot be ignored that "a conspiracy to commit a crime is a different offense from the crime that is the object of conspiracy" (W. Mack–W. B. Hale: "Corpus Juris," Vol. XII, p. 542). Now, crime is "a wrong directly or indirectly affecting the public to which the state has annexed certain punishments" ("Corpus Juris," Vol. XVI, p. 51), and the "guilty knowledge of the act done by the conspirators is a necessary element without proof of which there can be no conviction" ("Corpus Juris," Vol. XII, p. 552). Moreover, it is generally accepted that "a law providing punishment for an act which was criminal when done but for which no punishment was provided is ex post facto as to that act" ("Corpus Juris Secundum," W. Mack and D. J. Kiser, Vol. XVI, p. 8892). Can it be sanely assumed that all members of the Nazi Party "with knowledge of its aims and purposes became an accessory," to the murder of all the four million persons exterminated in Maidanek? After all, no crime can exist without the combination of a criminal act and criminal intent ("Judicial and Statutory Definition of Words and Phrases," Third Series, II, p. 694). To be made responsible for all the war crimes and crimes against humanity specified in Counts III and IV, the knowledge of the aims and ends of the party, the Gestapo, and the S. A. or S. S. is scarcely sufficient, since to be an accomplice, an accessory, or an abettor the knowledge in each and every case of when, where, and by whom the crime was committed is an irremissible element unless we accept the Hitlerian principle of presuming a future guilt.

There are other principles of law and jurisprudence with which the Indictment is at variance, but the violation of non-retroactivity sets the most dangerous example. Patrick Gordon Walker, speaking over the B. B. C., acknowledged that the acts which the defendants are accused of were not deemed crimes, but he thought the Indictment contained not an infringement but the establishment of a rule of law. However, no law can be established by violating the elementary principles on which both law and human civilization rest. It is not a lawyer's crotchet to insist on these principles. Recklessly to disregard them is to threaten the very foundation of our social life. Maintenance of law is of permanent interest; revolutions are transitory episodes in the history of human society. In liquidating revolutions legal means are unfit instruments unless they help to restore pre-revolutionary law and order. Observing legal formalities while ignoring the essence of legal principles necessarily results in atrocities against justice itself.

In Kipling's poem, "Norman and Saxon, A.D. 1100," we have been told:

> The Saxon is not like us Normans.
> His manners are not so polite.
> But he never means anything serious
> Till he talks about justice and right.

Is the Nürnberg trial going to dispute this statement?

The People's Front

[Last week Mr. del Vayo described the sudden attack on the Spanish Republican government launched in the Cortes by Indalecio Prieto, the man chiefly responsible for the composition of the Cabinet. The opposition, led by Dr. Negrin, promptly protested his action in a message addressed to the President of the Republic. This dispatch discusses the further consequences of the Prieto maneuver.]

Mexico City, November 23

THE parliamentary opposition gave President Martínez Barrio a week's grace in which to reply to its message, after which the text was published. Although respectful in tone, it amounts to a severe criticism of the government's policy, which in the three months since Giral's appointment as Premier has been increasingly feeble. The tables have been turned. Each day the government becomes weaker and the opposition stronger. But the opposition itself has been inhibited in action by its fear of causing damage to the Republic. The opposition would like to see the Cabinet either strengthened or replaced, but it does not want it to fall as a result of the maneuver of "los liquidadores" (the Prieto faction). The message presented to President Martínez Barrio is a last appeal from the opposition to the men who, under the constitution, can change the present course. It says: "Faced with a grave reality which is contrary to our most fervent hopes, it is our duty to inform Your Excellency that up to November 8 [the day Prieto delivered his speech in the Cortes] we believed we might be wrong in our judgment, and even hoped so. Since that date, it has been impossible to go on juggling fear with hope, sentiment with anguish, lest failure and even disloyalty bring down the Republic in collapse or subject Republican institutions to ridicule, and also place in an awkward position the nations which have recognized us. We cannot and will not participate in this. It is the prerogative of Your Excellency to prevent this havoc. In exercising that prerogative, we wish you success. If no move to save the situation is taken, it is our unalterable decision to regain our freedom of action and to defend the Republic and its institutions by whatever means are within our reach."

This document was presented to the President on November 13. Today the answer finally came, and it proved a vague and disappointing one, containing no hint that any immediate action was contemplated but criticizing the opposition for not having fought harder in the Cortes—an amusing reproach coming from that source. Actually the only solution would be to remove from the Cabinet the two Ministers who represent Prieto's faction. That is the very minimum that must be done, especially since Prieto, not satisfied with his speech in the Cortes, repeated the other day in an interview in the newspaper Excelsior that the moment an alternative to the Republican government in exile presented itself, his group would consider itself free to withdraw its support from the government. Surely, Prieto would proclaim himself the first and best of the Republicans; but it should be noted that even among some of his own followers his speech was very badly received. They are anti-Communists, and they hate Negrín because Prieto hates him, but they are Socialists and do not want the Socialist Party identified with a policy of capitulation. They fear an agreement between Negrín and Largo Caballero, the old Socialist leader, who only six months ago was the idol of the New Leader and Matthew Woll, and who now is in imminent danger of being called a fellow-traveler. Last Saturday, at a meeting of the Prieto group here, it was said, although still in very respectful and cordial terms, that since Caballero had been in a German concentration camp for three years, he "must have lost his contact with the reality of the Spanish situation." Caballero's position regarding the Communists is coming closer to that of the Negrín group. He believes that until the liberation of Spain is achieved, all the anti-fascist forces which fought during the Spanish war must be kept together.

In the Excelsior interview, more specifically than in the Cortes, Prieto advocated a plebiscite under the control of the Latin American republics and suggested that a proposal to this effect be presented at the next Pan-American conference.

The plebiscite idea is not new to Prieto. He presented it in a speech in Havana in July, 1942, and during the past three years he has revived it several times amid a tempest of protests from the Spanish emigration. The idea is wrapped in a sophisticated argument designed to keep us quiet. "What kind of Republicans are they who doubt the outcome of a plebiscite?" asks Prieto. But the rest of us know that such a plebiscite would only help the Monarchists and the fascist successors of Franco. For almost ten years in a great part of Spain and for more than six years in all of Spain the people have lived under terror. Hundreds of thousands of Spaniards have died, physically or morally, or have been twisted by the worst kind of totalitarian propaganda—propaganda full of slander and lies against the Republic and its men. A plebiscite taken before the Republic is restored and the fascist organization destroyed, before the Spaniards are reintegrated in a normal civil and political life, would be, in the words of a Republican friend, a "grotesque proposition." A plebiscite taking place under the supervision of other nations—even though they are close to us in sentiment and culture as are the Latin American countries—is unacceptable to us. Spain is not a country to accept tutelage, any more than are her sister republics of South America, which would also decline our tutelage in solving their internal disputes. It is a further question whether all the Latin American countries have been so free from dictatorial influence in the last two decades that they could be set up as arbiters of a war between the Spanish people and fascism—a war which is yet to be ended and won. "I denounce," Negrín has said, "this plebiscite proposal as the continuation of that defeatism which nullified the efforts of our brave fighters, of that policy of capitulation which brought our war to an ignoble end and sacrificed the Spanish people, of that conformism which is equally ready to accept the republic or the monarchy. . . . I call attention to a treachery which might overwhelm Spain—as it did France." The acclamation with which his words were received was really a plebiscite against the liquidadores.

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

Scarce Minerals and Tariffs

BELIEVING that the mineral resources of the United States have become so depleted that national military strength and economic standards are both endangered, Secretary of the Interior Harold L. Ickes urges in the December issue of the American the necessity of a broad conservation program. "We must begin at once," he says:

> To stockpile minerals;
>
> To explore our country more intensively than ever before;
>
> To hunt for better methods of recovering metal from scrap;
>
> To have access, in common with other peacefully disposed nations, to minerals in lands that have been conquered in the recent war, for from now on we shall be increasingly dependent on imports for our minerals.

To take the last point first, I feel Mr. Ickes should have been a little more explicit. The chief countries conquered in the war are Germany and Japan, which, as he notes elsewhere in his article, are "have-not" nations so far as minerals are concerned. Other foreign resources are not in any way barred to American consumers though they, in common with all consumers, have sometimes been forced to pay a hold-up price by monopolies and cartels. In the case, however, of copper, lead, zinc, tungsten, and manganese, all vitally important metals in peace or war, the chief obstacle to imports is the American tariff, imposed for the protection of high-cost American producers of these minerals.

Economically, as Professor Percy W. Bidwell has pointed out in the October issue of Foreign Affairs, it is very hard to justify tariff duties on the products of extractive industries. It is not possible to urge, as it is in the case of "an infant industry," that given temporary shelter a mine will expand and increase its efficiency. No amount of protection can turn low-grade ore into high-grade, but by adding to profits it encourages mine owners to work their best seams while the going is good. It does, of course, also enable some low-grade operations which might not have been undertaken at all to be carried on, but it does this at the expense of the metal-using industries, which, by and large, are America's most efficient producers and the ones giving the highest return to the nation per man-hour of labor. Free trade in metals, which would enable such industries to obtain their raw materials at competitive world prices, would mean more economical use of our total resources. It would involve, naturally, the closing of mines whose costs of production were above world prices, but that, in turn, would preserve underground a stock of marginal and submarginal ores for use in an emergency.

In his magazine article, the Secretary of the Interior does not mention the tariff though he asserts that we shall have to import copper, lead, zinc, and other metals "in larger and larger quantities" if our chromium-plated civilization is to be preserved. However, he declares that conservation by closing mines would be wasteful because it would make impossible the recovery of much ore already developed. Moreover, the social cost involved in the collapse of many mining communities would also be very high. Since the abolition of the tariff would have such effects in many cases, Mr. Ickes must either favor its maintenance or support the alternative method of insuring his objective—a continuance of the war-time subsidy system.

If uneconomic mining operations are considered vital to the national interest, their direct support by the taxpayers is preferable to their indirect support through tariffs. For one thing, subsidies can be graduated, as they have been during the war, so as to encourage the use of low-grade ores without offering bonanza profits to cheap producers. Thus during the past few years some 75 per cent of the domestic copper mined has been raised without subsidy and profitably sold at the ceiling price of 12 cents a pound. But the production of the marginal 25 per cent, which could not be spared when war requirements called for every possible ounce of the metal, would not have been forthcoming without additional incentive payments. If the problem of including extra production had been left to the forces of supply and demand, as it was in World War I, the price of copper might easily have risen to 30 cents, making a large addition to total war costs. Thanks to subsidies, the average cost to the government was under 14 cents a pound.

Mr. Ickes does not directly advocate subsidies though he does say that private industry should be given government aid to enable it to carry on exploration and research. His stockpile scheme might also be linked to a subsidy program, as he proposes that a large national inventory of metals be built up by purchases in times of depression. This would help to stabilize both prices and employment. During the war the government has accumulated such a stockpile, which could form the nucleus of a permanent reserve.

The question arises: Should such a reserve be held inviolate, for use in emergency only, or should it be operated on an "ever-normal-granary" basis? That is to say, should its managers release metals for the market when supplies were tight and prices booming, as well as absorb them when commercial demand was weak and prices falling? In a nationally planned economy we would certainly need to take some such action in order to stabilize the mining industry, but managed metal prices are not going to be popular with business in general or mine operators in particular. Moreover, the United States is on record as strongly opposed to foreign attempts to hold prices at a profitable level by such means.

I have raised such points not in criticism of Mr. Ickes but in the hope that in some future article he will go into the subject more thoroughly. Particularly I would like to see him review it on an international rather than a national basis. For the problem of declining mineral resources is one for all peoples. America's reserves have shrunk more rapidly than those of some other nations mainly because its standard of living calls for a per capita consumption of metals enormously greater than that of any other country. But if, as we hope, average standards throughout the world are raised within the next generation to even as little as a quarter of the American level, the question of the adequacy of global reserves may well become a burning one. KEITH HUTCHISON

The Education of Evans Carlson

BY CAREY MC WILLIAMS

(A contributing editor of The Nation*)*

Los Angeles, November 21

ON SEPTEMBER 28, 1945, California newspapers carried an inconspicuous paragraph announcing that the Point Loma Democratic Club of San Diego had gone on record as urging Colonel Evans Fordyce Carlson, of Carlson's Raiders fame, "to make himself available for the position of United States Senator from California in 1946." Other Democratic clubs in San Diego promptly echoed the resolution. While Colonel Carlson has not agreed to run, he has expressed "a very real sense of obligation to work in the post-war years for the full realization of the objectives for which we fought the recent global war," and he has said that he expects to be released from active service as soon as his present hospitalization at the San Diego Naval Hospital is completed. This has proved sufficient encouragement for the San Diego Democrats, and a Carlson-for-Senator movement is now under way in California.

The "talk about Carlson" in California politics has an interesting genesis. On his release from the Marine Corps, Michael Blankfort, the Hollywood screen writer and novelist—at present engaged on a biography of Colonel Carlson—wrote several letters to Robert Walker Kenny, Attorney General of California, calling attention to the great political possibilities of Carlson. Though accustomed to discount such suggestions, Kenny met Blankfort at the California Club in Los Angeles and was apparently convinced without too great difficulty that Carlson was "a great guy." By midnight they were both on the telephone rousing Hollywood liberals from their sleep to announce the new political discovery. Since then the "talk about Carlson" has been persistent and increasingly enthusiastic. Recently I drove down to Escondido to spend a Sunday with Colonel Carlson, with the intention of finding out, if possible, how a professional soldier had managed to acquire a democratic social, economic, and political philosophy.

A NEW KIND OF DEMOCRAT

Colonel Carlson is not the easiest person in the world to interview. Since he is still in the service, he cannot take part in political activity, and he scrupulously respects this restriction. But he is quite willing, painfully modest man that he is, to talk about his experience with people in China and Nicaragua. Ironically, the education of Evans Carlson in democracy has taken place outside the United States. I am convinced that this education has been unusually thorough and that his unique experience has revealed to him a basic weakness in our conception of democracy. Should he run for the Senate, as I believe he will, he will represent a new kind of democrat in American politics. To understand his point of view, it is necessary to know something about his career—about his education in realism.

Although Colonel Carlson was born in Vermont, a distinct handicap in California politics, he has his roots deep in California. His father was "the first white child born in Alpine County, California"—Native Sons and Daughters please note—and was christened Thomas Alpine Carlson. Still living, the father is a retired minister of the Congregational faith. That Colonel Carlson is the son of a minister provides, I believe, the first clue to an understanding of the man. Point Loma Democrats have stressed his "moral integrity" and his "ethical qualifications for public leadership," and these are the qualities one first notices in him. One gathers, however, that Colonel Carlson at an early age became dissatisfied with some of the answers given by his father to his questions about matters of faith, for at sixteen he ran away from home and enlisted in the army.

He served as a private with a field-artillery unit in the Philippines and Hawaii from 1912 to 1915. When his period of enlistment was up, he was advised to apply for a commission, but was rejected when, for the first time, he revealed his true age. After working for a year or so as an engineer with the Highway Commission in Riverside, California, he reentered the army in 1916 for service on the Mexican border. Commissioned a second lieutenant in 1917, he was later promoted to first lieutenant and then to captain, served in France with the Eighty-seventh Division, and for a time was Assistant Adjutant General of the Third Army (the army of occupation). In 1919 he resigned his commission and got a job in California. A few years later he entered the Marine Corps, becoming a captain in 1935. It was in the Marine Corps that his real education began.

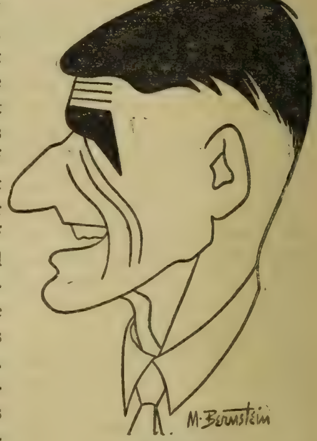
SHANGHAI AND NICARAGUA

Attached to the staff of Major (now General) Vandergrift, Carlson accompanied the Third Battalion, Fourth Marines, to Shanghai in 1927, and served as regimental intelligence officer there until 1929. As an intelligence officer, he believed that it was incumbent upon him to know something about China—its people, its customs, its politics, and its culture. This first assignment in China was therefore really a freshman course in Far Eastern affairs.

In 1930 Carlson applied for service with the Guardia Nacional in Nicaragua, giving as his reason a desire to work with native peoples. His experience in Nicaragua supplied the second chapter of his socio-economic education. Among his assignments was a term as chief of police of a Nicaraguan town. Since the agreement under which the marines were in Nicaragua stipulated that the courts were not under our control, the judges reflected the prevailing anti-Yankee sentiment of the people and Carlson found it extremely difficult to secure convictions. Realizing that the courts would not cooperate, he decided to take the problem of law enforcement directly to the people. First of all he sought to win their confidence by demonstrating that the rich and well-born were not immune from arrest—something of a novelty in Nicaraguan life. He also set about establishing direct, personal contact with the people, and to this end proceeded to teach himself the language.

"YOU CAN TRUST THE PEOPLE"

Before his term of office was over, he was functioning as chief dispenser of justice and personal adviser to the people. It was in Nicaragua that he first got a pervading sense of confidence in the people and in the workings of the democratic process; he learned, he says, that "you can trust 'the people.'" When he left Nicaragua, he was awarded the medal of Merit by the President for his relief work after the earthquake of March 31, 1931, and the Medal of Distinction as a token of the esteem in which he was held by the people. Listening to him recount his experiences with all sorts and conditions of people in Nicaragua, one realizes that for him Nicaragua was a fine training school in the techniques of democratic leadership.



Colonel Carlson

Returning to China in 1933, Carlson resumed his post as intelligence officer at Shanghai. During his previous assignment in China (1927-29) he had closely studied the Kuomintang government then being established in Nanking. Now he requested a transfer to Peking so that he might have a better opportunity to study the Chinese language and the cultural and historical background of the Chinese people. From 1933 to 1935 he served as adjutant of the guard at the Peking legation. One might assume that such an experience would tend to make a man an authoritarian, but for Carlson, who carried a well-worn edition of Emerson's "Essays" on all his travels, these were particularly fruitful years.

When he first went to Peking, the marines spent most of their leisure hours carousing and pushing Chinese "coolies" off the street. Carlson thought it would be a good idea to cultivate their interest in China and thereby improve their morals. With the assistance of his old friend, Edgar Snow, he organized a forum program for the marines which soon became a popular adult-education center. He even induced the men to learn a little Chinese. Once the marines were assigned the task of digging a deep excavation for an installation. Knowing that the site had archaeological interest, Carlson got the men interested in what they might discover. As the excavation proceeded, they found and carefully preserved numerous coins, artifacts, ceramics fragments, and the like. All these items were laid aside, catalogued by experts in the presence of the men, and later shown as a special Marine Corps exhibit. For Carlson, these years in Peking were a kind of post-graduate course in Chinese history and culture. Among his personal acquisitions was an expert knowledge of Chinese ceramics.

Back in America in 1935 Carlson served as aide-de-camp to General Charles H. Lyman at Quantico and got permission to attend night classes at George Washington University in international law and politics, with special emphasis on the Far East. As part of his studies he wrote a thesis on Japanese expansion which concluded with a prediction that in the near future Japan would attack the United States. In November of 1935 Carlson became commander of the Marine detachment assigned to guard President Roosevelt at Warm Springs. It was there that he got to know the President as a friend. Although it is not generally known, Carlson served the President as a special intelligence officer on Far Eastern affairs when he returned to China in 1937, reporting directly to the White House.

THE LESSON OF YENAN

During this third assignment in China Carlson was an observer with the Chinese armies at the battles of Nanking and Hankow. On his own initiative he covered more than 2,500 miles with the Chinese Communist forces behind the Japanese lines in North China and Mongolia, the first foreign military observer to study the tactics and training methods of these famous guerrilla fighters. His experience was graphically described in his book "Twin Stars of China," published by Dodd, Mead in 1940. Of particular interest are his accounts of his interviews with such leaders as Chu Teh, Mao Tse-tung, and Chow En-lai. From his experience in North China, superimposed on his Nicaraguan experience, Carlson got the ideas about democratic indoctrination and training that he put to such effective use in his Marine Raider Battalion.

Carlson resigned from the service in 1938 to join the American Committee for Non-Participation in Japanese Aggression—the Stimson committee—which was trying to mobilize American opinion to demand an embargo on the shipment of scrap iron and war materials to Japan. In a speech before the Foreign Policy Association in Boston on March 2, 1940, he warned against "a surprise attack from the air," which he characterized as "more imminent than a surprise attack through any other medium," urged an ethical indoctrination of our military personnel, and called for a foreign policy "designed to convince other nations of our desire to meet them on terms of equality, which will assure them of our integrity, of our sense of justice, and of our good-will toward all nations."

In July, 1940, he returned to China to make a four-thousand-mile tour of the Chinese industrial cooperatives with Rewi Alley. He interviewed Chiang Kai-shek at Chungking and continued to report directly to President Roosevelt on Chinese affairs. Early in 1941 he hastened back to America convinced that Japan intended to strike soon for Singapore. Commissioned a major in the Marine Corps in April, 1941, he later organized the famous Second Marine Raider Battalion of Gung-ho fame. He landed with the Second Marine Division at Tarawa, accompanied the assault units in the Marshall Islands operations, and took part in the battle for Saipan, where he was wounded. He has received about all the decorations the services have to offer—the Navy Cross (three times), the Legion of Merit, two Purple Hearts, and three Presidential Unit Citations, for Guadalcanal, Tarawa, and Saipan.

UNIQUE QUALIFICATIONS FOR SENATOR

It is apparent that Colonel Carlson would bring to the United States Senate some unique qualifications—an expert knowledge of Far Eastern and Central American affairs and of the people of those areas, an expert knowledge of our military establishment together with some ideas about the necessity for democratizing the services, a realistic knowledge of the kind of world we live in, a profound faith in democracy, and great skill, based on wide experience, in the techniques of democratic leadership. After Hiram Johnson, James Phelan, and Samuel Shortridge, who did so much to undermine American prestige in Asia, California might well take pride in a Senator who actually understood the peoples of the Far East. (A Senator who speaks both Chinese and Spanish would be, I take it, a rather exceptional figure on the hill.)

In the course of our conversation Colonel Carlson said that the American people must renounce the "success myth," with its emphasis on individual achievement, and acquire something that they now seem to lack, namely, a sense of identification with the democratic process. By this he means not merely the formal identification expressed by going to the polls at stated intervals to cast a ballot but a living, creative, participating identification with democratic processes in personal and family relationships and social conduct. He constantly emphasizes the necessity for self-discipline in a democracy, the kind of self-discipline that he found in the Eighth Route Army. Essentially, his concept of democracy is that of John Collier—"democracy livingly, immanently experienced." Both men apparently acquired this concept of democracy from their experience with non-industrial, or rather pre-industrial, peoples; Collier from his life among American Indians, Carlson in Nicaragua and China. It is a concept of democracy that industrialism has damagingly corroded in the Western democracies and that only the vigorous self-discipline advocated by Colonel Carlson seems able to restore.

Recently I asked Staff Sergeant Willard D. Darling for his impressions of the Colonel. In reply he wrote: "I find that words are of no use to me. When the Colonel is mentioned you don't think, you feel things inside of you that you were not aware of, that become a part of your life while you are with him. There was never a man who left his outfit who did not grit his teeth to keep the tears back, and some couldn't. He is the kind of man you would go to hell for should he tell you to, and never ask the reason why." A man who can inspire this feeling in those he commands has demonstrated his capacity for democratic leadership. Colonel Carlson frequently quotes these words from a speech which President Roosevelt was prevented by death from delivering: "Today we are faced with the preeminent fact that if civilization is to survive we must cultivate the science of human relationships—the ability of all peoples, of all kinds, to live together and work together in the same world, at peace." Our problem, in other words, is to create a real democracy based upon individual self-discipline and cooperative effort.

Houghton Mifflin Company's

Gift Guide

Books to cure a Christmas headache

	Fiction			Non-Fiction
	Romance	Froth	Chills	The past	The present	Timeless
Heavy Thinker	Best American Short Stories Children of the Covenant Swing Low	Looking for a Bluebird Hunky Johnny The World, the Flesh, and Father Smith	Beneath the Stone	Thomas Jefferson Raw Material Against These Three	Europe in Revolution One Nation More Lives Than One	The Practical Cogitator The Wisdom Tree Encyclopedia of World History
Returned Hero	Hunky Johnny Written in Sand Birth of Mischief It's a Free Country The World, the Flesh, and Father Smith Hurry Home to My Heart The Private Adventure of Captain Shaw	Outside Eden Suds in Your Eye High Time Country Mouse	Bedelia Leave Her to Heaven Beneath the Stone Who Wants to Live Forever? The Valley of Dry Bones	Slow Train to Yesterday Thomas Jefferson Against These Three Elizabeth & Leicester	House of Europe Gumbo-Ya-Ya When Johnny Comes Marching Home More Lives Than One	The Practical Cogitator The Wisdom Tree The Garden Dictionary
Highbrow Harriet	Best American Short Stories The Far Away Music Swing Low The World, the Flesh, and Father Smith Hunky Johnny Children of the Covenant	Looking for a Bluebird Outside Eden	Bedelia Beneath the Stone	Thomas Jefferson Against These Three Elizabeth & Leicester	Gumbo Ya-Ya One Nation More Lives Than One Where Do People Take Their Troubles?	The Practical Cogitator The Wisdom Tree
Best Seller Fan	Jennifer's House The Far Away Music The World, the Flesh, and Father Smith The Birth of Mischief	Looking for a Bluebird Outside Eden Suds in Your Eye High Time Country Mouse	Leave Her to Heaven	Thomas Jefferson Against These Three	Gumbo Ya-Ya The Great Answer	The Practical Cogitator
Ivory Tower Tenant	Portrait of a Lady My Antonia Mirror for Witches U.S.A. Tale of Genji	Their Wedding Journey Marjorie Daw	Midnight on the 31st of March Number One Elsie Venner	Patterns of Culture Mont St. Michel and Chartres Maritime History of Massachusetts Audubon's America	Looking Backward Mein Kampf	Selected Works of Thoreau (Canby) Selected Works of MacLeish Road to Xanadu
Lending Library Liz	Private Adventure of Captain Shaw Jennifer's House The Birth of Mischief The World, the Flesh and Father Smith Hurry Home to My Heart Hunky Johnny Red Fruit	Outside Eden Suds in Your Eye High Time Country Mouse	Leave Her to Heaven Bedelia	Elizabeth & Leicester	Where Do People Take Their Troubles? The Great Answer	Mrs. Appleyard's Kitchen
Radio Readers	Paddle to the Sea The House of Seven Gables Johnny Tremaine	Peterkin Papers Tales From Uncle Remus	Smoke Jumper Adventures of Richard Hannay Adventurers All	Tree in the Trail A Picture History of Britain The Story of a Bad Boy Two Years Before the Mast Log of a Cowboy	The Moved-Outers Sky Highways	A Natural History of Birds Anthology of Children's Literature Field Guide to Birds
Man of 1960	Pecos Bill Don Coyote The Little House Jack Tales	Anybody at Home? Feed the Animals Where's My Baby? The Little Red Hen	Katie and the Big Snow The Big Fire	Little History of the United States	Ilenka Little Georg What Makes it Tick?	Prayer for Little Things Very Young Verses Anthology of Children's Literature

BOOKS and the ARTS

PILOTS, MAN YOUR PLANES

BY RANDALL JARRELL

(A Jill is a Japanese torpedo-plane)

Dawn; and the jew's-harp's sawing seesaw song
Plucks at the starlight where the planes are folded
At the lee of their blank, wind-whipped, hunting road—
A road in air, the road to nowhere
Turreted and bucketed with guns, long undermined
With the thousand necessary deaths that breathe
Like fire beside a thousand men, who sleep
Hunched in the punk of Death: slow, dreaming sparks
That burrow through the block-long, light-split gloom
Of their great hangar underground and oversea
Into the great tanks, dark forever; past the steam
Of turbines, laundries—under rockets,
Bakeries, war-heads, the steel watch-like fish,
To the hull's last plates and atmosphere:
The sea sways with the dazed, blind, groping sway
Of the raw soul drugged with sleep, the chancy life
Troubling with dreams its wars, its own earned sea
That stretches year on year, death after death,
And hemisphere on blind black hemisphere
Into the stubborn corners of its earth.
Here in the poor, bleak, guessing haze of dawn
The giant's jew's-harp screeches its two notes
Over and over, over and over; from the roar
Of the fighters waved into the blazing clouds
The lookout lifts his scrubbed tetanic stare
Into the East of light, the empty day.
But on the tubes the raiders oscillate
A mile in every nine or thirteen seconds
To the target's first premonitory bursts;
To the boy with a ball of coffee in his stomach,
Snapping the great light buckles on his groin,
Shifting his raft's hot-water-bottle weight
As he breasts the currents of the bellowing deck
And, locked at last into the bubble, Hope,
Is borne along the foaming windy road
To the air where he alone is still Above the world's cold, absent, searching roll.
The carrier meshed in its white whirling wake,
The gray ship sparkling from the blue-black sea,
The little carrier—erupts in flak,
One hammering, hysterical, tremendous fire.
Flickering through flashes, the stained rolling clouds,
The air jarred like water tilted in a bowl,
The red wriggling tracers—colonies
Whose instant life annexes the whole sky—
Hunt out the one end they have being for,
Are metamorphosed into one pure smear
Of flame, and die
In the maniacal convulsive spin
Of the raider with a wing snapped off, the plane
Trailing its flaming kite's-tail to the wave.
A miss's near, near bloom, a hill of foam,
Is bulged skyward, crashes back; crest after crest
Patterns the ships' cat's-cradle wakes, the racing
Swells that hiss outward from a plane's quenched flame:
There is traced in the thousand meetings of the grave
Of matter and of matter, man and man,
The print of the running feet upon the waves. . . .
The Jill threads her long, blind, unbearable Way into fire (the waves lick past her, her whole sky
Is tracer and the dirt of flak, the fire
Flung from the muzzles riddling sea and sky),
Comes on, comes on, comes on; and the fighter flames to her
Through his own flak, the hammering guns
Stitch one long line along his wing, his gear
Falls, his dive staggers as his tracer strikes,
And he breaks off and somersaults into the sea.
Under the canopy's dark strangling green,
The darkening canopy, he struggles free
To float into the choking white, to breathe—
His huge leg floating and immovable,
His goggles blackened with his own bright blood—
On the yellow raft, to see his carrier
Still firing, but itself a fire, its planes
Flung up like matches from the stern's white burst.
Now rockets arch above the deck's great blaze,
Shells break from it, trail after trail; its steel
Melts in steam into the sea, its tanks explode
In one last overwhelming sound; and silently
The ship, a flame, sinks home into the sea.
The pilot holds his striped head patiently
Up out of the dancing smother of the sea
And weeps with hatred, longing, agony—
The sea rises and settles; and the ship is gone.

The planes fly off looking for a carrier,
Destroyers curve in their long hunting arcs
Through the dead of the carrier: the dazed, vomiting,
Oil-blackened and fire-blistered, saved or dying men
Cling with cramped shaking fingers to the lines
Lowered from their old life: the pilot,
Drugged in a blanket, straining up to gulp
From the mug that scrapes like chalk against his mouth,
Knows, knows at last; he yawns the chattering yawn
Of effort and anguish, of hurt hating helplessness—
Yawns sobbingly, his head falls back, he sleeps.

RANDALL JARRELL

THE PORTRAIT OF NEW ENGLAND

BY LOUISE BOGAN

THE BOSTONIANS. By Henry James. With an Introduction by Philip Rahv. The Dial Press. $3.

"THE BOSTONIANS," evidently written sometime between James's fortieth and forty-second year, serialized in the Century Magazine in 1885, published in both England and America in 1886, has never until now been reprinted in an American edition. Its non-appearance in the Collected Edition (Scribner's, 1907-17) has raised various questions, chiefly concerned with James's apparent later squeamishness toward the frank insight of his early work. Whatever the reason, James never rewrote the book, as he did some others. It stands, therefore, as perfect "early James." That it has not become, and will never become, a "period piece"—a novel irremediably of its time, an outmoded lump of costume drama—can be put down to the fact that James, in his early forties, "knew the world." "The Bostonians" is shot through with the lights of humor, with the satire of a detached, experienced, disabused, civilized intelligence. Far out of the milieu he presented, James drew the picture of Boston in the '70's with the greatest variety of detail, the utmost vivacity of presentation. He is grinding no ax, shedding no tears, driving through points without fanaticism. His separation from his material gives him a freedom that is almost the freedom of an expert in some sport; James often, here, plays a wide, high, and handsome kind of game. The underlying tone of the book is gay—the tone of high comedy.

The title is not to be applied to the inhabitants of Boston in the large. James makes it clear that his "Bostonians" are two young women—Olive Chancellor, of a certain position and means, "a spinster, as Shelley was a lyric poet or as the month of August is sultry," living on the water side of Charles Street; and Verena Tarrant, the daughter of a mesmerist and all-round charlatan, who lives in a wooden cottage "with a little naked piazza," on an unpaved "place" in Cambridge. Verena has a "gift"—the gift of eloquence. She is able to move audiences, speaking inanities in a voice that James compares to both silver and gold. She is, that is, a kind of reductio ad absurdum of that influential American figure the platform orator. Got up in a costume resembling that of a circus rider, she opens her pretty mouth and exerts her fresh and genuine charm upon a variety of audiences in the cause of women's rights. Olive is, by contrast, a far more complicated character. A woman of distinction (James insists on this throughout), no fool, completely in earnest in her desire to establish some contact with "the toilers"—the workers who, she senses, touch reality beyond and "beneath" the layer of middle-class vulgarians she despises, Olive is yet sterilized by an aridity of spirit, baffled by genteel prejudices, and warped by a nervous constitution. Set against James's portrait of a woman reformer of an earlier period—the warm-hearted, eccentric, but touching Miss Birdseye—Olive Chancellor is a rather terrifying resultant of Puritanism gone to seed, a female organism driven by a masculine will, without the saving graces of masculine intelligence or feminine tenderness and insight.

These two young women move in a tepid atmosphere of post-Abolition idealism. It is an atmosphere still peopled by the cranks, faddists, cultists, evangelists, revolutionaries, and dogmatists so usual in America in the forties and fifties—the intellectual and emotional débris of the breakdown of faith, the beginning of the "scientific view," of the general ethos of still crude industrial and moral revolutions. James knew these visionaries, of all shades of sincerity and sanity, well; his father's New York home had been a sort of clearing-house for them. It is James's background of plain experience and accurate youthful observation which makes the revolutionaries in "The Princess Casamassima" so modernly recognizable and the cranks of "The Bostonians" so sharply alive. In these two books, written almost concurrently, James pays these characters his clear-sighted and ironic devoirs, and leaves them for good.

The "outside observer" in "The Bostonians" is, insolently and cleverly enough, a young man from the recently "conquered" South. Of first-rate intelligence, completely "unreconstructed," holding "unprogressive" ideals of manliness, courage, and chivalry, Basil Ransom, introduced into the midst of these, to him, vaporous ideas expressed by these decaying, except for Verena, personalities, has a civilized set of principles to fall back upon—principles that seem "medieval" to his cousin Olive and her "set." James's artistic and moral courage in setting, at the time, Ransom's "prejudices," Ransom's humorous and "feeling" nature, Ransom's underlying flexibility of outlook against the eerie and run-down New England prophets of "progress" and "change" cannot be underestimated. James had, it is true, Turgenev's example. Turgenev, earlier, had bent an artist's eye on the follies committed in the name of "progress" by the romantic Russian reformers and their allies in the middle class (he invented the term "nihilist"). "The Bostonians" loses nothing by being read along with "On the Eve" and "Rudin"; and Verena Tarrant often resembles a Turgenev heroine. But James, in describing her surroundings and giving her motives, is triumphantly on his own ground.

Ransom's pin-point sharpness of eye results in a sort of continual sparkle in the first part of the book. The young Mississippian does not hesitate to put a name to things; he sorts out the real from the artificial instantly. He spots the self-sufficient sincerity of the little woman doctor with the same swiftness with which he puts down Verena's father as a "carpet-bagger" and a "varlet." He sees through the pretentiousness of Mrs. Luna; and he does not fail to see true discrimination and an actual passion for justice in Olive, in spite of his quick recognition of her manias. James succeeds in keeping Ransom free from a romantic emphasis. As Philip Rahv, in his preface to this edition, says, "In the figure of Ransom [James] created with remarkable prescience a type of intellectual who has only in the last few decades come to the fore in the English-speaking world . . . a type, ex-

The Debut of an American Classic

The Friendly Persuasion

by JESSAMYN WEST

THE FRIENDLY PERSUASION is a rare and beautiful adventure in reading. Jessamyn West has filled her book with the color of the Indiana countryside, with homely wisdom, with a love for people, and a gaiety and wit that flavor each chapter.

CHARLES LEE: "Her writing sings . . . No mere seasonal triumph . . . bears the hallmark of literature."

ASSOCIATED PRESS: "This is a most subtle and sensitive author, informed exhaustively about the human heart." $2.50

ALL TRIVIA

By LOGAN PEARSALL SMITH

Here are the "tremendous trifles," as Don Marquis called them, emended and revised by the author. $2.50

BLACK METROPOLIS

By St. Clair Drake and Horace R. Cayton. A study of Negro life in a Northern city. "Great . . . From cover to cover, this is a book of intellectual discipline and talent."—NEW REPUBLIC. Charts and diagrams, $5.00

VIRGINIA WOOLF

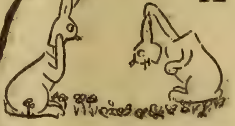
By Joan Bennett. Her art as a novelist: "Provocative . . . For it leads one at every point to the text of Virginia Woolf, to the special beauty and significance which it is the critic's duty to discover."—N. Y. TIMES. $2.00

TRIAL BALANCE

By William March. 55 of his stories, many of which have never appeared in book form, and several new ones published here for the first time. $3.50

JAMES THURBER

A Tale of Love and Magic and other Perils



THE WHITE DEER

With illustrations by the author and four pages in multi-color by Don Freeman. $2.50

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY

NEW SCRIBNER BOOKS TO GIVE TO READ · TO OWN

TERESA; OR HER DEMON LOVER
By AUSTIN K. GRAY

A brilliant and authoritative biography of Teresa, Countess Guiccioli, the last of Lord Byron's "ladies." "Deftly done, clever and highly entertaining."—Orville Prescott, New York Times. Illustrated. Second printing. $3.50

THE SHELLEY LEGEND
By ROBERT METCALF SMITH
In collaboration with Martha M. Schlegel, T. G. Ehrsam and L. A. Waters

A brilliant, provocative, and authoritative exposure of the mistaken efforts to turn the "romantic pagan" Shelley into a Victorian angel. An important contribution to Shelley biography. Illustrated. $5.00

THE FOREST OF THE SOUTH
By CAROLINE GORDON

Sixteen stories and a novella about the South and Southerners. "A very fine book . . solid, varied, delightful and original."—Paul Engle, Chicago Tribune. $2.50

FOR THEE THE BEST
By MARK ALDANOV

"A dryly humorous historical novel about the nationalistic Carborari movement in which Byron was associated. Byron steals every scene in which he appears, and is felt as a presence even when he is absent or after he is dead."—Carlos Baker, New York Times. $2.50

at your bookstore
CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS, NEW YORK

A welcome gift in history and biography is "LEE'S LIEUTENANTS" by D. S. Freeman. Per volume, $5; Three Volumes, Boxed, $15.

emplified in writers like T. S. Eliot or the school of Southern agrarians, whose criticism of modern civilization is rooted in traditionalist principles. Thus James anticipated . . . one of the major tendencies in twentieth-century thinking."

Behind the central figures—and how masterly is the introduction and first grouping of these—James has painted in with complete solidity, combined with his own delicate, peculiar kind of poetic light and coloring, the New England social, spiritual, and physical scene as it has never been rendered before or since. Anyone who has grown up in New England during the last fifty years can vouch for the truth of these delineations of New England social and spiritual tremors. Here is the top layer shot through and through with the humanitarian feeling which must, rather guiltily, accompany utilitarian push and compromise—seeking for "roots" and reality. Here is the entire middle class yearning upward, toward "the fragrance of Beacon Street." James bares the many thin layers of provincial snobbery with scalpel nicety. Turns of both vulgar and affected speech; wrong entrances regretted; all sorts of little affronts taken as "liberties"; shabby genteel uneasiness; upper-class idées fixes and brutalities of placement ("it is as though [I] had struck up an intimacy with the daughter of [my] chiropodist"); the beginning of newspaper curiosity into private lives; the pushing tactics of the vigorous outsider—the whole brittle, energetic, shifting scene, filled with cruelty, uncertainty, nervousness, and "nerve": here it stands in James as in our memory.

Nor does he scamp the scene's décor and backdrop. Note the poignant description of the period's American bleakness, seen in "the red sunsets of winter" from Olive's drawing-room windows. Remark the details of another Boston dusk, as Ransom walks the Boston streets before Verena's "big" lecture. Consider the exquisite description of the Cape—the background James sets behind the bitter struggle between Ransom and Olive for the "possession" of Verena. One sentence, beginning, "There were certain afternoons in August, long, beautiful, and terrible, when one felt that the summer was rounding its curve," can be set, for sheer power of evocation, against anything in Emily Dickinson.

I have always associated the little "square," Union Park, in Boston, with "The Bostonians." Set between two busy and now run-down avenues, it takes the form of a flattened oval—that shape dear to the nineteenth century. Great trees shade it, around a grass plot running its length, decorated by two small cast-iron fountains. The red brick houses, with their "salient" bulging fronts running from top to bottom of the façades, exemplify the first Boston architecture purely American nineteenth-century in character. The naive assumption, usual at the beginning of technological, political, and generally materialist triumphs, that anything sufficiently bold and powerful must last forever is built into these "fronts" along with their brick and mortar. It was in such a house that Miss Birdseye lived, and that Ransom first saw Verena. But things change. Today—and for the last forty years or so—these houses have been shabby boarding-houses or "light-housekeeping" rooms. The roomers, armed with their paper bags of food and their milk bottles, return to them at night under the shadow of the gracious trees, mount the steps

GIVE THE BOOKS YOU'D LIKE TO GET

THE AGE OF JACKSON

by Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr.

Marquis James, Pulitzer Prize biographer of Andrew Jackson: "He has set a landmark in American historical literature . . . The book has depth, clarity and ease—and its people live. Many will understand better the causes that engendered, the forces that sustained and the aims that triumphed under the aegis of a leader who has lately left us and whose mark on American life is so like that of Jackson."

SEVENTH PRINTING • $5.00

The Story of the SECOND WORLD WAR

Edited by Henry Steele Commager. A series of vignettes, descriptions, analyses and historic statements by men and women who participated in or observed the war, all bound together with a general historical narrative by the Editor. With frontispiece and maps. $3.00

I SAW THE RUSSIAN PEOPLE by Ella Winter

Ella Winter went back to Russia to learn what had happened to daily life in the Soviet Union. The result is a warm-hearted introduction to the Soviet citizens and an exciting account of one woman's experiences in the homes, farms, shops, the theaters, courts, and schools, of the country which gave so much strength to defeat our enemy. $3.00

ROAD TO REACTION* by Herman Finer

Give the conservative friend who made you read Hayek's Road to Serfdom this brilliant exposé of Hayek's political and historical fallacies. In it, a distinguished political scientist points out the dangers in the attitude of those who welcome Hayek as the prophet of "free enterprise." $2.00

DILEMMA IN JAPAN by Andrew Roth

". . . grounded on facts . . . the result of logical thinking. He represents the younger school of American experts who are not blinded . . . by myths which even the Japanese do not believe."—Owen Lattimore. $2.50

New Fiction by Major Novelists

REPENT IN HASTE
by John P. Marquand
$1.50

WHERE MY LOVE SLEEPS*
by Clifford Dowdey
$2.50

THE HIGH BARBAREE*
by Charles Nordhoff and James Norman Hall
$2.00

SO WELL REMEMBERED*
by James Hilton
$2.50

COMMODORE HORNBLOWER
by C. S. Forester
$2.50

BEYOND THE SOUND OF GUNS
by Emilie Loring
$2.00

MANY LONG YEARS AGO
by Ogden Nash

Containing chiefly poems from earlier books now out of print, this volume, with I'M A STRANGER HERE MYSELF and GOOD INTENTIONS, represents Mr. Nash's collected verse as of today. $2.50

At all bookstores

Atlantic Monthly Press Books

LITTLE, BROWN AND COMPANY

beside the flourish of scrolled iron railings, and enter the big doors under obsolete, elaborate "gasoliers." The materialist spirit that thought to build enduring mansions built, instead, the most solid and dismal furnished lodgings.

In "The Bostonians" James fixes the crudities and misapprehensions of that spirit. Far from identifying himself with Ransom, he yet uses this character to throw uncompromising light on a humanitarianism itself grown harsh, proud, and aggressive, cut off from the humility and the realism which must be charity's true base. He shows us perfectionists blind to their own imperfections, liberals neutralized by their "liberality," radicals bound by unyielding dogma to callousness and sadism; as well as the "moist, emotional" yearners and the hysterics of both sexes, unconsciously seeking a ritual and a master that they consciously reject. "The Bostonians" fills a gap in our literature. It is important that it is again in print, available to those who have overlooked one of the greatest of American novels, which has existed, as it were, in the shadow of the very culture upon which it sheds light, since 1886.

BERTRAND RUSSELL AMONG THE SAGES

BY SIDNEY HOOK

A HISTORY OF WESTERN PHILOSOPHY. By Bertrand Russell. Simon and Schuster. $5.

BERTRAND RUSSELL'S history of philosophy is perhaps an event of the first importance in the intellectual history of Bertrand Russell. But it is not likely to be regarded as of comparable importance in the history of the history of philosophy. Reading this book, I was continually reminded of George Henry Lewes's "Biographical History of Philosophy." Under the inspiration of Comte and positivist doctrine Lewes undertook to write a history of philosophy exposing the pretensions of philosophy to knowledge. He pointed up his history to show that philosophy could not stake a valid claim for itself as constituting either a distinctive subject matter or a distinctive method. The conclusion was an eloquent plea that philosophical speculation be abandoned for scientific inquiry, especially in psychology. None the less, Lewes wrote such a lively and captivating account of the errors of philosophy that few readers completed it without a strengthened interest in the subject. In my own case it was one of the books that turned me to a closer study of philosophy.

Russell's aim is not as iconoclastic as Lewes's. For him the problems of philosophy, in so far as they are soluble, are problems of logical analysis, not psychology; in so far as they are not soluble they are simply not problems of knowledge. Although his temper is ironical rather than crusading, he conveys a profounder impression of the futility of philosophy than Lewes was able to do. Where Lewes, openly hostile to philosophy, makes the reader feel that it is of exciting concern to every reflective person, Russell, with a greater show of sympathy, fails to establish any good reason for thinking philosophy of the slightest practical importance except in getting rid of a few metaphysical bugbears. This failure is bound up with the weakness of his book as history and the unclarity of his conception of the nature of philosophy and what it can do. Despite this, the book has several merits which make it decidedly worth reading, and I shall discuss these first.

Russell is one of the great prose stylists in the English language. Reading him is a delight even when he says puckishly untrue things about his predecessors and contemporaries from Socrates to Dewey. Much of philosophic discourse must be technical; but there is also much that is needlessly so. Russell trims the verbiage to a minimum. What stands out in his style is its clarity, which has a deceptive simplicity for the unwary, a sensitiveness to logical form, and a graceful wit, often deflected by flippancy but sometimes sure and deadly. These qualities give Russell's work a buoyancy that floats the reader through almost nine hundred pages. He translates jargon into more familiar language. The account of Kant does not contain the phrase "the transcendental unity of apperception." There is an effort to make philosophers sound plausible even when it is obvious that Russell thinks they are talking nonsense. Sometimes they are even given the benefit of good arguments they could have used. In this way Russell succeeds in making almost all philosophers seem clear, usually clearer than they are. He is always on the lookout for the central nerve of argument, which he probes in an expert way. A dry humor gives added force to his criticism. Watching him brings to mind the swordsman in Thurber's famous cartoon who cuts off his opponent's head with one neat stroke and murmurs, "Touché!" All of these qualities are very unusual in other histories of philosophy.

But they have the defects of their virtues. Russell writes history like a mathematician: the complexity, the sense of depth and richness in the history of ideas and events are not communicated. This is true not only when he treats of religious heresies but also when he treats of the influence of scientific movements like Darwinism on philosophy. His approach is psychologically thin; he does not make plausible the compulsive "reasons" which have led philosophers to embrace doctrines that seem absurd or paradoxical. And sometimes the man whose head he cuts off isn't there!

The strongest merit of Russell's history is its emphasis on problems. It gets away from exposition for its own sake, from that dreary retelling of what philosophers have said in language that differs little from paraphrase. Russell's approach suggests that after allowance is made for the varying historical idioms in which problems are put, there are certain perennial problems that always emerge when men consider the foundations of knowledge and belief. Wherever he runs across them, Russell steps out of the historical frame and offers to solve them. The solutions may be moot, but the procedure gives life and a dimension of contemporaneity

Challenge at Changsha

By Paul Hughes

A novel of epic proportions built around a vast, bloody military operation — the third battle for Changsha. Through the personal and poignant reactions of the men who fight, their women, and the people of Changsha, the whole magnificent panorama is brought to life. Like War and Peace, Challenge at Changsha will not soon be dated, for it is not a military record but a rich tapestry woven from the human substance of history. $2.50

THE SMALL GENERAL

By ROBERT STANDISH

A rollicking novel of contemporary China. "Offers much as an intimate tapestry of Chinese life." — Chicago Daily News. "By long odds better than anything Standish has done before . . . wholly delightful . . ." — New York Sun. $2.50

MY FELICIA

By PAUL DRISCOLL

The story of a beautiful Polish-American girl who was loved by two men: the sensitive rich boy whose ancestors founded the mill in which her immigrant mother worked, and the appealing Irishman involved in politics and rum-running. $2.50

My 25 Years in China

By John B. Powell

Here is J. B. Powell's long-awaited book on China. Reporting civil wars and invasions, kidnapped by bandits, in direct touch with political and economic developments throughout the Far East, imprisoned and tortured by the Japanese, Powell was always in the thick of things. His book is an informed appraisal of contemporary Chinese history. $3.50

Wartime Mission in Spain: 1942-1945

By CARLTON J. H. HAYES

The first fully authentic report of our policy in regard to Spain: a personal account of the Ambassador's role in ensuring Spain's neutrality and aid to the Allies. An interesting and significant book. $3.00

Russia and the Western World

By MAX M. LASERSON

An objective answer to a crucial question: what role will the Soviet Union play in world affairs? This dispassionate appraisal of Russia's foreign and domestic policies clarifies many Russian actions which may puzzle us today. $2.50

At all bookstores THE MACMILLAN COMPANY

Books from the HARVARD
UNIVERSITY PRESS

The First Volume in the American Foreign Policy Library Edited by SUMNER WELLES

The United States and Britain
by CRANE BRINTON

A book which gives the public, in exceedingly readable and simple form, a comprehensive understanding of the British people, their government and the issues involved in Anglo-American relations. Maps. $2.50

Why Smash Atoms?
by ARTHUR K. SOLOMON

A new, revised edition brought up to date to include the latest authoritative information on the atomic bomb. The Journal of the American Chemical Society says: "An excellent popular story of contemporary research in nuclear physics . . . warmly recommended to interested laymen." $3.00

General Education in a Free Society
THE REPORT OF THE HARVARD COMMITTEE

"The sanest, most practical statement of our national educational problems that I have yet seen."—Claude Fuess. Introduction by James Bryant Conant. $2.00

The Philippine Islands
by W. CAMERON FORBES

"Condensed from the two-volume edition, Governor Forbes' major work has retained its authority, its clear, readable style, its comprehensive and sympathetic treatment of every major element."—Far Eastern Survey. $5.00

The Road to High Employment
Administrative Controls in a Free Economy
by DOUGLAS B. COPLAND
Professor of Economics, University of Melbourne

A cogent analysis of the importance of both public and private investment in the maintenance of a high and stable level of employment in a free economy. $1.75

Financing Full Employment
by J. PHILIP WERNETTE
President of the University of New Mexico

Dr. Wernette outlines a positive program to achieve full employment and prosperity with the minimum of governmental regulation and a maximum of free private enterprise. $2.00

At all bookstores

HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS
Cambridge 38, Massachusetts

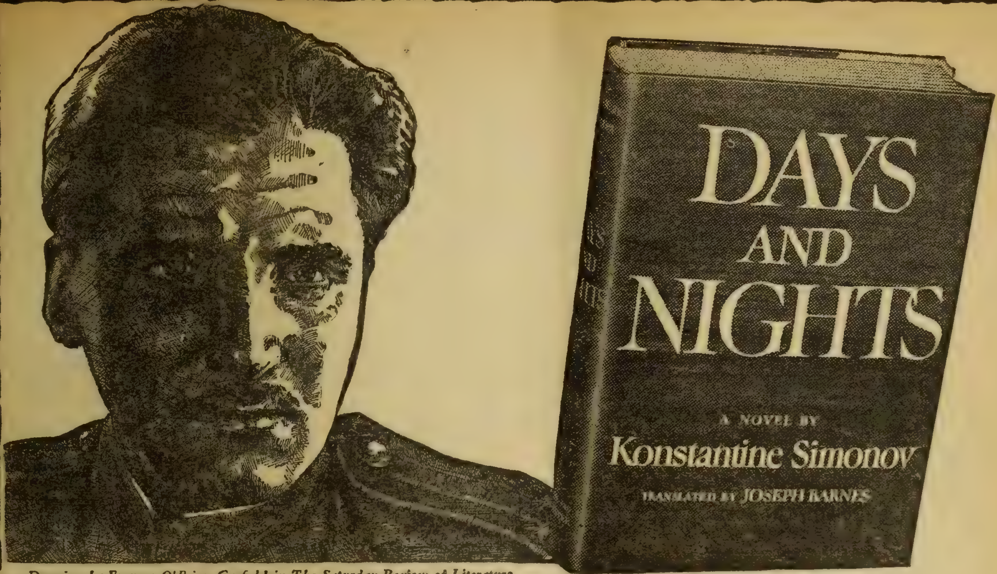
to material that lies dead in the pages of conventional historians.

While his emphasis is on problems, Russell does not neglect cultural and political history. The book is bravely dedicated in its subtitle to a study of philosophy in its "connection with political and social circumstances." Although the connection is, so to speak, side by side rather than in and out, a great quantity of political and social history is presented in narrative form, so that the reader is aware that philosophers are men and live in definite social and political climates of opinion even when the philosophers themselves show no awareness of this. The treatment of the social and political history of the medieval period is unusually extensive for a history of philosophy.

Finally, flashing through the pages, are Russell's insights on men and issues challenging the pieties of the stuffed tradition with simple truths, simply put. Speaking of the long history enjoyed by the idea of the gentleman in philosophical and educational theory, he writes: "The gentleman is to be defined as one of a society of equals who live on slave labor." After a frank evaluation of the Socratic dialectic, he comments on Socrates: "As a man we may believe him admitted to the community of saints: but as a philosopher he needs a long residence in a scientific purgatory." Platonism, when analyzed, "is found to be in essence Pythagoreanism." Of Aristotle's metaphysics: "Roughly speaking [it] may be described as Plato diluted by common sense. He is difficult because Plato and common sense do not mix easily." Rational mystics like Plotinus and Spinoza are treated gently; romantics like Rousseau, Schopenhauer, and Nietszche with devastating irony. Leibnitz is treated as a supreme intellect and as a supreme prig. Russell seems always intent upon appraising the I. Q. of philosophers. It is almost as if he were matching himself against them—and was satisfied with the result. This, too, makes for a certain freshness.

None the less, the work as a whole is very disappointing. It will not influence historical writing on philosophy, nor will it help Russell's reputation. It fails first of all to achieve what it set out to do. The connection between most philosophical ideas and their social and political circumstances is not established. In places this connection is interpreted in terms of the narrow economic interests of the class to which the philosophers belong, according to the fashion of "vulgar" historical materialism. This can never explain why Aristotle and Plato differ in their views on property and other subjects. One need only contrast Russell's treatment of philosophy in Greek culture with Dewey's to see how extrinsic it is. In his discussion of the late medieval controversy between realism and nominalism he overlooks its connection with important social issues, like opposition to a universal church and the rise of individualism.

Russell divides philosophy into what is scientific and what is ultimately personal opinion. The first is treated independently of culture, the second almost exclusively in terms of it. This simple division is irrelevant to exploring the hypothesis that philosophy and culture are integral to each other. Granted that the logical validity of scientific philosophy is independent of its social origins, the problem is: Why do these ideas, true or false, arise and spread in some social periods and not others; what influences the change in scien-



—Drawing by Frances O'Brien Garfield in The Saturday Review of Literature for this breathtaking novel of Stalingrad, by Russia's young hero-reporter-poet,

INSTANT ACCLAIM

Konstantine Simonov

"The love story of little Anya and her huge captain is told with such delicacy and grace that one easily understands why the whole battalion fell in love with Anya. No one can read Days and Nights without a lift of the spirit and some little accretion of pride in being a man."
—Gerald W. Johnson,
New York Times Book Review

"'When a book raises your spirit and inspires you with noble and courageous feelings, it is good and made by a good workman.' Days and Nights is a good book made by a good workman. It is a touchingly simple love story. And so well has Simonov written his tale that he purveys the gift of hope." —Ernestine Evans,
New York Herald Tribune Book Review

"The finest of the Russian novels to reach us."
—Lewis Gannett, New York Herald Tribune

"The triumphant success of this book is easy to understand. It is an intense, dramatic, and intimately authentic account of action in one of the most momentous battles of history. It is significant as an expression of Russian emotion about Russia's greatest victory."
—Orville Prescott, The New York Times

"It is undoubtedly one of the finest modern novels about men and women at war. Threaded through it are the epic heroism of 'War and Peace,' the tender poignancy and sharp reality of 'A Farewell to Arms.' The heroic characters are as honest, as recognizable, and as universal in their own way as Mauldin's Willie and Joe."
—Richard E. Lauterbach, The Chicago Sun

"'Days and Nights' thrills the reader like the rolling drums of Chopin's Funeral March."
—William McFee, New York Sun

As these reviews show, Days and Nights is being greeted as the greatest novel to come out of the Soviet Union. In Russia it sold more more than 400,000 copies. It has just been published in the United States, in a splendid translation by Joseph Barnes. The Book-of-the-Month Club has chosen Days and Nights as its November selection.

$2.75 At Your Bookseller's • Simon and Schuster, Publishers • New York City

tific world outlooks? On the other hand, even if the rest of philosophy is defined as "an organic whole of extra-rational decisions," is it so obvious that these decisions and related ideas are overwhelmingly determined by social and political motives? Russell feels himself to be in substantial agreement with Marx, but Marx does not equate economic conditions with economic self-interest. To say, as Russell does, in discussing usury, that "the views of philosophers, with few exceptions, have coincided with the pecuniary interest of their class"—and there are suggestions that he believes this is true of many of their views on other things, too—is closer to Bentham than to Marx.

Russell fails once more in presenting a rounded account of the technical philosophical systems of the great philosophers. He relies too much on secondary sources and, where not, gives a running commentary on one or two of the philosophers' works without setting forth the philosophy whole. He lacks the sympathetic imagination of a good historian. One has long since given up expecting him to be even fair in his exposition of Dewey. In criticizing for the fourth time Dewey's definition of inquiry he overlooks for the fourth time Dewey's explicit statement that "discourse through the use of symbols is intrinsic to inquiry," and thereby convicts Dewey of believing that drill sergeants and bricklayers are masters of inquiry. It is amusing to observe Russell's complete rejection of Hegel, whose pan-rationalism is legitimately criticized, when he is himself using in this very history—however inadequately—a cultural approach we owe to Hegel.

Last, and strangest of all, Russell fails to give even a coherent account of the meaning of philosophy and its uses. He begins by defining philosophy as a field of opinion intermediate between science, which possesses definite knowledge, and theology, which entertains dogmas about what is beyond knowledge. He ends by identifying the method of philosophy with the method of logical analysis, which is able to reach conclusions both definite and valid. This would make philosophy a part of science. Throughout the volume we are constantly assured that all questions of value are merely questions of taste, that reason, argument, scientific evidence are essentially irrelevant to judgments of value. But his very last words maintain that the philosophy of logical analysis can "suggest" and "inspire" a way of life, that it can be "extended to the whole sphere of human activity," with beneficent results. Among these results are "a lessening of fanaticism with an increasing capacity of sympathy and mutual understanding." But if the grounds of our valuation have nothing to do with scientific method, why should he believe that the extension of the habits of scientific inquiry and logical analysis will not only affect our moral judgment but improve it?

Like every other historian of philosophy Russell has a philosophy of history, too. It is suspiciously like Spengler's. All important cultures inevitably develop from a stage in which the social system is tyrannical, superstitious, but stably organized to a stage in which, as a consequence of brilliant intellectual achievements and the spread of rationalism, traditional social bonds are dissolved, resulting in anarchy. This is followed by a new authoritarianism that goes through the same cycle. Russell pleads for the philosophy of liberalism as an escape from this "endless oscillation." The distinctive feature of liberalism is "an attempt to secure a social order not based on irrational dogma." But if Russell were logically consistent in his value theory, he would have to admit that liberalism is just as much an irrational dogma, since no reasons can inform it, as Hitlerism and Stalinism. By all means let us build a social system based on rational dogma. But if it is truly rational, how does it differ from a truth or from a conclusion believed true in virtue of the scientific method used in its discovery?

Russell's moral skepticism, as well as his scientific skepticism, defeats itself in the literal sense that he finds himself incapable of believing what is entailed by his theoretical position. It is possible that his theory is sound and he himself not strong enough to live up to its blinding truth. Before reaching this conclusion, it would be well to explore other positions according to which it is his theory that is weak and his moral judgments sound.

The Dream from Which No One Wakes

LITTLE FRIEND, LITTLE FRIEND. By Randall Jarrell. Dial Press. $2.

IT IS an open secret, and a pity, that Randall Jarrell is known chiefly as the author of overwhelming wisecracks about other poets. Jarrell is not entirely innocent of responsibility for this reputation, nor is the reader: both are perhaps too eager to forget everything for the sake of a good laugh. But only the reader who forgets the jokes and remembers Jarrell's first two books will be prepared for the extraordinary growth in this new book. In his first two books many of the poems were weakened by a thinness and abstractness of texture and reference; it was as if the poet saw his subjects through opera glasses. One was forced to remember Eliot's observation that "the great poets give us real men, talking; set up before us real events, moving." For all the genuineness of the poems, the net result resembled the dim and ghastly negative which has to be held up to the light, and not the developed photograph full of daylight and defined objects. And it was impossible not to think of Jarrell's critical prose and to guess that if only the wit might be part of the verse, what a modernist Pope we might have.

The wit remains absent and the abstractness is not entirely dissolved. But in this new book Jarrell has a much closer, much more intimate grasp of his subject, perhaps because he has actually lived through the war with which his first poems were also concerned, but concerned in terms of intuition and premonition, not of the event and the aftermath. From the start Jarrell's sensibility has been avid, ravenous to know, to take in what really exists, to stay awake and to stare at the dark as well as the light. In "Little Friend, Little Friend" this quality of mind, this passion to be aware and awake and alive, comes up against the immense, international, and yet muffled, scattered, masked terror of war, precisely the kind of phenomenon to make such a mind most articulate, as Shakespearean heroes are most eloquent and full of insight when they are dying. Instead of general affirmation or re-

The pros and cons of the literary controversy of the day

THE QUESTION OF HENRY JAMES

A COLLECTION OF CRITICAL ESSAYS

Edited by
F. W. DUPEE

AN OUTSTANDING volume of 26 of the best critical essays on the merits of Henry James, climaxing 60 years of debate on the subject. Not all the essays are favorable. They range from merciless parodies of his style to the high praise of the men responsible for today's unprecedented interest in his novels and stories. "Recommended as the most useful single book on a major American writer whose work is now being republished and reappraised."—Library Journal

Among the critics represented: Max Beerbohm, Joseph Conrad, Van Wyck Brooks, Edmund Wilson, T. S. Eliot, Philip Rahv, Andre Gide, and 19 others.

302 pages, with index and bibliography of critical papers on James, $3.75

AT ALL BOOKSTORES

HENRY
HOLT
& COMPANY

Illustrated with 34 full-page drawings

A RIBBON AND A STAR

THE THIRD MARINES AT BOUGAINVILLE

Text by JOHN MONKS, JR., co-author of Brother Rat
Illustrations by JOHN FALTER, famous cover artist of the Saturday Evening Post

A tough, direct, personal account of the historic Marine victory by a participant in the battle. $2.75

"Brilliant . . . A lesson for Americans to ponder."
—N. Y. Times Book Review

TIN HORNS AND CALICO

By HENRY CHRISTMAN
Introduction by CARL CARMER

The thrilling story of an unknown American revolution—New York's Tin Horn Rebellion of 100 years ago. "It would be difficult to recommend it too highly." — Minneapolis Tribune. 377 pages, illustrated, $3.75

Make it a hilarious
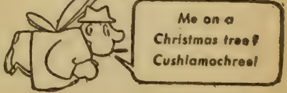
Christmas with

BARNABY AND MR. O'MALLEY

By CROCKETT JOHNSON

$2.00



Me on a Christmas tree? Cushlamochree!

"... opens windows on ... problems that must be understood and solved if the coming world is to be truly democratic."
—LEWIS COREY, The Nation

REPRESENTATIVE BUREAUCRACY

An Interpretation of the British Civil Service

By J. DONALD KINGSLEY

Deputy Executive Director, WMC; co-author of "Public Personnel Administration" and "Strategy for Democracy"; Professor of Government in Antioch College.

The Labor Party victory has swung Kingsley's book into the foreground of immediate tactics in the British scene and notably sharpened its relevance for America. Essential to an understanding of the forces shaping present-day democracy. 324 pages. $3.50

●

THE ANTIOCH PRESS
YELLOW SPRINGS, OHIO

H. G. WELLS—
Prophet of
the Atomic Bomb

Read his latest book:
"CRUX ANSATA — An Indictment of the Roman Catholic Church"
An historical summary of the Catholic Church's political intrigues leading to its tie-up with the Nazi-Fascist-Shinto Axis.
Cloth Binding $1.75 Paper-covered $1.25

Also get a copy of
"BEHIND THE DICTATORS" by L. H. Lehmann
A fully documented analysis of Vatican-Fascist collaboration.
Cloth Binding $1.75 Paper-covered $1.00

COMBINATION OFFERS Both Cloth Bound Books $3.00
Both Paper Bound Books $2.00

New Pamphlet
"VATICAN POLICY IN THE SECOND WORLD WAR"
48 pages of Documented Facts 25c

Free to those who return this ad with their order for the above books

Order From:
AGORA PUBLISHING CO., Dept. D51
229 WEST 48TH STREET NEW YORK 19, N. Y.

jection of the war, Jarrell takes the particular part of the dead. In poem after poem the dead soldier says, "Why did I die?" And that is the end of the poem. The bombers can't land in the fog, the child does not know why he is in the refugee ship, the prisoners load trucks like automata, the halfwit can accept his mother's death and the drafting of his sister, he can accept everything but that "They took my cat for the Army Corps," "And I cried, and I cried, I wanted to die." Indeed, the obsessive symbols of the cat, the child, and the dream emerge through most of the book, forced by the pressure of the emotions of hopelessness, helplessness, animal terror and animal tenderness, senseless death, and shrieking over-all perplexity at the fact that men kill each other.

These emotions show their effect in the development of Jarrell's versification. His personal rhythm is now both clear and various. To the ignorant or inattentive reader, who looks in poetry only for the sensational imagery and obvious chanting, Jarrell's writing may seem slack and loose when it is exactly the contrary. By means of justified repetition, hurried anapests, and a caesura fixed by alliteration Jarrell gets a wonderfully expressive syncopation of movement, a tone which insists, like a passionate stammer, and reiterates nervously because the whole being is compelled by anxiety and guilt:

> They lived, they died. "I am what I am,"
> Someone heard Swift stammer: he was crazy.
> Beethoven, dying, learned to multiply.
> What does it mean? Why, nothing.
> Nothing? . . . How well we all die!

New defects occur also as a result of the poet's growth. In some poems he writes like a nouveau riche in ideas, crudely brandishing and flourishing Marxist ideas and permitting himself such a line as "But soon all the chimneys were hidden with contracts," a mixture of the visual and the abstract which tries to and cannot become a genuine—which is to say, seen—image. An effort is made to versify Marx baldly, to go from statements about trade and credit to a perception of mines and mills. Consequently the poem collapses. Twice, and strangely for an author like Jarrell, he permits his emotions about the war to become an anger against books and the university. The thesis of Archibald MacLeish is renewed when Jarrell attempts to say that if knowledge and scholarship were not actually the causes of war, they ought somehow to have been able to transform capitalist society and prevent war. This banal and sentimental view arrives at hideous absurdity in the poem in which the climax is the burning of the university. Two opposed quotations bear directly on this kind of hysteria: "The letter killeth but the spirit giveth life"; "The spirit killeth, but the letter giveth life." It ought to be possible to remember both of these maxims, for both were spoken with authority and both may be useful pieces of knowledge.

For the most part, however, the motives of honesty, courage, and inconsolable love of life are here submitted to the conditions of poetry and fulfilled in them. If, as one poem declares, this life is a dream from which no one wakes, the dreamer has refused to deceive himself, to let himself go, and to forget what he believes and loves.

DELMORE SCHWARTZ

A Biographical Dictionary of Ancient, Medieval, and Modern Freethinkers

By Joseph McCabe. 60,000 words, in our larger format, pages 5½x8½ inches in size. 75c, prepaid.

McCabe's list of Freethinkers is so large that the result is sure to impress even Freethinkers. A study of the numerous dates in this encyclopedic work shows that skepticism or freethinking grows in all ages in exact proportion to the grant of freedom of expression and the diffusion of knowledge, and that this skepticism, beginning with a challenge of the prevailing religious form, deepens into Atheism.

This fine book's list includes almost 50 monarchs and heads of states, more than a score of the world's greatest musicians and artists, and hundreds of famous scholars and writers. It also includes less illustrious names that will prove of interest to the reader. In our opinion, the best advertisement for this book is a list of the Freethinkers who are given biographical treatment by McCabe. There are almost 500 biographical sketches in this book. Here is a partial list:

Abelard, Peter
Adams, John
Addams, Jane
Allen, Ethan
Alembert
Anaxagoras
Annunzio, d'
Anthony, Susan B.
Aristippus
Aristotle
Arnold, Sir Edwin
Arnold, Matthew
Asoka
Aspasia
Bakunin, Mikhail
Bacon, Lord
Balzac
Baudelaire
Beethoven
Bennett, Arnold
Bergson
Bierce, Ambrose
Bizet
Bjornson
Bolivar, Simon
Bonaparte, Prince
Bonheur, Rosa
Borrow, Geo.
Bradlaugh, Chas.
Brahms
Brandes, Geo.
Brieux, Eugene
Brooke, Rupert
Browne, Sir Thomas
Browning, Robt.
Bruno, Giorano
Buddha
Buffon
Burbank, Luther
Burns, Robert
Burroughs, John
Burton, Sir Richard
Byron, Lord
Butler, Samuel
Carlile, Richard
Carnegie, Andrew
Carlyle, Thomas
Caroline, Queen
Catherine the Great Chaucer
Cherubini
Cicero
Clemenceau, Georges
Clemens, Sam L.
Coleridge
Comte
Confucius
Conrad, Jos.
Croce, Benedetto
Curie, Marie
Curie, Prof. Pierre
Danton
Darrow, Clarence
Darwin, Chas.
Daudet, Alphonse
Debussy
Delacroix
Desmoulins
Dewey, John
Diderot
Douglas, Stephen
Dreiser, Theo.
Dumas
Edison, Thos. A.
Einstein, Prof.
Eliot, Prof. Chas. W.
Eliot, Geo.
Elizabeth, Queen
Ellis, Havelock
Emerson, Ralph Waldo
Epicurus
Erasmus
Euripides
Fabre, Jean Henri
Fels, Jos.
Ferrer, Francisco
Ferrero, G.
Feuerbach
Fichte
Fitzgerald, Ed.
Flammarion, Camille
Flaubert
Fourier
France, Anatole
Franklin, Benj.
Frazer, Sir James
Frederic II.
Frederic the Great
Freud
Gallatin
Galsworthy, John Garibaldi
Garrison, Wm. Lloyd
Gautier
Gibbon, Edward
Girard, Stephen
Goethe
Gorky
Gourmont, Remy de
Grant, U. S.
Hadrian
Haeckel
Harte, Bret
Hauptmann, Gerhart
Hawthorne, Nath.
Hazlitt, Wm.
Hearn, Lafcadio
Hegel
Heine
Helmholtz
Helvetius
Henley, Wm. E.
Heracleitos
Hobbes
Holbach
Holmes, Oliver Wendell
Holyoake, Geo. J.
Howells, Wm. Dean
Hugo, Victor
Humboldt
Hume
Huneker, James G.
Huxley, Prof.
Ibsen, Henrik
Ingersoll, Robt.
James, Wm.
Jaures
Jefferies, Richard
Jefferson, Thomas
Jordan, David Starr
Juarez
Julian, Emperor
Kant
Keats
Keith, Sir Arthur
Key, Ellen
Kropotkin, Prince
Lafayette
Lamarck
Lamb, Chas.
Lamennais
Lang, Andrew
Lao-tse
Laplace
Lassalle, Ferdinand
Lecky
Lenin
Leopardi
Lessing
Leuba, Prof.
Lewis, Sinclair
Liebknecht, Wm.
Lincoln
Locke, John
Lombroso
London, Jack
Longfellow
Lowell, James R.
Lowell, Percival
Lucretius
Madison, James
Manfred
Mann, Horace
Marat
Marcus Aurelius
Marlowe, Chris
Martineau, Harriet
Marx, Karl
Masaryk, Pres.
Mascagni, Pietro
Massenet
Maupassant
Maxim, Hiram
Mazzini
Melville, Herman
Mendel
Mendelssohn, Moses
Mencius
Meredith, Geo.
Merimee, Prosper
Metchnikov
Michelet
Mill, James
Mill, John Stuart
Milton, John
Mirabeau
Mirbeau, Octave
Moliere
Mommsen, Prof.
Montague, Lady
Montaigne
Montesquieu
Moore, Geo.
Morley, John
Morris, Gouveneur
Morris, Wm.
Morse, Prof.
Motley, John L.
Mozart
Musset, de
Nansen, Prof.
Napoleon
Nietzsche
Nightingale, Florence
Omar Khayyam
O'Neill, Eugene
Osler, Sir Wm.
Owen, Robt.
Owen, Robt. Dale
Paine, Thomas
Palmerston
Pasteur, Louis
Pater, Walter
Pavlov, Prof.
Pericles
Pestalozzi
Peter the Great
Pheidias
Phillpotts, Eden
Pirandello, Luigi
Pitt, Wm.
Planck, Prof.
Plato
Poe
Poincare, Prof.
Pope, Alex.
Protagoras
Ptah-hotep
Ptolemy II
Pushkin
Rabelais
Reade, Wm. Winwood
Renan
Ricardo, David
Robespierre
Rodin
Rolland, Romain
Rostand
Rousseau
Ruskin, John
Russell, Bertrand
Sainte-Beuve
Sand, George
Santayana, Geo.
Sardou
Schiller
Schopenhauer
Schreiner, Olive
Schubert, Franz
Schumann, Robt.
Seneca
Servetus
Shakespeare
Shaw, G. B.
Shelley
Smith, Adam
Smith, Prof. Godwin
Socrates
Spencer, Herbert
Spinoza
Stalin
Stanhope, Lady
Stevenson, Robt. L.
Strauss, Richard
Strindberg
Sudermann
Symonds, J. A.
Tagore
Taine
Tai-tsung
Talleyrand
Tchaikovsky
Tchekov
Tennyson
Thackeray
Thales
Thiers
Thoreau
Tolstoi
Turgeniev
Turgot
Twain, Mark
Tyndall, Prof.
Vandervelde, Emile
Vauvenargues
Verhaeren
Verdi
Verestchagin
Victoria, Princess
Virchow
Volney
Voltaire
Wagner, Richard
Wallace, Alfred R.
Walpole, Sir Robert
Ward, Lester F.
Washington, Geo.
Watt, James
Wells, H. G.
Westermarck, Prof.
Whistler
White, Prof. A. D.
Whitman, Walt
Wollstonecraft, Mary
Zangwill, Israel
Zeno
Zola

E. HALDEMAN-JULIUS
Box 1900, Girard, Kansas

ORDER BLANK FOR BIOG. DICTIONARY

E. Haldeman-Julius, Box 1900, Girard, Kansas

Enclosed find 75¢, payment in full for Joseph McCabe's A BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY OF ANCIENT, MEDIEVAL, AND MODERN FREETHINKERS. Prepaid.

Name..

Address..

City..State........................

BARGAINS in BOOKS

UP TO 75% OFF FORMER PRICES

Offered by America's Oldest Mail-Order Book House

GIVE BOOKS FOR CHRISTMAS

1. THE LOST BOOKS OF THE BIBLE and The Forgotten Books of Eden. Two volumes complete in one large, fully illustrated volume. Handsomely bound. 562 pages. This intensely interesting volume is highly recommended by Dr. A. Parkes Cadman, President of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America. Only $1.98

2. THE GOLDEN BOUGH. A Study in Magic and Religion, by Sir James G. Fraser. Index. 752 pages. "One of the greatest books of all time." Contains the wealth of the 12-volume edition published at $30.00 and formerly published in this 1-volume edition at $5.00. Only $2.49

3. I DISCOVER GREECE. By Harry A. Franck. 1st edition. Illustrated with 97 photographs, 359 pages. Century, 1929 (now out of print). "The Prince of Vagabonds" roams through the picturesque land of Ulysses and tells you what he saw. Published at $4.00. $1.29

4. FOREIGN LANGUAGE WORD CARDS. Stephens Word Cards. The famous simplified self-teaching system of foreign language study, containing 512 cards and illustrations. By means of these cards anyone can acquire a basic vocabulary and a general familiarity with Spanish, French, German, Italian and even Esperanto. Put up in an envelope. All for only $1.29

5. CARPENTRY. Craft Problems. By H. H. Siegle. With 700 illustrations. Index. Contains everything you want to know about carpentry. Only $1.98

6. A CENTURY OF MURDER MYSTERIES. 101 Years' Entertainment. The Great Detective Stories 1841-1941. Edited by Ellery Queen. 999 pages. From Poe to Agatha Christie, Ellery Queen has selected 50 of the finest detective-mystery-crime short stories ever written. Only $1.98

7. 10,000 TRADE SECRETS, RECIPES, etc. Fortunes in Formulas for Home, Farm and Workshop. (Henley's Twentieth Century Book of Ten Thousand Formulas, Processes and Trade Secrets). Edited by G. D. Hiscox, M.E. Illustrated. Index. 883 pages. (Formerly published at $4.00). Only $1.49

8. THE AMERICAN RIFLE. Our Rifles. A History of the American Rifle from 1800 to the Present Time. By Charles Winthrop Sawyer. With more than 450 illustrations of every known type of American rifle. Index. (New edition. Second-hand copies of the out-of-print edition have fetched over $20.00). Only $3.88

9. THE TRAVELS OF MARCO POLO. Ed. by Manuel Komroff. The 13th century Venetian merchant's own amazing story of his world travels. The most spectacular travel narrative ever recorded. Only $1.98

10. IN AND OUT OF COURT. By F. X. Busch. Illustrated. 306 pages. "As rare a collection of humorous courtroom incidents as has ever been gathered into one volume." Published at $3.00. Only $1.29

11. THE NEW WAY TO EAT AND GET SLIM. By Donald G. Cooley. Shows you how to eat well—yet lose 10 pounds in 10 days. Contains the "10-day miracle diet." Only $1.98

12. MEN PAST FORTY. By A. F. Niemoeller, A.B., M.A., B.S. Illustrated. "This great book contains an immense amount of wonderful information about impaired vigor, the prostate gland, weak manhood, rejuvenation, etc." Special $1.49

13. ENCYCLOPEDIA OF FURNITURE. By Joseph Aronson. 1,115 photographs, hundreds of drawings. The tremendous number of illustrations shows almost every kind and type of furniture ever made. For home decorators, collectors, antique dealers, architects, students, 424 pages. 8½" x 11". Only $2.98

14. BURTON'S ARABIAN NIGHTS. The book of the Thousand Nights and Night. By Sir Richard Burton. Complete and unexpurgated edition. In 16 illustrated volumes. Size of volumes 6¼" x 9¼". Over 5,000 pages. Published at $112.00. The complete 16-volume set. $44.50

15. RABELAIS. With the Doré illustrations. The complete and authentic Works of Rabelais. Profusely illustrated by Gustave Doré. 640 pages. "Not to have read Rabelais—is not to have lived." "Never has there been, nor is, nor ever shall be, another book like it—for it stands unique and alone." Only $2.49

Money-Back Guarantee

THE UNION LIBRARY ASSOCIATION N-44

Established 1884

121-123 East 24th Street, New York 10, N. Y.

Gentlemen: I enclose $.................................... for which please send me the items I have encircled below, delivery charges prepaid.

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15

(Mark circle around items desired)

☐ Please send me FREE Holiday Catalog No. 344-N, containing hundreds of equally unusual Book Bargains—just off the press!

Name..

Address..

City.. State..............................

Forever England!

YEARS OF VICTORY: 1802-1812. By Arthur Bryant. Harper and Brothers. $4.

IN ADDITION to being a prolific and deservedly popular writer of histories, Arthur Bryant is also one of the intellectual pillars of British conservatism. In the years before the war, when the premature anti-fascism of the Left Book Club was getting under Tory skins, he was, I believe, one of the promoters of the Right Book Club and a supporter of Neville Chamberlain. I hope, therefore, that I am not being unfair in regarding his new book, which tells the story of Britain's attempt to appease Napoleon and the long struggle that ensued after the effort proved futile, as an act of atonement.

At any rate, in writing of the decade that followed the Peace of Amiens Mr. Bryant seems to have had constantly in mind its many parallels with more recent events, though he never makes actual comparisons. Of course, the basic strategic and political situations were similar. Europe in 1802 was dominated by a dictator whose unbounded ambitions were blocked as long as Britain commanded the seas. When Britain was isolated, partly as a result of its attempts at appeasement, he planned to invade the island, massing troops and barges in the ports of the Pas de Calais. All he needed was three days of good weather with the British navy out of the way, for England had only a handful of trained troops to oppose a landing. But the British navy could not be disposed of by either force or trickery, and Napoleon, like Hitler, turned in disgust to new Continental aggressions which eventually raised all Europe against him. In the end Russia's armies played a big part in his defeat, but at times Russia's policies may have seemed as enigmatic to Pitt and his successors as they did to Churchill. Disgusted with Britain, the Czar Alexander embraced Napoleon at Tilsit, but "while France remained untamed, the ultimate interests of Britain and Russia remained the same."

Not only the plots of the two periods but their dramatis personae offer striking analogies. In retrospect Napoleon appears of greater stature than Hitler, and Mr. Bryant may be a little unjust in summarizing his plans in typical Hitlerian phraseology. But he gives samples of Napoleonic propaganda which one could swear were authentic Goebbels. He also etches an acid portrait of Addington, the Prime Minister who procured a "peace in our time" at Amiens which endured just about as many months as peace lasted after Munich. Addington's forcible-feeble protests against French aggressions recall the speeches of Neville Chamberlain as readily as those of Pitt remind us of Churchill.

Mr. Bryant has told his story well except for occasional lapses into patriotic rhetoric. Drawing copiously on the abundant memoirs and diaries of the time, he gives a lively picture of the home front. His account of the complicated naval strategy of the war is excellent, and he does a good job in sustaining interest in the Peninsular War, reports of which usually make rather dreary reading for all but students of military history. At the same time scholarship has not been sacrificed to entertainment; Mr. Bryant's researches appear to have been extensive, and I cannot detect any serious inaccuracies in regard to facts.

All Hits —
All HARPER'S

Aldous Huxley
THE PERENNIAL PHILOSOPHY

In this profound and memorable book the author of Time Must Have a Stop and Ends and Means has drawn upon the wisdom of the ages to find a common denominator of a faith for today. "... even an agnostic can read this book with joy ... perhaps Mr. Huxley has written the most needed book in the world."—N. Y. Times Book Review. $3.00

Louis Adamic
A NATION OF NATIONS

The colorful story of the various national groups which make up the United States, showing how each has helped to make our country great. A new and exciting kind of history which for the first time rounds out the story of America and brings these groups into proper focus. 16 pages of photographs. $3.50

E. B. White
STUART LITTLE

"STUART LITTLE is a dream book. Children will go off to sleep dreaming of its minute hero, and parents who have reread it aloud for the *n*th time will still chortle as they find new glints of E. B. White's matchless humor which they overlooked in keeping pace with the adventure."—Edward Weeks, Atlantic Monthly.

With 87 drawings by Garth Williams. $2.00

At All Bookstores

HARPER & BROTHERS

KITCHEN FUGUE

By SHEILA KAYE-SMITH

"A ragout of recipes for eating and thinking; a splendid casserole, harmoniously integrated."—N. Y. Times Book Review. $2.75

BOLTS OF MELODY

NEW POEMS OF EMILY DICKINSON

Edited by Mabel Loomis Todd and Millicent Todd Bingham. With 10 pages of facsimile poems. $3.00

ANCESTORS' BROCADES

By MILLICENT TODD BINGHAM

The Literary Début of Emily Dickinson. With 10 pages of photographs. $3.75

Boxed with Bolts of Melody. $6.75

GERMANY IS OUR PROBLEM

By HENRY MORGENTHAU, Jr.

"No book since Mein Kampf has offered the American people information so important to their survival"—N. Y. Times Book Review. $2.00

THE LIFE OF THE HEART

GEORGE SAND AND HER TIMES

By FRANCES WINWAR

"No more readable book has appeared this season ... a human story of ageless quality."—Philadelphia Inquirer. Illustrated. $3.00

YEARS OF VICTORY

1802-1812

By ARTHUR BRYANT

"A remarkable history of England's participation in the Napoleonic wars ... a fine and stirring book."—N. Y. Times. With maps. $4.00

BOOKS FROM CORNELL

CIVILIZATION AND DISEASE

BY HENRY E. SIGERIST
William H. Welch, Professor of the History of Medicine in The Johns Hopkins University

"A thoroughly readable book in one of the most fascinating fields of history. . . . Dr. Sigerist treats his rich material with admirable organization and selection, and writes clearly, urbanely, and unpretentiously."
—JOHN T. FREDERICK, The Chicago Sun $3.75

★

WRITERS AND THEIR CRITICS

BY HENRI PEYRE
Sterling Professor of French, Yale University

"It is not Monsieur Peyre's intention to close the doors of mercy on the critics."
—London Times Literary Supplement $3.00

★

ROSENBERG'S NAZI MYTH

BY ALBERT R. CHANDLER
Professor of Philosophy, Ohio State University

The first full treatment, in English, of Der Mythus des 20. Jahrhunderts. Little known outside Germany, Rosenberg's book holds a rank second only to Mein Kampf as an expression of Nazi philosophy. $1.75

★

MODERN GERMAN LITERATURE 1870-1940

BY VICTOR LANGE
Professor of the German Language and Literature, Cornell University

A critical analysis of German writing which surveys the work of the past three generations not in terms of dates and names, but in a coherent pattern of growing and shifting human attitudes and literary forms. $2.50

★

ORDER FROM YOUR BOOKSELLER OR

CORNELL UNIVERSITY PRESS

ITHACA, NEW YORK

These are some of the book's merits. Its chief fault is the product of its author's ingrained assumption of British superiority. I can understand that Mr. Bryant during the past crucial years found it difficult to be detached about an earlier era of crisis for his country. Patriotic pride is no sin, but it does not excuse the moral chauvinism that infects so much historical writing in all countries. In this book we see it in the contemptuous epithets constantly applied to the Spaniards who fought with Wellington against Napoleon's best legions. The regular Spanish forces, it is true, were for the most part badly led and often proved undependable, but again and again uprisings of guerrillas drew off the French when the British army was hard pressed. Mr. Bryant concedes the courage of this resistance movement but hardly gives it the credit it deserves for the final French débâcle in Spain.

Again we find Mr. Bryant explaining French atrocities by reference to national characteristics and the legacy of revolution. Looting, rape, and massacre of civilians are reported in detail as proof that Napoleon's veterans "under the shock of defeat . . . had reverted to type" and gone back to "the shambles of the Terror." The similar behavior of British troops under similar circumstances is also condemned. But it is not used as a text for racial moralizing except to the extent that Irish recruits are held responsible!

KEITH HUTCHISON

The Trollopes at Home and Abroad

THE TROLLOPES. By Lucy Poate Stebbins and Richard Poate Stebbins. Columbia University Press. $4.

FRANCES TROLLOPE came to America in 1827 with a muddle of purposes—she was fleeing from her husband's financial ruin and trying to repair it, she wanted to live in a communist colony for Negroes and whites in Tennessee and to make a fortune in the dry-goods business in Cincinnati—and returned to England in 1831 with one unintended achievement, the witty and still readable "Domestic Manners of the Americans." The writing she began at fifty, by chance, continued from necessity for twenty-six years, during which she turned out 114 volumes and drove her two sons to follow her trade, Thomas Adolphus by encouragement and love, Anthony by contempt and neglect.

It is Anthony who most interests us now, and it is his life which gives unity to this volume by Mrs. Stebbins and her son. Their skilfully organized family chronicle gives us Anthony in full scale by showing in their own full size the gay mother and gifted brother who so dwarfed him throughout his wretched early years and against whom he measured himself all his writing life. When his mother found her only opportunity to support a dying household by writing her novels before dawn, unknowingly she set a pattern that Anthony felt compelled to follow even when money and time were plentiful. He had to exceed the huge output of his mother and brother, and boasted usually of his speed-up methods of production, rarely of the quality of his product, which was much higher than he dared suspect. He intended in his travel book on America to correct his mother's harsh

Borzoi Books—As pleasant to give as to receive

FREEDOM AND RESPONSIBILITY IN THE AMERICAN WAY OF LIFE

by Carl L. Becker

The final work by the author of How New Will the Better World Be? is "both a testament and a prophecy, and it should be widely read for what it has to say to us today."—CHARLES POORE, New York Times. $2.50

NO MAN KNOWS MY HISTORY

The Life of Joseph Smith, the Mormon Prophet

by Fawn M. Brodie

Winner of an Alfred A. Knopf Fellowship in Biography. In addition to affording a remarkable insight into the enigma of the Prophet's power, this stirring chronicle of a tragic and dramatic life provides a full and detailed history of the early Mormon Church. Illustrated. $4.00

Supplement One

THE AMERICAN LANGUAGE

by H. L. Mencken

"Thoroughly readable in itself. . . . No professional can afford to neglect him . . . and no layman has ever dipped into The American Language, as none will dip into Supplement One, without surprise and admiration and delight."—CARL VAN DOREN $5.00

SPENDING, SAVING, AND EMPLOYMENT

by H. Gordon Hayes, Professor of Economics, Ohio State University. An original analysis, in terms of current economic thought, of the problem central to modern-day unemployment—namely, saving and investment. $3.00

LABOR TODAY AND TOMORROW

by Aaron Levenstein. A dramatically written, thoroughly informed analysis of the present and future relations of labor, management, and government, by a member of the Panel of Arbitrators of the American Arbitration Association. $2.75

NEW FRONTIERS IN ASIA

A CHALLENGE TO THE WEST

by Philip Jaffe. "One of the most illuminating analyses of the interrelationship of the advanced industrial powers with the undeveloped countries of Asia that I have read."—T. A. BISSON, Institute of Pacific Relations. $3.00

LEAVES OF GRASS

by Walt Whitman. This pocket-size edition, beautifully designed by W. A. Dwiggins, is an exact transcription of Whitman's own Deathbed Edition. Preface by Bernard Smith. $2.00

THE THEATRE BOOK OF THE YEAR: 1944-45

by George Jean Nathan. "There is probably more good sound sense about the contemporary theatre per page of his writing than will be found in any other commentator."—JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH $3.00

These books are for sale at all bookshops and are published in New York by

ALFRED · A · KNOPF

PROGRAM

of The Nation Associates' Annual Forum on

WHAT IS THE ANSWER TO THE ATOMIC BOMB?

DECEMBER 1, 2, 3, 1945
Hotel Astor • New York

★

Session Saturday, December 1—9:30 A. M.

I. IS SECURITY POSSIBLE?
  - a. Opening of Conference.
  - b. Can there be any defense against the atomic bomb?
  - c. What value, if any, in secrecy?

Speakers and Discussants: Freda Kirchwey, Prof. Henry DeWolf Smyth, Prof. Ivan A. Getting.

★

Session Saturday, December 1—2 P. M.

II. WHAT IS OUR REAL ATTITUDE TOWARD THE SOVIET UNION?
  - a. Are we preparing for war against the Soviet Union?
  - b. Should we give the secret of the bomb to the Soviet Union immediately?

Speakers and Discussants: Helen Gahagan Douglas, M. J. Coldwell, Walter Millis.

★

Session Sunday, December 2—9:30 A. M.

III. WHO SHOULD CONTROL THE ATOMIC BOMB?
  - a. Domestically
    - 1. Government vs. Big Business.
    - 2. What is the role of Labor?
  - b. What atomic energy may mean for the welfare of mankind
  - c. Internationally
    - 1. Big powers and small ones.
    - 2. The United Nations Organization.
    - 3. An international control commission.

Speakers and Discussants: Thurman Arnold, James B. Carey, Boris Pregel, Stuart Chase, Jerome Frank, Edgar A. Mowrer, Prof. L. N. Ridenour.

★

Session Sunday, December 2—2 P. M.

IV. IS WORLD GOVERNMENT THE ANSWER?
  - a. Can the United Nations Organization be preserved?
  - b. Is World Government possible in immediate future?

Speakers and Discussants: Thomas K. Finletter, Charles G. Bolte, Lt. Kingman Brewster, Lt. Cord Meyer, Jr.

★

DINNER FORUM — DECEMBER 3

Speakers: Dr. Herbert Vere Evatt, Professor Harold Laski, Dr. Leo Szilard, Dr. E. U. Condon, Mrs. Franklin Delano Roosevelt, Freda Kirchwey, Leon Henderson, Chairman.

---

judgments (he didn't—he confirmed many of them), and not content with the magnificent social history in the Barsetshire and parliamentary novels, undertook by his studies of Caesar and Cicero to rival his brother as a historian.

Family rivalry stirred Anthony not only to his prodigious effort but also, as the Stebbinses point out acutely, to the creation of his greatest characters. He was forever going over the old struggles between his irrepressible mother and his morose unsuccessful father, testing how they would have come out if their lines had fallen in other places. Proportioned exactly to his changed circumstances, his father becomes in turn the impoverished curate Crawley, the hero of "The Last Chronicle of Barset," and Plantagenet Palliser, the upright duke and prime minister who is the hero of the parliamentary novels; but his mother, with equal justness in her change, as Palliser's wife, the boundlessly alive Glencora, triumphs over her husband in fiction as she did in life.

"The Trollopes" is scholarly, pleasantly written, full of well arranged facts and at the same time so full of firm opinions that the captious reader can quarrel at will. The Stebbinses are always restrained; they are never swept away by their material and never attempt to sweep it along to some predestined end. If they have not exploited their subject fully—an unreasonable demand but one we are always justified in making—they have also never exploited it cheaply and have never spoiled the fascinating story of the great Philistine artist.

JAMES GROSSMAN

Unamuno—Last Essays

PERPLEXITIES AND PARADOXES. By Miguel Unamuno. Philosophical Library. $2.50.

MIGUEL UNAMUNO died during the complex struggle which is still called the Spanish civil war, and under circumstances which are still less than clear. The great objector of Spanish philosophy, his objections touched the political scene at a time and in a place where questions were not welcome. He who, under the republic as under the monarchy, had been fearless in criticism found his criticism exploited by the republic's enemies for their own side. His last days were spent in Salamanca under the aegis of the rebel generals. Never over-respectful of any government, he reserved the right to exercise his barbed technique of analysis on this newest one as he had on the old ones. It was common gossip that the Franco forces were so glad to see his tongue stilled that they might have hastened its quieting.

Crusty, intolerant of sham, coruscating in his comments, passionate in his insistence on the search for truth at all costs, he was at once the pride and the scourge of intelligent Spaniards. Since his death in the last months of the Spanish war he has grown in stature as the great incorruptible, and among a divided people in daily need of contemporary symbols of greatness he looms even larger than he did in life.

For these reasons among many others the appearance of a new book by Unamuno is potentially a literary event of the first order. This one has been published simultaneously in Spanish and in English by publishing houses in Mexico and the United States. Its essays, collected by Unamuno's nephew in Buenos Aires and translated by Professor Stuart Gross of

VIKING JUNIOR BOOKS for Christmas

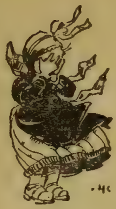
JUST OUT!—A Perfect Gift Book



WIND ISLAND

Written and illustrated by HEDVIG COLLIN

"To the children, a jolly, exciting story with delightful pictures. To their elders, a book that deserves its place among the arts."—MARY GOULD DAVIS, The Saturday Review of Literature Ages 5-10 $2.00

POPPADILLY

Written and illustrated by
AUDREY CHALMERS

"Delightful and convincing characters in a fresh and amusing corner of the world of make-believe."—ANNE T. EATON, N. Y. Times Picture book $1.00

AUGUSTUS

By CLAIRE HUCHET BISHOP
Illustrated by Grace Paull

"Will make a lovely Christmas present—an appealing black calf who stepped out to see the world."—Boston Traveler Picture book $1.50

THE WIND BOY

By ETHEL COOK ELIOT
Illustrated by Robert Hallock

"This new edition is a welcome event, for here is fantasy at its rare and exquisite best."—Chicago Sun Ages 8-12 $2.00

SECRETS

By JESSIE ORTON JONES
Illustrated by Elizabeth Orton Jones

"One of those rarely beautiful books that holds the loveliest of children's fancies."—Cleveland Plain Dealer Ages 8-12 $2.00

BURLAP

Written and illustrated by
MORGAN DENNIS

"A thoroughly human and delightful story about a Basset hound, with accents of genuine humor."—Boston Herald Picture book $1.00

YOU CAN WRITE CHINESE

Written and illustrated by KURT WIESE

"Nothing like it has ever been published before . . . a clarifying, fascinating introduction to a hitherto mysterious subject."—Chicago Sun All ages $1.50

THE YEAR WITHOUT A SUMMER

By ETHEL PARTON
Illustrated by Margaret Platt

"A worthy addition to this author's period stories."—Chicago Tribune Pre-teen age $2.00

THE MITCHELLS

Written and illustrated by
HILDA VAN STOCKUM

"A hearty family book . . . well written and dramatically sustained."—VIRGINIA KIRKUS Pre-teen age $2.50

ALL THOSE BUCKLES

By E. R. GAGGIN
Illustrated by Mildred Cloete

"One of the season's finest stories—a lovable family."—Washington Times Herald Pre-teen age $2.00

THE MULE SKINNERS

By MYRA REED RICHARDSON
Illustrated by Louis S. Glanzman

"If you give this to a small boy, he'll probably read it over and over."—MAY LAMBERTON BECKER, N. Y. Herald-Tribune Pre-teen age $2.00

High School Age

NORTH FORK

By DORIS GATES
Jacket by Wesley Dennis

"If only there were more books for boys like this one! . . . a working philosophy woven in with a good story about real people."—Chicago Sun $2.00

WINGS OVER THE DESERT

By GRAHAM M. DEAN
Illustrated by Wesley Dennis

"Thrilling story of the Civil Air Patrol, centered around a young cub reporter."—Retail Bookseller $2.00

SANDY

By ELIZABETH JANET GRAY
Color frontispiece by Robert Hallock

"Older readers will enjoy this book for its New England atmosphere . . . the insight it gives into the heart and mind of a modern girl."—Phila. Friends Intelligencer $2.00

BORDER IRON

By HERBERT BEST
Illustrated by Erick Berry

"This fine book tells the story of a real boy and his sheepdog, who solve a border dispute over iron ore in the 1750's."—Baltimore News Post $2.00

AMERICAN EMPEROR

By ROSE BROWN
Illustrated by C. B. Falls

"A clear picture of Brazil's Portuguese background and an interesting account of Dom Pedro II's 49-year regime."—GERTRUDE ANDRUS, Library Journal $2.50

NEW FOUND WORLD

By KATHERINE B. SHIPPEN
Illustrations and maps by C. B. Falls

"A lively, informed, and fascinating book . . . six hundred years of the life and history of South America."—Saturday Review of Literature $3.50

Write for free, illustrated 1945-46 catalogue THE VIKING PRESS, 18 East 48 Street, New York 17

Hofstra College, are fragmentary and uneven. They reveal no new facets of the master's thinking; they give no direct evidence of his reactions to Franco and the Falange. Their value lies chiefly in the indirect light they shed on the disintegration that was taking place in Spanish life during the last days of the republic and the first years of the Franco "purification." They are fragments, but happily some of them carry the old fire. It would have been of material aid had they been dated and placed. As it is, one has only internal evidence by which to guess approximately when they were written, and where—in Spain or in a Latin American country—they might have seen first publication.

Whether he is discussing Kierkegaard or obscenity, Unamuno is always interesting. When he dissects the effect of Hispanic envy on Spain's children in the Peninsula and the New World, when he casts a bored glance at Don Juan Tonorio, when he justifies his liking for the superrealism of carved Spanish Christs or mourns over the increase of licentiousness, which he finds "due to the absence of high, fecund ideals, to the lack of religious interest, to the non-existence of deep spiritual preoccupations," and to "false pseudo-paganism"—at such moments he is the puritan Basque, castigating the evils that surround him. When he praises Barcelona at the expense of Madrid he is the impish thorn in the proud Castilian flesh.

In this translation the famous Unamuno style loses sparkle and the gift for paradox goes dim. But the echo is still there. Of this people, who pride themselves on their spiritual ascendancy, he says, "What ruins Spanish-speaking people—I have said it many times and in many ways, and I shall repeat it many more times and in new ways—what ruins them is their materialism disguised as practicalism." Those who accuse him of playing too much with paradox he calls lazy-minded. His intent, he says, "has been, is, and will continue to be, that those who read my works shall think and meditate upon fundamental problems, and has never been to hand them completed thoughts. I have always sought to agitate, and, even better, to stimulate, rather than to instruct. Neither do I sell bread, nor is it bread, but yeast or ferment."

There is every reason for collecting and publishing the bubbles of ferment in this volume. But to enjoy their full flavor one must still go to Unamuno's "Life of Don Quixote and Sancho Panza," and to that book whose title haunts our present world, "The Tragic Sense of Life." Compared to them, this book comes as an extended footnote.

MILDRED ADAMS

Psychiatry and the Soldier

MEN UNDER STRESS. By Lieutenant Colonel Roy R. Grinker and Major John P. Spiegel, M. C., A. A. F. The Blakiston Company. $5.

PSYCHIATRY IN MODERN WARFARE. By Edward A. Strecker and Kenneth E. Appel. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

THE war is over, that is, V-E and V-J Day have come and gone. Demobilization has already slipped from the front page, though well over half the armed forces are still in uniform. The two books under review may seem, therefore, to be as dated as yesterday's headlines. Yet a careful reading of these 500 pages, written by four doctors, would provide the intelligent, socially responsible layman with sufficient sympathetic insight and knowledge to enable him to help wisely in the readjustment of disabled veterans, particularly those whose scars do not show.

The two books could profitably be read in sequence. Strecker and Appel have written an essay, substantially documented, about the state of psychiatry in two world wars. They have described the problems of the psychoneurotic and psychotic soldier from 1914 through 1945, and the treatment accorded to him. The slim volume is not always easy to read, but all of it is clear, including the valuable second part on "demobilization and the return to civilian life." Strecker, who won his spurs in the First World War, held the outstanding civilian psychiatric assignment in World War II.

"Men Under Stress" may well turn out to be the most important psychiatric summary of World War II. It is written about the men of the Air Forces, but its authors had extensive experience with the infantry and other ground forces during the North African campaign. (Their volume on that campaign is still "restricted.") This book is divided into five parts. Part I briefly describes the selection and background of the men making up the combat team. Then it carefully builds up the picture—the environment of combat, the reactions to combat, the reactions after combat, and possible civilian applications. The meaning of its scientific vocabulary is made clear by the generous use of real cases as illustra-

THE CHALLENGE OF RED CHINA

by Gunther Stein

For 12 years Asia correspondent for the Christian Science Monitor and Manchester Guardian

"The most up-to-date handbook, amazingly complete, of questions about the Chinese Reds, views held about them . . . and their expositions and interpretations of what they do and why."—Owen Lattimore, N. Y. Herald Tribune Book Review

Illustrated with photographs and color map

At all bookstores • $3.50

WHITTLESEY HOUSE
A Division of the McGraw-Hill Book Co., New York 18

For Christmas
— and forever

THE SHORT NOVELS OF Dostoevsky

With a biographical and critical estimate by THOMAS MANN

These 6 out-of-print novels by the author of Crime and Punishment demonstrate the range of his magnificent talent as a story teller. Thomas Mann, in his introduction, says: "He erected a stupendous life-work of an unheard of novelty and audacity; a surging wealth of passions and visions." Here are the masterpieces included: Notes From Underground, The Gambler, The Friend of the Family, Uncle's Dream, The Eternal Husband, The Double.

A Permanent Library edition. 840 pages, $4.00

Another distinguished Permanent Library edition.

THE GREAT SHORT NOVELS OF HENRY JAMES

10 complete novels by America's newly rediscovered master of letters. Edited by Philip Rahv. 840 pages, $4.00

Henry James' great novel of American life

The Bostonians

By HENRY JAMES

THE BOSTONIANS was considered too strong for America's reading palate. Since its original publication in 1886, it has never until now been reprinted. Edmund Wilson calls it "a remarkable and too little read novel". If James' shorter works have given you a taste for more, this is the "major work" you've been looking for. Introduction by Philip Rahv. 400 pages, $3.00

America demanded this enlarged and permanent edition

FRANKLIN DELANO Roosevelt

A MEMORIAL

An expanded and illustrated gift edition of the famous Pocket Book. Complete with an index, and new material in a large, handsome format. 320 pages, $3.00

By the talented author of BLOOD FOR A STRANGER

Little Friend, Little Friend

By RANDALL JARRELL

A new book of verse by one of the most gifted of the new generation of American poets. It expresses in poetic terms and with rare insight the ideas of a lively, sensitive, original, and learned mind. 120 pages, $2.00

At all bookstores

THE DIAL PRESS, N. Y.

tions. The method of treatment and its implication for civilian psychiatry are discussed in some detail.

The amazing thing about the psychiatrists in this war—in contrast to the psychologists—is their complete though not always mentioned acceptance of Freudian psychodynamics. Using adaptations of the techniques of hypnosis, uncovering drugs, sedation, shock therapy, ordinary reassurance, and, above all, where possible, patience in establishing rapport with the soldier, almost every one of them based his approach on the relation of personality to the trauma of war. Personality in this context is regarded as a composite of its Freudian descriptions—id, ego, and super-ego, or variations of that vocabulary. Moreover, the fact that these psychiatrists in many instances have held posts of high civilian responsibility as neurologists—Grinker was chairman of the Department of Neuropsychiatry at Michael Reese Hospital in Chicago—lends an undergirding of sound laboratory science to Freudian analysis.

This combination gives to "Men Under Stress" much of its value. If its approach gains wide acceptance we may hope that in the future emotionally disabled civilians who are not wealthy enough to afford a long analysis or poor enough to be treated as free clinic patients may get the necessary attention at a cost within their means.

I might end this review with a quotation from Strecker: "War, which of necessity is largely destructive, has some scientific and humane by-products." One such by-product is found in these two volumes. For they offer the promise of psychiatry's future aid for an as yet indifferent public.

FRANK N. TRAGER

KAETHE 1867-1945 KOLLWITZ
LITHOGRAPHS DRAWINGS
NEW SCULPTURE IRMA ROTHSTEIN
WEEKDAYS 9-9, SUNDAYS 2-6
Books in English, German and French
Large selection of art books and reproductions
THE TRIBUNE BOOK AND ART CENTER 100 WEST 42ND STREET
6th Ave. Subway Arcade beneath Schulte Cigar Store

STAGE PLAYS

Kermit Bloomgarden & George Heller present
DEEP ARE THE ROOTS
A New Play by ARNAUD d'USSEAU and JAMES GOW
Staged by ELIA KAZAN
FULTON THEATRE Forty-sixth Street West of Broadway. Circle 6-6380.
Evenings 8:40. $4.20, $3.60, $3.00, $2.40, $1.80, $1.20 Matinees Wednesday and Saturday. $3.00, $2.40, $1.80, $1.20. Tax inclusive.

"DESERVES ITS GREAT SUCCESS!"—Nichols, Times
Rodgers and Hammerstein present
MADY CHRISTIANS • OSCAR HOMOLKA
in JOHN VAN DRUTEN'S
I REMEMBER MAMA
from Kathryn Forbes' "Mama's Bank Account"
with JOHN TETZEL • ADRIENNE GESSNER • RICHARD BISHOP
MUSIC BOX 45th Street, West of Broadway. Phone: Circle 6-4636 Eves 8:35 Sharp. Mats. Thurs. and Sat. 2:35 Sharp

MICHAEL TODD Presents
UP IN CENTRAL PARK
Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS Lyrics by DOROTHY FIELDS Music by SIGMUND ROMBERG
BROADWAY THEATRE, Broadway at 53rd Street. Matinees: WED. & SAT.

In Short

"The Rebuilding of Italy," by M. H. Macartney (Macmillan, $1.25). A brief review of the tasks facing the Italian people in restoring their democracy. The author's approach is sympathetic, and he urges the need for outside help in relieving the pressure of population and making possible the attainment of a secure, if modest, standard of living for Italy. On such burning issues as the monarchy and relations with the Vatican, Mr. Macartney sums up very, very judicially, leaving his jury or readers to form their own conclusions.

"Ourselves Inc. The Story of Consumer Free Enterprise," by Leo R. Ward (Harper, $2.50). Father Ward of Notre Dame University reports with enthusiasm on a round of visits to consumer cooperatives in the Middle West. In a final chapter he calls for "a marriage between cooperation and religion" as a way of salvation for a world "going out of the frying-pan of individualism into the fire of collectivism."

"Economic Reconstruction," edited by Seymour E. Harris (McGraw-Hill, $3.75). Based largely on a series of lectures delivered at the Harvard Graduate School of Public Administration, this volume includes papers on a wide variety of post-war economic problems, domestic and international. Included in a distinguished list of contributors are Alvin H. Hansen, Mordecai Ezekiel, Gerhard Colm, S. Morris Livingstone, Gottfried Haberler, and Eveline M. Burns.

"Journey Underground," by Flight Officer David G. Prosser (Dutton, $2.75). Parachuting out of a bomber, the author landed near Paris and was nursed, sheltered, fed, and eventually smuggled into Spain by members of the French resistance. Flight Officer Prosser gives a straightforward account of his experiences, but in his anxiety not "to shoot a line," as they say in the R. A. F., he has adopted a style that tends to flatten out some of the excitement of the story.

"Socialism Looks Forward," by John Strachey (Philosophical Library, $2). John Strachey, who is now a junior member of His Majesty's Government, writes of "things as they were" in pre-war Britain and of the way to produce a better social order. A tract for the unsophisticated, written in words of one syllable and rather over-simple in its treatment of some of the problems which are going to prove troublesome for Britain under any economic system.

CONTRIBUTORS

LOUISE BOGAN is Poetry Consultant of the Library of Congress. Her most recent book is "Poems and New Poems."

SIDNEY HOOK, head of the department of philosophy at New York University, is the author of "Reason, Social Myths, and Democracy" and "The Hero in History."

DELMORE SCHWARTZ is the author of "Shenandoah," "In Dreams Begin Responsibilities," and other books.

JAMES GROSSMAN, a New York lawyer, has contributed to The Nation and Partisan Review.

MILDRED ADAMS has been for many years a close student of Spanish literature.

NOW!

"The Lost Weekend"

From the novel millions talked about in whispers!

Starring

RAY MILLAND
JANE WYMAN

With

Phillip TERRY • Howard daSILVA
Doris DOWLING • Frank FAYLEN

- Produced by CHARLES BRACKETT
- Directed by BILLY WILDER
- Screen Play by CHARLES BRACKETT and BILLY WILDER

From the Novel by CHARLES JACKSON

RIVOLI, B'way and 49th St.

"A nostalgic musical" . . . Cameron, News

20th Century-Fox presents

BETTY GRABLE in

THE DOLLY SISTERS

John PAYNE • June HAVER

with

....ON STAGE...

CARL RAVAZZA • BEATRICE KAY
GOMEZ and BEATRICE
Extra! MAURICE ROCCO

Now Playing ROXY 7th Ave. at 50th St.

Special Nation issue on the

ATOMIC BOMB

The December 22 issue of The Nation will contain a 24-page insert devoted to summaries of the most significant speeches delivered at The Nation Associates three-day forum on the atomic bomb and its impact on political and economic problems.

Advertising in this issue will be charged at the regular rates. It is expected that the 52,000 print order permitted by our paper supply will be a complete sellout.

Forms for the December 22 issue close Monday, December 10; we must be ready to print by noon, Thursday, December 13.

Advertising Department
THE NATION
20 Vesey Street New York 7, N. Y.

RKO NOW

Manhattan
ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST.
86th ST.
58th ST. near Lex.
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENT
RIVERSIDE
23rd ST.
Bronx
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL
Westchester
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

"Loud, Lively Comedy." —N. Y. Sun. "Loaded With Laughter." —N. Y. Herald-Tribune

SAMUEL GOLDWYN presents

DANNY KAYE

'WONDER MAN'

In TECHNICOLOR — WITH VIRGINIA MAYO • VERA-ELLEN
— PLUS —
'FOREVER YOURS' GALE STORM

Brooklyn
BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYOU Coney Island
Queens
Keith's FLUSHING
ALDEN Jamaica
Keith's RICH. HILL
STRAND Far Rockaway
Manhattan
COLONIAL

"An Enchanting Musical" —N. Y. Sun "Songs Ripple Infectiously" —PM

Rodgers & Hammerstein's

'STATE FAIR'

DANA ANDREWS • JEANNE CRAIN
DICK HAYMES • VIVIAN BLAINE

In TECHNICOLOR • A 20th Century-Fox Picture
— And —
'Circumstantial Evidence' Lloyd Nolan Michael O'Shea

PRAISED TO THE SKIES!

"I don't know whether it is better in its humanity or its exciting story!" —Sinclair Lewis

"Definitely a film to be seen!" —Samuel Grafton

M-G-M Presents

The LAST CHANCE

LOEW'S CRITERION

BROADWAY & 45th

★ BUY VICTORY BONDS ★

It's Paramount's Gay Whirl of Romance, Adventure & Rhythm!

Dorothy LAMOUR • Arturo deCORDOVA

"MASQUERADE in MEXICO"

WITH
Patric Knowles • Ann Dvorak • George Rigaud

IN PERSON
THE BAND OF THE YEAR
TONY PASTOR and his ORCHESTRA
— plus —
The Nonchalants
— plus —
Paul & Eva Reyes
Extra Added Attraction!
Marion Hutton
Don Baker at the Organ

Midnight Feature Nightly Buy Victory Bonds

NOW PLAYING PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

Your Gift List!

CROSS SECTION 1945
A Collection of New American Writing
Edited by Edwin Seaver

Right out of America's lusty new literature is hewn this anthology of unpublished work by 33 young writers. Some, like Richard Wright, you know; others as gifted and challenging appear for the first time in this book ... as richly-grained, varied, exciting a collection of contemporary writing as has been presented. $3.50

BACK TO LIFE
The Emotional Adjustment of Our Veterans
By Herbert I. Kupper, M.D.

". . . the best to date. Thorough study of a book like this is essential to our knowing how to act when we welcome the veteran home."—St. Louis Post-Dispatch. $2.50

SEVEN TIMES THE LEADING MAN
A Novel by Egon Hostovsky

"A powerful, strange story whose demonic terror is classic as Poe and as contemporary as the torture camps of Himmler."—Waldo Frank. "This book discloses a novelist of high achievement."—Lewis Mumford. $2.75

HAHNEMANN: MEDICAL REBEL
By Martin Gumpert, M.D.

The turbulent life of the founder of homeopathy who, in civilizing the medical barbarism of his own day, has enriched the science of ours. $3.00

ALL BRAVE SAILORS
The Story of the S. S. Booker T. Washington
By John Beecher

"There's a new book called All Brave Sailors which is going to make history."—Harry Hansen in the N. Y. World-Telegram. $2.50

L. B. FISHER PUBL. CORP.
381 Fourth Avenue New York 16

Drama

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

DR. SAMUEL JOHNSON found the farce "High Life Below Stairs" very amusing on the stage. Later, he was amazed to discover that one could read it "without being aware that one was reading anything at all." He would, I think, have much the same experience with the new smash hit by Lindsay and Crouse, which was once called "I'd Rather Be Left" but is now somewhat more portentously entitled "State of the Union" (Hudson Theater). The piece is a wisecracking political comedy, a sort of "Of Thee I Sing" without any singing, and it makes a sufficiently diverting evening chiefly for two reasons. In the first place, there is an extraordinarily slick production, plus one very fine performance contributed by Ruth Hussey in the role of the fall guy's knowing wife. In the second place, there is a rapid succession of lines which somehow manage to seem both new and witty despite the fact that they are almost never both and are very frequently neither.

The two authors have put themselves squarely on the side of the angels—much more unequivocally so than the authors of "Of Thee I Sing" did, even though that was written in the days before one of them woke up to find himself in the right-thinking higher brackets. Indeed, the last big speech of "State of the Union," delivered passionately by Miss Hussey, sounds really eloquent either because it is written with deeper conviction than most of the play or, possibly, because the actress manages to put great feeling into it. Moreover, and even during the less inspired passages of comic writing-with-a-purpose, it is pleasant to hear enlightened sentiments getting the kind of response from the audience which used to be reserved exclusively for anti-Roosevelt jokes. Whether this means that a different spirit is abroad in the world or whether it means merely that news of the play's tendency had got out in advance to its predestined audience, I do not know. Gloomily I suspect that the latter possibility is the actuality, for it has been my observation that sentiments in a play get applauded for precisely the same reason that sentiments get applauded at most political rallies, which are, as a matter of course, attended by few except those who already know which way they are going to vote. However, "State of the Union" will doubtedly serve to hearten our side, and I am all for it.

But I still cannot pretend to think either that the wit is very scintillating or that the dramaturgy is of a very advanced sort. The curtain lines of the second act are: "What is the difference between the Republicans and the Democrats?" "They're in and we are out"; the final curtain comes down with the heroine squarely facing the audience and registering delight at a slap on the behind from her husband—the fact that he had stopped administering such playful chastisement at the same time that he had stopped sharing her bed having been carefully planted a little earlier in the evening. If the wisecrack just quoted and given the traditional place of honor in the play's structure is brilliant, if the bit of business which concludes the whole is an example of high dramaturgy, then I will vote America First at the next election.

During the course of the evening I jotted down some of the most effective lines and I shall now cite a few of them, not in order to rub in what I have already said, but merely to protect myself against the charge of unfairness by spreading the evidence on the record. When one character asks another why governors always snore, that other convulses everybody by asserting, "It is an occupational disease"; when the heroine gets drunk at her own party and thereby gains courage to tell her guests where to get off, she lets us in on the secret of her condition by boasting, "I'm a very thick quinker." "I'd rather be tight than President" is another specimen of what sounds like wit but isn't, and "Just because I don't trust him is no reason why he shouldn't trust me" is another. There is, to be sure, one really witty line uttered as an obiter dictum when it is learned that the candidate's estranged wife will accompany him on a speaking tour: "Politics makes strange bedfellows." But in New York, at least, that crack was well circulated during the Presidential campaign of 1940.

"Are You with It?" (Century Theater) is a lively musical show which got extremely good notices and has probably settled down to a long run. In order that prospective customers may know what they are in for they should be informed that though the show is unquestionably entertaining in its own way, the entertainment is of a now rather old-fashioned sort—lots of noise, lots of speed, lots of tap dancing, and nothing in the least bit novel or "smart" by the standards of the moment.

Art

CLEMENT GREENBERG

THE second annual "Portrait of America" exhibition is now functioning, under the aegis of the Pepsi-Cola Company, at the International Building, Rockefeller Center (through December 15). Here are 150 paintings by living American artists which were selected by a jury of fellow-artists from 3,270 items submitted in open competition from all over the country. The jury was divided into a "traditional" and a "modern" panel, and the entrants were asked to specify under which category they wished their work to be judged. Of the pictures finally hung, twenty were awarded prizes by a jury composed of a museum director, an art critic, and three painters. As it happened, all the prize-winning canvases were entered as either "modern" or both "modern" and "traditional," none being entered simply as "traditional."

This procedure of selection, with its unabashed assertion that two different yardsticks were needed for the fair evaluation of contemporary art, augured the worst. And the worst came about. Four-fifths of the pictures shown are rampantly bad—to say they are mediocre would give an incorrect impression. What is shocking is that so many of the artists present do not seem to possess even a journeyman's control of their craft, much less an artist's. There are passages in not a few canvases that would not have been allowed to go unwiped in any decent elementary art school; let art lovers take a good look at Paul Burlin's "Soda Jerker," which won the first prize of $2,500.

Contemporary American painting at its best is not one-quarter as bad as this monstrous show makes it out to be. For the discrepancy the jurors, I suppose, must be held responsible—unless, as is possible, our better painters did not bother to submit their work. Abstract art is gingerly represented, in very bad examples. The School of Paris is admitted in its fourth-hand forms. It is perhaps because the title of the exhibition was taken literally that it abounds so in raw landscapes and street scenes. America apparently is not people but what you see from the window—not that it makes much difference. But the fact that the hues of the American scene are not held to be as soft and harmonious as those of the European is no excuse for coarse brushwork and muddy color.

ATOMIC ENERGY in WAR and PEACE

By GESSNER G. HAWLEY,
Chief Technical Editor, Reinhold Publishing Corp.

and SIGMUND W. LEIFSON
Head of Dept. of Physics, University of Nevada

The basic principles of atomic energy can be understood by any intelligent layman who thinks as he reads. The future welfare of the world requires that everyone be informed about the nature and the possibilities of this new social dynamic. In a democracy, matters of national policy should reflect the will of the people—and this can be expressed intelligently only when it is based on knowledge.

This simply worded and logically presented explanation of atomic energy contains all the essential scientific facts, with concise descriptions and graphic diagrams. It brushes up elementary physics and chemistry as it goes along. Here are some of the subjects covered: Combustion, explosions, energy transformation, isotopes, neutrons, nuclear fission, and atomic structure. The social and economic implications of atomic energy are discussed, with emphasis on the cost and supply factors.

225 pages • Many illustrations and diagrams • Price $2.50

THE ART OF BUILDING CITIES

By CAMILLO SITTE; translated from the German by Lt. Charles T. Stewart, USNR, former director, The Urban Land Institute

A classic in its field, thoroughly modern in its approach to the problem of urban planning. Its first appearance in English will be welcomed by architects and city designers. In addition to the original text, it features a foreword by the noted architect, Eliel Saarinen, and a supplementary chapter by Arthur C. Holden, illustrating applications of Sitte's theories in New York and Washington. Sympathetic in treatment, architecturally sound—above all, practical and constructively modern in its outlook.

Profusely Illustrated. (Ready January) $5.50

NEW CITY PATTERNS

By S. E. SANDERS, Director, City Planning Research, FWA, PBA, Washington, D. C.

and A. J. RABUCK, City Planning Research, PBA, Washington, D. C.

One of the most fascinating and truly enjoyable discussions on city planning, this book is thoroughly practical and realistic. The text is devoted to able discussions of the organization of metropolitan planning commissions and the exact methods to be followed to insure that each new improvement or change shall coincide with a carefully predetermined plan. The authors devote much attention to parks, greenbelts, wedges, playgrounds, community shopping and parking areas; non-stop highways diverting heavy traffic from residential streets.

Profusely Illustrated. (Ready February) $7.50

REINHOLD BOOKS of current interest

•

THE ELECTRON MICROSCOPE
By E. F. Burton and W. H. Kohl
Ever since the publication of this first book in English on this phenomenal new tool of science, the demand for an enlarged and more up-to-date edition has been increasing. Now in preparation, this will be available early in 1946: many more pictures, amplified text, wider appeal! Full descriptions of amazing recent work in biology, metallurgy, and related fields. 325 pages. Profusely illustrated. $4.00

THE WAR ON CANCER
By Edward Podolsky, M.D.
An excellent presentation for the layman of the causes of cancer and the many ways in which it is being combated: treatment by radio-activity, X-ray, surgery, low temperature and other methods is described; chemical and dietary lines of attack are summarized. 180 pages. Illustrated. $1.75

THE TECHNIQUE OF THE TERRAIN
Maps and Their Use in the Field in Peace and War
By H. A. Musham
For a "map-conscious" world. Sportsmen, hikers, country dwellers in general will find this a fascinating book, opening up new understanding of the countryside. 228 Pages. Illustrated. $3.85

THE PHYSICS OF FLIGHT
By Alfred Landé
Here, in condensed and concise form, are all of the essential principles involved in the flight of heavier-than-air machines. Illustrated with sketches, diagrams, and supplemented with problems, 135 Pages. Illustrated. $2.50

CITIES OF LATIN AMERICA
By Francis Violich
An exceptionally discerning discussion of the cultural heritage of the colorful cities studied, their planning problems, their hopes for future betterment. 241 Pages. Illustrated. $3.50

THE AMAZING PETROLEUM INDUSTRY
By V. A. Kalichevsky
An interesting picture of the world's most important raw material—petroleum. In non-technical language, it tells simply what petroleum is, how it is obtained, what it does. 234 Pages. Illustrated. $2.25

At Your Bookstore or Direct
REINHOLD PUBLISHING CORP.
330 West 42nd Street New York 18, N. Y.
Also publishers of Chemical Engineering Catalog, Metal Industries Catalog, Materials & Methods, formerly Metals and Alloys, and Progressive Architecture — Pencil Points.

The mass of art in any period is mediocre, but it is not often that a prevailing style is founded on a misconception. The curious thing about many of the pictures at the "Portrait of America" show is that they are not conceived with a banality equal to that of their execution. In many cases they were thought through with fair success in terms of the values of dark and light; complete disaster ensued only when color was laid on in the modern unvalued manner. The explanation for this lies in the unpublished fact that most American painters of the present period are more academic by instinct than they admit to themselves; their art has nothing to do essentially with anything later than Manet's first period; and they think and feel in the language of values—of darks and lights—rather than of color. Yet they insist on superimposing color, in the manner of Cézanne, Gauguin, or Utrillo, upon a framework that calls for glazes, half-tones, gradual transitions.

There are, of course, two or three mildly successful pictures present: for one, Max Weber's still life, which won the second prize—and which demonstrates again that Weber should leave landscape and the human figure alone from now on. But taken together with the calamitous Whitney Annuals, the National Academy of Design's fliers into modern art, and the recent Critics' Show at the Armory on Park Avenue—all of them, aesthetically speaking, of a supreme squalor—the "Portrait of America" exhibition makes the situation really grave. We are in danger of having a new kind of official art foisted on us—official "modern" art. It is being done by well-intentioned people like the Pepsi-Cola Company who fail to realize that to be for something uncritically does more harm in the end than being against it. For while official art, when it was thoroughly academic, furnished at least a sort of challenge, official "modern" art of this type will confuse, discourage, and dissuade the true creator.

The KENYON REVIEW
announces for early publication . . .

The Circle of Chalk, Act V, from Bertolt Brecht's new play, translated from the German by W. H. Auden and James Stern.
Homage to Valery: appreciations by André Gide and Lawrence Leighton
Innocents, a long fiction by M. P. (Mrs. Robert Maynard) Hutchins.
Theatre of Jean-Paul Sartre, by Eric Russell Bentley.
Shapiro Is All Right, by William Carlos Williams.
Marxism and Modern Anthropology, by Clyde Kluckhohn.
Pre-Hispanic Quota in Mexican Mural Art, by Jean Charlot.
The Intimations of Wordsworth's Ode, by Cleanth Brooks.

75 cents per single copy
$3.00 per annual subscription
Postpaid from GAMBIER, OHIO

Books by Mail

In spite of shortages we do our best to mail promptly and accurately to your order books reviewed and advertised in The Nation and elsewhere . . . anywhere the mail goes! No mailing charges. No c. o. d.'s.

DOWNTOWN BOOK BAZAAR
212 Broadway New York 7, N. Y.
(corner Fulton Street)

BOOKS FOUND FREE!
WHAT BOOKS DO YOU WANT?
We quote lowest market prices. No charge for locating Hard-to-Find and Out-of-Print Books. All books, OLD or NEW, mailed POST-FREE.
SEARCHLIGHT BOOK NATION
22 East 17th Street, New York City

Music

B. H. HAGGIN

TOVEY'S "Beethoven" (Oxford, $3) is an uncompleted first draft, of which he revised only a few pages. "There is," says the editor, "only internal evidence that the unfinished chapter was the last in the plan"; but that internal evidence is the amount of ground the book has covered before it breaks off. The ground is strictly musical: "While admitting that 'the style is the man,'" Tovey writes, "I refuse to involve the reader in vulgar entanglements between the art and the artist's private or official life"; also, "the task of dealing with the music as music is more than enough for me; and, even now that an intelligent interest in music is more widely distributed than the music-lovers of last century could ever have dreamt of as possible, there is crying need for a clearer understanding of the nature of music itself . . . the humble and professional facts of rhythm, melody, counterpoint, harmony, and tonality." The book, then, is a statement of Tovey's ideas about these elements as they are used in musical forms, illustrated chiefly by examples of Beethoven's practice, but with side-references to the practices of other composers.

"My professional terminology," he observes, "is rigorously confined to generalizations from the behavior of musical compositions." So are his ideas; and to be understood they must be re-derived by the reader from his own first-hand experience of that behavior. He must, that is, turn to each passage of music that Tovey mentions to discover in it the meaning of what Tovey says about it. That makes the reading of the book a long process (I have been able only to glance through it), and really possible only for someone who can do the reading of music it requires. It is, then, a book for the person with at least the amount of musical education this presumes; and even a musically educated person will have difficulty with some of the ideas, or with Tovey's statement of them.

A rereading of his "Integrity of Music," "Musical Textures," and a couple of other lectures, last summer, sharpened into conviction what had been a vague impression—that Tovey's epigrammatic style is one of his strengths when it succeeds but a weakness when it fails: in the one case the compression brings the elements of the idea into wonderfully illuminated relations; in the other it presents them with their relations obscured.

There is a great deal of this obscurity when Tovey is making general observations; very little of it when he is pointing out the detailed behavior of a musical composition. And it was while I happened to be rereading his marvelous expositions of Haydn's symphonies, in "Essays in Musical Analysis," that I received the program notes for the Boston Symphony's first New York concerts, with an article by Ernest Newman in which I discovered that he too has "long wanted to do something to try to help the obviously increasing number of people who . . . are now beginning to realize what pleasure great music can give them," and that his help was to advise them to give up their idea of "a sort of ordnance highway to musical appreciation" to which they can be directed by "a musical traffic policeman. No amount . . . of charting of 'sonata form'—which, by the way, is largely an abstraction, a myth created by the nineteenth-century pedagogues—will of itself enable you in the least to sense the difference between a good first movement and a poor one. . . . A symphonic first movement . . . may reproduce the 'form,' the procedure of the great first movement of the Eroica down to the minutest detail, and yet not be worth, as music, the paper it is written on. The vitality of the great work, the quality that makes it Beethoven's . . . must therefore reside elsewhere than in its 'form,' its 'technique.' . . . What you have to do is to discover that life for yourself and make it yours; and the only way to do it is by listening to great works until the composer's thought has become part of your own inmost being, just as you will learn, for your own non-practical purposes, more about sculpture by spending a few weeks with the Elgin marbles than by reading descriptions of the tools with which the sculptor works and the professional manner of handling these."

Certainly one's appreciation of a piece of sculpture will not be increased by knowledge of the sculptor's tools and the methods of their use; but one might look at the Elgin marbles many weeks, and fail to perceive formal relations among the elements that an expert eye could point out. So with music: Tovey is aware of the danger of confusing "knowledge which is relevant only to the discipline of an artist's training" with "knowledge that is relevant to the understanding of works of art"; but the latter knowledge includes, for him, the realities of sonata form that can be observed in Haydn's practice, which, he points out, "constantly upsets the orthodoxies of the text-books"; and one might listen alone to Haydn's symphonies for a long time without perceiving the things Tovey points out and without getting from them the pleasure they were intended to give. "Balance of keys, balance of sentences, and balance of contrasts, animated by a sense of dramatic movement . . .—these," says Tovey, "and not the external signs of symmetry, are the principles of Haydn's form"; these, I would say, are what Haydn intended the listener's mind to be affected by, as he intended it to receive from the form of a certain first movement the "impression . . . of perpetual expansion as regards themes and phrases and developments, while the perfect balance of keys and harmonies provides that sense of underlying symmetry which makes the expansion so exhilarating"; and they are what one's mind might, like Newman's, be unaware of.

Someone else, finally, may use Haydn's procedures with other ideas and produce music that isn't worth the paper it is written on. But used by Haydn with his own ideas they produce much of the life that is in his music.

an encyclopedia of the ARTS encyclopedia of the ARTS

GIFT BOOK DELUXE

Real Gold Imprint

Authoritative, comprehensive compendium of all the arts, of all times and all places. Monumental in conception and scope, more than one-hundred authorities collaborated in its preparation.

DAGOBERT D. RUNES
Editor-in-Chief
Harry G. Schrickel
Co-Editor

FILM
MUSIC
DANCE THEATRE PAINTING SCULPTURE
LITERATURE DECORATION ARCHITECTURE

ALL-INCLUSIVE, IN ONE VOLUME
- ★ A History of the Arts
- ★ A Handbook of Techniques and Materials
- ★ Special Articles by Leading Authorities
- ★ Definitions of All Art Terms

LIMITED EDITION ORDER NOW
1,100 Pages Boxed $10.00

PHILOSOPHICAL LIBRARY
Publishers
15 E. 40th St., New York 16, N.Y.

PHILOSOPHICAL LIBRARY, Publishers
15 E. 40th St., Dept. N, N.Y. 16, N.Y.
Please send me ...... copies of the ENCYCLOPEDIA OF THE ARTS, at $10 per copy. Enclosed are $.............
NAME...............................
ADDRESS...............................

TO ORDER ANY BOOK described or advertised in this issue
USE THIS COUPON! (Books sent postage free anywhere in U.S. and to members of the armed forces overseas.)

512 Phone orders in N.Y. City: CIrcle 6-1700, Ext. 50
To: Doubleday Book Shops,
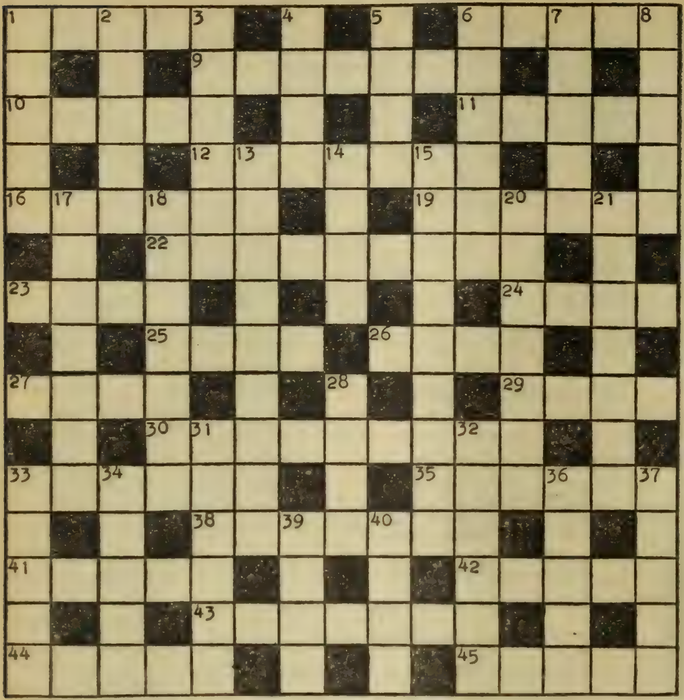
Mail Order Department, 9 Rockefeller Plaza, New York 20, N.Y.
Please send me the following books for which I enclose $..........;
(PRINT TITLES OF BOOKS WANTED) ....
....
Name ....
Address ....
City.................................. Zone No. (IF ANY).........State...........

Crossword Puzzle No. 137

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 Not G. B. S.
6 How a pedagogue might answer one's knock
9 One of the best-known characters in Arabian Nights
10 Not the "old, old story," evidently 11 Accustom
12 "One-eyed steaks"
16 Proverbially a hungry sportsman
19 Sounds rather a familiar way to address an English alumnus (two words, 3 & 3)
22 More often one who has left something undone, perhaps 23 Browning wrote of some unsuspected one in far-off seas
24 May follow fire
25 A scrubwoman turns roguish
26 He is always ready to listen to a safe proposition
27 A journey by ox-wagon
29 Latin poet (43 B.C.-17 A.D.)
30 "O, I can vote!" (anag.)
33 Suitable vegetables for Scandinavians?
35 Comes after 38 Embrace
41 He shows us up
42 I am always to be found in this Florida resort
43 Does this Kansas town consist entirely of large stores?
44 Far from fresh
45 Relationship of Rose Maybud to Aunt Hannah

DOWN

1 A Tom in Martin Chuzzlewit (a guileless lad)
2 You'll find welcome in this asylum
3 A well-known Johnny in the spirit world
4 An English artist and legislator concoct a swindle
5 One looks for this tool in a daze
6 Isolate
7 Every honest miller was supposed to have a golden one
8 High and thin
13 One way of distinguishing a German soldier (two words, 4 & 5)
14 Important family in The Merry Wives
15 Colonies where the settlers never complain without caws
17 Loosen threads
18 Pinched and twisted
20 In truth, most of their flying was done on flags
21 Milky-hued
28 Card game in which Pharaoh became involved
31 Changed course
32 "---'---'s poison is another man's breakfast," or something (two words, 3 & 3)
33 French marshal who starts out with spirit
34 Preliminary gas attack before starting operations
36 A letter of address to the wise
37 River and fishing-net in one
39 He has two per annum
40 Clay which sounds like a Cockney's injunction to get a move on

* * *

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 136

ACROSS:—1 DOGBANE; 5 EXPOUND; 9 WRATH; 10 SATURATES; 11 GAINSAYER; 12 FORCE; 31 ROUNDED; 15 CALIBAN; 17 FRETSAW; 19 COOPERS; 21 GLADE; 23 SHOVEL HAT; 25 ELIZABETH; 26 RURAL; 27 THYROID; 28 SHEKELS.

DOWN:—1 DOWAGER; 2 GRATITUDE; 3 ASHES; 4 ESSAYED; 5 ENTERIC; 6 PORTFOLIO; 7 UTTER; 8 DISCERN; 14 DESPERADO; 16 BRET HARTE; 17 FIGMENT; 18 WEST END; 19 CLOTHES; 20 SETTLES; 22 AMITY, 24 EERIE.

RESORTS

The Oaks
Vacation Time Never Ends at —the Year 'Round Resort—All Sports of the Season—Enjoy the crisp, tingling excitement of autumn in the country—with congenial companions bent on fun and frolic.
Don't waste precious time traveling. Capture the wondrous magic of Fall with a visit to THE OAKS—only 50 miles from N. Y.
Make Holiday Reservations Now
Elberon, New Jersey Long Branch 2433

INVITATION TO RELAX
Enjoy the serenity of Plum Point. Gorgeous countryside, roaring fireplace, delicious food — and fun.
Only 55 miles from New York
MAKE RESERVATIONS EARLY
PLUM POINT
"Year-Round Vacation Resort"
New Windsor, N.Y. Tel: Newburgh 4270

The Fieldstone
On Round Island Lake
A place of unexcelled beauty for rest and relaxation. One hour from New York. All Sports.
CLOSED — REOPENS DECEMBER 21st
MONROE, N. Y. Phone 7965

BREEZEMONT PARK
ARMONK N.Y.
35 MILES FROM NEW YORK CITY
"A Country Estate in the Scenic Hills of Westchester County"
The nearest of all nearby resorts. Exclusive location. Luxuriously furnished. Dignified. All sport activities. Excellent cuisine.
OPEN ALL YEAR Phone Armonk Village 955

The Rein House
Lake Mohegan 42 Miles from N. Y.
FOR REST AND RELAXATION
FISHING ON OUR BEAUTIFUL ESTATE
HORSEBACK RIDING AND GOLF NEARBY
DELICIOUS FOOD—$7 PER DAY—INFORMAL
Accommodation By Reservation Only—Dietary Laws
Mrs. M. F. Rein, Tel. Peekskill, 1747 J.

HATHAWAY SKI LODGE
OPEN ALL YEAR
Formerly the palatial 592-acre Macy estate in the beautiful "Hills of the Sky." Large, luxurious rooms, many with open fireplaces and private porches. Winding Mountain Trails. Ski Tow. 700-foot Ski Slope. Delicious food. Easy transportation.
Attractive Winter Rates
For reservations or further information write or call
HATHAWAY LODGE, Haines Falls, N. Y.
Telephone: Tannersville 299

50 MI. FROM NEW YORK
MAMANASCO Lake Lodge
A Resort Estate of unmatched beauty. Ideal for winter rest and recreation. Write or phone Ridgefield, Conn. 820.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 161 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • DECEMBER 8, 1945 NUMBER 23

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 609

EDITORIALS

- Same Bill of Goods 612
- Radio's Second Chance 613
- Exit Pat Hurley by Maxwell S. Stewart 614

ARTICLES

- Palestine Pilgrimage by I. F. Stone 615
- Britain's Colonial Squeeze by Andrew Roth 617
- Senator Johnson and God Almighty by Philip Wylie 619
- Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison 620
- The People's Front by Del Vayo 621
- Hungary Samples Democracy by Hal Lehrman 622
- Greece in Purgatory by Philip Jordan 624
- In the Wind 626

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

- Three Poems by Isabel Wilner 627
- Hauptmann Accepts by Hermann Kesten 627
- America and Britain by Ethel M. Thornbury 628
- Joseph Smith, Mormon Prophet by Marguerite Young 630
- Briefer Comment 632
- Books of 1945, A Selected List 635
- Music by B. H. Haggin 641
- Drama by Joseph Wood Krutch 642
- Books in Short 642

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 643

CROSSWORD PUZZLE NO. 138 by Jack Barrett 644

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor J. KING GORDON
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]
European Editor: J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates
LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS
CAREY MCWILLIAMS REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

THE NATION ASSOCIATES FORUM ON CONTROL of atomic power, held last Saturday, Sunday, and Monday at the Hotel Astor in New York, was a success by any accepted standard of measurement. The number of delegates and guests attending the four sessions on the first two days totaled more than 500 and represented a wide range of national organizaitons. They came from 95 cities in twenty-two states, including places as far away as Washington, Oregon, and California. As for the dinner, its attendance was held by space limitations to some two thousand guests; at least as many more would have come if they could have been accommodated. Professor Harold J. Laski chairman of the British Labor Party, came by plane from London especially to take his place among the guest speakers. Statistics don't tell the story but these few figures illustrate one part of it: they show how keenly American progressive groups realize the urgent nature of the problem of control created by the bomb; how eager they are to arrive at informed conclusions and agree upon effective action. The program was deliberately arranged to allow time for the active participation of the delegates, and at each working session except the last, which was somewhat crowded, the discussion was general and full. One delegate remarked at the end that it was the first "really democratic" conference she had ever attended, the first at which speakers and presiding officers alike "treated the audience like a collection of adults." One factor contributing to this happy impression was that the audience was adult—a group of serious, well informed citizens who knew what they were there for. To the distinguished group of speakers and discussion leaders The Nation and the members of the Forum owe a deep debt of gratitude.

*

THE FORMAL PAPERS PRESENTED AT THE FORUM need not be reviewed here. They formed, we believe, a remarkably coherent and impressive whole. It would be unfair to select any for special mention; instead we plan to publish them in as complete form as possible, together with some of the discussion from the floor, in a special supplement to appear two weeks hence. Then Nation readers who were unable to attend the forum will be able to judge for themselves the quality of the material presented and share, in part, the value of the meetings. Perhaps the most insistent note struck by scientists and lay speakers alike was the impossibility of finding any protection against the destructive power of atomic explosives except through international machinery capable, first, of exercising effective authority over atomic development for military purposes and, second, of preventing war itself. This insistence was expressed in various ways: in detailed discussions of methods of international inspection and control; in a strong demand, voiced by several speakers, for the rapid transformation of UNO into a world government; and in a realistic discussion of the conflicts and tensions—particularly between Russia and the West—which stand in the way of adequate international action. The forum adjourned with the adoption of a set of "propositions" which will appear in the supplement.

✶

THERE ARE DOZENS OF EXPLANATIONS BUT NO excuses for the failure of the labor-management conference. The reasons for its collapse are all bad. Industry delegates were determined not to endorse the President's wage policy. John L. Lewis, now the absolute boss of the A. F. of L., in fact if not in name, was determined to scotch any proposal of importance originating with the C. I. O. Management was determined to prevent fact-finding or voluntary arbitration machinery which involved real disclosure of company books, and labor was happy enough to avoid the subject lest it be saddled with nothing but a crippling requirement for cooling-off periods. The only thing that can make the conference failure more abject than it is will be to indulge in the fantasy that it really accomplished something.

✶

PRESIDENT TRUMAN'S MESSAGE TO CONGRESS asking for legislation to provide for emergency fact-finding boards in critical labor disputes is clearly connected with the failure of the labor-management conference. The policy it outlines has been strongly urged by The Nation ever since the present menacing situation developed. Commerce Department and OWMR reports and the President's own speech have proclaimed that wages can be raised substantially without increasing prices. Since industry has rejected that policy in word and in deed by refusing to bargain collectively on the subject, the government must prove its point and enlist public support behind it. It must arrange disclosure of the economic facts, industry by industry. In this way it can accomplish the two principal goals which the conference missed—the creation of effective and fair disputes machinery and the demonstration of the broad economic terms in which strikes must be settled.

✶

A STEEL STOPPAGE IS AN IMMINENT THREAT in view of last week's strike vote and United States Steel's absolute refusal to resume negotiations in the absence of higher price ceilings. No strike could be more menacing to reconversion. The nation's durable-goods factories would come to a halt in a matter of weeks. Even more forcibly than the General Motors walkout this crisis demonstrates the compelling necessity for federally sponsored machinery to settle disputes. Unfortunately the steel dispute is also the most difficult to settle. "Big Steel" has always set the pattern, and it proposes to continue that role in a situation where the stakes are greater than a mere wage increase, where the battle revolves on the question of whether prices and profits are the concern of an individual company or of the public. Moreover, the steel industry's profits are probably less than those in other industries where similar wage demands are being made. Finally, for the OPA to compromise its price policy by allowing higher ceilings would be to create the terrifying necessity of repricing practically everything under OPA. After all, steel enters some 85 per cent of all manufactured products. Since the OPA-industry dispute over prices and the union-industry dispute over wages really center in the question of steel profits, and since neither side trusts the other's figures, only one settlement procedure appears to offer any hope. That is the government-sponsored, impartial investigation of the facts as they appear from an examination of all sources, including the industry's books. It should produce the only answers that could be expected to satisfy the workers and give the public the truth on which to base its decisions and force a just settlement. Failure to avert the strike, or to end it promptly when it begins, means a productionless winter, possibly one of the blackest and most dangerous in the country's peace-time history.

✶

ITALY, AS WE GO TO PRESS, STILL HAS NO government. The task of forming a cabinet has been entrusted to Alcide de Gasperi, leader of the Christian Democrats and Foreign Minister in the Parri administration, whose efforts to maintain a broad-based coalition are encountering opposition from the Liberals. One major bone of contention in the Ministry of the Interior which Signor de Gasperi, in agreement with the Socialists, Communists, and Actionists, had alloted to the Socialists. Since this department controls the police and will be responsible for preparations for the elections next spring, the Liberals, who have become in fact the spearhead of conservatism and monarchism, are desperately anxious to secure the post for themselves. It was the Liberals who forced the current crisis by their attacks on Signor Nenni, Socialist Vice-Premier in the Parri government whom they accuse of too much zeal in his purge of Fascists. But their intrigue could hardly have succeeded if the Allies had shown a less negative attitude toward Parri. When he took office British and American representatives approved his democratic program and promised support. The most effective form such support could have taken would have been the abrogation of the harsh armistice terms which thwart an Italian government at every turn. Under the armistice, for instance, Allied Military Government controls the industrial north; demobilization of the Italian army which is eating up one-third of the budget is prohibited; the conclusion of commercial treaties with other countries, which could help to revive trade, is prevented. Two months ago Parri urged the Allies to substitute an "interim peace arrangement" for the armistice. But his plea was ignored and thus encouragement was given to reactionaries who spread the word that Parri's policy of cooperation with the democratic powers had failed. If Italy is to have a chance, if it is not to be shaken by continual crises, the Allies must allow its government power commensurate with its responsibilities.

✶

ADDRESSING A TORY CONVENTION LAST WEEK, Winston Churchill sought to raise the drooping spirits of his followers by unloosing a stream of invective against the Labor government. Herbert M. Matthews of the New York Times tells us that "the doughty old warrior" was never in better form. He quotes in proof "pungent phrases that tumbled like malevolent gems from a genie's pouch," such as "morbid and reactionary Socialists," "the gloomy vultures of nationalization," "the heavy-footed state." These rhetorical clichés seem more like sweepings from the floor of Lord Beaverbrook's yellow press than jewels of eloquence, and we suspect that they affected the impressionable Mr. Matthews far more than they did the politically mature British public. In fact, Britons are likely to find in Mr. Churchill's tirade yet another proof of the political bankruptcy of his party. Having no constructive program with which to oppose the Labor Party, the Tories must fall back on abuse. In his peroration Mr. Churchill showed that he was still unable to read the lessons of the Parliamentary and municipal elections when he said "events are moving and will move toward the issue—the people versus the Socialists." Obviously he refuses to accept the fact that "the people" are with the Socialists and are likely to stay with them so long as they stay with socialism.

* * *

EVEN AT THIS ELEVENTH HOUR WE COULD DO something effective about Argentina. But it should be done without delay. We should immediately call a conference of Latin American nations and urge a general break of relations with Buenos Aires and the application of economic sanctions. This is the only way to prevent Perón from being elected President. Once he is in office, nothing can be done short of using force. That is the conviction not only of newspapermen who have watched events in Argentina, or of impatient anti-fascists, but of many well-informed Latin American diplomats. These men cannot express their views openly, but they have done so privately, and if the State Department desires we can furnish the names of our sources. Nor is the issue one of anti-Semitism or the suppression of every form of freedom, including freedom of the press. It is that the election of Perón as President means almost certain war in the Western Hemisphere by 1950. His rule will lead to the absorption by Argentina of Bolivia and Paraguay, the latter country having already become almost an Argentine province. It will lead later to the encirclement of Uruguay and Chile, then to open conflict with Brazil and, in the end, with the United States. The strong stand taken by Spruille Braden in Buenos Aires did much to stiffen popular resistance to the threat of a continued, quasi-legal Perón dictatorship. When Braden was recalled by Washington to become Assistant Secretary of State, it was hoped that immediate steps would be taken to translate his attitude into official policy. So far nothing has happened, and as a result Perón's position is much stronger than when Braden left. Only prompt and energetic action can reverse the situation.

* * *

GRUDGINGLY THE ASSOCIATED PRESS HAS decided to comply with the verdict of the federal courts. In January, 1944, it will be recalled, the District Court found that the public interest required that the A.P. in passing on applications for membership should not take into account the effect on the competitive position of existing members. This decision was upheld by a majority of the Supreme Court in June, 1945, and a petition for a rehearing of the case was denied in October. With no further legal procedures open to them, the directors of the agency felt compelled to take steps which would make possible a motion to the court for lifting the injunction under which the A.P. is now operating. With this in view they recommended to the members at a special meeting on November 28: first, an amendment to the by-laws providing that "in voting upon an applicant for membership, whether such voting be by the members or the board of directors, no member or director shall take into consideration in passing upon such applicant the effect of his or its admission upon the ability of such applicant to compete with members in the same city and field"; second, the election of four applicants for membership, including Marshall Field, owner of the Chicago Sun. The motion to elect was seconded by Colonel Robert R. McCormick, who made no attempt to disguise the bitterness of the pill. He consented, he said, only because the A.P.'s counsel agreed that if the applicants were rejected, "the courts will hold us in contempt." However, having tripped over the law, the Colonel is hoping to get the law changed. He had, he told the meeting, 500 proxies supporting a resolution pledging the membership to agitate for legislation exempting newspapers and news agencies from the anti-trust laws. Having done its modest part in the campaign in which the A.P. has just acknowledged defeat, The Nation promises to renew the fight if and when newspaper publishers seek special privileges from Congress.

* * *

JOHN (THE GIANT-KILLER) LONGO RECENTLY won another respite from the persecution of the Hague colossus in New Jersey, which has been trying for years to put him securely behind bars. Longo was sentenced to serve eighteen months to three years after he was found guilty, on the evidence of Hague witnesses, of having falsified his own voting record, or rather of having stood by while it was falsified. The Court of Errors and Appeals denied his request for a new trial. The Board of Pardons refused clemency. But just when it seemed that the prison doors must surely close upon him, and the Hague cohorts were undoubtedly heaving sighs of relief, Judge August Ziegner of the Court of Common Pleas issued an order directing the Hudson County prosecutor to show cause why Longo should not have a new trial. The Hagueophile Hudson County Bar Association immediately swung into action and tried to enjoin any move for a new trial. Meanwhile the New Jersey papers carried a full-page advertisement designed to prove that Longo's trial had been above reproach. Nevertheless, the Court of Errors and Appeals turned down the Bar Association's application for a writ prohibiting Judge Ziegner from reopening the case. To anyone familiar with New Jersey politics the determination of the Hague machine to prevent a new trial is enough to prove that Longo deserves one. If it comes about, we hope the defense will find a way of bringing into court the handwriting expert who was hired by the prosecution to examine the record in question—but was not produced as a witness. On being questioned by former Governor Edison as to his findings, he said that they showed that the crime with which Longo was charged had never been committed. The prosecution, it seems, did not consider his report—with photographs—worth mentioning.

Same Bill of Goods

BURTON K. WHEELER'S speech in the Senate last week on the Connally resolution for the appointment of American representatives to the United Nations Organization constituted a formal unveiling of the new, 1946 model, post-war isolationism. For the isolationists reconversion has been an easy process. The war has not affected them; atomic energy has left them untouched. Their line is virtually identical with what it was when the attack on Pearl Harbor suddenly forced them, temporarily, to shut up shop. They present now only a single innovation—the slogan, "We told you so."

Senator Wheeler put it this way in his opening words: "Mr. President, the speech I am about to make is in no way intended as a criticism of President Truman. He has inherited an almost insoluble situation—one which some of us foresaw was the inevitable consequence of the policies pursued before Pearl Harbor. Now there are those who seek to blame him—in order that they may excuse their own lack of foresight, their own support of some of the things which could only lead to the situation in which we now find ourselves."

Later on he amplified this in an interesting exchange with Senator McMahon:

> Mr. McMahon: Does the Senator believe we fought for survival?
>
> Mr. Wheeler. Certainly not.
>
> Mr. McMahon. Does the Senator take the position that this country was in no danger at any time?
>
> Mr. Wheeler. We were never in any danger until we were attacked.
>
> Mr. McMahon. Does the Senator believe that that attack was inevitable?
>
> Mr. Wheeler. No, I do not.
>
> Mr. McMahon. The Senator thinks it could have been avoided?
>
> Mr. Wheeler. Of course I do. I have said so repeatedly. I think it could have been. I do not claim to be infallible. My own conviction was then, and my conviction is now, that the policies we pursued led us down the road to war.

This, of course, is precisely the line which is being developed by the Republicans in the Pearl Harbor inquiry. Even less subtly than Senator Wheeler, they are attempting to prove the validity of their own pre-war contentions—that the Axis had no designs on America, that the war was no more than a contest between rival and equally reprehensible imperialisms, that President Roosevelt's resistance to the Axis was contrary to our real national interest and provoked, if it did not actually justify, the Japanese attack upon us. Here is an interpretation of history which, if it can be made to germinate in the soil of post-war disillusionment, will undermine and subvert the whole American outlook, and uproot the nascent sense of unity with mankind which has been this nation's one positive gain from the awful experience of war.

It is unlikely that Senator Wheeler can succeed, or that he even entertains any hope of success, in his assault on the Connally resolution. At the time this is written, with the defeat of the Taft amendment, its passage seems assured. This measure is intended to accomplish no more than to implement American adherence to the United Nations Charter, ratified by the Senate four months ago, eighty-nine to two. It would authorize appointment of an American representative and a deputy to the UNO. It would empower the President to commit this country to collective measures short of war without reference to Congress. And it would also empower him to make stipulated American forces available for the enforcement of decisions taken by the Security Council. The size and character of the American forces to be made available would have to be approved in advance by Congress, but once approved, they could be committed to action unanimously agreed upon by the council in an emergency without specific Congressional indorsement. It is this last provision, of course, which will test those who, like Senator Wheeler, gave no more than lip service to the charter itself. Plainly, without this provision American participation would be meaningless and the council impotent.

Senator Wheeler's assault highlights certain dangers to the United Nations Organization in the attitude of some of the younger interventionists who disparage the charter as inadequate and already obsolescent. Perfectionism, as President Roosevelt noted, has its serious dangers. One need not embrace Senator Connally's extravagant fears of a world state to recognize the force of his reasoning when he asked rather irritably, "Why can't we stick with this until we try it a while? . . . Why, when we start to do something, do you have to say: 'Let's to something else.'" The immediate problem is to make the United Nations function.

Senator Wheeler plays adroitly upon the dissatisfactions of those who want something better than the UNO. He cites their criticism of it as proof that it has already failed. And as an even more effective means of undermining popular faith in it, he attributes to this alleged failure the whole sorry state of the world today. Russia and Britain, as he sees it, are both now actively engaged in aggression. The task of the UNO must be nothing less than to quell them at once, forthwith. "Enforce the peace against whom?" he asks rhetorically. "Certainly not Germany and Japan—they are destroyed. The only aggressors today are our beloved and noble peace-loving allies, both of which are still at war."

But if Senator Wheeler is scornful of the UNO's capacity to bring these recalcitrants to heel, he has no doubt that the United States, alone and unaided, can and should do so. "We must quit appeasing Russia," he insists staunchly, "and let her know once and for all we did not fight this war to let her enslave the peoples of Europe. She agreed to our high principles in her hour of distress. She must abide by them now." If President Roosevelt's remonstrances to the Axis before Pearl Harbor were war-mongering, what can this be called?

It is quite obvious by now that the advent of the atom bomb has at once made more urgent the establishment of a functioning world organization and called for the strengthening of the authority set up by agreement among the nations. Some honestly feel that the international authority must be invested with all the powers and instrumentalities of world government. And logic, if not history, seems to support them. But however much beyond the present United Nations Organization men's logic and hopes and fears may carry them, the first and immediate task is to find ways to heal the rifts between the nations and give UNO the power it now requires. It is this task that must unite all Americans who, even before the bomb, knew that the world was one.

Radio's Second Chance

THE development of FM broadcasting, free from static and interference, marked a great step forward in electronics. It promised more, however, than full-fidelity reception. To a radio industry that has been constipated with bad taste and noisome commercials, it offered a chance for a fresh start. To business that was left out in the cold when simoniacs in the Coolidge and Hoover administrations were selling the nation's airways down the spectrum, it offered a new opportunity for station licenses. To the body politic, it offered a thousand platforms widely scattered, from which all points of view could gain a public hearing.

The inventor of FM, Major Edwin Armstrong, was fully aware of the immense social values of his brain-child. He had found that the radio industry, particularly RCA, had fought FM "every inch of the way," and he expressed the expectation that FM would make possible a large number of small and independent stations. When the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) gave the go-ahead to FM in May, 1940, it emphasized that "the opening of a new band for commercial broadcasts will help to correct numerous defects and inequalities now existing in the standard broadcast system." It limited the competitive advantages which standard stations would have in the FM field by requiring every FM station to present two hours of programs not duplicated on standard broadcast stations, "to demonstrate the full fidelity of the FM system." Finally, during the war, it announced that it planned to reserve twenty channels for later distribution, so that small business units could enter the field at a later date, after more sets had reached the public.

Last December Paul A. Porter, a fluent Kentuckian, was lifted out of his job as publicity chief of the Democratic National Committee and made chairman of the FCC. Fresh from the OPA, where he had done an effective job as rent administrator, he was known in Washington both as a "liberal" and a "smooth operator." He came to the FCC wearing his "L" sweater, and his earlier hitch as a member of the rugged CBS lobby in Washington was dismissed as a totally irrelevant factor in his past. And after he assumed office he wrote a hard-hitting diatribe for American Magazine, entitled Radio Must Grow Up, which accused the networks of "commercial opportunism" and sharply excoriated them for putting out a very shoddy type of product. His remedy for the evils of radio, however, was that listeners should write letters to their station managers. Some felt that this solution betrayed a rather narrow view of the powers and functions of the FCC.

When the question of FM came before the commission, Mr. Porter had very little trouble in persuading most of his colleagues to yield to the pressure of the networks and the trade press and abandon the requirements for separate programming on FM outlets owned by AM (standard) stations. And he urged them to forget the silly notion of reserving frequencies for veterans and for newcomers. To veterans who protested against the failure to reserve frequencies, he replied that there would always be a considerable number of unused spots. In places, no doubt, like the Great American Desert.

Protection of present investments in radio has become one of the FCC's chief concerns—in spite of the fact that its own statistics show that the broadcast industry made a return before federal taxes of more than 269 per cent of the depreciated value of its property in 1943—and it is now the FCC's fixed practice to award an FM license almost automatically to every AM station, without any hearing to show what sort of public service it has rendered under its AM license.

Even after receiving their licenses, vested interests enjoy formidable competitive advantages over newcomers in FM: (1) they have no additional rentals; (2) they have no additional programming costs; (3) they have practically no additional personnel or administrative costs; and (4) they enjoy a virtual government tax subsidy through their privilege of offsetting early losses by FM broadcasting against AM profits.

The annual operation cost for a non-affiliated FM station with one kilowatt power will average $35,000, a sum equal to the original construction costs. For an FM station duplicating the programs of an AM affiliate, the annual operation costs will be negligible.

It will take from two to five years for enough FM receivers to be in the homes of the nation to make FM a generally profitable enterprise. Until that time it is not a practical activity for modestly financed units. It is essential, therefore, if small business, civic groups, labor unions, and cooperatives are to enter the field at all, that at least half of the available FM channels be reserved for later distribution.

Up to the present such applications have been sparse, although applications are now on file from the U. A. W., the I. L. G. W. U., the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, the Potomac Cooperative Federation, and the Hollywood Community Radio Group. Columbia University has applied for a non-commercial educational station. Most non-profit organizations, however, are unable to finance the venture through the difficult early years, and many have been too preoccupied with war work even to consider the possibility.

The need for action is urgent. Of the first 129 conditional FM licenses, all but 23 were granted to companies which already hold licenses for AM stations. Within the next twelve months a large part of the FM spectrum will be distributed. The responsibility of the FCC is a gigantic one—it has a unique opportunity to safeguard and implement our cherished constitutional guaranty of freedom of speech. Its power is greater than the Supreme Court's, for the court deals only with restraints, and the commission has the positive task of creating opportunities. If America is to avail itself fully of its second chance in radio, if it is to create a vital and imaginative industry whose ownership is widely diversified and whose microphones tap the talent resources of every community, the FCC must execute a sharp and courageous reversal of policy. That it will have full Congressional support in such a move is indicated by the fact that the Senate Small Business Committee, sparkplugged by Senator Glen H. Taylor of Idaho, is making a study of the problems of small business men and veterans in radio. It is hoped that a thorough Congressional investigation of this subject will soon take shape, so that FM can be saved for the people before it is too late.

Exit Pat Hurley

BY MAXWELL S. STEWART

ORDINARILY when a public servant fails in his task, he resigns quietly, and his shortcomings are mercifully forgotten. This has always been true in the diplomatic service, where tradition frowns upon the airing of individual opinions. But Patrick Hurley is not a man who can accept failure gracefully. He showed that repeatedly in his brief but stormy career as ambassador to China. And when the inevitable consequences of his meddling in Chinese domestic affairs became so apparent that he was denounced in Congress, his inordinate vanity would not permit a peaceful exit. Instead, he issued an angry public statement which only dramatized his unfitness for the responsibilities with which he had been intrusted.

His attempt to shift the blame for his failure to his former subordinates is a reflection of both his vanity and his incompetence. While it is true that his staff, almost to a man, opposed his consistent support of the reactionary elements in the Chungking regime, it must be remembered that Hurley's policies in every case prevailed and that during the past six or eight months he had surrounded himself with men of his own choosing. Nor has the China Division of the State Department exercised a restraining influence. When conflict arose, Hurley was upheld against the judgment of experts who had spent years studying China's complex political problems. Hurley might have argued that civil war would have broken out even if the United States had not encouraged the Kuomintang with promises of American backing, but he certainly has no grounds for blaming our involvement in that war on those who opposed our taking sides in China's domestic dispute. Hurley's charge that some of the career men openly favored the Communists is a deliberate misrepresentation cooked up, apparently, for political effect. The policies advocated by the experts were from the beginning essentially those of Stilwell and Gauss. They sought to prevent American supplies from being diverted from the war against Japan for use in civil conflict and to assist all groups—not merely the Communists—seeking to establish a more democratic political structure in China. In contrast, Hurley's unconditional support of the Kuomintang has encouraged Chungking to resist popular demands for democratic constitutional reform.

The part of General Hurley's statement that most clearly betrayed his unfitness, however, was the self-contradictory charge that these foreign-service officials were siding simultaneously with an "imperialist bloc" and with "Communist imperialism" against "democracy and free enterprise." It would be impossible in a brief article to untangle the confusion that apparently exists in General Hurley's mind regarding these basic issues. The equating of "democracy" and "free enterprise" provides a partial key to the confusion, but even that does not explain how the career men's alleged Communist sympathies were causing us to be "sucked into a power bloc" against Communist imperialism. Yet this is the one specific charge that would in any way justify his assertion that their policies, in contrast to his own, were laying the basis for World War III.

Confused and uninformed though General Hurley's statement is, it has been seized upon with delight by the anti-British, anti-Russian press. Yet its effect in the long run should be salutary. The American people have a right to know not only the details of our involvement in China but how our policies on crucial foreign issues are formulated. They should be particularly interested in learning why the views of a relative novice should be permitted to override the recommendations of men who have devoted years of study to Chinese affairs. Another relevant question is why, considering his obvious incompetence, General Hurley was kept in his post as long as he was. It is known that a successor—a man with long experience in China—was selected several months ago, even before the General returned from China. But after Chiang Kai-shek sent an urgent letter requesting Hurley's retention, it was announced that he would return to China. The public would doubtless like to know why the views of a Chinese official should take precedence over the interests of the American people. A Congressional investigation of these questions would be useful.

After the furor created by Hurley's resignation it was obviously impossible for the President to go back to the original plan of naming a career diplomat to replace him. He had to find a man who enjoyed the confidence of all sections of American opinion and who at the same time would command the highest respect in China. While the selection of a military man with little China experience may be questionable, especially at a time when political issues are paramount, General Marshall is no ordinary military man, and he is not wholly without experience in China. His ability is exceptional, and there is no reason to believe that he shares Hurley's anti-Russian bias. While his task is an unenviable one, he will assume it with as close to united backing as any diplomat could desire.

President Truman has promised that General Marshall will be given specific published instructions before he leaves for Chungking. It is probable that these instructions will follow the general lines of those given Hurley a year ago, making due allowances for changed circumstances. The new ambassador will undoubtedly be asked to explore the possibility of solving the Kuomintang-Communist controversy and to help formulate a long-range policy on American military and material assistance to China. Whether the President will go farther is uncertain. But Marshall's task would be greatly clarified if the President would use this occasion to restate the principles of American foreign policy contained in his Navy Day speech as they apply to China. Such a statement would have a tremendous effect on China's internal situation. The militarists who have gone confidently ahead with preparations for civil war on the assumption that Uncle Sam will provide the arms and pay the bill would lose their trump card if our policy were clearly put; for no responsible American official will pledge the kind of assistance the Kuomintang militarists need if they are to establish control throughout China. If the President were to make it plain that American military and economic support will depend upon the acceptance of basic democratic principles, Chungking might be forced to abandon its stubborn opposition to constitutional reform and so might open the way for a settlement of China's internal difficulties.

Palestine Pilgrimage

BY I. F. STONE

New York, November 30

I FEEL a little like the hero of Jules Verne's "Around the World in Eighty Days," though he was a slowpoke by comparison. Last Tuesday I had tea in England and dinner in Ireland. I breakfasted the next day in Newfoundland and lunched in New York. I have just returned from a six weeks' trip abroad, a typical bit of American blitz journalism. My primary concern was Palestine, and the largest part of my time was spent there. But I had five days in London on my way and two days in Paris. I saw St. Peter's from the skies over Rome, and I climbed the Acropolis in awe during an overnight stop in Athens. I had five days in and around Cairo before I reached Palestine, and I saw every part of the Holy Land except the Dead Sea during my stay there. I spent two days and a night in the Lebanon, and stayed three days each in Cairo and London on my way back, with short descents from lonely night skies over Cyrenaica and Malta, and a breakfast near Marseilles.

It was my first trip abroad, and if a wandering newspaperman may be forgiven his enthusiasm, I came back drunk on the beauties of the world: that last look at Manhattan's heady towers on the way out; the infinite variety of sea and sky on the boat trip over; St. Paul's, mighty and melancholy amid the bomb ruins in a London dusk; Paris, as one had dreamed of it, miraculously unscathed by the war; a savage sunset over the wild Balkan headlands flying into Greece; the green delta stretching from horizon to horizon as one enters the Egyptian skies; the minarets and the stars over the Citadel in Cairo; dawn over the Negev from the watch tower at Gevulot, with Sinai far in the distance; Minara, my favorite colony, which shoulders the sky 3,000 feet above the Jordan across from the enormous Harmon, where Pan dwelt; and Jerusalem, clean, white, and lovely on its ancient hills. I was moved to tears twice on my trip, once when I walked for the first time into Notre Dame in Paris, and again when I came through the narrow winding streets of the Old City to the Wailing Wall in Jerusalem, and saw the few stones to which cling so many filial memories for a Jew.

I went over neither to uncover sensations nor to bolster preconceptions but to understand the British and the Arab as well as the Jewish point of view, to get the atmosphere of London and the flavor of Arab nationalism, and to see for myself what had been accomplished in Palestine. I dined with a Cabinet minister in London and had a two-hour off-the-record talk with Azzam Bey, head of the Arab League, in Cairo. My assignment, to achieve some grasp of the complexities and the tragedies involved in Britain's position, Arab aspirations, and urgent Jewish needs, was an assignment that called for an Isaiah, not a mere reporter. Perhaps I learned most from chance contact and talks with humbler folk—a devout English Catholic returning on the Queen Elizabeth from captivity in Japan, a cockney Jewish mother bombed out of her home in the East End of London, a Coptic doctor struggling against the disease and squalor of an Egyptian village, a young Sephardic Jew homeless in Athens whose Spanish passport had saved him in a German death camp, a brilliant Christian Arab leader in Beirut whose sympathetic understanding of Zionism surpassed that of any Zionist I encountered, a veteran English civil servant in Haifa, and above all the young men and women of the Jewish colonies I visited, the grandest young folk I have ever met.

I hated Egypt. I have never seen such poverty. There are wise and farseeing men in the Egyptian upper class, and I had the good fortune to speak with several. But there are also a whole horde of self-serving phonies, and some Egyptian officials seem to treat their own people with an arrogance and contempt beyond that of the worst foreign imperialist. The gap between rich and poor is unbelievably wide. Of all the villages in Egypt some fourteen now have health centers, and of these fourteen, five have doctors. It was to one of these show villages, near Gizeh, with the Pyramids visible not far away, that I was taken. The filth and squalor were beyond conception, and there, as in the Muski, the ancient quarter of Cairo, I saw a sight one cannot forget—flies feasting on the corrupted eyelids of little children. In the West one speaks of exploitation, but in the West the exploiting capitalist builds, constructs, produces; his activity adds as much as if not more than it subtracts. But in Egypt exploitation is of a different and almost one-sided character. The fellah lives on the Nile and the pasha lives on the fellah. In the West when we think of colonial nationalism, we think of Gandhi and Nehru. Egypt once had a Zaglul Pasha, responsive to his people's needs, but today one catches few if any overtones of idealism in the Wafdist movement he founded.

Egypt provides perspective on Palestine. There is the sharpest contrast between the markets of Egypt and the Arab markets in Palestine, as I saw them in the all-Arab town of Gaza or in the Arab sections of Jerusalem and Haifa. The Arab markets of Palestine are clean. The town and village Arab of Palestine is better dressed, healthier looking by far, than the Arab in Egypt, whose usual dress is a dirty, old-fashioned, single-piece garment which is almost an exact replica of the nightshirt grandpa in America used to wear. Passing from Egypt to Palestine one can see for oneself what is testified to in the Peel Royal Commission report on Palestine—that the coming of the Jews has not degraded the Arab but lifted his living standards.

I found myself immensely attracted by the life of the Yishuv, the Jewish community of Palestine. It is the one place in the world where Jews seem completely unafraid. I did not see the displaced persons' camps in Germany, but even in such free countries as England and France—and at home, in the United States—there are premonitory tremors in the Jewish communities, conscious or subconscious fears of the future. In Palestine a Jew can be a Jew. Period. Without apologies, and without any lengthy arguments as to whether Jews are a race, a religion, a myth, or an accident. He need explain to no one, and he feels profoundly at home; I am quite willing to attribute this to historic sentimentality, but it remains none the less a tremendous and inescapable fact. In the desert, on the barren mountains, in the once malarial marshes of the Emek, the Jew has done and is doing what seemed to reasonable men the impossible. Nowhere in the world have human beings surpassed what the Jewish colonists have accomplished in Palestine, and the consciousness of achievement, the sense of things growing, the exhilarating atmosphere of a great common effort infuses the daily life of the Yishuv. I came away feeling that no obstacles, no setbacks, nothing but perhaps a Third World War and atomic bombs in the Middle East, could stop this people.

It happens that I felt myself painfully impelled to disagree with majority opinion in the Yishuv. I am not in favor of a Jewish state in Palestine. But it would be foolish, and it would be completely to misunderstand how history and human beings work, to disparage Zionism. Only a passionate, narrow, and mystical national faith made it possible for Jews to colonize areas the goats despised. Without the Zionist movement, what has been achieved in Palestine would never have come to pass. The closest parallel in American experience is Puritanism, and Palestine is indeed much like the frontier in our own country, both in colonial times and in the West. But the strength associated with such a movement also has its corresponding defects, and the defects of Zionism are reflected in its failure to take into account the feelings and aspirations of the Palestinian Arab. The Arab has benefited from the Jewish influx, but only indirectly. The Zionist has not hurt him, but the Zionist has made him feel shut out. This exclusiveness is natural and understandable, but it needs to be corrected if the Jews are to build for themselves a secure life in the Middle East.

I understood after seeing Egypt and talking with Christian Arabs in the Lebanon—many of them anti-Zionist only in public—why the Yishuv will fight and has a right to fight against permanent minority status under present conditions in an Arab state. But I also understand why the Palestinian Arab, to whom Palestine is also home, who has fully as much right there as the Jew, does not wish to live as a minority in a Jewish state. No one likes to be ruled by an alien people, and though I, a Jew, found the friendliest sort of welcome visiting with Arabs, I found no Palestinian Arab in favor of a Jewish state. Relations on the day-to-day level between the two peoples are friendly and quite unlike what one expects. There is no sense of race tension as one feels it in our South or in encounters with anti-Semites in the Western world. The Arab does not hate the Jew, but he fears being dominated by him, and this fear must be allayed.

In a visit to Amir on the upper Jordan, where the Hadassah was opening a new health center for Jews and Arabs, I encountered a feeling among the Arabs that they somehow risked the displeasure of the British governing authorities if they were friendly with the Jews. I found no evidence to support this suspicion, but I believe that there is much the British could do to improve relations between leaders of the two peoples. I was told that at Haifa the chief engineer, the leading British civil servant of the municipality, had done much in a quiet unobtrusive way toward the success of the local government. Haifa's population—and its City Council—is equally divided between Jews and Arabs. The mayoralty was long held by a respected Arab, succeeded since his death by his deputy, a Jew of Turkish origin. The chief engineer told me that he could remember no occasion on which a split vote in the council had not found Jews and Arabs on both sides. Admittedly it is easier to run a municipality than a nation, but Haifa nevertheless illustrates the fact that the two races can get along in equal partnership.

The earlier day when Arab nationalist and Zionist could work together, as they did in the first honeymoon period after the war, came to an end for two reasons. One was Britain's failure to fulfil the promises made the Arabs on the basis of which their leaders accepted Zionism for Palestine. The other was the Jewish demand, first by implication and then explicitly, for a Jewish state in Palestine. The Jewish State slogan has made political cooperation between Jew and Arab impossible, and left the Jewish homeland completely dependent on British support. The British, feeling that the Jews had to support the Empire under any circumstances, have more and more made their concessions to the Arabs. These concessions have been at the expense of the Yishuv, of French interests, and of the minorities in the Middle East generally. It is because the Jews understand this and feel deeply the needs of their homeless brethren in Europe that they have launched the present civil-disobedience campaign. They scent an attempt to liquidate the Yishuv, and they scent another cruel Evian farce beneath Bevin's fine talk of finding a world solution for the Jewish problem. And I must confess that after being in London, and with all due respect for the good intentions of British Labor, I agree with Palestinian Jewry.

I came away with a great liking and respect for the English people but a great distrust of their officials. I understand the average Englishman's resentment over American interference, and I favor not only American sharing of responsibility but an international solution for the Middle East. British fears of an Arab uprising largely reflect a hobgoblin of their own making; the great powers can impose any solution they choose. I think the equitable solution would be a bi-national state for Palestine and international trusteeship until population parity has been reached between Jews and Arabs. I think the powers must recognize the Arab aspiration for some kind of league or federation and put bi-national Palestine into it, and I think they must then provide some form of international guaranty for the Christian Lebanon, the Jewish community in Palestine, and other minorities in the East, but a guaranty free from the taint of "capitulations" in Egypt, a system of protection much abused both by the imperialist powers and the minorities themselves. A settlement of this kind depends, of course, on whether London and Washington are sincerely concerned with stability in the Middle East or merely with appeasing the Arabs in preparation for a new war against the Soviet Union. I do not speak from surmise when I report that from Ernest Bevin down, the British Foreign Office and the Colonial Office seem to be suffering from an obsession on this score, and the Jews are its principal victims.

A bi-national settlement would provide enough immigration certificates over, say, the next five or ten years—about 650,000—to take care of all Jews who must be given a refuge in Palestine. It would establish a Jewish community strong enough to hold its own in the Arab world. It would end Palestinian Arab fears of a Jewish state. It would genuinely fulfil Britain's obligations to both peoples, and it would lay the basis for a stable and developing order in the Middle East, in which British and world interests in communications and oil could be adequately safeguarded without infringing Arab independence. In that context, if the Jews give one-tenth the devotion to Arab relations that they have given to the land, they can build a secure homeland for themselves among their Semitic brethren. This way, I am deeply convinced, lies the only lasting and equitable solution for Palestine and the Middle East.

Britain's Colonial Squeeze

BY ANDREW ROTH

(Author of "Dilemma in Japan")

BLOODY struggles in Indonesia and Indo-China and seething unrest in Burma, India, and other colonies have raised a storm of discussion over the morality or immorality of British actions. Despite the great volume of words the solution of the problem has advanced hardly at all because little attention has been paid to the economic underpinnings of British colonialism. When the problem is viewed from an economic angle it becomes clear that Britain is clinging ever more desperately to its own colonies and reaching out for those of the weak French and Dutch empires as a major part of its effort to bolster its sagging political and economic power.

Few persons realize how far Great Britain has fallen behind the United States and the Soviet Union in economic strength or grasp the full effect of this development on its foreign and particularly its colonial policy. Foreign trade is the crux of the British economic crisis. The island homeland itself is poorly endowed in natural resources: it is self-sufficient only in coal and nitrates; it must import a considerable amount of iron ore. Although agricultural production was increased during the war, a substantial part of its agricultural needs will still have to be imported.

On the other hand, Great Britain is the most important industrial area in the world for its size and population. In use of horse-power per man and in machinery investment it is first in Europe, although it is surpassed by the United States and Canada. Its industrial structure is still somewhat antiquated, but it has perhaps the greatest body of skilled artisans in the world.

Because of this poverty of natural resources combined with plenitude of industrial skills Britain has depended more than any other power on large-scale imports of food and raw materials. Before the war its per capita imports were about four times those of the United States. About three-fifths of the cost of these imports was met by exports, another fifth by income from overseas investments, and the final fifth by the profits of shipping, banking and insurance, and the like.

The tremendous world-wide economic and political changes of the six war years have markedly impaired Britain's ability to pay for imports. There has been a very considerable decline in revenue from overseas investments because more than half of the $16 billion of overseas investments held in September, 1939, has been liquidated. Canada, for example, has succeeded in repatriating $1½ billion of Canadian securities held in Britain. Furthermore, about $14 billion of debts, exclusive of Lend-Lease, have been incurred, mostly in the form of blocked sterling balances.

While the falling off of these secondary revenues has underlined the primary importance of exports of British manufactures, the markets for these exports have shown a parallel shrinkage. British manufacturers have written off their trade possibilities in China and Japan, where American politico-military predominance has virtually squeezed out all competitors. Eastern Europe, with the exception of Greece, has moved into the Soviet economic orbit. Increased self-sufficiency in the dominions as a result of their war effort has cut down markets in that field. In six years of war Canada was able to make an industrial advance equal to twenty-five years of normal peace-time development. By 1944 Canada had become the third largest trading nation in the world and the fourth largest producer of war supplies among the United Nations. Australia, released by the war from British-imposed limitations on industrialization, tremendously increased the amount and diversity of its industrial production.

Elbowed out of these markets, Britain is looking more and more to the lush colonial world for guaranteed markets, cheap sources of raw materials, and favorable terms for investment. The pressing need for American dollar exchange has emphasized the value of Malaya, whose substantial pre-war exports of tin and rubber to the United States earned it the title of Britain's "dollar arsenal." The transfer of Rumanian and Polish oil into the Soviet economic orbit has heightened the importance of Burma's oil resources. The increasing economic independence of Canada and Australia is in sharp contrast with the subject economy of India, where British economic controls have successfully retarded industrialization.

Unquestionably the colonial world holds great riches. India, Burma, Malaya, Indo-China, and Indonesia produce 90 per cent of the world's quinine, 80 per cent of its natural rubber, 70 per cent of its tin, and substantial amounts of coal, iron ore, oil, manganese, bauxite, and tungsten. They are the richest rice-growing areas and contain almost a third of the earth's human labor and potential consumer demand.

However, these rich regions are "encumbered" with nationalist movements which, while varying in strength, are powerful enough to compel Britain's leaders to choose between two widely divergent paths—a daring, almost revolutionary economic expansionism or a closed, repressive colonial mercantilism.

There is little doubt that expansionist economics in the colonies could, as Philip Jaffe demonstrates in his new book "New Frontiers in Asia" (Alfred A. Knopf), solve or fend off many of the current problems of Britain and the other advanced industrial countries. An increase in the per capita income of colonial peoples to a mere $200 a year would enlarge the demand for consumers' goods, machinery, and agricultural implements in the British Empire alone by perhaps $100 billion. But such an increase could only be achieved by a daring break with the imperial past and acceptance of the idea that a healthy economy in the advanced capitalist countries requires a substantial improvement in the living standards of the backward colonial peoples. Rent and interest reductions and other anti-feudal agrarian reforms must be instituted in the colonies similar to those which have been announced for Japan. Responsibility and power in the colonial village must be diverted from the big landlord and usurer to the village cooperative. Attention must be shifted from assuring 20 per cent profits for European concerns operating in the colonial world to assuring decent wages—and thus consuming power—for the laborers they employ. Mental energies, instead of being devoted to the task of circumventing the desire to industrialize of the colonial middle classes, must be channeled into planning a long-range industrialization which will bulwark rising living standards in the colony and simultaneously provide a steady market for the machine-building and allied industries of the home country. The achievement of economic parity would undoubtedly pave the way for political equality.

Under current conditions of nationalist strength and economic crisis, the alternative to this program goes far in the other direction. It involves tightening the economic controls in order to guarantee Britain a share of the narrow colonial market. Additional markets can then be obtained by absorbing the colonial possessions of weaker European countries, such as Holland, Belgium, France, and Portugal. Additional revenue can be obtained by tightening the international cartel controls over tin, natural rubber, quinine, and the like.

As between these two alternatives of a liberal, expansionist approach and an old-line, restrictive approach, the burden of evidence indicates that the present British Labor government is continuing the Tory attitude to the colonial problem. Its acts in Burma, Java, and Indo-China have drawn heavy fire from left periodicals like the New Statesman and the Tribune but have been heartily applauded by the Economist, organ of enlightened capitalism, which has further suggested a pooling of the military, economic, and political resources of the British, Dutch, and French empires. In the Commons young Labor back benchers have assailed the colonial policies of their own party leadership, and the Tory opposition—caustic on the subject of other Labor policies—has approved the colonial measures of the Attlee government. The proposed absorption of the India Office into the Dominions Office—a personal election pledge by Mr. Bevin—has apparently been forgotten. Furthermore, there has been no sign of the drastic personnel changes in the India and Colonial offices which would accompany a departure from Tory policy.

The apparent decision of Prime Minister Attlee and Foreign Minister Bevin to tread the old colonial path can be traced to a number of factors. The unexpected end of the war shortly after their assumption of power confronted them with a host of problems, some of a pressing domestic character. The older, more conservative Labor leaders are afraid that a liberal colonial policy may result in the loss of the colonies and their revenue and jeopardize Labor's domestic reforms. They also hesitate to arouse Tory opposition on too many subjects, and lean in the direction of appeasing the Tories abroad while weakening their hold on the domestic economy. On the other hand, the younger, more radical members of the Labor Party, who have been strongly anti-imperialist on political and moral grounds, have been rather weak in constructive proposals for freeing the colonies without simultaneously intensifying England's economic crisis.

American economic aggressiveness has greatly stiffened the British attitude. The economic exclusion of the British from American-dominated areas like Japan and China has strengthened Britain's exclusiveness in its own colonies. American terms for the sorely needed $4 billion loan have revealed rather clearly an intention to subordinate the British to the American economy and to secure for the United States a veto power over British domestic economic policies. The Russophobia of the senior Labor leaders makes it impossible for them to look to Russia as a counter to American pressure and consequently strengthens their tendency to rely on the colonies as their chief economic bulwark in the deepening international crisis.

A policy of tightening colonial bonds at this stage in world history is laden with enough dynamite not only to blow the British Empire apart but to plunge the whole world into a third and infinitely more destructive conflict. Although the current upsurge of colonial nationalism is more militant and forceful than anything seen before, it is a Sunday School picnic compared with the next stage, which will probably be a coordinated rising of all Asiatic colonial peoples, including India's myriad millions, who are rapidly approaching a parting of the ways with the Gandhi doctrine of non-violent resistance. Moreover, if Britain moves farther away from the United States and Russia, it is not unlikely that either or both would lend at least tacit support to such a rising.

A diehard colonial policy is also packed with economic dynamite. The United States, Britain, and Canada have emerged from the war with greater industrial capacities than they have ever had. At the same time war-time destruction has reduced large areas of the world to penury and thus contracted markets. A policy of maintaining the colonial world at its present abysmally low level of consumption will prevent any substantial expansion of world trade and condemn all nations to an unprecedented economic crisis.

While the colonial question is primarily a British one, it can be solved only as part of a world-wide politico-economic settlement, for it demands American economic agreement, Russian political cooperation, and the assent of the authentic leaders of the colonial nationalist movements. It will be difficult to achieve such world-wide cohesion, but unless we make a determined effort in that direction we may all personally experience atomic fission.

Senator Johnson and God Almighty

BY PHILIP WYLIE

(Author of "Generation of Vipers" and "Night unto Night")

RECENTLY, in a syndicated newspaper debate on Keeping the Atom Secret, Senator Edwin Carl Johnson of Colorado, cosponsor of the May-Johnson bill, was allowed to have his say. His little sermon followed a statement expressing the position of "the scientists," which took the now-familiar line—that is, there is no basic secret, an attempt to enforce any secrecy would invade human rights, inhibit progress, lead to an atomic armament race, and so on.

With this kind of argument the Senator had no truck, but since he has been advocating one of the most disputed bills offered in our history, and possibly the most tyrannical, it is important that his reasoning be given the utmost attention. He presents the case for secrecy on a fundamentalist basis and with a fervor worthy of—typical of—his high estate.

First, he paints a rather thin picture of pre-nuclear international futures. "And then," he says, "God Almighty in His infinite wisdom dropped the atomic bomb in our lap!" Certain distant, prejudiced peoples would question the accuracy of the metaphor, but it will pass in this discussion. "Almighty God," he says a little later, "has placed in our hands His mightiest instrument of peace." The Senator's main idea is clear: We Americans were given the bomb by Almighty God, or God Almighty, whichever you prefer. With it, we shall force peace.

This is where I wish to enter the debate. I think my credentials entitle me to a voice. For I am not only a citizen in reasonably good standing but also one less hastily informed on nuclei than the Senator, having, since 1933, spent many of my days with nuclear physicists. However, Senator Johnson has lifted what must seem to him a sordid squabble above the level of mere worldly knowledge and set it on the plane of Divine Authority. So it is there, rather than in the realm of mere atomic fact, that I must meet him.

"Who's Who in America" does not give the Senator's religious denomination, or his past denomination, or any other such data. I, however, am coming right out with the categorical statement that I am the son of a Presbyterian minister, born and raised in the Presbyterian church. Anybody who has been born and raised in the Presbyterian church will tell you for a fact that Presbyterians yield to none in the interpretation of the will of Almighty God. It is a delicate subject, perhaps, but a Presbyterian minister's son gets a briefing in these matters which gives him a franchise. So if Senator Johnson can speak out bravely about God's will, a humble Presbyterian can also.

What might be called the nucleus of the Senator's Divine Interpretation lies in the following observations: "With vision and guts and plenty of atomic bombs, ultra-modern planes, and strategically located air bases, the United States can outlaw wars of aggression. The courage to assume such a magnificent, God-inspired responsibility is the price of our survival." We ought not to care, the Senator also says, whether other nations like that attitude or not. The bomb, the Senator thinks, should be made our sacred trust.

That's where, as an authority on the Divine Will, I demur. In the Presbyterian church—twenty years ago, I admit—we were taught that temporal things are not sacred. Not even bombs. The inference would have been, indeed, that as long as Americans thought a bomb was sacred, nobody could trust Americans. We were also taught that courage was never the price of anything—a philosophical point obscure to the Senator. And we were told over and over that "right makes might," while the interpretation of Senator Johnson at least nudges or maybe embraces the opposite theory—a theory recently put to an extensive empirical test, which failed.

Now, while I am able to extrapolate on nuclear physics far more rationally than the Senator, who doesn't know what it's all about—and while I will not yield to him as a versed spokesman of the Lord—I cannot, unfortunately, produce a physicist who worked for the Manhattan District and who is also a deacon, elder, trustee, or plate-passer. Most of the scientists I know are not especially religious, although they generally live in suburban houses with privet hedges, seldom run afoul of the law, and will often surprise you with a coup at six no trump or a brisk game of table tennis. But even such men, plain heretics, are willing to agree that Divine Providence has placed the atomic bomb in our hands in the same way it has placed in our hands the kiss-fast lipstick, Boulder Dam, and the roller skate.

They will agree on no other terms. The godly can hardly make a distinction, either. If so, how? And in the matter of the secret, these scientists "are the only people who can share it because they are the only people capable of understanding it." Here, I have not quoted Almighty God but Walter Lippmann, who is a near miss.

My inclination, therefore, after reading the Senator's defense of his bill, is to regard it in part as the work of a misguided brother. His emotional attitude is excellent: in this shrinking planet there is no place for shrinking people; courage—responsibility for all mankind—is necessary to save the lot of us. Nevertheless, the Senator plainly needs far more dope on atoms. Concerning the rest of his Divine Revelation I ask, as an informed Presbyterian, Who does he think he is, God Almighty?

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

General Motors: Sovereign State

IN THESE days, when we are wondering whether the sovereign national state has not become an anachronism, it is rather extraordinary that we should also find ourselves faced with the problem of the state within the state. For this was one of the burning questions of the Middle Ages, when great lords ruled their baronies with little regard for the central government, levying taxes, raising armies, and carrying on war against one another and the king himself. Only after long struggles were their claims to autonomy abandoned and the modern state established.

Today instead of feudal landlords we have feudal corporations which through ownership of the means of production control the livelihood of millions. The decision made by a handful of managerial boards may cause widespread unemployment, may indeed plunge the whole country into depression. Yet these men refuse to accept full responsibility for the results of their actions; they are accountable to no one but their stockholders and in most cases only to a minority of those.

This situation is perfectly illustrated by the stand taken by General Motors in its current dispute with the automobile workers' union. "It should be clear to you and all others," wrote Harry Anderson, vice-president of the company, in a letter to the union, "that we will not negotiate with your union regarding our selling prices and profits." This refusal to discuss the financial situation of the corporation renders negotiation impossible, for the workers' representatives have made a specific claim for higher wages unaccompanied by higher prices. If it can be proved that a rise in pay will unavoidably make automobiles more expensive, the union is willing to withdraw its demand. General Motors has dodged this challenge entirely. It has denied broadly the validity of the economic analysis made by the union in support of its belief that even if car prices were lowered, its wage demands could be met and a handsome profit left to the company, but it has attempted no factual disproof.

One reason for this entirely negative attitude is, I suspect, that the U. A. W.'s estimate of the situation, even though based on admittedly incomplete data, is a pretty accurate one. As a profit-making machine General Motors has an amazing record. In the nine years 1936 to 1944, inclusive, it not only paid out a total of $27.75 on its common stock, or more than the current book value of its shares, but raised its total invested capital out of earnings from $973,000,000 to $1,440,000,000. During these years its poorest experience was in 1938, when it earned a mere 10 per cent on its invested capital; its average return was 16.3 per cent. With post-war sales of cars due to beat all records, offering General Motors the prospect of operating at capacity for some years, there is every reason to suppose that such results will be duplicated if not exceeded. At any rate the Stock Exchange expects this to happen, for General Motors common stock is currently quoted (November 28) at 71⅞, or practically three times its book value. The market, that is to say, is taking into account General Motors' proved ability to earn an abnormal rate of profit on its actual investment of capital.

This is what the published accounts show. If the company's books were opened to an arbitration board, I have no doubt that they would show an even more favorable position. But as Mr. Anderson has declared, "We don't even open our books to our own stockholders"—a remark which deserves to achieve the fame of "the public be damned." Actually, it is not an entirely true statement. What Mr. Anderson should have said is that the books are not open to the majority of stockholders. Thirty per cent of the stock is owned by the managers and their associates, including 23 per cent held by the du Pont Corporation, which has a large number of representatives on the board of directors. We can be sure that this group of stockholders is given all the facts about the company and thus occupies a specially privileged position.

With the remainder of the stock widely dispersed among several hundred thousand owners, this small inner group can run General Motors in its own way. Profits and prices, it declares, are purely managerial business and no concern of the union or the public, even though it cannot be denied that wage-rates are intimately connected with prices and profits. As John W. Snyder, Director of War Mobilization and Reconversion, said on October 17, "Whether wage increases can be granted, and to what extent, can in the final analysis only be judged by asking a common-sense question, 'How much of an increase can the individual company afford to pay if it is to meet its pay rolls and stay in business?' " General Motors' managers not only claim to be the final arbiters of this question but arrogantly repudiate any obligation to provide factual support for their answer.

General Motors employs some 350,000 workers, representing with their families at least one million persons. Fourteen of the forty-eight states have populations smaller than this total. General Motors has an invested capital of $1,440,000,000, a sum greater than the combined bonded debt of New York, California, and Illinois. General Motors' net sales in 1941, its last peace-time year, amounted to $2,437,000,000, equal to 1/14 of the gross 1941 income of all manufacturing industries. Is it possible to treat an entity of this magnitude on the same legal basis as an incorporated corner grocery? Surely its very size, the influence for good or evil it inevitably exercises on the whole economy of the country, the number of people dependent upon it, affect it with a public interest.

Not only the employees and shareholders of General Motors but the people of the country as a whole have a right to a great deal more information than the management of the corporation vouchsafes. The policy decisions it makes at this time will have a strong bearing on the economic fortunes of the whole country for years to come. If the directors of General Motors, putting profit margins before production, aim at grabbing all that the traffic will bear, they will be laying the foundations for a new depression. This is a matter of the utmost concern to every American, and the Administration, if it does its duty, will recognize the fact by insisting that General Motors supply all the information needed to make possible a public judgment of its actions.

KEITH HUTCHISON

The People's Front

Mexico, November 29

I SAW General Cárdenas two weeks ago. The last time I had seen him before that was at the end of August on the day when he left the Ministry of War announcing that he was withdrawing completely from political life. Since 1932, when he was military commander of the state of Michoacán and I Spanish Ambassador, I have been with him at so many different moments and in such different circumstances, that I think I can read his mind. He always prefers to listen rather than talk. In fact, I do not know any man who can listen as attentively as he. When Negrín arrived in Mexico this summer to unite the Spanish political groups, I flew with him to see Cárdenas. I kept an eye on my wristwatch. Negrín talked exactly four hours and ten minutes about the whole problem of Spain, internal and international. During that time Cárdenas asked one question, and that was the only moment when he moved his lips. When he talks, he talks with unmatched precision. Anyone who meets Cárdenas for even a short time realizes that he has before him a leader of world dimensions.

The day I went to see him at the Ministry, I was accompanied by one of the most fervent "Cardenistas." The news of his imminent retirement had struck his followers speechless. This man did not dare go into the room with me. He waited for me in the street and as soon as I rejoined him, he asked, "Do you think he is quitting forever?" I replied, "It depends, . . . But if the counter-revolution breaks out, you will not find him in bed."

Two weeks ago this impression was confirmed. Although he did not tell me anything, I left his house absolutely convinced that he was "coming back." I do not know whether he will come back as Minister of War or in another government post. But in whatever capacity, he will soon be back in the midst of the political struggle. He knows it is only he who can stop the counter-revolutionary process which is fermenting in Mexico.

It is a year now since this process began, but the imminence of the Presidential elections has increased its tempo. On Sunday, November 25, Ezequiel Padilla was named candidate of the new Partido Democrático Mexicano. The party convention was very rough. In the two days that it lasted, delegates attacked President Avila Camacho. They attacked the Parliament. They attacked Lombardo Toledano and the unions. But the name of the real enemy, Lázaro Cárdenas, was not even pronounced. He is the one they really fear, and instinctively they shrink from any move which might provoke him to come back—in time.

Once the minor candidates had withdrawn, two remained to face each other in the fight—Padilla and Alemán. Padilla is too well known in the United States to require any description. In fact, that is one of his greatest political handicaps. Mexicans do not want a President who will get into trouble with the United States; but even less do they want a servant of the State Department. Moreover, and in spite of his external features, which so greatly impressed the society reporters—especially the ladies—in San Francisco, he is one of the least Mexican of all the Mexicans I have met. Mexicans are seldom vain, and Ezequiel Padilla is a sort of matinee idol who gets on their nerves. Even when he was in the United States, at the pinnacle of his success, people in Mexico booed every time his face appeared on the screen.

Alemán, on the other hand, is unknown to most Americans. He is one of the youngest presidential candidates ever to run—in his middle thirties. But he has behind him the experience of judge, senator, governor of the state of Veracruz, and Minister of the Interior. It was especially in this last job, during the war, that he showed indisputable ability. He was responsible for the arrest of three Japanese, two of whom were directing an attempt to blow up the Panama Canal and the third a plot to assassinate President Roosevelt.

Considered by the best political observers as certain to win, he is carrying his campaign into every corner of the country. His program includes, together with the continued distribution of land, an ambitious project of industrialization. The great leap taken by Mexico during the war is reflected in this plan. Alemán, with whom I talked at length, does not share the concern of some people over the possible dislocation of Mexico's economy as a result of the war's end. He admits that the expected crisis in the United States may have a severe effect in Mexico. But he thinks that in the intervening years the economic life of the country can be readjusted so that many Mexican industries founded as part of the American war effort can survive and even grow.

This modern approach to the problems of Mexico and the fact that he is the first civilian candidate in many years have drawn to him new sources of support. Besides the great popular groups which traditionally formed the basis of successive revolutionary governments—peasants, workers, civil servants, small business men—one sees this time participating in the campaign leading intellectuals and technicians. They are organized as a Planning Committee whose appearance is a novelty in a Mexican presidential campaign.

But the most impressive phenomenon is the reappearance in the fight of people who years ago had withdrawn from politics—artists, physicians, people of intellectual distinction who had come to believe that the revolution was so well established that they would never be obliged to come to its defense again. They now realize that Mexico is not going to escape the great struggle between right and left which is dividing the world. The clerical offensive whose most audacious demonstration took place in October during the centenary of the Virgin of Guadalupe is waking many people up and drawing others back into the battle. Can anyone doubt that Mexico's great revolutionary leader, Lázaro Cárdenas, will come forward when the struggle reaches its climax?

DEL VAYO

[Next week's article will deal with clerical reaction in Mexico.]

Hungary Samples Freedom

BY HAL LEHRMAN

(Correspondent with the United States Military Mission in Hungary)

Budapest, November 20

THE most startling thing about the Hungarian elections is that they were actually held after all. A maneuver to lump the candidates of every party together on a "united list," divide up the parliamentary seats in advance, form a new coalition government, and then stage a ja oder nein plebiscite on election day came very close to success.

The idea originated with the Communists after their crushing defeat in the Budapest municipal elections in October. Certain of the Agrarian leaders, stunned by their own capture of an absolute majority at the City Hall, fell in with it gratefully. They trembled at the prospect of winning an absolute majority in Parliament as well, with all the risks bound up with full power—and responsibility—in a desperate economic situation. The Communists added to the jitters of their Agrarian rivals by muttering darkly about strikes and street demonstrations if "reaction" won at the polls. The Russians, worried about further loss of prestige in a national defeat of the Communists, expressed concern over possible "anarchy and civil war" should the campaign proceed as scheduled.

Agreement "in principle" to torpedo the elections had already been reached among the top figures of the major parties when the Agrarian rank and file revolted. The British Broadcasting Corporation, and later the American radio, strengthened the position of the rebels by roundly denouncing the scheme. Provincial Agrarian leaders forced the party's Budapest headquarters to call a meeting of the national directorate. The uproar at home and abroad caused a general retreat, even on the Russian front. The night before the meeting, the Communists sullenly told an inter-party conference that they would enter a coalition government whatever the results of the election. The project for a united list was formally interred.

The elections were further distinguished by their unquestionable honesty. The election law, though full of loopholes when it was first drafted, was plugged and patched, mainly through the efforts of the Agrarians, until it emerged from Parliament a genuinely democratic document. The ballot was secret; suffrage was universal for persons who had reached the age of twenty; disqualification of voters and pressure on them to vote this way or that were reduced to a minimum. Poll committees functioned with admirable vigilance. This first national election in Southeastern Europe since the war set an excellent example. It was, moreover, the first clean election in all Hungarian history, with the possible exception of 1920.

Another record was set by the size of the vote. Never before had 88 per cent of all eligible Hungarian citizens gone to the polls, and never before had the total number of voters reached 4,700,000. The best previous figures had been 74 per cent and 3,200,000. Narrow suffrage qualifications, terrorism, falsification of returns, and general apathy had made earlier elections more or less farcical. This time the turnout in Budapest was not only large but indicative of political maturity. Though a month apart, the municipal and national elections in the capital were alike in the size of the vote and in its distribution among the parties, demonstrating the people's steady interest and the fidelity of their allegiances.

Of the specific results the most striking was the redoubtable victory of the Agrarians, a party which had literally been driven into the ground a scant thirteen months before. When the Russians first liberated Debrecen in eastern Hungary and sponsored a provisional government there, remnants of the Agrarian leadership were just emerging from a year in hiding. The high Communist leaders came in behind the advancing Red Army and had its backing. The Agrarians had little money and no foreign support.

The Communist Party took the key positions in the civil service and bluffed or bludgeoned its way into the top trade-union posts. It made the new police largely a Communist agency. It dominated the workers by the Russian system of "factory committees" and all other Hungarians by the Nazi system of "house delegates." Nevertheless, the Agrarians have won 245 seats in the next Parliament, against 70 for the Communists and 69 for the Social Democrats.

The defeated parties assert that the reactionaries were responsible for this phenomenal reversal. Certainly a multitude of dubious characters voted Agrarian when they would have vastly preferred to vote for Horthy, Otto, or the Arrow Cross. The one troubling note is the overwhelming extent of the Agrarian triumph. The situation would be much healthier if the Social Democrats, who three weeks before the elections at last broke away from the Communists, had made a better showing. They would then have been established as a formidable alternative party with democratic principles, able to exercise a check on the Agrarians.

But it must not be forgotten that the Agrarians do have a firmly established liberal tradition, despite the vagaries of Tibor Eckhardt and his kind. They are not democrats merely by revulsion against the authoritarianism of the post-war extreme left. Ever since its organization fifteen years ago the party has distinguished itself by its stand against the developing fascism. During the war and until the day of the German occupation it fought openly and courageously against the German orientation, anti-Semitism, and all the other abominations of an expiring feudal society.* In the 1939 elections the Agrarians polled 850,000 of the 3,200,000 votes cast, and achieved this despite the open ballot and the official terrorism.

If the leftist defeat was caused by reaction, the reaction was against the Communist-controlled leftist bloc. The electorate nursed two profound grievances. One was the bloc's intimate association with the occupation army, whose behavior had hardly endeared it to the Hungarian people. This feeling about the Russian army, reinforced by a suspicion that the Soviets planned ultimately to absorb Hungary as a member state or a Russian colony, stimulated the reemergence of a national spirit. The second and more profound grievance was the left's arbitrary rule, the intolerance of its doctrine, its strong-arm methods of proselytizing. Against these the reaction was soundly democratic. The Social Democrats suffered heavily from their connection with the Communists. They ran jointly with the Communists in the Budapest contest and were rejected; they ran separately in the national elections and were rejected again, because nobody believed the separation was more than tactical.

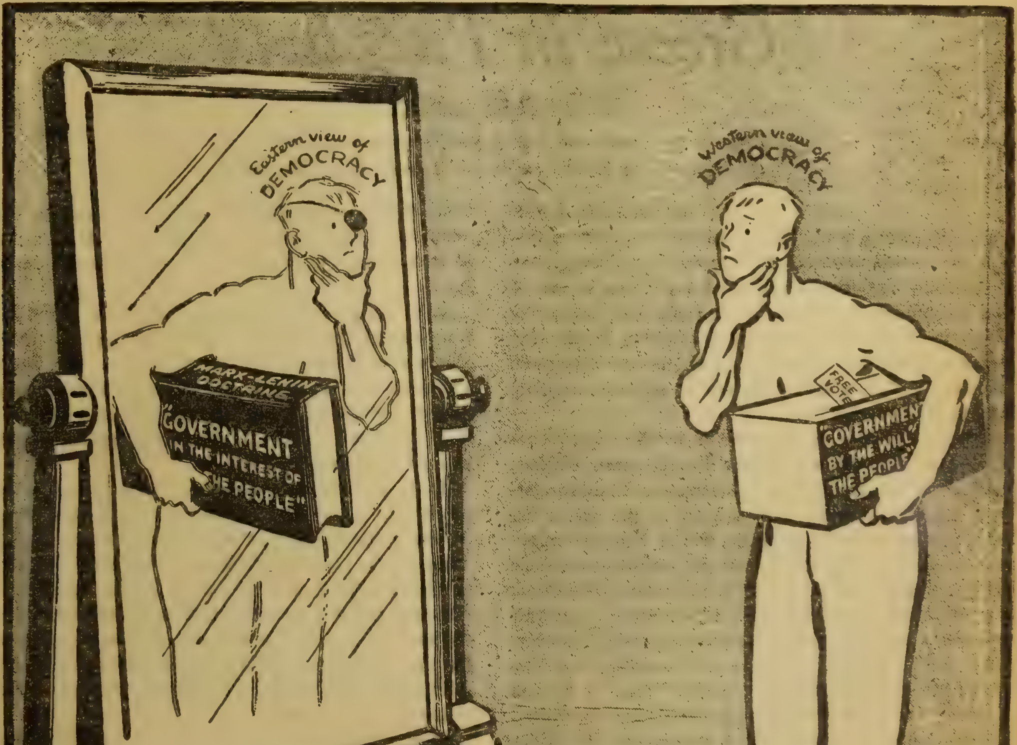
---

* According to Hungarian democrats in this country, the Agrarians were dominated by reactionary elements until 1937, when they expelled Eckhardt, who had been chairman of the party.—EDITORS THE NATION.

The new all-party coalition Cabinet could not have had a more auspicious launching. All factions pretended to find great comfort in the election returns. Swallowing their mortification, the Communists expressed delight over proof that "every fifth Hungarian is a Communist"—let's say every sixth, to be accurate. The Social Democrats were proud that "Hungary had passed its test satisfactorily." Even the Peasant Party, junior member in the defunct bloc, interpreted its 6.8 per cent of the vote as "a solid basis" for another try.

No coalition in which one party is excessively strong has good prospects for long life. The Agrarians will need infinite resources of tact to suppress a temptation toward truculence in government councils. But the Communists' attitude offers by far the greatest danger. They are frankly waiting to spring. Their leader, Matyas Rakosi, who found employment in the Soviet Ministry of the Interior during his Russian exile, flatly announced on election eve: "We can always order the comrades to go into the streets. Meanwhile the ballot is also a weapon."

The Communists, it is true, can go "into the streets" when they wish: they have the nuclei for disturbances in the factories, and they can play upon the misery of a hungry, bankrupt people. The urban population requires at least 500,000 tons of grain for minimum bread rations, but only 100,000 tons will be available from the total estimated 1945-46 crop. Similar appalling deficits exist in basic foods like meat, fat, and sugar. Reparations and armistice obligations take 60 per cent of the state budget. Only one-tenth of these expenses is covered by revenue; the rest is met by freshly printed money. The consequent inflation is rapidly approaching the astronomical levels of inflation in Germany after the First World War. The dollar, worth 5 pengoes in 1939, now brings 35,000 pengoes. Prices have risen thirty times more than wages. This makes a fertile field for demagogues. The Agrarian leader



Eastern view of DEMOCRACY
MARX-LENIN DOCTRINE
"GOVERNMENT IN THE INTEREST OF THE PEOPLE"
Western view of DEMOCRACY
FREE VOTE
"GOVERNMEN BY THE WILL" THE PEOPLE"
LOW

LOOK THINGS IN THE FACE

Zoitan Tildy said to me, "We will solve the economic problem or fall with it."

All factions agree that the crisis cannot be met without foreign aid. The Russian offer of a "cooperation" pact—giving the Soviets control of virtually half of Hungary's economy—met the favor it did because it promised at least some assistance by delivery of supplies and easing of reparations. Feeling was strong throughout the country against selling Hungary out so cheaply, but neither of the other Allies seemed willing to offer concrete help. The first intervention of the democracies against the pact was greeted here with intense thanksgiving because it showed some interest, however vague, in Hungary's survival. The expressed desire for moral and material support from the West is not simply a device to pit the democracies against Russia, although there are many who live for nothing else. Hungary cannot remain independent unless it receives economic aid. Russia alone cannot revive Hungary's economy. The solution must be tripartite.

In this connection the American State Department has revealed an agility and good sense which the writer, as a very minor but perennial critic of that institution, hastens to acknowledge. It is moving with more subtlety, for once, than the usually suaver Whitehall. The British tactic has been to pound on the table in an empty room; the American to speak softly and be heard. Washington's offer to recognize the provisional government if the balloting was honest helped the election of a government worthier of recognition than the deadlocked council of Foreign Ministers could have hoped for at this time. Its note to Moscow concerning the pact, a protest which was clearly marked "not a protest" and shrewdly delivered in duplicate to London, saved Russian face and simultaneously pointed to a way out through tripartite consultation on aid to Hungary. Its dry reminder to Budapest that an exclusive agreement with the Soviets would violate Hungary's existing commitments to the United States offered just the right amount of hope and argument.

I have it on high authority, despite recent suggestions to the contrary, that the bedrock of American policy here remains collaboration among the powers rather than allotment of spheres of influence. Progress varies in the different countries of Southeastern Europe. In Hungary, for the moment, there is a stalemate on Allied Control Commission statutes. The Russians operate on the principle, derived from the indefiniteness of the Potsdam agreement, that the Soviet commissioner need consult his colleagues only on matters which he considers "important." The British and Americans have never accepted this procedure. The result is misunderstanding and continuing irritation. It will be better for Hungary, and for the world, when this problem is adjusted in conformity with the larger pattern of tripartite cooperation.

Greece in Purgatory

BY PHILIP JORDAN

(The Nation's correspondent in Southeastern Europe; formerly chief foreign correspondent for the London News-Chronicle)

Athens, November 18

AFTER having saved Greece—let's face it—from a violent revolution by a minority nearly a year ago, the British troops here may yet be called on to save it from an equally vicious coup by the right. That is the prevailing view here. At present it has no substance, for the very good reason that any immediate application of democratic procedures in Greece would produce an enormous majority in favor of the monarchy.

Not that the Greek people are wedded to the idea of monarchy or that they care a nickel for the dull person of King George, now sweating it out in the comparative ease of Claridge's Hotel in London. But—and this is the key to the whole present situation—they are afraid. They are afraid of a continuation of the almost unimaginable economic chaos; they are afraid of the K. K. E., which is the Greek Communist Party; and they are afraid of Russia. The truly abominable excesses committed by the E. L. A. S. last December left a legacy of hate and fear; and the natural instinct of the majority is to run as far away from that moment of terror as they possibly can. The farthest limit is the Crown, standing as it does for repression of any movement to which the label "left" could be attached. The Crown, then, has become something more than a point of political disputation; it has become a longed-for refuge and a symbol of security. That it would in fact prove nothing of the kind, that the Greek people would almost certainly grow tired of it, almost certainly repudiate it within a year of its reestablishment, most of them know, but that does not prevent them from wanting it.

Small wonder that the elements which have most to fear from communism are trying to put forward the elections, scheduled to be held on January 20 next year, and that those who have most to gain from the introduction of even the mildest Socialist principles are doing all they can to have them postponed. It looks, at the moment, as if the right and center would have their way.

By the present arrangements the elections will be fought on the issue of the Crown. The Crown's future will depend on the result of the elections, whereas it should depend solely on the promised plebiscite, which should be allowed to dispose of the matter one way or another before the elections are required to decide problems infinitely more serious than the fate of a dreary Hohenzollern Dane. Alas for Greece, the elections are to be held before the plebiscite, which, if it ever comes, will merely be adding insult to injury.

From present indications, the left, without exception, will boycott the elections. They state quite categorically that the elections will be faked. Their enemies, they say, are able to obtain electoral booklets—without which no voter can go to the polls—in quantities, while such indispensable documents are denied to them, and are padding the electoral rolls with vast quantities of fictitious names.

It is quite impossible for the traveling journalist to check the truth of such charges. The barrier of language is too great, and also many who might want to speak and to prove the point are afraid of the police. As careful an investigation as I have been able to make leads me to believe that there is some substance in what the Communists say but that they greatly exaggerate. They claim, and rightly, that the thousands of their supporters now in jail will be denied the right to vote; nevertheless, it would be a mistake to take at its face value their campaign for a political amnesty. It is not, I am convinced, entirely sincere. The jails are the best recruiting schools that the K. K. E. possesses; martyrs are useful to it, and it makes the most of them; and if the prisoners were let out today, the lives of quite a few of them would almost certainly come to an abrupt end.

This leads to the subject of the "white terror." If by "terror" one means an organized, centrally directed, and systematic campaign of extermination, there is no terror here. There is, however, fairly widespread intimidation of men and women known to have leftist views by those who suffered in the revolt of last December. The Minister of the Interior said the other day that law and order now prevail throughout Greece: he was speaking out of turn; law and order will not prevail so long as men and women are being murdered by his own henchmen and supporters. Bullies are cashing in on the present hatred of all things "left" and are seeking revenge for what happened thirteen months ago. Almost every day reports of beatings, of murder, of rape are printed in the Athens press and cannot be denied. But if they were placed alongside the atrocities of last December, what is happening now would fade into insignificance. It is disgusting and reprehensible and a shame to the authorities that such things should continue, but it must always be remembered that war and revolution have left the Greek people with a fever from which they have not yet recovered. Until that fever dies out, or until the British decide to use their troops as police, excesses will be committed.

Of the glaring and frightful instances of connivance by the authorities I will give but one example. In the Patras district there lives a rich man whose family were murdered by the E. L. A. S. last December. He has declared a private war on all who belong to the left, and he wages it in the shadow of police protection. He openly hunts human beings as though they were game, and he kills them with a knife. Each time he kills he is arrested and put in jail for a week, at the end of which time he pays someone 50,000 drachmas—about $100—and is let out to go hunting again. I have not investigated this case myself, but I am satisfied that the report I have received is true. Such loathsome events are taking place all over the country, and they argue, of course, complete anarchy and a corrupt administration.

Slowly, too slowly perhaps, law and order are being reestablished, so far as they were ever established here; the creation and training of a new gendarmerie by a British subject, Sir Charles Wickham, are steps in the right direction. Sir Charles is a strong man, and although he has no sign of what might be called "left-wing views," he is informed, I am sure, by a deep humanitarianism and a passion for the law. Already his work is bearing fruit; the Athens police for the first time in their history are armed with nothing more lethal than batons. Complaint is made by the left that he will not—in fact, he is not allowed to—take recruits from their side of the fence. This is in some ways a pity, for the habit has grown here of labeling anybody a "Communist" who was ever in the E. A. M. On the other hand the Greek temper is such at the moment that any police force recruited on a wide basis would almost certainly cancel itself out; as a police officer said to me the other day, "One Trojan horse in a country's history is enough."

The economic plight of Greece is easily described. If it were not for UNRRA the country would die on its feet in a week. What UNRRA gives it is almost the only food it gets. It is not UNRRA's business to distribute its supplies; it hands them over to the government and from then on can take no more than a moderately academic interest in their destination. There has been considerable racketeering in the distribution of UNRRA goods, and at one time, it is said, the bulk of them found their way to the black market. Some, but a very small proportion of the whole, are still sold there. The Communists claim that the authorities use UNRRA supplies as a political lever, denying aid to families known to have liberal views. There is some substance in this charge, I believe, but UNRRA insists that it is true only in isolated instances.

British and American policy at present is one of nonintervention in Greek affairs. If that makes you smile, it makes a lot of people here smile, too, for Britain has several divisions of troops here, an act which in itself constitutes the strongest intervention, unless the word has ceased to have any meaning. Actually, if that much-maligned character the British ambassador were allowed to intervene and to use his undoubted authority, Greece could probably have a stable government from now until the elections are held. But he is not allowed to, and British policy toward Greece is not made here but in Whitehall. It may be optimistic to think that a stable government of the left center could be put in power, for although Greece is a country of politicians it is not at the moment a country of statesmen. Men with any experience of ruling are old and set in their ways. There has been no government in the sense in which we understand a "government" in England since 1936, when Metaxas, with the connivance of King George, set up a personal dictatorship. Young and middle-aged men have had no training in the art of government, and they will have to learn.

The British are unpopular with the left, which mistakenly but quite sincerely believes that they want the King to be brought back; they are unpopular with the right because, by and large, and certainly in the districts where their fiat runs, they prevent a policy of widespread revenge being carried out. If they were to go, there would be no freedom in Athens, which is today one of the freest cities in the world. The eighteen daily newspapers here enjoy a freedom of the press that makes a British and even an American journalist green with envy. The other day 50,000 followers of the K. K. E. held a meeting in the Athens stadium, "guarded" only by unarmed police. These fundamental rights would cease to exist if the occupying forces were withdrawn.

In spite of the wisdom and charm of the United States ambassador, Lincoln MacVeagh, America is beginning to forfeit some of its once high popularity. Washington has turned down a Greek demand that Italy be asked to pay reparations for the frightful damage done here by Fascist thugs and their Albanian satellites. Athens has been told that the Italian economy will not stand the strain of reparations, but because the Greeks have suffered more than any other people in Europe with the possible exception of the Poles, they find this a singularly unpalatable answer. It is difficult for them to understand Allied tenderness toward a former nasty enemy combined with what seems utter indifference to the just claims of a gallant ally. There has been some talk of a dollar loan at a small rate of interest, but the Greeks say that they are not willing to saddle present and future generations with a burden that should in equity be borne by those who put them to fire and the sword. They have unofficially suggested that if any loans for Greek reconstruction are to be made, the Italian people should be burdened with them and compelled to spend the capital here, as the Greeks stipulate. This has been refused. It is impossible not to sympathize with this demand, for although the Allies can properly say that they are spending millions here on relief, the Greeks can as properly say that charity is not what they fought and bled for, and that, anyhow, relief does not restore a railroad system 90 per cent destroyed or repair a country's bridges.

The Greeks are also distressed by the attitude of the Big Three toward the Dodecanese question. There is no doubt whatever that their claim to these islands is just. They say that Greek soldiers were invited to spend their blood to recover them, but now that they have only to be occupied, no Greek is allowed to set foot on the sacred soil.

It is reported here, and I happen to know it is true, that the American and British governments are about to recognize as the legitimate government of Albania the terrorist gang headed by Enver Hodja, who is loathed above all other men as a persecutor of Greeks in the border regions. Such action by the Allies will increase the country's growing sense of isolation, from which any one of half a dozen horrid events may eventually spring.

Greece needs capital to restore its previous modest level of prosperity and is looking to its allies to provide it; but it is relevant to report in this connection that no effort is being made to call in an estimated $330,000,000 held by Greek subjects abroad, the majority of them resident in Egypt, Britain, or the United States. Nearly all great Greek fortunes are held abroad; their owners are ardent patriots so long as patriotism does not limit their profits from the commerce of the world.

However capital is provided, those who lend it should insist on certain conditions. Though Greece is a land of small holders, grave social and economic inequalities exist that accord ill with the temper of the modern world, and no royalist government could be relied on to remove them. The civil service must be reorganized before a real start can be made on reconstruction. Hospitals and schools are desperately needed. Above all, a sense of community responsibility must be developed. It is not enough for Greeks to be good Greeks: what is needed is good modern Greeks.

In the Wind

NOW THAT TEXAS NEGROES have won the right to vote in Democratic primaries, a new type of political organization is springing up—the White Man's Association. One such, in Jackson County, will hold a primary of its own on December 8 to nominate candidates for the unexpired terms of County Tax Collector Charles A. Mitchell and County Treasurer Claudius Branch.

THE NAVY DEPARTMENT'S buses in Washington have signs that read, "These buses are for official business only. Any persons using them for any other purpose will be summarily removed from office." A friend reports that Naval Reserve officers are getting in those buses and joyriding like crazy.

DURING THE WAR crates of oranges sent from Spain to England sometimes contained bombs which exploded when the crates were opened. But that is all past. Oranges sent from Spain to England today are wrapped in tissue paper imprinted with the British and American flags, three crowns, and the motto "Unity makes certain peace."

IN ITS ISSUE of November 12 Time maintains a nice neutrality as between science and theology. Thus: "Anthropologists no longer look for a definite single place where the human race first appeared on earth. They know that man's ancestors were numerous, varied, and widely distributed before they were fully human. . . . Adam and Eve before the Fall were 'food gatherers,' in anthropological jargon. . . . But after they ate 'of the tree of knowledge' and were driven from the Garden (Genesis 3: 16-19), they became husbandmen."

PRESIDENT TRUMAN has nominated Irvin C. Mollison, a Negro attorney of Chicago, to be a judge of the United States Customs Court. This is the first time a Negro has been nominated to the federal bench in the continental United States. The only previous Negro federal judge was William H. Hastie, nominated by President Roosevelt to sit in the Virgin Islands.

THE COOPERATIVE IDEA has come to Broadway. Your Theater, Inc., a new producing enterprise, will divide its profits proportionally among those who buy tickets prior to the opening night of each of its productions. Thus, since the spectators are also the angels, they will eventually govern the choice of plays.

THE LATE WERNER SCOTT, says School and Society of November 10, left $19,000 to the University of California for scholarships "to worthy, faithful, and needy students from Hawaii, to Caucasian youths who are not of Polynesian blood."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. One dollar will be paid for each item accepted.]

BOOKS and the ARTS

THREE POEMS

BY ISABEL WILNER

Small Dirge

Small comfort the candle
Of moon on the maple,
The steeple of poplar,
The arch of the birch.

Small comfort the yellow
Of sun on the linden;
Small comfort the ripple
Of wind in the larch.

Small comfort the shadow
Of ash and of alder,
Of elm and of willow
Now that you lie

Where comfort is hollow
And hope is shallow
With dust for your pillow
And dust for your sky.

"And Suddenly the Room" . . .

And suddenly the room grew very small
And I as tall as sorrow. We alone
Walked back and forth from wall to wall

On feet that moved only because They moved that's all. They couldn't stay
They moved They moved No laws

Could hold them or could make them move
They moved. They moved from wall to wall
From wall to wall From wall to wall
There was no room

Except for sorrow and for me. We both were tall
From wall to wall

No Interval

Rushing for comfort to the embracing walls
Which kept out other flesh with wood and plaster,
I found one moving thing, one moving thing,
A clock was ticking, faster, faster, faster.

Alive with sound, alive with moving wheels,
A clock ticking, this was what I found.
Strange, after cells had ceased to live, this spring
Should mock the dead and living with its sound.

Louder and louder I heard its small strokes fall
With hammer's movement accurately cast
Joining with precision the future to the past,
Future to past, future to past, future to past . . .

The present never came at all.

HAUPTMANN ACCEPTS

BY HERMANN KESTEN

"Ripeness is all."—"King Lear."

THE efforts of German anti-fascists deserve respect and help, especially when they attempt to restore to life in the artificially quartered Reich the German civilization that died in 1933. At times, however, these efforts arouse little more than a sense of embarrassment and pity.

In the Tägliche Rundschau, a new Berlin newspaper published in the Russian zone, Gustav Leuteritz, the editor, describes a visit to Gerhart Hauptmann in October, 1945. With the president of the Cultural Association for the Democratic Reconstruction of Germany, Johannes R. Becher, and two Russian officers Leuteritz drove from Berlin to Hauptmann's home at Agnetendorf in Silesia—now a Polish province—to ask the aged author to help in the restoration of German culture.

A moving scene! What strange midwives for a new German democracy and culture: two uniformed Russians of the army of occupation, an unknown Berlin editor calling himself "the messenger of spiritual Germany," a poet recently returned from exile in Moscow, and Gerhart Hauptmann, a dying opportunist and perpetual conformist.

As a youth Becher was a radical, expressionist poet whose works were at times esoteric and at others showed the influence of Schiller's verse. In the days of the Weimar Republic the Reichswehr charged him with high treason for his courageous novel "Levisite, oder der einzig gerechte Krieg" (Vienna, 1926), which condemned the use of gas in war. In 1933 he went into exile, first to Paris, then to Moscow. He described his youth in an interesting novel, "Abschied" ("Departure"). He was coeditor of the Communist exile publications Das Wort and Internationale Literatur. There he attacked, in prose and poetry, the barbarism of the Nazis and the writers who had gone over to them, Gerhart Haputmann among others. In the summer of 1945 Becher, a member of the German Freedom Committee in Moscow, returned to Berlin in the wake of the victorious Russian armies and became president of the Cultural Association for the Democratic Reconstruction of Germany.

In his youth the eighty-three-year-old Gerhart Hauptmann, the patriarch of German literature, wrote a few outstanding dramas of social content, among them the famous "Weavers." Later in life he gave up his social ideals, his Social Democratic friends, and his naturalistic style. He built castles, collected works of art, amassed millions, and contracted enormous debts. Through the skill of his hairdresser he achieved a certain coarse resemblance to a popular portrait of Goethe. In addition, he wrote symbolic dramas, patriotic pageants, pitiful prose works, and simple-minded festival plays. The Nobel prize, which he obtained in 1912 at the age of fifty, was nothing but a tribute to the beautiful past of an author who had outlived himself.

During the First World War Hauptmann wrote bloodthirsty poems against the Russians and the French. He put himself at the disposal of the Weimar Republic as he had previously served the empire and its supreme commander; he was always ready to be praised for the services of his youth and his no longer existing convictions, and he became the echo of all the changing political regimes of his time. After some initial friction with the new master, Gerhart Hauptmann put himself completely at the disposal of Hitler and his millennial Reich. He was ready to acknowledge the applause of the public arm in arm with such atrocity-manufacturers as Hitler and Goebbels. In 1933 he sent a birthday telegram to Mussolini. He wrote, "I say yes!" when Germany left the League of Nations. Indeed, Hauptmann was not ashamed to have his plays performed by the Nazis in Krakow and Paris after the Poles and the French had been subjugated.

Confined to his armchair, Gerhart Hauptmann greeted the two Russians in uniform, the editor from Berlin, and the Communist poet. He showed them the well-preserved duplicate of his letter to Maxim Gorki written in 1922, probably as evidence of his moral and political identity. "I could not state better what I have to say than I did in this letter." That may be so. A political chameleon as aged as Hauptmann will ultimately return to an old position in the merry-go-round of time.

The president of the Cultural Association for the Democratic Reconstruction of Germany said: "We have become a spiritually and intellectually impoverished people. We want you, Gerhart Hauptmann, to live again. I beg for your help. . . . Millions are waiting for an encouraging word from you." Hauptmann, "visibly moved," answered in these classic terms, repeatable as a Homeric formula, and repeated by him on every improper historical occasion: " I put myself at your disposal. I am ready."

Leuteritz's comment was: "We thus achieved the purpose of our visit: to free the greatest living German author from his isolation and to restore to him the beautiful conviction that the entire cultural world has not forgotten him, indeed, needs him. . . . The momentous event of this meeting with the messengers of Russia and of spiritual Germany was Gerhart Hauptmann's promise to cooperate in the work of reconstruction to the best of his ability."

The visit of the Russian and Berlin delegates lasted three days. They saw that the author had had the heroes of his plays painted on the walls of his room by a German professor, one Avenarius. They saw the "still sprightly, high-spirited" wife of Hauptmann, much younger than her husband. They met a friend of the family, Gerhart Pohl, editor of a radical leftist periodical before 1933, after 1933 a member of Goebbels's Chamber of Culture (Kulturkammer). They saw the author's masseur, one Metzkow, the author's secretary, Fräulein Anni, the author's servant and gardener, one Stiev— who in the naturalistic style of the early Hauptmann dramas cited moving conversations between "the master" and himself. They saw the author's personal physician, a Dr. Schmidt; they saw the author's art treasures. The luxury of the home of the man who perpetually collaborated with all systems was doubly enjoyable at a time when many Germans were living in cellars and cooking their watery broths over open fires in the streets. They were pleased by the "chivalrous smile" of the author, "who never grew as loquacious as when he came to speak about his own writings," although he "hardly any longer knew his way around in his own works." They also uncovered evidence of Hauptmann's weakness of mind in verse which Leuteritz reproduced in his account of the interview. In one of these poems, written on April 14, 1945, Hauptmann addresses Goethe, whom he had imitated in his coiffure and facial wrinkles for a lifetime, though unable to equal him in intellect and style: "Forgive me, Goethe; I no longer call your story a miracle but rubbish. . . . I hold your little volume in my hand, O you unsuspecting philistine. . . ."

And this is Germany's "greatest living author"? Shortly before, the spiritual messengers and their friends had thought differently. Over the Berlin radio and through the pen of a former president of the Prussian Writers' Academy, Walter von Molo, the author of novels no more than patriotic, and of articles celebrating the banishment of free German authors and the burning of their books, these spiritual messengers had called for Thomas Mann to return home. On that occasion they had called him "the greatest living German author."

When Mann publicly answered that he would not return but would remain an American citizen and a resident of California, "the spiritual messengers of Russia and Germany" quickly found another "greatest living German author." He was likewise a Nobel prize-winner and world famous, but he was a profiteer of the Hitler regime. Unfortunately, he had lost his talents and his humanity fifty years before, his conscience and his good repute twelve years earlier, in 1933.

I find it touching to see Russian and German Communists honoring an old man because of his past Social Democratic convictions. But is there among living and dead German authors no better symbol for the renaissance of moral and spiritual life in Germany than the old, worn-out weathercock, Gerhart Hauptmann?

(Johannes R. Becher, by the way, seems to have been of the same opinion as I in 1932, when, on the occasion of Hauptmann's seventieth birthday, he wrote an article against him entitled Hauptmann, der Repräsentant.)

America and Britain

AMERICA'S STAKE IN BRITAIN'S FUTURE. By George Soule. The Viking Press. $2.75.

IT is reliably reported that Lord Keynes, at one of the recent meetings on Lend-Lease settlement and post-war Anglo-American trade, said to Leo Crowley: "We British are watching America with immense interest today, for we think that though you may enjoy prosperity for perhaps four or five years you will run into very great difficulties at the end of that time, from which we think you may be able to extricate yourselves by the skin of your teeth." This remark

"Is there a way of living that is noble, and another that is base, or are all the ways of living merely futile?"

TO THIS QUESTION, and to a thousand others, the great philosophers from Plato to John Dewey have tried to find an answer. Bertrand Russell, in his monumental "History of Western Philosophy" shows how their various answers helped to shape history: its wars, its golden ages of peace, its social upheavals. He shows, too, how the thinking of such men as Aristotle and Kant, Karl Marx and Hegel, was influenced by the character of the various communities in which they lived. His book has won enthusiastic tributes from scholars and laymen alike. A few follow:

"Anyone who has met Bertrand Russell knows that when he enters a room everything and everyone lights up. Something like that has happened in this book. The old sparkle is there. Mr. Russell has done almost everything to bridge the chasm between philosopher and public."—RAPHAEL DEMOS of Harvard University, in the New York Herald Tribune Book Review.

"Anything Bertrand Russell writes about philosophy is sure to be worth reading; bound to be interesting, important, and written with impeccable clarity. This book fulfills these expectations. It is a fascinating running commentary by Russell on the history of European thought, and worth anyone's time and money."—IRWIN EDMAN, in the Book-of-the-Month Club News.

"The most readable popular history of philosophy since Will Durant's 'Story of Philosophy.' Bertrand Russell is a provocative writer. His book will provoke the average intelligent reader to delight."—The New York Times Book Review.

"The brilliant results of a lifetime of study. A most satisfactory and remarkable book."—Philadelphia Inquirer.

A History of Western Philosophy
Bertrand Russell
Simon and Schuster

Bertrand Russell's

A HISTORY OF WESTERN PHILOSOPHY

895 PAGES • $5.00 • SIMON AND SCHUSTER • NEW YORK CITY provides both a footnote to Mr. Soule's book and ample confirmation of what he has to say about British attitudes today toward the United States.

"America's Stake in Britain's Future" sets forth in the clearest possible terms just what it is that Britain fears about our future policy and just what we ought to fear. It explains with admirable clarity the problems inherent in world trade balances, the mistakes in policy, especially American policy, after the last war, and the economic causes of the depression of the '30's. The reader can find here an excellent exposition of Hobson's theory that the disparity in rates of investment and savings constitutes one of the chief causes of depression. Indeed, the clarity of the exposition of this highly technical subject affords a model for all popular writing. Having stated the problems, the author argues, with relentless logic, the case for America's own self-interest, for full employment at home and collaboration with Britain abroad.

Mr. Soule is no dreamy Anglophile. He brushes aside—perhaps somewhat too cursorily—the idea that Britain and the United States are natural allies because of "our common heritage and our common speech," pointing out that though we use the same words, we often mean different things by them. No one can fail to agree in part, but no one reading, for example, the passage from the White Paper on Education quoted on page 98 can fail to feel that here is a "well of English undefiled," as much American as British. The important fact, however, is that we are natural allies because our economic interests are essentially complementary, and our respective positions in the world inevitably make us collaborators. At no point does Mr. Soule so much as suggest that this harmony of interest between Britain and the United States need imply antagonism toward other nations, notably Russia. On the contrary, he makes a case—an incontrovertible one, I think—for the idea that an enlightened policy of cooperation between the two countries will spell peace and prosperity for the rest of the world, and that a contrary policy will inevitably lead to economic distress and another war.

It would be hard to find a better summary of such economic theories as those underlying the Bretton Woods plan, the Beveridge plan, and similar economic ideas, the full meaning of which has not, until now, been either so admirably stated and analyzed or gathered together to show their interrelations. Certainly one of the best aspects of this excellent discussion is the way in which the author manages to show the relation of Bretton Woods to full employment, to cartels, to an expanding world economy.

One minor criticism may be made. Mr. Soule assumes, it seems to me, that our country is actually richer in natural resources than it is. We are richer than Britain, certainly, but out of about 150 essential materials we produce within our borders only 8. We have to import, for instance, almost all our ferro-alloys, not to mention such important items in our diet as coffee, tea, cocoa, much of our sugar, fats and oils, and so on.

The manuscript of this book must have gone into printing only shortly after V-J Day. It is therefore interesting, and depressing, to review the events which have taken place since then and consider how far we have traveled from the principles set forth here. First, we have abruptly canceled Lend-Lease shipments and put Anglo-American collaboration under a severe strain. Second, we have virtually shelved the Full Employment bill; so that people are now talking of eight million unemployed by next spring instead of the original six million which we had accepted as a temporary figure. Third, we are lifting restrictions of all sorts upon private business with dizzying rapidity; so that our export and import positions are both in chaos. Fourth, we have given employers reimbursement for cut-backs on war orders and have virtually promised them cancelation of excess-profits taxes, whereas we have done nothing to ameliorate the position of wage-earners; these policies will lead to an even wider spread between the rate of investment and the rate of savings, which, as Mr. Soule has pointed out, many American economists, and virtually all British economists, believe to be one of the chief causes of cyclical depressions. Fifth, we are demobilizing our armed forces without any plan for reemployment. And sixth—though this is perhaps outside the scope of Mr. Soule's discussion—our foreign relations generally have worsened unbelievably, partly because of our policy on the atomic bomb, but also because we are now an isolated country of private entrepreneurs in a world of social planning.

It is not too late for us to make a change in our policies, but the time is short. Every patriotic American should get a copy of Mr. Soule's book and live with it until he has mastered its ideas. Then he should insist that Congress take action.

ETHEL M. THORNBURY

Joseph Smith, Mormon Prophet

NO MAN KNOWS MY HISTORY. By Fawn M. Brodie. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.

NOTHING could be more baroque than the life history of Joseph Smith, the founder of the Mormon church. He was already in his own lifetime a mythical character. He founded the Mormon church almost, it might be said, by a series of accidents which, logically considered, would never seem to lead to their amazing result, a stable institution. Step by step, no one could have foreseen the way. It is all a beautiful maze, the Mormon pattern, winding and rewinding in an area where, though the mystery may be explained empirically, it remains a mystery transcending the limitations of actual experience.

Looking for the impossible treasure said to have been buried by a much-publicized but purely hypothetical Indian tribe of vanished Semitic mound-builders, Joseph Smith discovered the golden plates which he said had been buried by the angel Moroni, guardian spirit of the lost tribe. The golden plates rustled in that Arabian dream world which for so many people was more real than the harsh American wilderness, where they were more likely to encounter a skunk than an angel. The golden plates were invisible to everybody except Joseph Smith, an unschooled farm hand who in another society might have been an anthropologist or an archaeologist or at least the writer of a literary epic as pale as "Ossian." Joseph Smith was not a man to keep a deep secret to himself. He devoted himself to translating the microscopic picture handwriting on the invisible golden plates. When the first hundred or so pages were stolen by the skeptical wife of his

MARGARET MARSHALL'S listing of the significant new books of this year includes these ten published by RANDOM HOUSE

PRATER VIOLET
By Christopher Isherwood
$2.00

THE SHORT STORIES OF
HENRY JAMES
Edited by Clifton Fadiman
$3.00

SPRINGBOARD
POEMS 1941-1944
By Louis MacNeice
$1.75

THE COLLECTED POETRY OF
W. H. AUDEN
$3.75

THE PATTERN OF SOVIET POWER
By Edgar Snow
$2.75

SURRENDER ON DEMAND
By Varian Fry
$3.00

PERSIAN GULF COMMAND
By Joel Sayre
$2.00

WARS I HAVE SEEN
By Gertrude Stein
$2.50

NAMES ON THE LAND
By George R. Stewart
$3.00

ALL OUT for the SACK RACE!
By Robt Day
$2.50

At bookshops everywhere RANDOM HOUSE, N. Y. Publishers of the Modern Library

private secretary, with the challenge that he should then repeat exactly what the angel had said, Smith, rather than deny his previous statement or present a garbled version, merely proceeded from the political to the religious character of the lost Semitic Indians—who, our later research shows, never did exist. Had the manuscript not been stolen, it is possible that he would not have stumbled into founding a great religious order, where were reflected the many facets of his own personality, itself the result of a fervid community imagination.

The angel Moroni, unlike most angels of that era, was not in favor of an arid celibacy in the midst of nature's fruitfulness. Just as the impotent angel was perhaps the vision of an impotent old leader, this angel, appearing to a young man, was highly potent, scattering spores as big as the purple grapes in autumn. The angel of a lost people preached, ironically enough, but perhaps only because of his experience with a lost people, polygamy and the infinite progression of the exuberant human race. Joseph Smith liked women, all women, the old as well as the young, and so his religion glorified human potency. For every wife, another star in heaven. You pursued your many wives, all fifty of them, from earth to heaven and beyond. And of his own wife, Emma, who astutely objected to all this carnality, which she believed had never been recommended by the angel Moroni at all, Joseph said when temporarily she fled from him, "I will have her back although I must pursue her into hell."

From court records of cases in which Joseph Smith was involved, from newspaper articles, memoirs, letters, and the dossiers of the women who were successively sealed to the prophet in marriage, Mrs. Brodie has recaptured the spirit of a man whose history remains, just as he said, unknown, unknowable. He was a mystery even to himself. He was killed at the age of thirty-nine by blackface murderers. It was at sunset, and the sun was hidden behind a cloud. When one of them rushed forward to cut off his head, the sun came out from behind the cloud, and the people fled silently away.

MARGUERITE YOUNG

BRIEFER COMMENT

Not Enough

DURING THE VICIOUS OPEN-SHOP DRIVE after World War I, when injunctions were fluttering down on the unions like leaves from the trees and labor everywhere had its back to the wall, William Allen White put up in the window of his Emporia Gazette a sign reading, "We are for the striking railroad men 49 per cent." And that is the pay-off on the Kansas editor who is now on his posthumous way to sainthood in the Liberal Church. To be sure, his dear friend Henry J. Allen, Governor of Kansas, had set up a Kansas Industrial Court, with White's support, for the outlawing of any and all strikes, and Henry went through the motions of arresting Will for this 1 per cent less than half-hearted support of a life-and-death struggle in which better men than William Allen White were being beaten up by legionnaires and Kluxers, rotting in jails, losing their jobs, their little savings, their homes, their all—and not writing Pulitzer-prize editorials about how nice free speech is, either.

In his obeisant, wretchedly organized, distressingly fulsome biography of White, "A Man from Kansas" (Putnam's, $3), David Hinshaw compares White's prize-winning editorial on free speech written at that time to Milton's "Areopagitica." And that is the pay-off on David Hinshaw, who apparently spent his life on his knees alongside the much-publicized country editor's cluttered (it would have to be cluttered) desk.

Everyone knows that William Allen White was a sweet, lovable, outgoing personality who was for decency and against bigotry and intolerance, but to attempt to make out as a "great" philosopher and a symbol of all the democratic virtues a man who could support Harding and write of Coolidge that he was "a strong man" who "never let his courage get the best of his judgment" is just a bit too thick. After all there must be more to democracy than saying "Howdy" to a Negro worker on Emporia's Main Street.

MC ALISTER COLEMAN

Life on a Destroyer

THERE IS A FRESHNESS and sincerity about "Lower Deck," by Lieutenant John Davies, RNVR (Macmillan, $2), which gave much pleasure to one tired reader of high-pressure war books. The book describes war-time life from the standpoint of a single gun crew on board a British destroyer. Its moments of intense action are set down with simplicity, and for that reason these passages are very telling. Lieutenant Davies has a fine but not too conscientious sense of the personality of his gun crew. He says what he feels about his men, and not, as is too often the case in books of this sort, what he feels should be said. There are no heroics, and there is a great deal of authentic rough-and-ready humor. The style is excellent for its purpose, and there are none of the usual journalistic disfigurements.

RALPH BATES

CONTRIBUTORS

ISABEL WILNER grew up in China and the Philippines, coming to this country in 1938 to attend William Smith College. She was one of the winners of the Durham Poetry Award of the University of New Hampshire Writers' Conference in 1944 and 1945. At present she is a member of the staff of the Boys and Girls Department of the Carnegie Library of Pittsburgh.

HERMANN KESTEN is a German novelist and playwright, an exile from the Third Reich, who is now living in the United States. He is the author of "The Children of Guernica," and of "Copernicus and His World." He will publish a novel, "The Twins of Nürnberg," in the spring.

ETHEL THORNBURY was, during the war, an economist for the Office of Strategic Services and the Foreign Economic Administration.

MARGUERITE YOUNG is the author of "Angel in the Forest: A Fairy Tale of Two Utopias." She has also published two volumes of poetry.

BOOKS OF 1945

A Selected List

BELLES-LETTRES

The Short Novels of Dostoevsky. With an Introduction by Thomas Mann. Dial. $4.

The Crack-Up with Other Uncollected Pieces, Notebooks and Unpublished Letters. By F. Scott Fitzgerald. Edited by Edmund Wilson. New Directions. $3.50.

Hercules, My Shipmate. By Robert Graves. Creative Age. $3.

Prater Violet. By Christopher Isherwood. Random House. $2.

The Bostonians. By Henry James. Dial. $3.

The Short Stories of Henry James. Selected by Clifton Fadiman. Random House. $3.

The Folded Leaf. By William Maxwell. Harper. $2.50.

Pipe Night. By John O'Hara. Duell, Sloan and Pearce. $2.50.

Years Before the Flood. By Marianne Roane. Scribner's. $2.50.

The Collected Poetry of W. H. Auden. Random House. $3.75.

Bolts of Melody: New Poems of Emily Dickinson. Edited by Mabel Loomis Todd and Millicent Todd Bingham. Harper. $3.

Poems New and Selected. By Richard Eberhart. New Directions. $1.

Selected Poems. By Marsden Hartley. Edited and Introduced by Henry W. Wells. Viking. $3.

Little Friend, Little Friend. By Randall Jarrell. Dial. $2.

Aragon, Poet of the French Resistance. By Hannah Josephson and Malcolm Cowley. Duell, Sloan and Pearce. $2.

Short Is the Time. Poems 1936-1943. By C. Day Lewis. Oxford. $2.25.

Springboard, 1941-1944. By Louis MacNeice. Random House. $1.75.

Selected Poems. By John Crowe Ransom. Knopf. $2.

A Season in Hell. By Arthur Rimbaud. In a New English Translation by Louise Varèse. New Directions. $1.

Rains (Pluies). The French Poem by St.-John Perse with an English Translation by Denis Devlin. Sewanee Review. $2.50.

Essay on Rime. By Karl Shapiro. Reynal and Hitchcock. $2.

Esthétique du Mal. By Wallace Stevens. Cummington Press. $5.

The War Poets: An Anthology of the War Poetry of the 20th Century. Edited by Oscar Williams. John Day. $5.

Like the Root. A Poem by George Zabriskie. Coward-McCann. $2.

A Grammar of Motives. By Kenneth Burke. Prentice-Hall. $5.

The Unquiet Grave. A Word Cycle by Palinurus (Cyril Connolly). Harper. $2.50.

The Practical Cogitator or the Thinker's Anthology. Selected and Edited by Charles P. Curtis, Jr. and Ferris Greenslet. Houghton Mifflin. $3.

Selections from the Note-Books of Gerard Manley Hopkins. New Directions. 50 cents.

Reader's Companion. By Louis Kronenberger. Viking. $2.

The Penguin New Writing. Edited by John Lehmann. Penguin Books. 25 cents.

The American Language. Supplement I. By H. L. Mencken. Knopf. $5.

The Air-Conditioned Nightmare. By Henry Miller. New Directions. $3.50.

All Trivia. By Logan Pearsall Smith. Harcourt, Brace. $2.50.

Rock Crystal: A Christmas Tale. By Adalbert Stifter. Rendered in English by Elizabeth Mayer and Marianne Moore. Pantheon Books. $2.75.

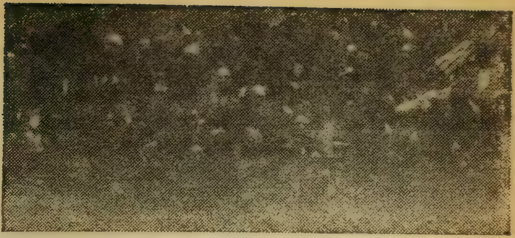
THE ARTS

Le Surréalisme et la Peinture. By André Breton. Brentano's. $7.50.

Proust and Painting. By Maurice E. Chernowitz. International University Press. $3.75.

Hunting and Fishing: Twenty-Four Lithographs. By Honoré Daumier. Pantheon Books. $5.50.

Yankee Stonecutters: The First American School of Sculpture, 1800-1850. By Albert Ten Eyck Gardner. Columbia. $4.



The colorful story of our various national groups, showing how each has helped to make our country great

A NATION OF NATIONS

by LOUIS ADAMIC

Author of My Native Land and The Native's Return

"A book that corrects and supplements, with a crackling succession of surprising facts, our distorted school books of American history."—Wendell Johnson, Chicago Sun Book Week

"A wise and well-informed book which puts warmth and human interest into Walt Whitman's sonorous phrase, 'a nation of nations'."—Professor Arthur M. Schlesinger, Harvard University

"Should go into every home in the United States, to remain there until our citizens master the text . . . a vast collection of data . . . enlivened by colorful personalia."
—Tremaine McDowell, Chicago Tribune

With 16 pages of photographs

At all bookstores • $3.50

HARPER & BROTHERS

Artists on Art. Compiled and Edited by Robert Goldwater and Marco Treves. Pantheon Books. $4.50.

Femmes Parisiennes. Twenty-four Collotypes. By Constantin Guys. Pantheon Books. $12.

Degas. By Camille Mauclair. Duell, Sloan and Pearce. $3.

The Theatre Book of the Year, 1944-1945. By George Jean Nathan. Knopf. $3.

Tomorrow's House: How to Plan Your Post-War Home Now. By George Nelson and Henry Wright. Simon and Schuster. $3.

Paul Strand: Photographs 1915-1945. By Nancy Newhall. Museum of Modern Art. $1.50.

Annals of the New York Stage. Volume XIV (1888-1891). By George C. D. Odell. Columbia. $8.75.

The Drawings of Leonardo da Vinci. Edited by E. E. Popham. Reynal and Hitchcock. $10.

Prehistoric Cave Paintings. By Max Raphael. Pantheon Books. $7.50.

Rodin. By Rainer Maria Rilke. Fine Editions. $3.50.

Music of Latin America. By Nicholas Slonimsky. Crowell. $3.50.

Georges Rouault: Paintings and Prints. By James Thrall Soby. Museum of Modern Art. $3.

The Musical Scene. By Virgil Thomson. Knopf. $3.

Beethoven. By Donald Francis Tovey. With an Editorial Preface by Hubert J. Foss. Oxford. $3.

Essays in Musical Analysis: Chamber Music. By Donald Francis Tovey. With an Editor's Note by Hubert J. Foss. Oxford. $4.

Musical Articles from the Encyclopaedia Britannica. By Donald Francis Tovey. With an Editorial Preface by Hubert J. Foss. Oxford. $4.

Marc Chagall. By Lionello Venturi. Pierre Matisse Editions.

Painting and Painters: How to Look at a Picture—from Giotto to Chagall. By Lionello Venturi. Scribner's. $3.50.

LITERARY HISTORY, CRITICISM, ESSAYS

Shakespeare & Jonson: Their Reputations in the Seventeenth Century Compared. By Gerald Eades Bentley. 2 volumes. Chicago. $7.50.

Ancestors' Brocades: The Literary Debut of Emily Dickinson. By Millicent Todd Bingham. Harper. $3.75.

William Ernest Henley: A Study in the "Counter-Decadence" of the 'Nineties. By Jerome Hamilton Buckley. Princeton. $2.50.

Rousseau, Kant, Goethe: Two Essays. By Ernst Cassirer. Princeton. $1.50.

"Elizabeth Is Missing" or, Truth Triumphant: An Eighteenth Century Mystery. By Lillian de la Torre. Knopf. $3.50.

The Question of Henry James: A Collection of Critical Essays. Edited by F. W. Dupee. Holt. $3.75.

The Aesthetic Adventure. By William Gaunt. Harcourt, Brace. $3.

Literary Currents in Hispanic America. By Pedro Henríquez-Ureña. Harvard. $3.50.

Freudianism and the Literary Mind. By Frederick J. Hoffman. Louisiana State. $4.

The Yogi and the Commissar and Other Essays. By Arthur Koestler. Macmillan. $2.50.

Reflections in a Mirror. By Charles Morgan. Macmillan. $2.50.

The Profane Virtues: Four Studies of the Eighteenth Century. By Peter Quennell. Viking. $3.

The Shelley Legend. By Robert Metcalf Smith in Collaboration with Martha Mary Schlegel, Theodore George Ehrsam, and Louis Addison Waters. Scribner's. $5.

Perplexities and Paradoxes. By Miguel Unamuno. Philosophical Library. $2.50.

Brazilian Literature: An Outline. By Erico Verissimo. Macmillan. $2.

Walden Revisited: A Centennial Tribute to Henry David Thoreau. By George F. Whicher. Packard. $2.

BIOGRAPHY, MEMOIRS, LETTERS

American Chronicle. The Autobiography of Ray Stannard Baker (David Grayson). Scribner's. $3.50.

Jefferson in Power, Jefferson and Hamilton, and the Young Jefferson, By Claude G. Bowers. 3 volumes. Houghton Mifflin. $10.

No Man Knows My History: The Life of Joseph Smith, the Mormon Prophet. By Fawn M. Brodie. Knopf. $4.

Enrico Caruso, His Life and Death. By Dorothy Caruso. Simon and Schuster. $2.75.

The Bach Reader: A Life of Johann Sebastian Bach in Letters and Documents. Edited by Hans T. David and Arthur Mendel. Norton. $6.

Smouldering Freedom: The Story of the Spanish Republicans in Exile. By Isabel de Palencia. Longmans, Green. $3.

The Best Is Yet. . . . By Morris L. Ernst. Harper. $3.

William Morris, Medievalist and Revolutionary. By Margaret R. Grennan. King's Crown. $2.50.

John Henry Newman. By Charles F. Harrold. Longmans, Green. $3.50.

Wartime Mission in Spain, 1942-1945. By Carlton J. H. Hayes. Macmillan. $3.

Copernicus and His World. By Hermann Kesten. Roy. $3.50.

Chief Justice Stone and the Supreme Court. By Samuel J. Konefsky. Macmillan. $3.

The Diaries of Tchaikowsky. By Wladimia Lakond. Norton. $4.

John Henry Newman. By John Moody. Sheed and Ward. $3.75.

Visions and Memories. By Henry L. Nevinson. Oxford. $3.

Fighting Liberal: The Autobiography of George W. Norris. Macmillan. $3.50.

One Small Voice. By Marianne Oswald. Whittlesey House. $2.50.

Tolstoy and His Wife. By Tikhon Polner. Norton. $2.75.

Lincoln the President: Springfield to Gettysburg. By J. G. Randall. 2 volumes. Dodd, Mead. $7.50.

Home to India. By Santha Rama Rau. Harper. $2.50.

The Letters and Private Papers of William Makepeace Thackeray. Collected and Edited by Gordon N. Ray. Volume I, 1817-1840; Volume II, 1841-1851. Harvard. $12.50.

Letters of Rainer Maria Rilke, 1892-1910. Translated by Jane Bannard Greene and M. D. Herter Norton. Norton. $3.50.

San Martín, Knight of the Andes. By Ricardo Rojas. Doubleday, Doran. $3.50.

JUST PUBLISHED

ADVENTURE in DIPLOMACY

OUR FRENCH DILEMMA

by Kenneth Pendar

Written by an American serving in North Africa at the time of our invasion, this first-person narrative takes you behind the scenes of our tangled diplomatic negotiations there. The fascinating story of great personalities and decisions which it presents illuminates our present and future relations with France.

At all bookstores • $3.00

DODD, MEAD & COMPANY

THE Nation

FOR YOUR FRIENDS

There's no better gift!

52 TIMES A YEAR FOR ONLY $3

You can give The Nation as a gift to as many people as you wish at the special rate of only $3 each. And with it goes the usual greeting card. You can renew your own subscription now or whenever it expires at the regular yearly rate of $5, or if you want to make a real saving, you can renew for two years for $8 or three years for $11. Just fill out and mail the order form below.

GIFT ORDER FORM

THE NATION ASSOCIATES, Inc. • TWENTY VESEY STREET • NEW YORK 7, N. Y.

Dear Nation: Please send gift subscription of one year of The Nation to my friends as indicated below, at the special gift rate of $3 each.

☐ Also renew my own subscription to The Nation at the regular rate for .... years.
☐ Don't renew my subscription now. ☐ Remittance inclosed. ☐ Please bill me.

My Name is..
Street ....
City.............................. Zone & State..............................

Regular Renewal Subscription Rates: One Year $5 • Two Years $8 • Three Years $11
For Foreign and Canadian subscriptions add $1.00 a year.

LIST GIFT SUBSCRIPTIONS HERE

Name ....
Street ....
City.................... Zone & State....................
Gift Card should read from..
☐ Send Gift Card to me for mailing.

Name ....
Street ....
City.................... Zone & State....................
Gift Card should read from..
☐ Send Gift Card to me for mailing.

Name ....
Street ....
City.................... Zone & State....................
Gift Card should read from..
☐ Send Gift Card to me for mailing.

Name ....
Street ....
City.................... Zone & State....................
Gift Card should read from..
☐ Send Gift Card to me for mailing.

12-8-45

An Intellectual Event!

A Grammar of Motives

•

By KENNETH BURKE

THIS is a landmark book, the first volume of a trilogy on human relations. Burke's approach to language is in terms of drama rather than scientific knowledge. Mark Van Doren says: "Here is semantics with a difference—i.e., with a justification. I think Burke must be on the way to building a substantial and delightful world."

Burke's book presents a theory of meaning which is the culmination of his long concern with the basic problems of communication.

$5.00 at all bookstores

Prentice-Hall

70 FIFTH AVENUE
New York 11, N. Y.

The Middle Span. Volume II, Persons and Places. By George Santayana. Scribner's. $2.50.

Letters. By Felix Mendelssohn. Edited by G. Selden-Goth. Pantheon Books. $4.50.

The Trollopes: The Chronicle of a Writing Family. By Lucy Poate Stebbins and Richard Poate Stebbins. Columbia. $4.

The Builders of the Bridge: The Story of John Roebling and His Son. By D. B. Steinman. Harcourt, Brace. $3.50.

Benjamin Franklin's Autobiographical Writings. Selected and Edited by Carl Van Doren. Viking. $5.

South America Called Them. By Victor Wolfgang von Hagen. Knopf. $3.75.

Son of the Wilderness: The Life of John Muir. By Linnie Marsh Wolfe. Knopf. $3.50.

Tom Paine: America's Godfather, 1737-1809. By W. E. Woodward. Dutton. $3.50.

Black Boy: A Record of Childhood and Youth. By Richard Wright. Harper. $2.50.

Flowering Dusk: Things Remembered Accurately and Inaccurately. By Ella Young. Longmans, Green. $3.50.

THE WAR, THE PEACE, INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

Let's Talk about the Peace. By Henry G. Alsberg. Hastings House. $2.75.

The Price of Peace. By Sir William Beveridge. Norton. $2.

America's Far Eastern Policy. By T. A. Bisson. Macmillan. $3.

The New Veteran. By Charles G. Bolté. Reynal and Hitchcock. $2.

North Atlantic Triangle. By John Bartlet Brebner. Yale. $4.

The United States and Britain. By Crane Brinton. Harvard. $2.50.

America, Partner in World Rule. By William Henry Chamberlin. Vanguard. $3.

Tomorrow's Trade. By Stuart Chase. Twentieth Century Fund. $1.

Europe Free and United. By Albert Guérard. Stanford. $2.15.

America's Role in the World Economy. By Alvin H. Hansen. Norton. $2.50.

The Governing of Men: General Principles and Recommendations Based on Experiences at a Japanese Relocation Camp. By Alexander H. Leighton, Lt. Comdr., Medical Corps, U. S. N. R. Princeton. $3.75.

Germany Is Our Problem. By Henry Morgenthau, Jr. Harper. $2.

Arms and Policy, 1939-1944. By Hoffman Nickerson. Putnam's. $3.50.

America's Place in the World. By Nathaniel Peffer. Viking. $2.75.

One World in the Making. By Ralph Barton Perry. Current Books. $3.

Europe in Revolution. By John Scott. Houghton Mifflin. $3.

The Pattern of Soviet Power. By Edgar Snow. Random House. $2.75.

America's Stake in Britain's Future. By George Soule. Viking. $2.75.

The Balance of Tomorrow: Power and Foreign Policy in the United States. By Robert Strausz-Hupé. Putnam's. $3.50.

Bones of Contention. By the Rt. Hon. Lord Vansittart. Knopf. $2.75.

An Intelligent American's Guide to the Peace. Under the General Editorship of and with an Introduction by Sumner Welles. Dryden. $3.75.

The Story of the Second World War. Edited by Henry Steele Commager. Little, Brown. $3.

A Miniature History of the War Down to the Liberation of Paris. By R. C. K. Ensor. Oxford. $1.50.

Surrender on Demand. By Varian Fry. Random House. $3.

Conspiracy in Algiers. By Renée Gosset. The Nation. $1.

General Marshall's Report: The Winning of the War in Europe and the Pacific. Simon and Schuster. $1., cloth; $2.50, boards.

"Stepchildren" of France. By Charles Odic. Roy. $2.50.

Persian Gulf Command: Some Marvels on the Road to Kazvin. By Joel Sayre. Random House. $2.

Wars I Have Seen. By Gertrude Stein. Random House. $2.50.

AMERICAN HISTORY, PUBLIC AFFAIRS

A Nation of Nations. By Louis Adamic. Harper. $3.50.

Big Democracy. By Paul H. Appleby. Knopf. $2.75.

Woodrow Wilson and the Great Betrayal. By Thomas A. Bailey. Macmillan. $3.50.

GHOSTS OF SLAIN JEWS AT STATE DINNER

WASHINGTON—There were ghosts at the state banquets for Prime Ministers Attlee and Mackenzie King here last night—the ghosts of the 6,000,000 Jews the Germans murdered in Europe during the war.

Flesh and blood rabbis represented the wraiths. A delegation of several hundred of them has been in Washington for the past two days to urge that Palestine be opened up to Jewish immigration.

But the wraiths were more real, in a sense, than the rabbis. For it is the terrible fate that befell that 6,000,000 that is the primary force that moves American policy on Palestine. This force is a desire to save the Jews who survive.

(Wallace R. Deuel, Chicago Daily News, Nov. 13, 1945)

Senator McKellar, president of the U. S. Senate, together with Senators James Mead and Arthur Capper and many representatives, headed by majority leader John McCormack, receive and address the Zion march which was sponsored by the Zionist-Revisionist Organization of America, headed by Rabbi Dr. Morris M. Rose.

On the steps of Congress—at the gates of the White House—in front of the British Embassy, these men of God not only voiced the last echoes of the six million Jews who had perished in Europe, but also uttered the warning that there can be no peace for the world until justice is done to the Jews.

The internationally significant Zion March on Washington with the unprecedented news interest which it has aroused in the American press from coast to coast, is the beginning of what must become a ceaseless, unrelenting drive to achieve the following program, presented by the Rabbis to the White House:

1. The immediate transfer to Palestine of 100,000 Jews who had escaped the slaughter houses and gas chambers, according to the recent request by President Truman.

2. The immediate abrogation of the illegal White Paper—the barrier which prevents the return of European Jews to their ancestral land.

3. The creation of an American-British commission for the systematic evacuation of almost two million surviving Jews from Europe to Palestine.

4. The immediate release of thousands of Jewish patriots whom the British administration has thrown without investigation or trial into concentration camps in Palestine and the waste lands of Sudan and Eritrea.

Every right-thinking American must dedicate himself to the complete evacuation of European Jews to Palestine; to the furtherance of Jewish immigration into Palestine despite the White Paper and under all circumstances; to the bolstering of our heroic underground movement in Palestine.

This is a task in which you are urged to participate.

The American people fought and died that freedom and justice should prevail! We spent billions of dollars to help men fight for their freedom.

We dare not lend our wealth to help England kill free men in Palestine.

This is a battle for all free men who believe in Justice and righteousness!

We invite you to help! Tremendous financial resources must be mobilized in order to surmount the obstacles that lie in our path. It is a race against time. Act now!

RECORD OF ACHIEVEMENTS OF THE ZIONIST-REVISIONIST MOVEMENT

1—Our Movement was instrumental in bringing into Palestine tens of thousands of Jews through the extra-legal immigration in spite of the White Paper and thus rescued them from the Maideneks and Oswiecims.

2—Our Movement was foremost in the underground activity against the Nazis in Europe and particularly in the heroic last stand of the Warsaw Ghetto.

3—We organized the movement for a Jewish Army in the beginning of the war and carried on a struggle despite all obstacles. These efforts culminated in the establishment of a Jewish Brigade in which thousands of Jabotinsky's disciples fought heroically on all the battlefronts.

4—Through our plan of evacuation, supported by many European governments, we made every effort to avert the oncoming catastrophe which struck the Jews of Europe. We broke the conspiracy of silence which enveloped the Jewish tragedy. Our representatives from Palestine and Europe bent every effort in the rescue work.

5—We organized the historic march of the Rabbis on Washington, the most stirring expression of Jewish fate and need voiced in the nation's capital to date.

This record indicates not only the achievement of our Movement but also the validity of the principles upon which it is founded. Today there is general agreement that our ideology, methods and tactics stand vindicated by the course of events to date and by their trend toward the future.

PALESTINE EMERGENCY FUND, Inc.
140 West 42nd St., New York 18, N. Y. Wisconsin 7-2595

Palestine Emergency Fund, Inc.
140 W. 42nd St., N. Y. 18, N. Y.

Gentlemen:

I want to aid your efforts toward the complete evacuation of European Jewry to Palestine, toward immigration under all circumstances and support of the Heroic Jewish resistance in Palestine. I am enclosing my contribution to the Palestine Emergency Fund in the sum of $..................

Name ....

Address ....

City ....Zone............State............

Kindly make checks payable to PALESTINE EMERGENCY FUND, INC.

Oxford Books

Included in* THE NATION'S *list of "Notable Books of 1945"

Short is the Time
by Cecil Day Lewis
A new collection of poems by an outstanding modern English poet. 102 pages. $2.25

Beethoven
by Sir Donald Tovey
A human and profound analysis of all aspects of Beethoven's music. 144 pages. Music examples. $3.00

Essays in Musical Analysis*
by Sir Donald Tovey
A collection of chamber music analyses by the great pianist, composer and critic. 244 pages. Music examples. $4.00

Musical Articles from the Encyclopaedia Britannica
by Sir Donald Tovey
Form the most complete attempt at a system of music that Tovey ever wrote. 256 pages. Music examples. $5.00

Visions and Memories*
by Henry W. Nevinson
Collected and arranged by Evelyn Sharp. Selections from the work of the essayist, poet and war-correspondent. Introduction by Gilbert Murray, O.M. 220 pages. $3.00

A Miniature History of the War
Down to the Liberation of Paris
by R. C. K. Ensor
Reveals the exact progress of victory from September, 1940 to the liberation of Paris in August, 1944. 163 pages. $1.50

England in the Eighteen-Eighties
Toward a Social Basis for Freedom
by Helen Merrell Lynd
"A penetrating and profound study . . . of English social history [and] of the principles of social change."—Max Lerner. 517 pages. $4.50

The French Revolution
by J. M. Thompson
"This is the best history of the French Revolution." — Book-of-the-Month Club News. 519 pages. Illustrated. $5.00

National Self-Determination
by Alfred Cobban
A profound examination of the theory and practice involved in this formula of Power. "An important study." — Foreign Affairs. $4.50

*Temporarily out of stock

At all bookstores

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS
114 Fifth Avenue • New York 11

Behold Our Green Mansions: A Book about American Forests. By Richard H. D. Boerker. North Carolina. $4.

Democracy Under Pressure: Special Interests vs the Public Welfare. By Stuart Chase. Twentieth Century Fund. $1.

The Killing of the Peace. By Alan Cranston. Viking. $2.50.

The City Is the People. By Henry S. Churchill. Reynal and Hitchcock. $3.

Democracy in America. By Alexis de Tocqueville. The Henry Reeve Text as Revised by Francis Bowen, Now Further Corrected and Edited with Introduction, Editorial Notes, and Bibliographies by Phillips Bradley. 2 volumes. Knopf. $6.

Black Metropolis: A Study of Negro Life in a Northern City. By St. Clair Drake and Horace R. Cayton. Harcourt, Brace. $5.

Can Representative Government Do the Job? By Thomas K. Finletter. Reynal and Hitchcock. $2.

Two Billion Acre Farm: An Informal History of American Agriculture. By Robert West Howard. Doubleday, Doran. $2.50.

Labor Today and Tomorrow. By Aaron Levenstein. Knopf. $2.75.

Time for Planning: A Social-Economic Theory and Program for the Twentieth Century. By Lewis L. Lorwin. Harper. $3.

Systematic Politics. By Charles E. Merriam. Chicago. $3.75.

Diplomat in Carpet Slippers: Abraham Lincoln Deals with Foreign Affairs. By Jay Monaghan. Bobbs-Merrill. $4.

Primer for White Folks. By Bucklin Moon. Doubleday, Doran. $3.50.

City Development: Studies in Disintegration and Renewal. By Lewis Mumford. Harcourt, Brace. $2.

A Million Homes a Year. By Dorothy Rosenman. Harcourt, Brace. $3.50.

Tomorrow's Business. By Beardsley Ruml. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

The Age of Jackson. By Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr. Little, Brown. $5.

Food or Famine: The Challenge of Erosion. By Ward Shepard. Macmillan. $3.

Names on the Land: A Historical Account of Place-Naming in the United States. By George R. Stewart. Random House. $3.

Sixty Million Jobs. By Henry A. Wallace. Simon and Schuster, $1, paper. With Reynal and Hitchcock, $2, cloth.

The Social Systems of American Ethnic Groups. By W. Lloyd Warner and Leo Srole. Yale. $4.

Saints and Strangers. By George F. Willison. Reynal and Hitchcock. $3.75.

Justice in Transportation: An Exposé of Monopoly Control. By Arne C. Wiprud. Ziff-Davis. $2.50.

When Democracy Builds. By Frank Lloyd Wright. Chicago. $4.

Angel in the Forest: A Fairy Tale of Two Utopias. By Marguerite Young. Reynal and Hitchcock. $3.

EUROPE, ASIA, LATIN AMERICA

The Curtain Falls: Last Days of the Third Reich. By Count Folke Bernadotte. Knopf. $2.

Years of Victory, 1802-1812. By Arthur Bryant. Harper. $4.

Talk about Russia with Masha Scott. By Pearl S. Buck. John Day. $1.75.

The Bank of England. A History by Sir John Clapham. 2 volumes. Macmillan. $7.50.

The Basis of Soviet Strength. By George B. Cressey. Whittlesey House. $3.

Building Lenin's Russia. By Simon Liberman. Chicago. $3.

England in the Eighteen-Eighties: Toward a Social Basis for Freedom. By Helen Merrell Lynd. Oxford. $4.50.

Eastern Europe Between the Wars, 1918-1941. By Hugh Seton-Watson. Macmillan. $6.50.

The Arab Island: The Middle East, 1939-1943. By Freya Stark. Knopf. $3.50.

The French Revolution. By J. M. Thompson. Oxford. $5.

Evolution of the Dutch Nation. By Bernard H. M. Vlekke. Roy. $3.50.

Report on the Russians. By W. L. White. Harcourt Brace. $2.50.

Shinto, the Unconquered Enemy. By Robert O. Ballou. Viking. $2.75.

The Asian Legacy and American Life. Essays Arranged and Edited by Arthur E. Christy. John Day. $3.50.

The Japanese Nation. By John F. Embree. Farrar and Rinehart. $3.

Earthbound China: A Study of Rural Economy in Yunnan. By Hsiao-Tung Fei and Chih-I Chang. Chicago. $3.75.
Report from Red China. By Harrison Forman. Holt. $3.
Solution in Asia. By Owen Lattimore. Atlantic Monthly Press Book. Little, Brown. $2.
Forever China. By Robert Payne. Dodd, Mead. $3.50.
China's Crisis. By Lawrence K. Rosinger. Knopf. $3.
Dilemma in Japan. By Andrew Roth. Little, Brown. $2.50
The Challenge of Red China. By Gunther Stein. Whittlesey House. $3.50.
A Chinese Village: Taitou, Shantung Province. By Martin C. Yang. Columbia. $3.

Brazil: An Interpretation. By Gilberto Freyre. Knopf. $2.
The Argentine Republic. By Ysabel F. Rennie. Macmillan. $4.
South America Uncensored. By Roland Hall Sharp. Longmans, Green. $3.50.

Left Turn, Canada. By M. J. Coldwell. Duell, Sloan and Pearce. $2.75.

ECONOMICS, SOCIAL CRITICISM

The Economic Basis of Politics. By Charles A. Beard. Knopf. $1.75.
Freedom and Responsibility in the American Way of Life. By Carl L. Becker. Knopf. $2.50.
Full Employment in a Free Society. By William H. Beveridge. Norton. $3.75.
The Free State. By D. W. Brogan. Knopf. $2.
Nationalism and After. By Edward Hallett Carr. Macmillan. $1.25.
National Self-Determination. By Alfred Cobban. Oxford. $4.50.
Road to Reaction. By Herman Finer. Atlantic Monthly Press Book. Little, Brown. $2.
Fate and Freedom: A Philosophy for Free Americans. By Jerome Frank. Simon and Schuster. $3.
The Hopi Way. By Laura Thompson and Alice Joseph. Chicago. $3.
The Psychological Frontiers of Society. By Abram Kardiner with the Collaboration of Ralph Linton, Cora Du Bois, and James West. Columbia. $5.
The Ten Grandmothers. By Alice Marriott. Oklahoma. $3.
A Catholic Looks at the World. By Francis E. McMahon. Vanguard. $2.75.
The Liberal Tradition: A Study of the Social and Spiritual Conditions of Freedom. By William Aylott Orton. Yale. $3.50.
The Bogey of Economic Maturity. By George Terborgh. Machinery and Allied Products Institute. $3.
Plainville, U. S. A. By James West. Columbia. $2.75.
Freedom Under Planning. By Barbara Wootton. North Carolina. $2.

EDUCATION, PHILOSOPHY, SCIENCE

The Springfield Plan. A Photographic Record by Alexander Alland and James Waterman Wise. Viking. $2.50.
Teacher in America. By Jacques Barzun. Atlantic Monthly Press Book. Little, Brown. $3.
A Preface to Logic. By Morris R. Cohen. Holt. $2.50.
Politics and Morals. By Benedetto Croce. Philosophical Library. $3.
Atomic Energy in the Coming Era. By David Dietz. Dodd, Mead. $2.
Men Under Stress. By Roy R. Grinker, Lt. Col., M. C. and John P. Spiegel, Major, M. C. Blakiston. $5.
General Education in a Free Society. Report of the Harvard Committee. Harvard. $2.
The Science of Man in the World Crisis. Edited by Ralph Linton. Columbia. $4.
Total War and the Human Mind. By Major A. M. Meerloo. International Universities Press. $1.75.
A History of Western Philosophy. By Bertrand Russell. Simon and Schuster. $5.
What Is Life? By Erwin Schrödinger. Macmillan. $1.75.
Atomic Energy for Military Purposes: The Official Report on the Development of the Atomic Bomb under the Auspices of the United States Government, 1940-1945. By Henry De Wolf Smyth. Princeton. $2, cloth; $1.25, paper.

ARE YOU CONFUSED?

Then read this indispensable book for troubled times and puzzled citizens...

Edited by Bruce Bliven and
A. G. Mezerik

St. Louis Post-Dispatch — "This is a tightly integrated book with a definite point of view . . . a brilliant symposium. It should increase the number of informed citizens in the land."

Chicago Sun — "It would be difficult to find a book more useful to the ordinary citizen . . . might have been appropriately subtitled: 'A Handbook of National Issues for the First Five Postwar Years'."

N. Y. Times — Howard Mumford Jones says, "The liberal movement . . . will declare that the publication of this book is a notable event, and it will be right."

N. Y. Herald Tribune — "A new approach . . . which marks a salutary and refreshing change from the slogans and clichés so popular during the 1930's . . . If this type of thinking becomes generally prevalent . . . Americans can look ahead with justifiable confidence."

SOME OF THE 22 CHAPTERS

STETTINIUS—United Nations • BATT—Russia
BOWLES—Inflation • BERGE—World Trade
PARRAN—Health • PHILIP MURRAY—Labor
RANDOLPH PAUL—Taxes

The Library Journal — "Two valuable appendices, United Nations Charter, GI Bill of Rights, Bretton Woods, etc. Very useful guide to additional reading and bibliography."

AT ALL BOOKSTORES $3.00

DUELL, SLOAN AND PEARCE

MOTION PICTURES

It's Paramount's Gay Whirl of Romance, Adventure & Rhythm!
Dorothy LAMOUR • Arturo deCORDOVA
"MASQUERADE in MEXICO"
WITH
Patric Knowles • Ann Dvorak • George Rigaud

IN PERSON
THE BAND OF THE YEAR
TONY PASTOR and his ORCHESTRA
— plus —
The Nonchalants
— plus —
Paul & Eva Reyes
Extra Added Attraction!
Marion Hutton
Don Baker at the Organ

Midnight Feature Nightly Buy Victory Bonds
NOW PLAYING PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

"A nostalgic musical" . . . Cameron, News
20th Century-Fox presents
BETTY GRABLE in
THE DOLLY SISTERS
John PAYNE • June HAVER
....ON STAGE...
CARL RAVAZZA • BEATRICE KAY • GOMEZ and BEATRICE
Extra! MAURICE ROCCO
Now Playing ROXY 7th Ave. at 50th St.

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE
Money-Saving Magazine Combinations

THE Nation

with Harpers Magazine	You save $2.50	$6.50
with Consumers Union	You save $1.50	$7.00
with Harpers Magazine and Consumers Union	You save $3.50	$9.00
with Free World	You save $1.50	$7.50
with Saturday Review	You save $1.50	$8.50

All club combinations listed are for one year, and may be mailed to different individuals and addresses. Canadian and foreign postage extra.

THE NATION by itself
1 Year $5 2 Years $8 3 Years $11
Servicemen's Rate $3 a Year
Canadian and Foreign Postage—$1 a year extra

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.
I want to subscribe to The Nation, or the following Nation magazine combinations as listed below:

☐ Remittance enclosed. ☐ Bill me.

NAME
STREET
CITY ZONE STATE
12-8-45

Psychiatry in Modern Warfare. By Edward A. Strecker and Kenneth E. Appel. Macmillan. $1.50.

PICTURE BOOKS

Day of Paris. Edited by George Davis. Photographs by André Kertesz. Augustin. $6.
All Out for the Sack Race! By Robt Day. Random House. $2.50.
Who's Paying for This Cab? By Alan Dunn. Simon and Schuster. $2.50.
Studio: Europe. By John Groth. Vanguard. $3.50.
Mexico. 64 Photographs by Fritz Henle. Ziff-Davis. $4.
A Picture History of Russia. Edited by John Stuart Martin. Crown. $3.75.
Up Front. Text and Pictures by Bill Mauldin. Holt. $3.
This Petty Pace: A Book of Drawings. By Mary Petty. Knopf. $3.50.
One Nation. By Wallace Stegner and the Editors of Look. Houghton Mifflin. $3.75.
Persistent Faces. By William Steig. Duell, Sloan and Pearce.
All in Line. By Saul Steinberg. Duell, Sloan and Pearce. $2.50.

STAGE PLAYS

Kermit Bloomgarden & George Heller present
DEEP ARE THE ROOTS
A New Play by ARNAUD d'USSEAU and JAMES GOW
Staged by ELIA KAZAN
FULTON THEATRE Forty-sixth Street West of Broadway. Circle 6-6380.
Evenings 8:40, $4.20, $3.60, $3.00, $2.40, $1.80, $1.20. Matinees Wednesday and Saturday, $3.00, $2.40, $1.80, $1.20. Tax inclusive.

"DESERVES ITS GREAT SUCCESS!"—Nichols, Times
Rodgers and Hammerstein present
MADY CHRISTIANS • OSCAR HOMOLKA
In JOHN VAN DRUTEN'S
I REMEMBER MAMA
from Kathryn Forbes' "Mama's Bank Account"
with JOHN TETZEL • ADRIENNE GESSNER • RICHARD BISHOP
MUSIC BOX 45th Street, West of Broadway. Phone Circle 6-4636. Evs. 8:35 Sharp. Mats. Thurs. and Sat., 2:35 Sharp.

MICHAEL TODD Presents
UP IN CENTRAL PARK
Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS Lyrics by DOROTHY FIELDS Music by SIGMUND ROMBERG
BROADWAY THEATRE, Broadway at 53rd Street. Matinees: WED. & SAT.

Special Nation issue on the

ATOMIC BOMB

The December 22 issue of The Nation will contain a 24-page insert devoted to summaries of the most significant speeches delivered at The Nation Associates three-day forum on the atomic bomb and its impact on political and economic problems.

Advertising in this issue will be charged at the regular rates. It is expected that the 52,000 print order permitted by our paper supply will be a complete sellout.

Forms for the December 22 issue close Monday, December 10; we must be ready to print by noon, Thursday, December 13.

Advertising Department
THE NATION
20 Vesey Street New York 7, N. Y.

Music

B. H. HAGGIN

IN HIS last season with the New York Philharmonic Toscanini conducted three performances of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, of which the first and second impressed me, in the Allegro movements, as being tense and driving, but the third as being relaxed and spacious, as though it were the product of an equilibrium that had not existed in Toscanini during the first two. Since there was no possibility of checking the impression by rehearing the performances, I began to wonder whether I had really heard the difference; until a couple of years ago, when I had a chance to hear recordings of two astonishingly different performances of the Ninth that Toscanini gave with the N. B. C. Symphony in 1938 and 1939, with the first movement driving ahead relentlessly in one, but relaxed and spacious in the other (neither, incidentally, was satisfactory to Toscanini). And recently recordings of the broadcasts enabled me to hear the equally astonishing difference between his performance of the "Eroica" a year ago and the one on V-J Day: the first movement so much more con brio in the one a year ago. It is not, obviously, that he decided the movement should be less con brio in the V-J Day performance; but that conditions within himself of which he was unconscious, and over which he had no control, made it come out that way.

After these instances I am inclined to trust my impression that there was a tenseness in the recent broadcast performances of Brahms's Fourth and Schubert's Seventh that was not in the performances of three and four years ago. It was this tenseness that disturbed me in parts of the works; not the conceptions which disturb some listeners. Those who are disconcerted by Toscanini's single tempo throughout the final passacaglia movement of Brahms's Fourth have been corrupted by the performances they have heard—the performances not only of Stokowski and Koussevitzky and Ormandy, but of German conductors who also slow down for Variations 10-15 in the face of Brahms's direction that the value of the quarter-note in these variations remain what it has been until then. It is only by maintaining the pace of the eight-measure ground-bass inexorably in all its repetitions that the cumulative impact of the repetitions—which is the effect of the passacaglia form—is achieved. Weingartner does this in his recorded performance; and Toscanini does it with greater power.

As for his unusually fast pace in the second movement of Schubert's Seventh, I will repeat what I said about it after his performance four years ago: "Invariably I am startled by the first measures, and then go along easily with the rest of the movement; but at the Philadelphia performance I thought I understood what was behind that fast pace: the feeling for purity—that is, simplicity, economy, subtlety—of style, which leads him often to set a single, subtly modeled tempo for an entire movement, and which in this instance leads him to set a single pace not only for the opening section of the second movement and for the alternating section but for the catastrophe in the middle of the movement, so that the increasing urgency of this passage is achieved, powerfully, without any acceleration, and only a slight broadening at the end is sufficient to give shattering power to the chords with which the passage breaks off into silence." In the recent performance Toscanini did accelerate toward those catastrophic chords, with lessened effect; and this was part of what impressed me as a less successful integration of the movement, resulting from the tenseness I felt in the performance. But the building up of momentum in the following movements, to the climax in the great coda of the finale—this was as breathtaking as always.

On Columbia's November list is the cantata "Alexander Nevsky" (Set 580; $5.50), into which Prokofiev expanded some of his music for Eisenstein's film. A couple of passages—"Russia Under the Mongolian Yoke" and "The Crusaders in Pskov"—are effective musical soundtrack; but the music for the battle on the ice, a modern Russian equivalent of "The Ride of the Valkyries," as well as the choral proclamations of the might of Alexander Nevsky and the Russian people, and the patriotic lament of the Russian girl—these are, in their different ways, pretty terrible. The performance by the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Westminster Choir, and Jennie Tourel under Ormandy's direction seems good; and its sound on the records is the best Columbia has achieved with the Philadelphia Orchestra so far: clear, clean, bright, and agreeable to the ear.

What brought "The Ride of the Valkyries" to my mind was Columbia's recording (Set 581; $8.50) of Act 3 of "Die Walküre." It was a number of

USA—USSR
'Welding the Peace'
—through friendly aid for reconstruction
Tuesday, December 18, 7:30 P.M.
Madison Sq. Garden
LEOPOLD STOKOWSKI
CONDUCTING NEW YORK PHILHARMONIC SYMPHONY
WESTMINSTER CHOIR • JENNIE TOUREL
In ALEXANDER NEVSKY CANTATA by Prokofieff
Mayor FIORELLO H. LA GUARDIA ★ NEWBOLD MORRIS
DEAN VIRGINIA GILDERSLEEVE ★ EDWARD C. CARTER
JAMES B. CAREY ★ WILLIAM FEINBERG
The Rt. Rev. JAMES B. DE WOLFE
"They Came Back," FREDRIC MARCH, Narrator
American Society for RUSSIAN RELIEF, INC.
TICKETS: $.85, $1.20, $1.80, $2.40, $3.60
ON SALE: New York Office, Russian Relief, 5 Cedar St. (WH-3-2460); Russian Relief Workroom, 35 W. 35th St.; Local Russian Relief Headquarters; Bookfair, 133 W. 44th St.; Skazka, 227 W. 46th St.; Worker's Book Shop, 50 E. 13th St.

TRENDS & TIDES
A Paper of Information and Opinion
LOUIS ADAMIC
Editor-Publisher

•

Contents
December Issue

Welcome the Atomic Age
History Is Getting Fed Up
Renascent Yugoslavia
The Truth About Trieste
Exposé: The British in Greece
Protestant-Catholic Tensions America Is American
The Institute of Ethnic Affairs

•

Those who NOW subscribe for 1946 will receive this issue free.

RATE:
$1 a year; 6 subscriptions for $5, 12 for $10. Foreign (incl. APO and FPO) $1.50 each.

TRENDS & TIDES
MILFORD • NEW JERSEY

LANGUAGE IS POWER
. . . Forge ahead, win special assignments, promotion, better job in global peace time opportunities through ability to speak a foreign language.
MASTER A NEW LANGUAGE quickly, easily, correctly by LINGUAPHONE
The world-famous Linguaphone Conversational Method brings voices of native teachers INTO YOUR OWN HOME. You learn the new language by LISTENING. It's amazingly simple; thousands have succeeded. ◆ ◆ 29 LANGUAGES
Send for Free book, Call for Free demonstration
LINGUAPHONE INSTITUTE
81 RCA Bldg., New York 20 • Circle 7-0830

"A 'CHIEF RABBI' OF ROME BECOMES A CATHOLIC"
A Study in Fright and Spite
by
LOUIS I. NEWMAN
250 PAGES • PRICE $3.00
Order from
THE RENASCENCE PRESS
c/o Bloch Publishing Company
31 West 31st Street New York City or from local bookdealers

BOOKS FOUND FREE!
WHAT BOOKS DO YOU WANT?
We quote lowest market prices. No charge for locating Hard-to-Find and Out-of-Print Books. All books, OLD or NEW, mailed POST-FREE
SEARCHLIGHT BOOK NATION
22 East 17th Street, New York City

years since I had last heard the work; and I found myself laughing at what I had laughed at the last time—the orchestra's galloping and whinnying, the Valkyries' ho-yo-to-ho-ing, their traditionally tremolo-ridden shrieking, Wotan's harumphing, Wotan's and Brünhilde's flinging back and forth of Wagnerian declamatory style; nor could I hear out with patience, much less take seriously, the subsequent pomposities that many thousands of people find overwhelming. Some of the tremolo-ridden shrieking in the early scenes is Traubel's; in the sustained phrases later on her voice is steady, voluminous, and lustrous in its lower range, but becomes constricted and sharp-edged as it rises. Janssen's singing also is poor in the explosive declamation of the early scenes, but very good in the sustained phrases later on. Rodzinski drives through the act like a bulldozer. The recorded sound of the performance lacks brightness; and the violins are too weak in relation to the rest of the orchestra. The German and English texts are not provided with the records as they should have been.

Drama

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

"A SOUND OF HUNTING" (Lyceum Theater) is another play about the war. The action—such as it is—takes place in a ruined house at Cassino, and Harry Brown, the author, does manage to carry the conviction that he was there. This, one might think, ought to guarantee an interesting play, and this one is, as a matter of fact, never exactly dull. But neither, unfortunately, is it ever profoundly interesting, very moving, or at all unexpected.

One difficulty is, no doubt, the slightness of the single incident, which is stretched out over three acts of normal length and doesn't quite reach. Another, and I think more serious one, is that what the author has to say has been said a great many times before, even though he may be better qualified than most to say it. That war is a dull as well as a dirty business and that the men who fight it act heroically but despise heroics—beyond this Mr. Brown has little to communicate. He does, to be sure, hate war correspondents, and the specimen he presents is the only obvious caricature in his gallery of portraits, but hatred of war correspondents is hardly his subject, and one is left wondering what that subject is. The talk is good talk and sounds convincing, but it is the kind of talk we have come to expect from war-weary soldiers ever since "What Price Glory?" set a fashion, and though the conversation of Mr. Brown's characters is probably more accurate and less exaggerated than that of Captain Flagg and his associates, the very exaggerations of "What Price Glory?" gave it an impact which "A Sound of Hunting" fails to achieve. It may seem odd that Mr. Brown, fresh from the greatest war in history, should lack a subject, but that seems to be his chief difficulty. He appears to know how to write. At the moment he does not appear to have anything to write about.

Books in Short

"48 Million Tons to Eisenhower," by Lt. Col. Randolph Leigh (Infantry Journal, $2). The Services of Supply of the United States Army in the European Theater of Operations accomplished, it is claimed, the "greatest logistical job" in the history of warfare between D-Day and V-E Day. This book offers proof of that claim, buttressing its case with statistics, charts, diagrams, and pictures. For the professional soldier the record should prove valuable; for the armchair military critic it is a "must."

"Population Roads to Peace or War," by Guy Irving Burch and Elmer Pendell, Foreword and Postscript by Walter B. Pitkin (Population Reference Bureau, Washington, D. C., $1 and $2). The new Malthusians who have collaborated in this work believe that attainment of the four freedoms will be impossible until the human race learns to breed for quality instead of quantity. Though couched in pseudo-scholarly form, this is eugenic propaganda rather than a scientific study. Population is a fascinating subject which will continue to attract dogmas until the interplay of biology, psychology, and economics is better understood than at present.

"Post-War Markets," edited by E. Jay Howenstine (Public Affairs Press, $2.50). National production at near-capacity implies a vast increase in average incomes as compared with pre-war years and a new pattern of spending. Using the well-known studies of S. Morris Livingstone and other economists associated with the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, the compilers of this book discuss the meaning of this change in terms of the distribution problems of leading industries.

Letters to the Editors

Room for the Jews?

Dear Sirs: The gentleman from Georgia feels a momentary qualm concerning the refugee Jewish problem. The gentleman also displays a willingness to tolerate the entrance of the Jews provided they are settled in some section quite remote from his immediate vicinity. Give them Arizona, certainly, but Georgia? I seem to remember large sections of that state as quite thinly populated not so very long ago. Just so that there may be no accusation of the pot calling the kettle black I hasten to add that there are large sections of California thinly populated also. B. F. STEVENS, SR.

Antioch, Cal., November 22

Objection

Dear Sirs: In your issue of November 10 Ernest M. Whitefish of Canon, Georgia, proposes that Arizona be opened to the refugee Jews of Europe. May I point out several serious difficulties involved in such a project. (1) The land of Arizona belongs to the people now there just as the land in Georgia belongs to the Georgians. (2) Assuming that this difficulty could be overcome and all the Jews actually settled in Arizona, they would eventually become American citizens and as such could leave this state and locate in any other. They would thus assume their two-thousand-year role as parasites among other people—as they have been, for example, in Europe.

GEORGE WILLIAMS

Clarkston, Wash., November 18

Joseph Freeman's G. I.'s

Dear Sirs: Joseph Freeman's America's Homesick Army, particularly Part II, gives a highly misleading impression of the G. I. To believe Mr. Freeman, the American soldier is a shining example of democratic virtues, a roving man of freedom who spreads the gospel wherever he goes. It makes a very pretty picture, but it just isn't true.

This view is more than misleading; it is dangerous, because if we accept Mr. Freeman's picture, we may lose sight of the vast job that needs to be done in constantly orienting the G. I.—or future civilian—to a militantly anti-fascist point of view.

Before the publicity on Belsen and Buchenwald hit the papers, it was almost impossible to make G. I.'s believe Nazis behaved that way. They dismissed all such stories as "propaganda." Their attitude was much the same toward all army efforts to present the facts of international life—Lend-Lease, for example, or the importance of unity among the Allies.

Mr. Freeman and other writers glibly suggest an army education program as the answer for the overseas G. I.'s attitudes. We need to recognize that the problem is much deeper and needs more radical methods of treatment. If the G. I. had to see a concentration camp before he understood the nature of Nazism, our country has failed miserably in explaining the issues of the war.

CPL. SIGMUND SHLAKMAN

Brooklyn, November 14

How It Came About

Dear Sirs: It wasn't a very long story, and it was hidden halfway down the column. It said that several generals had luncheon on the first Liberty ship in Manila which had been converted to carry troops back to the States. Three-star, two-star generals, some colonels, including a Lieutenant Colonel Davidson, and some others were present.

At first it didn't seem so strange. But it was ironic when you thought about it.

As everyone knew, high-point men—eighty and ninety pointers—had been waiting for weeks in the replacement camps, waiting for these ships that never came in. Perhaps it was only a coincidence that on that very day—Navy Day—most of the major fleet units of the navy were tied up and tidied up in the big ports in the States. The navy was proud, and rightly so.

As everyone knew, too, cargo ships had left Manila for the States empty—even with a few empty berths on some. Then one day about two weeks before, some soldiers talked to this Colonel Davidson. He was in a position to know. He said that a Liberty could be made into a transport in forty-eight hours, with fifty men to do the job. Next day the army paper printed the story. Now that put the Colonel on the spot in a way. Obviously his superiors didn't think well of the idea or they would have ordered it done. In fact, the Colonel didn't know his statements would appear in public print, and he had some uneasy moments.

Then the letters started pouring in to the paper that printed the story. They were unanimous in their praise for the Colonel. Men volunteered in writing by the hundreds to work on the conversion of the ships—even after doing a full day's work. Very soon the War Department authorized conversion, provided certain minimum standards for troop comfort were met. So the volunteers' offer was accepted, and here the first job was done.

That's how it came about that the generals had luncheon on the Liberty ship, the Otto Mears. The generals probably didn't realize it—at least the paper gave no indication—but actually that meal was a testimony to Colonel Davidson, even if all the enlisted men weren't present to say so. That day the pièce de résistance was crow. SOLDIER

Manila, October 28

GET THE FACTS!
PALESTINE YEAR BOOK

Never before has there been a comprehensive presentation of valuable facts about Palestine in a single volume! Whether you write, speak on world affairs, or are just interested, this is the book you need! Just published and fact-packed with 532 pages of up-to-date information and data about Palestine. $3.50

Free 19"x27" AUTHENTIC MAP OF PALESTINE!

Included with PALESTINE YEARBOOK is a detached map, precise and up-to-date. Fits into handy pocket in back of volume.

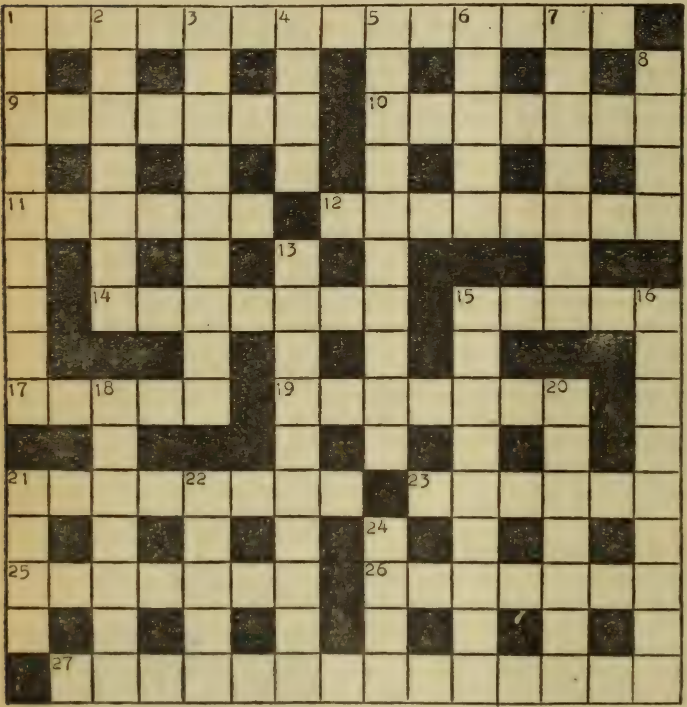
AT YOUR BOOK DEALER OR ORDER FROM:

BOOK DEPT., Zionist Org. of Amer.
1720 SIXTEENTH ST.
WASHINGTON 9, D. C.
Please send me the PALESTINE YEARBOOK. Check for $3.50 enclosed. I understand that I am to receive a 19"x27" map without charge.

Name ....
Address ....
City ....
Zone .... State N-1

Crossword Puzzle No. 138

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 We like to think of ships' captains giving their engine rooms this order, but actually they never do (three words, 4, 5, 5)
9 Due in N.M. (anag.)
10 A fan whose "vote" we would be glad to have 11 Sings Swiss style
12 Hanky-panky, skullduggery, or jiggery-pokery
14 One kind of table
15 Italian composer whose Goodbye was a song hit in its day
17 Quick! Think of a number! This may be it!
19 Cattle pens originally made by immigrants with wagons
21 Only two of Fido's feet, though it sounds like all four 23 "Ale, sir?" (anag.)
25 Clearly shows a vice den
26 Old 2F demands double
27 Those of an economical turn of mind might be presented at Court in these (two words, 8 & 6)

DOWN

1 Average age of an oyster when eaten (two words, 4 & 5)
2 Do help one over a stile! (two words, 4 & 3)
3 Lone playing-card with an undershirt on 4 There's one alternative to having it dyed, and this is it
5 Though not a Victorian young lady, she may prefer old-fashioned cocktails (two words, 6 & 4)
6 "Cry '-----,' and let slip the dogs of war"
7 The man's entirely absorbed in songs of praise, it seems
8 "From morn To noon he fell, from noon to ---- eve"
13 This eight-legged, ebon-hued relict may be all right, but we prefer a Merry one, personally (two words, 5 & 5)
15 We never saw the batrachian in question sitting on one, except in an illustration
16 Parisian hospital?
18 I go green—one of those dizzy spells, you know?
20 Meerschaum was once supposed to be made from it (two words, 3 & 4)
21 Oh, run away!
22 Fancy putting a fast horse in crape!
24 Button that's not easily collared

* * *

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 137

ACROSS:—1 PSHAW; 6 ENTER; 9 ALADDIN; 10 NOVEL; 11 INURE; 12 KIPPERS; 16 HUNTER; 19 OLD BOY; 22 WRONGDOER; 23 ISLE; 24 AWAY; 25 ARCH; 26 YEGG; 27 TREK; 29 OVID; 30 EVOCATION; 33 SWEDES; 35 ENSUES; 38 ESPOUSE; 41 USHER; 42 MIAMI; 43 EMPORIA; 44 TIRED; 45 NIECE.

DOWN:—1 PINCH; 2 HAVEN; 3 WALKER; 4 RAMP; 5 ADZE; 6 ENISLE; 7 THUMB; 8 REEDY; 13 IRON CROSS; 14 PAGE; 15 ROOKERIES; 17 UNSCREW; 18 TWEAKED; 20 DRAGONS; 21 OPALINE; 28 FARO; 31 VEERED; 32 ONE MAN; 33 SOULT; 34 ETHER; 36 USAGE; 37 SEINE; 39 PAPA; 40 URRY.

RESORTS

EXCELLENT HUNTING on Our PRIVATE PRESERVE

28 miles of beautiful private trails. Also — excellent fishing on our private 7½-mile lake. Golf, hiking, game rooms, cocktail lounge, dancing, really fine food . . . congenial atmosphere. Open year 'round.

Only 51 Miles from New York.

The Glenmere

CHESTER, N. Y. Chester 200 (N.Y.) RE 2-5847

The Fieldstone

On Round Island Lake

A place of unexcelled beauty for rest and relaxation. One hour from New York. All Sports.

CLOSED — REOPENS DECEMBER 21st

MONROE, N. Y. Phone 7965

50 MI. FROM NEW YORK

MAMANASCO Lake Lodge

A Resort Estate of unmatched beauty. Ideal for winter rest and recreation. Write or phone Ridgefield, Conn. 820.

HATHAWAY SKI LODGE

OPEN ALL YEAR

Formerly the palatial 592-acre Macy estate in the beautiful "Hills of the Sky." Large, luxurious rooms, many with open fireplaces and private porches. Winding Mountain Trails. Ski Tow. 700-foot Ski Slope. Delicious food. Easy transportation.

Attractive Winter Rates

For reservations or further information write or call

HATHAWAY LODGE, Haines Falls, N. Y.

Telephone: Tannersville 299

The Rein House

Lake Mohegan 42 Miles from N. Y.

FOR REST AND RELAXATION

Skating in season on our beautiful lake estate. Horseback Riding nearby. Hunting. Steam-heated. Delicious Food. Reasonable. Informal. Accommodation By Reservation Only. Dietary Laws.

Mrs. M. F. Rein Tel. Peekskill 1747-J

SAMUEL SCHAFER

"A Country Retreat With Homelike Atmosphere"

45 miles from N. Y.

TEL.: HIGHLAND MILLS 3071

CENTRAL VALLEY NEW YORK

OAKWOOD

NEW WINDSOR, N. Y. Newburgh 4477

Delightful...skating on private lake. Open fireplaces.

Different...the colonial atmosphere.

Delicious...our unexcelled cuisine.

Diverting...recordings for listening & dancing.

All this only 53 miles from New York City

A Resort for Adults Only

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

JAN 14

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 161 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • DECEMBER 15, 1945 NUMBER 24

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 645

EDITORIALS

Harold Laski 647
Labor Says No 648
Aid to Britain 649

ARTICLES

Plan or Perish by Harold J. Laski 650
America's Case at Nürnberg by Peter de Mendelssohn 652
Conflict in Latin America by Manuel Seoane 654
The Italian Crisis by Leo Valiani 656
The Wisconsin Riddle by Carey McWilliams 657
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison 659
The People's Front by Del Vayo 660

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Greece—The E. A. M. White Book by L. S. Stavrianos 661
Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall 664
Briefer Comment 666
Art by Clement Greenberg 669
Records by B. H. Haggin 669
Books in Short 670

LETTERS TO EDITORS 671

CROSSWORD PUZZLE NO. 139 by Jack Barrett 672

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor J. KING GORDON
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL
Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]
European Editor: J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO
Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON
Director of Nation Associates
LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS
CAREY MCWILLIAMS REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

THE MEETING AT MOSCOW OF THE THREE Foreign Ministers was long overdue, but it offers a last chance to clear out some of the obstacles dividing the great powers before the United Nations Assembly meets in January. The problem of the atomic bomb, political conflicts stretching from China and Japan to the Balkans, the difficulties in the way of unified control in Germany—these are only a few of the items which doubtless appear on the agenda confronting the conferees. The report from Washington that Mr. Byrnes wants to limit the talks to a week is disturbing. Unless unprecedented preparations have been made through diplomatic channels, the work cannot be crowded into a short meeting. The three Ministers face the absolute necessity of achieving agreement on major issues before they toss them into the unready lap of the UNO.

*

THE FRIENDS OF THE SPANISH REPUBLIC HAVE requested Secretary Byrnes to place the question of Spain on the agenda of the Moscow meeting with a view to obtaining severance of diplomatic relations with Franco and assurance that recognition will be granted only to a democratic Spanish Republican government. The Nation wholeheartedly joins in this demand. The issue has grown even more acute in recent weeks since the extent of Nazi entrenchment there has been fully exposed. It is high time for the Big Three to translate the resolutions of San Francisco and Potsdam regarding Fascist Spain into effective action.

*

UNDAUNTED BY SUCCESSIVE SPANKINGS FROM Byron Price, General Eisenhower, and Secretary Byrnes, the French government remains grimly determined to block any move toward centralization of the German economy until at least a provisional settlement of the Rhineland question is achieved. Thus thanks to the veto given at Potsdam to each of the four powers on the Allied Control Council, no progress can be made in carrying out an important part of the Potsdam program, and the danger of Germany's complete economic collapse is enhanced. The position of the French government is backed, as usual, with a certain logic. Exclusion of General de Gaulle from Potsdam—though no country had a greater stake than his in the future of Germany—made it possible to leave the question of the western frontiers of the Reich in the air. The French government's thesis is that the destiny of the Ruhr and Rhineland must be decided before steps are taken to reorganize the political and economic life of Germany. If the resources of the Ruhr are left to the Reich, many Frenchmen fear Germany will recover its power to wage aggressive war. Therefore they wish to see the Ruhr internationalized and an independent state under the protection of the Western European powers set up on the left bank of the Rhine. If such a plan were carried out, the Central German rump, cut away from its richest provinces east and west, would collapse economically or break up into several small states able to exist only by becoming clients of one or another of the powers. For different reasons the French solution is opposed in whole or part by America, Britain, and Russia; nor has it the full support of the French left. But it is a solution of sorts for a problem which the Big Three have dodged up to now, and in insisting upon its discussion General de Gaulle has a strong case. It seems to us that Mr. Byrnes is unwise in threatening to "by-pass" France by centralizing transport and currency agencies in the American, British, and Russian zones. Instead, he should urge prompt decision on the issues raised by the French so that Germany's economy can be organized within the framework of a definite political settlement.

*

PATRICK J. HURLEY APPARENTLY BELIEVES THAT if he yells loud enough someone is bound to believe his scurrilous charges against State Department personnel. In his appearance before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee he singled out two of the most responsible and conscientious of the State Department career men for attack. His case against George Atcheson, Jr., chief political adviser to General MacArthur, proved to rest on nothing more than the fact that Mr. Atcheson, through proper channels, recommended a policy with which Hurley did not agree. His venomous accusations against John S. Service proved to have even less basis, since Hurley was not ambassador when Service filed the memorandum to General Stilwell to which Hurley took such violent objection. Hurley's refusal to produce the offending document suggests that Service may have accurately analyzed the pitfalls in the policy which the fiery Ambassador subsequently followed. In any event, it is clear that both officials were merely carrying out their assigned duties. Neither is even charged with failing to carry out Mr. Hurley's directives. Fortunately, Secretary Byrnes refused to be stampeded by General Hurley's fireworks and rallied to the defense of the accused officials with a forceful statement. At the same time, we are glad to note that while Mr. Byrnes declared for continued support of the Chungking government as "the most satisfactory base for a developing democracy," he did emphasize the importance of using our influence to secure a broadening of that regime.

*

WHERE IS BRITAIN'S COLONIAL POLICY HEADED? An extremely well-informed, friendly critic of the Labor government insists that we may expect a considerable improvement over the Churchill policy. We have yet to see a glimmer of light in that direction. A test of British colonial intentions came last week when the UNO Preparatory Commission voted to broaden and safeguard the right of subject peoples to petition the UNO for a hearing on grievances against administering powers. Mr. Bevin's earlier declaration that Britain was ready to surrender part of its national sovereignty in the interest of international peace might have led one to believe that no objection would be made to this modicum of international supervision of territories over which Britain exercises trusteeship but not sovereignty. But the British delegation voted against the proposal, with the Americans abstaining and the Russians voting in favor. Another indication that even first steps toward modifying Britain's colonial policy have yet to be taken is the protracted retention of egregious colonial autocrats like Sir Reginald Dorman-Smith, Governor General of Burma. The only encouraging note has been the decision of the Labor M. P.'s to ask Mr. Bevin for a truce in Indonesia, to be followed by a Dutch-Indonesian conciliation conference in London under UNO supervision. While there is some danger that such a conference may impose a British, hence colonial, solution of the Indonesian problem, it is a marked improvement over previous suggestions from responsible British quarters.

*

DURING THE WAR THE ESCORT CARRIER CROATAN did its duty patrolling the submarine lanes of the Atlantic. It pioneered night flying on CVE's, sank many a U-boat. In the service it became affectionately known as "Old Crow." When the new redeployment program was set up to get the troops home fast from Europe, the Croatan was the first of the flat-tops to enter Le Havre. It was immediately confronted with a problem, in the eyes of its officers, more perilous to the American way of life than Nazi submarines. One hundred and twenty-three veterans of the campaigns in France, Belgium, and Germany stood waiting to embark. They were Negroes. The officers of the carrier, deciding there were not proper facilities for segregation, refused—over strenuous Army protests—to take them aboard. We are glad this action has not escaped the notice of higher naval authorities or of the American people. Old Crow, forsooth! Old Jim Crow!

*

BRAZIL'S PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION SHOWS HOW hard it is to move from dictatorship to democracy in one jump. The returns are incomplete as we go to press, but the outcome is clear. General Dutra, former Minister of War, the Vargas-backed candidate, is maintaining a two-to-one lead over his nearest opponent, General Gomes. The National Democratic Union, which supported Gomes, has not yet conceded his defeat, perhaps out of reluctance to admit that its prediction of a Gomes sweep was so wide of the mark. But on election eve every observer, Brazilian and foreign, picked Gomes as the winner. A man of strong nationalist conviction, Gomes has been consistently pro-Ally, but his personality and record are not such as to excite enthusiasm on the left. An almost excessive puritanism led him to devote a large part of his campaign to attacks on gambling and sexual immorality. He said relatively little about the process of nazification that went on unchecked in Brazil during the entire pre-war period of Vargas's rule or about the fascist character of the regime itself. As for Dutra, he boasts a decoration presented to him by Hitler in May, 1940, for "valuable services rendered to Germany by Brazil." As Minister of War he issued frequent warnings about the menace of communism while maintaining a discreet silence on the subject of fascism. In the election Dutra had the backing of large clerical groups, fascist sympathizers, ultra-conservatives, and the openly fascist Integralistas. Taken together, these interests formed the solid reactionary underpinning of the Vargas regime, which now promises to survive in a new guise and with impressive legal sanctions.

*

IF THE UNITED STATES AVOIDS A POST-WAR inflation such as overwhelmed the country in 1919 and 1920, Chester A. Bowles will deserve a major share of the credit. Speaking before the National Association of Manufacturers and other business groups, Mr. Bowles pulled no punches. He insisted that some price controls might have to continue after next June 30. Nor did he hesitate to point out to the N. A. M. that consumers have saved $66 billion by rejecting its price-control recommendations. The proposal that controls be dropped he attacked as a threat to the success of the entire free-enterprise system. And in reply to the accusation that the OPA was "ruining" business, he presented figures to show that in no period of our history have business profits been so large and business failures so few. With the inflationary threat far greater than at any time during the war, Mr. Bowles deserves more support than he has been getting from labor, consumers, and the general public. Sometimes it has looked as if the OPA Administrator were waging a one-man battle.

*

"WE ARE NO DIFFERENT FROM THE LABORING men of Great Britain," said William Green to a group of Representatives last week, "When driven to desperation we too will turn to the left." Which drove our house poet to this:

When cockle shells
Turn silver bells
We'll only shake our head;
We'll see real cause
For ohs and ahs
When William Green turns red.

*

ON THE NEW YORK HOUSING FRONT LAST week's shenanigans were strange ones indeed. The crisis is not only developing into a scandal but—as might have been expected—into a political football, with Governor Dewey, Mayor LaGuardia, and Mayor-elect O'Dwyer competing for the headlines. General O'Dwyer's emergency committee on housing started to function under the competent but irascible chairmanship of Robert Moses. The first day's hearing was highlighted by at least two "incidents"—Joseph Platzker, city Housing Commissioner, stormed out of the meeting when Mr. Moses urged him to cut his testimony short; and Charles G. Bolté, chairman of the American Veterans' Committee, first expressed his surprise at being removed from the committee and then, when he read O'Dwyer's campaign promise to do everything possible to provide temporary housing for veterans, was informed by Mr. Moses that the committee "was not interested in political promises." Mr. Bolté's removal from the committee is a neat example of the pressures, under which the new mayor will have to work: Bolté was appointed presumably because the A. V. C. has done the most to dramatize the housing shortage facing veterans, and was then removed without explanation but probably as a result of pressure from the American Legion which has done nothing about housing. Mr. Moses and the committee in general, which is composed largely of real estate and building-industry representatives, showed their distaste for temporary housing throughout the hearings, although none of them advanced any other workable solution. Not much can be expected from the committee's recommendations; it will be up to General O'Dwyer to make good his pledge whether the committee favors temporary housing or not.

Harold Laski

IT WOULD take space to analyze fully the unique talent for infuriating his political opponents which Harold Laski's recent visit to the United States demonstrated anew. Witnessing the reactions of the American right wing, from its outermost fanatic pinfeathers to the solid Republican scapular, one realized to what an impressive degree Laski has assumed for these groups the ominous shape of things to come. The Holy Name pickets marching up and down Broadway in front of the Astor on the night of The Nation's dinner, with their placards denouncing Laski and proclaiming "Franco Saved Spain from Communism," offered crude but revealing evidence of the potency of our guest of honor. More significant has been the barrage of editorial and radio comment that followed his speech, some serious but most of it aimed at exorcising the Laski spector by denunciation or ridicule.

The final and perfect tribute, however, came from the Republican Party chairman, Herbert Brownell, who announced in an address last Saturday at the close of the two-day conference of the Republican National Committee that Harold Laski had drawn the fundamental issue for the next political campaign in the United States. Admitting that "not all Democrats agree with Mr. Laski," Brownell insisted none the less that the views of the Labor Party chairman on free enterprise represent the position the Republicans must fight. And he officially proposed a new ten-point Republican program as an alternative to "the Laski or left-wing Democrat solution" of national and world problems. Mr. Hannegan and most of his party associates must be somewhat taken aback at finding themselves in the same political boat with the distinguished British Socialist, while the actual left-wing groups of this country, including those C. I. O. leaders who until yesterday solidly supported the Administration, will be no less astonished. For American labor has joined the Administration in frequent and, we believe, sincere obeisances to the gods of free enterprise.

But Mr. Brownell's statement is silly only on the surface. Underlying currents in America push in the direction he indicates, and the fears his words reveal are based on a sound instinct of self-preservation. One may dispute or agree with Laski's detailed analysis of the world situation; but who can question his deeper assumption that the tendency of capitalist society, faced with the threat of its own imminent breakdown, has been to seek refuge first in fascism and then in war? It was this tendency that led through the Spanish debacle to Munich and the final collapse of collective security. Today the United States remains the last fairly secure retreat of free enterprise, and even here the struggle against collective controls is reaching the stage of open warfare. No wonder the Republican chairman looks upon Laski as a bird of ill-omen. It would be a good thing if some of those "left-wing Democrats" he talks about would consider with equal attention the long-range portent of Harold Laski's words.

Labor Says No

THE application of impartial fact-finding to major national labor disputes as a final step in a series of procedures to avert strikes has been strongly urged by The Nation. Where collective bargaining has broken down through failure of one side or the other to disclose the economic facts at issue or through failure to agree on their implications, the fairest and most effective recourse is to get the facts laid before the people and the people's representatives. The legislative plan put forward by the President ostensibly seeks to achieve that objective. Word of it reached us just as we were locking up the forms on last week's issue. The report mentioned only the proposal for the creation of emergency fact-finding boards; so much of the plan The Nation indorsed then and subscribes to now.

An examination of the whole message, however, reveals, together with the indefensible suggestion that the General Motors strike be called off, a covey of unfair and probably unworkable provisions that contaminate the basic principle of the scheme. We do not agree with C. I. O. President Murray that the plan had the malicious intent of destroying unions. It appears to us much more likely to have been the product of bad handling and woeful ignorance of the facts of labor life. To charge the President with crass incomprehension may, indeed, be worse than to accuse him of wilful labor-smashing, but it seems a more accurate indictment.

The first and most incredible fact about the message is that it was composed at the White House without any detailed advice from Secretary Schwellenbach or any consultation whatsoever with those whom it principally affected, the labor unions. Philip Murray and William Green, even if they had not been able to go along with it, could have pointed out important technical flaws which could have been corrected without destroying the essential purport of the plan. And they could have produced compelling arguments against some of its basic provisions. As it was, the unions were slapped in the face, without warning or a gesture to bolster their prestige, with the most important labor decision of the Administration. Even in his days of greatest vindictiveness toward John L. Lewis, Mr. Roosevelt never treated him with such lack of consideration.

The President's appeal to the General Motors strikers to return to their jobs at once, and the fact that this too was issued without consulting Murray or Thomas or Reuther, are taken by the C. I. O. as conclusive proof that the whole message was in bad faith. A novice in the labor field would know that a strike as huge and involved as that at G. M. cannot be called off by pressing a button, even if the pressure is applied by the finger of the President of the United States. He cannot end such a strike, but his appeal can weaken it, take the heart out of it. It would require more philosophy than anyone has a right to expect from the leader of a life-or-death strike for him to interpret the back-to-work pleas as anything but a device to smash the union's cause.

Mr. Truman's suggestion that the proposed legislation be patterned after the Railway Labor Act was infuriating to labor. Unions hold that the act does nothing more than apply a freeze, tolerable in the railway industry where collective bargaining is firmly established and where the industry operates under strict federal control, but impossible in competitive, unregulated, and less highly organized fields. The proposal that strikes be made unlawful during a thirty-day period is an alarming restriction on the use of labor's ultimate weapon. It might be a "fair" quid pro quo for labor's demand that industry books be subpoenaed and opened. But it is needless and dangerous. A fact-finding system is perfectly feasible which provides for certification of a major dispute before the existing contract expires. The facts can be found and the recommendations made while the workers are still at their jobs—inhibited from striking by their own contract, not by outside legal compulsion. If the recommendations are adopted, there will be no strike. If the recommendations are not acceptable, or do not provide the facts on which collective bargaining can be resumed, there will be a strike. The same would be true under the President's scheme but with one all-important exception: under the proposed legislation the union cannot choose its time to strike and it thus loses half the power of its weapon. This, in fact, is labor's principal objection to the entire plan.

A technical but important flaw in the Administration proposal is the provision for a multitude of ad hoc boards, one for each case. This system permits no continuity or consistency. One board may grant severance pay, another deny it. Boards may differ on whether to consider anticipated production or ability to pay. A single agency operating on the organization pattern of the War Labor Board would be much more rational.

To complete the picture of labor gloom, the question of Congressional action is raised. Until the Smith-Connally act, President Roosevelt prevented the passage of anti-labor legislation—eagerly pressed by a strong majority of Congress during the last years—by refusing to send any labor legislation, even good bills, to Capitol Hill. He knew that Administration sponsorship of a labor bill would be only the fuse to an explosion; that Congress would tuck the ball under its arm and run in the opposite direction; that at best it would use the original blueprints for a house as the plans on which to build a jail. It is certain that Congress will attempt to do the same thing now, and it may well succeed. Mr. Truman had to take steps to establish disputes machinery, but was it essential that he turn the job over to Congress? Has he not the power to set up by executive order the necessary fact-finding instruments and procedures, and would not such action have been sufficient to head off legislation originating in Congress? There are no sure answers to these questions, but it would appear that Mr. Truman did not even think about them.

Aid to Britain

SCANNING the sheaf of documents which are the fruit of the Anglo-American financial and trade discussions, one begins to understand why these talks were so protracted. For these two joint statements and the financial agreement represent an attempt to square the complicated accounts of war, to provide means for underpinning Britain's shaky financial structure, and to construct a blueprint for world-wide cooperation in establishing an economy of expansion. The negotiators were forced to cover a broad range of very intricate problems, and they deserve congratulations for completing their journey as expeditiously as they have.

In the short space of an editorial it is obviously impossible to summarize these documents, still less to analyze their provisions. However, before the Anglo-American financial agreement becomes effective, we expect to publish a number of articles examining it and the related documents in detail and dealing with the many arguments pro and con which they are bound to evoke. Meanwhile we may note that this agreement provides for an open credit to Britain, to be drawn upon within the next five years, of $3,750,000,000. Until 1951 no interest will be charged, but thereafter Britain will pay off the loan in annual instalments representing both principle and interest at the rate of 2 per cent per annum. The purpose of this credit is to facilitate purchases in the United States and to assist Britain to "meet transitional post-war deficits in its current balance of payments" and "to assume the obligations of multilateral trade."

Connected with this second aim is a joint statement on commercial policy in which the governments of both countries subscribe to proposals drafted by the State Department for the expansion of world trade and employment. These proposals are to be placed before a special international conference in the course of next year. Their importance in relation to the financial agreement is that their indorsement by Britain constitutes a pledge to collaborate with the United States in reducing trade barriers, restricting cartel operations, and removing other obstacles to international commerce.

Another joint statement sets forth agreed principles for winding up Lend-Lease and Reciprocal Aid, for the settlement of mutual claims rising out of the war, and for the disposal of surplus American property in the United Kingdom. This involves the wiping out of all American claims for materials actually consumed in the course of the war but leaves the United States with the right to recapture Lend-Lease articles still in possession of the British armed forces. Including payment for Lend-Lease supplies furnished since V-J Day, Britain acknowledges a net debt of $650 million, which, apparently, is to be financed through the Export-Import Bank.

Taking this item into account, therefore, Britain is to receive in goods and credit a total of $4,400,000,000. The difference between this figure and the sum of $5 to $6 billion, either in the form of a grant-in-aid or an interest-free loan, for which the British asked in September is one measure of the "toughness" shown by the American representatives at the conference. Examination of the "waiver clause" of the financial agreement, shows the results of this toughness in a more subtle form. This clause provides, in effect that Britain's minimum import needs shall, in the event of a serious strain on its foreign-exchange resources, have priority over interest on the American credit. But in making this important concession our negotiators were most careful to include safeguards against its abuse. Thus before Britain can request a waiver of interest from the United States in any year, its other creditors must agree to a similar moratorium. Further, the necessity of such a step, in the light of Britain's balance-of-payments position, must be certificated by the International Monetary Fund, in which a majority of the votes will be controlled by the United States together with Britain's other creditors.

In spite of the extreme care which has been taken to protect American interests, the agreement with Britain is bound to be hotly attacked from many angles. Before Congress decides whether or not it will make the necessary appropriations, the Anglophobes will enjoy a field day exploiting widespread public ignorance of the realities of international economics. Nor is the agreement assured of an easy passage through the British Parliament. Over here we may consider that Uncle Sam is being excessively generous, but many Britons see him as taking advantage of their country's weakened condition to drive an extremely hard bargain.

The immediate gains offered to the United States by this agreement include the early relaxation of British exchange controls, the liquidation of the sterling area's dollar pool, so far as current transactions are concerned, and the prospect of a settlement of Britain's huge sterling debts —a mass of congealed purchasing power which, gradually released, can provide an important stimulus to world commerce. More important in the longer view is the fact that the proposed credit will place Britain in a position to cooperate with this country in reconstructing international trade on a non-discriminatory basis. The day of American isolation and economic self-sufficiency is gone forever; our prosperity in the years ahead will depend increasingly on ability to buy and sell internationally. But without the participation of Britain, the world's greatest market, no universal economic system could possibly be achieved.

The $3 billion credit to Britain, together with other loans from the dominions, will give it a chance to rebuild its foreign trade on multilateral lines. Denied aid, it would have no alternative but to organize the countries dependent on it politically and economically into a tight trading bloc. It would have to resort to every kind of device to insure the flow of imports without which it cannot exist, carefully matching purchases against sales and controlling and restricting the use of sterling even more rigidly than during the war.

The most tragic consequence of such a development would be political. A sterling bloc would inevitably lead to the formation of a dollar bloc, and economic rivalry between the two would speedily disintegrate the partnership that carried us through the war. The schism would splinter the United Nations Organization and thrust the world back into a more vicious anarchy than it has ever before experienced. It is in the light of such perspectives that our legislators must ponder the agreement. We look to them to be statesmen, not hucksters.

Plan or Perish

BY HAROLD J. LASKI

[The chairman of the British Labor Party delivered the following address at the dinner which concluded the Nation Associates' three-day forum in New York on The Challenge of the Atomic Bomb.]

I HOPE I may be regarded as an old friend of The Nation. May I build upon that friendship to begin with some personal words? I have come back, after six years of grim and agonizing conflict, to an America which has put me, for more than half my life, under immense obligation in the two great realms of intellect and of friendship. I am bound to begin by paying my homage to the great part that the United States has played in the organization of military victory; I hope I may live to pay a deeper homage to a great nation which makes the victory in war the prelude to victory in peace. For I suspect that all of us now recognize that military victory is an opportunity and not a fulfilment. That at least was understood by that supreme friend of democracy and freedom, Franklin Delano Roosevelt. We in Britain think of him as the outstanding American architect of what may become, given the will on our part, a better and a happier world. If that new world be built, I venture the prophesy that no name will be held in deeper reverence than his. You may have your differences with this or that item of his policies, as we in Europe have had our differences with Mr. Churchill or with Generalissimo Stalin. That does not prevent our realization that our own stature is measured by the respect we pay them. They have added a noble chapter to the history of mankind. They have given us the chance to find the secret of freedom.

But the will to use the chance before us is the pre-condition of discovering the secret. We have to make great decisions. We have to make them on the understanding that the life and death of our civilization hang upon the wisdom of our choice; boundaries, frontiers, tariffs, the ignoble imagination which associates the greatness of a state with the neutral massiveness of its power—all these seem mean and petty issues upon which to dispute before the central issue is decided. Three men hurriedly improvising a formula in a room screened from the public view cannot be accepted by any of us as having the title to decide our fate. Not even a commission of eminent specialists acting under the authority of the United Nations Organization can have that title. It is for the common people in every land to share in the shaping of their own destiny. If we proceed from any other premise than this, the victory is thrown away because the cause for which it has been fought is lost.

What follows from this premise? First, there can be no secrecy; if the common people are to decide, the full materials for decision must be made known. Secondly, there must be no blackmail of the scientist into an enforced silence; those who seek to break the international community of scientists and men of learning prostitute knowledge to the service of power. Thirdly, in the exploration of this new realm of awe-inspiring possibility, the claim of private interest to own or control materials or processes would be to impose new chains of servitude upon mankind. Adam Smith's "simple system of natural liberty," now, as I gather, in special repute in the United States, is, in this realm, the direct road to serfdom. We know the evil and the pain which were the price of the first and minor industrial revolution. No one can be forgiven who permits its repetition on a far greater scale by making the second and major industrial revolution a means to a deeper division of society into the few who know all the gain of living and the many who know nothing but its toil. Let us say explicitly what needs to be said: every implication of this discovery means planned internationalism, economic, social, political. It is an international discovery. The planning of its application has been international. The organization of its future use must be international also.

There is no nation state fit to be trusted with the development of atomic energy. There is no private interest working for profit to whom its future could be safely confided. Were this new realm to be controlled by generals or admirals, business men or professional administrators, it would become a kingdom of despair and not of hope. If anyone here tells me that the world is not ready for an international democratic government, there are at least two answers of final import. Who is responsible for that unreadiness if not the little, grasping plutocracy which has for so long made its private gain the chief end of human effort? From Amos and Hosea, through Rousseau and Jefferson, through Ruskin and Marx, through Morris and Tolstoy, that has been the single verdict of the prophet. Who is prepared to believe that this same little grasping plutocracy will undergo now a swift change of heart? The evidence is grimly unmistakable that it pays to mankind no other homage than the promises it makes in times of crisis, which it withdraws when the moment of danger is past.

I know of nothing so decisive as a judgment upon the men whose invisible empires have so largely shaped national policies as that we should stand in terror before a discovery whose peaceful development promises a future of abundance to mankind. We all think of it as a weapon of death. Already every nation prepares, through its government, to equip itself with the power to hurl death upon its fellow-nations. No people seeks that power; it is governments that seek it. They seek it because we live under a system by which the many are exploited by the few, and war is the ultimate sanction of that exploitation. War is the outcome of the exercise by governments of unlimited sovereignty. Unlimited sovereignty is essential to the preservation of those legal relations which subdue all human behavior to their service. We shall get rid of war as we get rid of those legal relations and the evil power politics they involve. We shall not get rid of it on any other terms.

The League of Nations failed because there was lacking the will to make it work. The Kellogg Pact failed because, there too, that will was lacking. We have seen governments watch with indifference the destruction of freedom in country after country because they were unwilling to pay the price the social process exacts to preserve freedom. I am not proud of the British record in the evil years of appeasement; I have a deep sense of guilt when I see the tragic spectacle of Spain. I do not think the ordinary citizen of Great Britain thought that the war was being fought to return, under any pretext, the Indonesian peoples to the sovereignty of Holland, or to organize the conditions upon which an evil social system shall be imposed in the name of law and order upon the peoples of Southeastern Europe—peoples who for the first time since the break-up of the Roman Empire see the faint dawn of hope. And let me add for myself that I accept as the acid test of the bona fides of the Labor government of Great Britain that it shall not merely declare its desire to see a free and self-governing India, but shall organize the conditions necessary to the fulfilment of its desire without the wish to delay an outcome so clearly inevitable.

If we want freedom, we must have peace. If we are to have peace, it is not enough to will its advent on the formal plane of empty desire. We must organize the conditions which make it to the interest of nation states to put war outside the frame of reference within which human impulses operate. That means that sovereignty must go; that means, also, that the interests which sovereignty protects must be recognized as outmoded in character and dangerous in operation. Just as the feudal system had to go, so the system by which the business man has made the commonwealth an unhappy dependency of the market economy has outlived its usefulness. It is clear to any honest observer that a society dominated by business men could not be trusted to create the mental climate in which the development of atomic energy would be confined within the framework of peace. They would not give the common people education because they fear its outcome. It is the business men who have split our society into two, the political society and the economic society. They have made the policeman the sanction of the first and the threat of starvation the sanction of the second. There is only one country in the world today where this dichotomy has been transcended. There is only one country, also, where science and technology can be developed without sacrificing the education of man and risking the breakdown of social well-being or community consciousness. It is significant that only in the new world of Russia has the business man ceased to count. It is also significant that one of the major preoccupations of the great vested interests is now to keep the "secret"—which is no secret—from the knowledge of Russia. You know the result—a halt to confidence and the rise of ugly suspicion about a third world war.

The first condition of peace is to subordinate a market economy to the claims of peace. It would be a bold step to take; the alternative is to permit the business man to fix the criteria by which the future of atomic discovery is determined. To do that in an age of political democracy is to force the contradiction between a society depending upon the elevation of human dignity and a society depending upon human peonage to develop to the point of conflict. The one searches for new standards of behavior, for a new education, and therefore for an ethics of life and not an ethics of death. The other needs that "beneficent private war," the law of the economic jungle, which is afraid of the democratization of knowledge, anxious for an ethics of death, eager to make leisure cheap and trivial instead of full and creative. It is not accident that our schools and colleges, our universities and foundations, even the churches, are the instruments of big business. It is not accident that the press is now a branch of big business too. It would be madness to let the purposes or the methods of private enterprise set the habits of the age of atomic energy. For those habits would then, like the habits imposed by the men who after 1789 made this world, become the habits of the new world.

M. Bernstein

Harold J. Laski

We have come to the boundaries of the final dividing line between liberalism and socialism. We are choosing between institutions which assume that freedoms must be won by the few and institutions which assume that they must be planned by the many. Either we must have power in the hands of men who use scarcity as the means of compulsion, or we must give it to men who find abundance is the instrument of freedom. There is no middle way. Free enterprise and the market economy mean war; socialism and planned economy mean peace. We must plan our civilization or we must perish.

I accept the need for the United Nations Organization in the first instance to begin the task before us. But I accept it on conditions. No secrecy; no invasion of the internationalism and the public integrity which are the glory of science and learning; no subordination of the scientist to that "practical man" who thinks it is wisdom to have habit without philosophy. Let the new institution for intellectual advance be given the chance forthwith to show that Plato was right when he said that the Minister of Education must be more important than the Minister of War. Let us show by a New Deal on a scale far wider and far more profound even than Franklin Roosevelt's New Deal that poverty is a curse of man's making even though he had the insolence to affirm its necessity by making it the outcome of God's plan for the universe. We in Britain have no more right to be content with the slum house and the slum mind than you in the United States have the right to evade the fact that you have acquiesced for eighty years in degrading twelve million Negroes by force and fraud and fear. This is not the time to rest content with a temporary plaster upon such deep and open wounds. This is the time to begin a new civilization, based on the freedom which comes when men have a map of the complex universe in which we live, have the assurance of security, and are no longer driven to work by the fear of starvation. Today we are in prisons where we have the key to freedom. When are we going to open the doors?

Do not believe for one moment that I think our task an easy one. But let us honestly face what the task is. We are societies haunted by fear and insecurity because we have made death the sanction of life and left its operation as a sanction to men who exploited its terrors to keep the many poor and ignorant and deceived. Now we know that we have reached the point where if they continue in power their demands will impose the law of the jungle upon us all; they sit there, believe me, in the dark at Nürnberg; when we indict men of their kind, we indict the same types in every society where democracy is not the participation in the processes of government by free citizens who live by the sanction of life because they have recognized necessary limitations and are thus free from fear. Nazism in all its forms is the culmination of a society built upon the anarchy of free enterprise; when it subjects man to the economy of the market, it destroys his right to be man. That is why we must alter the central principle of our civilization to planned production for community consumption. From that central principle alone flow the ethical values which can renovate and refresh this dying civilization. Without it we shall have done no more than make a supreme discovery in the art of social destruction. With it we can make a supreme application of a new power to the art of social creation.

We are before a revolution more mighty even than the vast change which came with the reorientation of men's minds effected by the scientific discoveries of Copernicus and Kepler. These required a new society and a new culture. They were obtained, but they were obtained by the degradation of the mass of mankind. Now we too require a new society and a new culture, this time a democratic culture in a free society. That prospect arouses fear and distrust in that middle class whose triumph was slowly achieved in the three hundred years after 1600. Now they want to arrest the dynamic of history at the point where their triumph is crumbling into decay. They cannot succeed and they ought not to succeed. Their day is over. Their thought is bankrupt, their ethical values are obsolete, their dogma is an angry anachronism. A new social philosophy is necessary for a new world. Let us admit it can be born only of a new social order.

Do you ask why? In the deep tempest of the Civil War Lincoln gave the answer. "The dogmas of the quiet past are inadequate to the stormy present. The occasion is piled high with difficulty, and we must rise with the occasion. As our case is new, so we must think anew and act anew. We must disenthrall ourselves." We must disenthrall ourselves; I venture to repeat those words. In no other fashion can we face this challenge with the proud confidence of free men.

America's Case at Nuernberg

BY PETER DE MENDELSSOHN

(The Nation's correspondent at the war trials)

Nürnberg, December 4

THE conclusion of the prosecution on Count I of the Indictment presents a suitable occasion for assessing the American contribution to this first phase of the Nürnberg trial. Listening for a fortnight exclusively to American voices in the Nürnberg courtroom led one perhaps to overlook the fact that the trial is a joint undertaking of four nations with widely different concepts and traditions of legal procedure. They may think along the same lines—they undoubtedly do—but that doesn't mean that they use the same language, actual or legal. Although the representatives of the four nations have obviously made some effort to attune and dovetail their approaches and techniques, the differences remain visible and are not the least fascinating aspect of this unique performance.

We have not yet heard the French or Russians, who will certainly contribute new features to the composite picture, but when on Tuesday Britain's new attorney general, Sir Hartley Shawcross, made his long opening statement on Count II in purest King's English, his clear, ringing voice came almost as a shock, though by no means an unpleasant one. At the same time a dark-haired, dreamy-eyed Russian youngster behind a glass panel, who turned out to be the American-educated son of the star Soviet correspondent, Troyanovski, was translating the speech into beautiful-sounding, deep-voiced, rumbling Russian, and it was exciting to switch back and forth between them. These are some of the minor but unforgettable thrills of this fantastic show.

To say that it is not a purely American show is certainly not to say that the United States does not play an important and possibly predominating role. The United States had not only the opening move, which was bound to be a tricky thing in a wholly untried venture of this kind, but also the task of proving the most difficult and in many ways the most controversial part of the common charge.

The American prosecution's task was twofold: first, to establish in the eyes of the world the legitimacy of this trial, as based on the tribunal's charter and international law; second, to establish the legitimacy and admissibility of the new charge of "a common plan or conspiracy" and furnish watertight evidence thereof. Much controversy has raged and will continue to rage around both of these points. In contrast with Count I of the Indictment, Count II, which is the responsibility of the British, and Counts III and IV, which are the joint French-Russian charge, seem comparatively straightforward. (Count II is "crimes against the peace—that is, "breaches and violations of international treaties, obligations, and assurances; Count III is "war crimes," and Count IV, "crimes against humanity"—these comprise non-observance of the rules of war, acts of inhumanity, deportations, arbitrary looting, killings, and the like not connected with the conduct of war.) The Americans, therefore, took on themselves the most difficult and most important task. And if in the years to come the world has reason to be thankful that this trial was held, its gratitude will go in large measure to the United States.

In the fortnight that has passed since Justice Jackson delivered his long opening statement, its historic significance has become apparent. Whatever the future experts of international law work out—and the United Nations Organization must soon tackle this matter in practical detail—they cannot ignore the fundamentals laid down in Jackson's speech. As there stated, and as reformulated by Shawcross in his own speech with great felicity of phrase, the chief issue is: Are these defendants charged under a law which did not exist at the time they committed their crimes, and if so, what justification have the Allies for so charging them? Reduced to simplest terms, Jackson's closely knit, hard-hitting, and comprehensive answer was that these men are lucky to be given a trial at all. We are trying them not because we want to sentence them to death—that would be an easy matter on any one of the thousands of atrocity charges—but because they present us with the first opportunity to formulate and lay down a law which the world must hold to if it is to survive. If it is said that this is a new law, not authoritatively declared at the time the crimes were committed, and that its declaration has taken them by surprise, the answer is that they are really surprised that there is any such thing as law. These men ignored and defied all law. Their failure to understand the evolution of the legal thought of the world is no defense. If it is said that there is no judicial precedent for the tribunal's charter, the answer is that international law is more than a collection of abstract, immutable principles. We have the right in our own day to institute customs and conclude agreements that will themselves become the sources of a new and stronger international law.

As to individual responsibility for crimes committed at the order of a higher authority, in the name of a government or state, it has now become a truism, Justice Jackson declared, to say that "only sanctions which reach individuals can be peacefully and effectively enforced." "Of course," he continued, "the idea that a state commits crimes is a fiction. Crimes are always committed only by individuals. This trial represents mankind's desperate effort to apply the discipline of law to statesmen who have used their powers of state to attack the foundations of world peace; it is a juridical action of the kind to insure that those who start war will pay for it personally." I repeat his words here because all who heard him in the Nürnberg courtroom felt with a sudden thrill that with their utterance an all-important, irrevocable step had been taken. I believe their impact will be felt long after most people have forgotten the Nürnberg trial and Justice Jackson. If this were not true, the tribunal might as well pack up and go home, and mankind make its testament.

It was a long step down from Jackson's exposition to the actual presentation of evidence on Count I—a common plan or conspiracy. The prosecution's thesis is that all twenty of the accused, "with divers other persons," participated in a conspiracy to prepare, instigate, and carry out a political-military program whose execution involved the crimes charged separately and specifically under the remaining three counts. It is common knowledge that when the Indictment was drawn up there was much argument over whether this count should be included at all. Many persons are still of the opinion, first, that it is a charge hard both to define and to substantiate, and, second, that it is entirely unnecessary for the purposes of this trial and introduces a dispensable complication. Crimes against the peace, plus war crimes and crimes against humanity, this school argues, would amply suffice to establish a legal precedent, which is the primary purpose of this tribunal, and to convict these twenty men, which is the secondary objective. The American delegation insisted that the conspiracy charge be included, and the immense mass of captured German files, documents, and correspondence introduced as evidence sustains their view. There can no longer be the slightest doubt that from the day Hitler assumed power he and his friends and associates knew what they were doing and intended to do. Few of the twenty will be acquitted of the conspiracy charge, least of all those who insist they had nothing to do with the "common plan," like Schacht, Papen, and Neurath.

NUREMBERG

It was with pained disappointment, therefore, that one watched the American prosecutors handle the magnificent documentary evidence in an utterly inadequate, uncomprehending way and throw away unique opportunities not only to pin certain crimes on certain defendants—mere child's play—but to teach that great history lesson for which the world was waiting. Here one of the basic faults in the plan for the trial came to light. The presentation of evidence was in the hands of three American lawyers, of whom Thomas Dodd, although he was apparently not very familiar with European or German history, was the least unequal to his task. Major Wallis, the Boston attorney, in presenting the evidence of financial conspiracy showed himself most unsure of his ground. But it was Sidney Alderman, general counsel for the Southern Railway, who finally compromised the prosecution through his grotesquely inept and amateurish handling of the material. If men of this caliber were to be given the job, they should have had the assistance of sound political advisers or, if none were available, of experienced foreign correspondents, in whom the court press gallery abounds. It was inexcusable for Alderman, after the long, detailed account of the aggression against Czechoslovakia, to be unable to give the date of the Munich agreement; it was painful to hear him admit, after a long account of secret German naval rearmament, that he had never heard of "the case of Captain Lohmann," one of the major scandals of the Weimar Republic, which revealed the navy's secret financial deals. Thus the trial defeated its own purpose. The issues are political as well as legal, and narrowing down the political aspect by a strictly legal approach, though it establishes the desired legal precedent, deprives the trial of most of its value. The political pattern, the military and diplomatic context, emerge only here and there, by accident.

A magnificent opportunity has been missed to unfold day after day before the entire world the breath-taking story of Europe during the past twelve years—the truth at last, nothing but the truth, and above all the whole truth—so that the common man in Germany might know why he is sitting where he is—on a rubble heap that once was his home. The lawyers have scored their points. But the world was entitled to expect more from Nürnberg.

Conflict in Latin America

BY MANUEL SEOANE

(Vice-President of the Peruvian Senate)

Lima, November 26

SOME months ago in an article in The Nation I expressed the view that at the end of the war the people of Latin America would show their determination to make the democratic victory a reality in their own countries. Recent events have justified my prognosis. In Guatemala last spring a liberal university professor, Juan José Arévalo, succeeded the sinister Juan Ubico as President. In Ecuador a democratic regime headed by José Maria Velasco Ibarra replaced the dictatorship of Arroyo del Rio. The Cuban elections ended the twelve-year-rule of Fulgencio Batista and brought Dr. Ramón Grau San Martín to office as head of a new liberal government. In Peru Dr. Bustamante y Rivero, supported by the forces of the left, won a smashing victory over his conservative rival, and the democratic Aprista Party became the strongest group in the Parliament. Then came the coup in Venezuela and the overthrow of Vargas in Brazil. Today Argentina, the Dominican Republic, and Paraguay are the only substantial bastions of totalitarianism in Latin America.

In the elections to be held on February 24, the Argentine people have a difficult but none the less imperative responsibility: Perón must be defeated. Judging by the present temper of the Argentine electorate, it is not wishful thinking to predict a victory for the anti-Perón coalition. One of the coalition parties, the Partido Radical, formerly claimed 60 per cent of the vote; today government attacks and the arrests of some of its leading members have increased its prestige and its voting strength. And it is supported by other powerful parties—the Socialist Party, which has always carried Buenos Aires; the Democráta Progresista, which has held a majority in the province of Santa Fé; the Communist Party; and even some of the old conservative groups alienated by the insolence of the Colonels' clique.

Perón has gathered around him a corrupt gang of turncoat Radicals, demagogic "labor" leaders, and jailbirds—only a few weeks ago the Peronistas staged a demonstration in Buenos Aires to demand the release of prostitutes, petty thieves, racketeers, and other prisoners convicted of misdemeanors. And he counts, too, on an ace in the hole—the support of international Nazi-fascism. Even so, he can muster only 40,000 followers in Buenos Aires, a city which numbers more than 300,000 voters. Undoubtedly election day will see bloody street fights provoked by Perón's pistoleros, but they will have to resort to fraud and ballot-box stuffing on a large scale to elect him.

In general the Latin American picture offers real hope of a democratic resurgence. But while several countries have ousted their dictators, reaction is still strong and thirsting for revenge. And unfortunately, it owes some of its present strength to the liberals. When fascists take power, they ruthlessly wipe out their opposition; when liberals win, they invariably guarantee freedom to everyone, including their enemies of yesterday. In Peru, for example, the Apristas organized a post-election victory celebration on May 20 at which they invited the right-wing opposition to cooperate in the reconstruction program. The defeated parties were dumbfounded; they could not believe in a generosity which they themselves had never practiced. Convinced at last that this was no trap, they declared themselves ready to cooperate with the government—and so far have used the liberties accorded them to sabotage national unity and prepare for a new assault against the incumbent regime.

Some Peruvian democrats, however, mindful of what happened in Europe as a consequence of the liberals' excessive generosity, have taken a strong stand against the policy of "liberty even to destroy liberty." As a result, the fascists have already begun to appeal to public opinion abroad, accusing the present regime of employing the same repressive measures which they themselves had used earlier. The charge is false. On the other hand, we have no intention of allowing them, in the name of democracy, to organize a fascist counter-revolution.

Until now the Peruvian fascists have not dared openly to defy the regime, first, because the government would take prompt measures to smash them, and, second, because the people of Peru, who have won a hard victory, would repudiate them. But they are working feverishly to create an atmosphere of mistrust abroad, particularly in the United States.

The Achilles heel of the new government is the difficult economic problem which it inherited from the previous regime. Upon taking office the Bustamante Cabinet announced that one of its first projects would be to settle Peru's foreign debt in order to reestablish the country's credit. To initiate a program of genuine economic reform, Peru needs the aid of foreign capital—and foreign capital, obviously, does not flow freely to countries which fail to pay their debts. The finance minister of Peru is now in the United States seeking to effect a settlement of the external debt. Upon the success of his mission depends the future of the regime and of the nation; if foreign capitalists can be induced to help develop Peru's enormous potential wealth, the country will enter a long-term period of prosperity. It is precisely this influx of capital which the reactionaries are hoping to prevent. At the same time within Peru they are endeavoring very discreetly to split the Frente Democrático Nacional, which supports the Bustamante government.

Here in Lima there is some anxiety about the attitude of England and the United States toward the Peruvian regime, particularly as it is reflected in the dispatches of the American and British news agencies. The Associated Press has as its representative in Lima the business manager of El Comercio, a conservative, anti-government daily. One of the owners of El Comercio is known as the "Goebbels" of Franco; he has carried on the kind of intensive propaganda campaign in behalf of fascist Spain that one usually associates with an official government agency. The head of the United Press in Lima is a brother of the A. P. representative, while the news editor of El Comercio is the Reuters correspondent. In short, all the news that reaches the United States and Great Britain through the channels of the major news agencies is written in the office of one of Peru's most anti-democratic papers!

Peruvian liberals will continue their all-out fight against the native fascists, but they are convinced that no country of Latin America can achieve full democracy as long as isolated fortresses of fascism like Argentina are allowed to survive and as long as Franco continues to misuse Spain's prestige in Hispanic America. In a recent declaration the Uruguayan Foreign Minister, Rodríguez Larreta, denounced the concept that within its own frontiers a government may act as it pleases, even if, as in the case of Argentina, its pleasure is to work for the overthrow of neighbor democracies. The Uruguayan position represents a healthy reaction against the vacillating policy enunciated in the Charter of Chapultepec. It courageously accepts the principle of intervention—intervention not by a single country but by all the countries of the Americas acting jointly in accordance with an accepted democratic agreement.

But future inter-American cooperation should not be limited to the political field. The Aprista Party of Peru has proposed an Inter-American Economic Congress; the history of foreign investment in Mexico, Central America, and even Peru makes clear the necessity of a coordinated hemispheric policy that will substitute social progress and economic democracy for exploitation, abuse, and counter-revolution. This proposal has been enthusiastically received by other Latin American countries; indeed, Chile has asked to be kept informed of all developments with regard to the project. But the Apristas count, above all, on the liberals in the United States to build up popular support for a policy of intelligent, democratic, and permanent inter-American cooperation that will make it impossible for reaction to destroy the people's victory before a single one of its fruits has been realized.

IN COMING ISSUES

The article on Wisconsin appearing on page 657 is the first of a series by Carey McWilliams, who is traveling through the Middle West and West.

Mr. McWilliams will report particularly on political thinking and political tendencies in the regions covered.

The Italian Crisis

BY LEO VALIANI

(Editor of the Milan daily Italia Libera and a member of the Provisional Parliament)

ON REPEATED occasions following the armistice with Italy in 1943 United Nations leaders promised the Italian people all possible aid in their efforts to set up a stable, democratic government. At the same time, the Italian anti-Fascist parties were asked to recognize the armistice signed by Marshal Badoglio, which placed the entire political and economic life of the Italian nation under the control of the Allies. Because Italian anti-fascism had faith in the promises of the democracies and wished to demonstrate its loyalty by making possible Italy's participation in the war against Germany, it recognized the armistice, though it had no part in concluding it. By so doing, the Italian anti-Fascists bound themselves, in the opinion of most Italians, to active and fruitful collaboration with the democratic powers. When the leaders of the partisan army then operating in northern Italy behind the German lines were asked by the Allied High Command to recognize the armistice, they agreed to do so because they placed the effective conduct of the war against the Nazis above all else.

In May, 1945, Allied representatives recognized that the Committee of National Liberation of Northern Italy had acquired great prestige throughout the country by having aroused and vigorously directed the anti-German and anti-Fascist revolt, and assured the committee that if it could reach an agreement with the political leaders in Rome and form a coalition government which would abide by the terms of the armistice, the abrogation of that document would be hastened and Italy would the sooner regain its place among free nations. These assurances contributed greatly to the formation of the government presided over by Ferruccio Parri, the most prominent leader of the resistance. When the Parri government was established, the Allies expressed approval of its democratic program and promised support.

By the terms of the armistice northern Italy, the richest and strongest part of the country, was to be ruled by the Allied Military Government as soon as the Anglo-American troops entered Milan, Turin, Genoa, and Venice, though these cities had liberated themselves by the armed insurrection of their inhabitants. This region should have been returned to the jurisdiction of the Italian government on September 1, 1945. Then the armistice should have been replaced by a treaty that would permit Italy to enter the United Nations Organization. This, of course, has not been done. To be sure, the Allies, particularly the United States, have contributed material help—UNRRA is greatly appreciated in Italy—but a country so devastated by war as Italy needs more than bread. (Even bread is very scarce: the daily allowance at present is 200 grams and will soon be reduced.) Without liberty and justice there can be no stable democracy and therefore no organic economic reconstruction.

All the factories saved by the partisans from German destruction are located in northern Italy. With the AMG in control there it is difficult for the Italian government to avail itself of the region's wealth, much of which has been sequestered because it was owned by Fascists but cannot, under AMG, be nationalized or sold to the profit of the state. Moreover, since AMG works through regional set-ups, the economy of northern Italy, which should function as a unit, is administered by five regional offices—Lombardy, Venetia, Piedmont, Emilia, and Liguria—without any central coordination. Under these conditions properly planned reconstruction is impossible.

Allied journalists in Italy often complain about the lawlessness and gangsterism. One reason is that the Italian government was deprived by the armistice of the right to acquire arms for its police. Yet one-third of the total Italian budget goes for military expenses because the armistice prevents the government from demobilizing the army and navy.

Italian relations with other countries are made very difficult by the armistice. It is clear that the French government is inclined to come to a democratic agreement with anti-Fascist Italy, but the latter is prevented by the armistice from undertaking the necessary démarches. Even commercial treaties, which might be concluded today with France, Switzerland, Poland, Czechoslovakia, and Latin America, are made difficult by the armistice. Until Italy is admitted to the United Nations Organization, it cannot adhere to the Bretton Woods agreements, by which the Italian currency might still be saved from uncontrolled inflation, or get back its merchant fleet.

The general elections in Italy are to take place next April. In these elections the people will decide the fate of the monarchy, which for twenty years was an accomplice of fascism. The majority of the people are undoubtedly for a republic; five of the six parties now on the political scene have already come out for one. However, we must expect the monarchy to use every possible method to save itself; its latest maneuver is to place the responsibility for the failure to abolish the armistice on the republican parties, and particularly on Parri. Old, conservative political leaders like Nitti and ex-Fascist newspapermen like the editor of L'Uomo qualunque were mobilized to blame Parri for the failure of his policy of cooperation with the democratic nations. Public opinion is naturally perplexed; it may give ear to the neo-nationalists if it becomes convinced that Italian democracy is not supported by the great democratic powers.

The Liberal Party, which is in reality the conservative and monarchical party, used this charge in its attack on the coalition government of which it was a part. According to the Liberal Party, the repercussions of the international situation are more vital in Italian public opinion than the anti-fascism which still animates Parri. At the last moment, the powerful Catholic Party headed by Alcide de Gasperi, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, joined the Liberal-Conservatives and asked Parri to resign.

A few hours before this crisis was reached in Rome, Ernest Bevin made his speech on foreign policy before the House of Commons. It would have been simple for the Labor Foreign Secretary to strengthen the position of the Italian democratic government. Instead, he limited himself to advising the Italian people to place reconstruction problems above political problems. His statement could have been interpreted as favorable to Parri, who is known as a student of economic problems rather than as a professional politician. But the Liberal-Conservatives were able to use it to support their thesis that the anti-Fascist government, which was of course a political government, should make way for a government of so-called technicians—among whom might be found a large number of monarchists. Thus Bevin's words, contrary to the speaker's wishes, not only failed to avert the Italian governmental crisis but actually hastened it. It is reported in Washington that the State Department recently proposed to London and Moscow that the Italian armistice be abrogated and an "interim peace arrangement" concluded. It is a pity that this step, which had been urged by Parri several months ago, was not taken in time to save his government.

As I write, De Gasperi is trying to form a new government. This solution of the crisis is a step toward the right, although the leftist parties will undoubtedly hold important posts in the new Cabinet. De Gasperi has always been an opponent of fascism but is still hesitating with respect to the abolition of the monarchy.

The political trend in Italy is inseparably connected with Italy's position in the world. A progressive, democratic, stable government presupposes that Italy becomes a free member of a democratic United Nations Organization.

The Wisconsin Riddle

BY CAREY McWILLIAMS

(A contributing editor of The Nation*)*

Milwaukee, December 6

A CROSS-COUNTRY trip that has taken me into a dozen or more communities in eight states has convinced me that political alignments in the 1946 Congressional elections are likely to be as unsettled and confused as ever before in our history. In every state I have visited political leaders have told me that "the fences are down" and that "the situation is wide open." The personal popularity so long enjoyed by Franklin D. Roosevelt had many curious effects on political allegiances. It held together various bizarre alliances, retarded to some extent logical political tendencies, and in a number of states actually prevented the formation of compact Democratic Party organizations. Roosevelt's death, therefore, created a vacuum which is only now beginning to be filled by the establishment of new alliances and organizations. I believe that 1946 political alignments throughout the country are more interestingly foreshadowed in Wisconsin than in any other state I have visited. Solve the present Wisconsin riddle, and you might be able to forecast the 1946 elections.

The principal reason why Wisconsin possesses this exceptional interest is that it is the only state in which a functioning third party exists—the La Follette Progressive Party. Everywhere I went I found evidence that pointed pretty conclusively to the likelihood of a third-party movement, if not in 1946, then in 1948. With so much "third-party talk" in the air, the question of what the La Follettes will do in Wisconsin acquires national importance. At the moment Milwaukee is buzzing with excitement over a recent resolution adopted by a local Republican organization inviting the La Follettes back into the Republican Party. After considerable debate the wording of the resolution was finally changed so as to substitute "welcome" for "invitation." It is interesting to note that the author of the resolution was Lansing Hoyt, chairman of the Third Ward Republican organization in Milwaukee and chairman in pre-Pearl Harbor days of the America First movement in Wisconsin—in active association with Phil La Follette. At present Mr. Hoyt is devoting much of his time to a new organization whose purpose is to "safeguard the atomic-bomb secret for America." It is also interesting to note that his invitation to the La Follettes to join up with the Republicans was eloquently seconded by "Ham" Fish, who just happened to be in Milwaukee at the time.

An invitation to the La Follettes from the Democratic Party ranks has come from Daniel W. Hoan, long Mayor of Milwaukee, and the nominee of the Democratic Party for governor in 1944. In recent months Mr. Hoan has been building up a liberal league within the Democratic Party—he claims an organization now in some thirteen counties of the state. From time to time he has suggested that the La Follettes should come into the Democratic Party. With the two parties apparently actively wooing the brothers, whose Progressive Party organization was nearly liquidated in the 1944 election, the political prestige of both Phil and Bob has been enhanced. Able politicians that they are, both, of course, are remaining silent and permitting the speculation to spread. It has been intensified by Phil's return to Wisconsin, following his release from service on the staff of General MacArthur. He has been speaking to numerous service clubs and business organizations, using as his principal themes distrust of the Soviet Union and praise for the genius of Douglas MacArthur. No one with whom I talked in Milwaukee believes that Senator La Follette's views and political beliefs can be separated from those of his dynamic brother, who is generally regarded as "the La Follette mind." I was told in all quarters that Phil La Follette is the strategist, the brains, the real force in the Progressive Party.

Most people incline to the belief that Phil La Follette, noting the trend toward a third party, hopes to head off the drive for a really progressive third party by seizing the leadership of the movement now or by organizing, if necessary, a demagogic third-party movement of his own. Whatever he does is likely to confuse any effort to further a third-party movement, now or later, by the C. I. O.-P. A. C. and the N. C. P. A. C. Those persons who believe that the La Follettes will return to the Republican fold reason that Phil La Follette is merely using MacArthur as a front to disguise his own ambition to become a key figure in the 1948 Republican convention—and its nominee, if not for the Presidency, then for the Vice-Presidency. My own conclusion, reached after talks with a large number of people, is that the La Follettes intend, if possible, to seize control of the developing third-party sentiment in the country.

The evidence supporting this view is pretty convincing. According to responsible political observers in Milwaukee, President Roosevelt had an important conference with the La Follettes in 1936. At this conference he is supposed to have invited them to join the Democratic Party, to have offered Phil La Follette the appointment as ambassador to the Soviet Union, and to have said that he regarded Senator La Follette as his eventual successor. It seems, however, that Phil wanted to be named director of the WPA, a position to which the President was reluctant to appoint him. In consequence, the merger fell through, and in 1938 Phil La Follette, with great fanfare, attempted to launch his ill-fated National Progressive Party. In the light of these facts it seems improbable that the La Follettes would now swing into the Democratic Party. But what about the Republican offer?

In 1946 Senator La Follette will be up for reelection—it is generally assumed that he will run. In a non-presidential year he is hardly likely to surrender his pivotal position as a Progressive by joining either the Republicans or the Democrats. Moreover, despite the current efforts to lure him into the Republican Party, it looks as if he would have difficulty in obtaining the Republican nomination if he should decide to run as a Republican. In the last senatorial contest in Wisconsin Captain "Joe" McCarthy, although in the service and therefore absent from the state, gave Senator Wiley a close race for the nomination. McCarthy, a Circuit Court judge, enlisted in the marines as a private and rose to the rank of captain. He is now back in Wisconsin and actively campaigning for the Republican nomination, speaking all over the state against compulsory military service in peace time. A likable person and a good campaigner, McCarthy, I was told, is extremely popular. Thus if Senator La Follette abandoned his position as a Progressive, he would be staking his political future on a contest in the primaries in which he might be defeated.

The leading candidate for the 1946 Democratic senatorial nomination seems to be Howard MacMurray, now back at the University of Wisconsin as an instructor. MacMurray is conceded a good chance of winning the nomination but not of being elected. He is an advocate of Union Now, and when he ran last time, he disappointed many of his followers by trying to keep his campaign dissociated from Roosevelt's. In a race between McCarthy, La Follette, and MacMurray—as Republican, Progressive, and Democratic nominees—the labor vote would be split between La Follette and MacMurray, and McCarthy would have an excellent chance of being elected. Some of the labor leaders with whom I talked freely admitted this possibility but said that their primary objective in supporting MacMurray would be the defeat of Senator La Follette. This may sound strange to liberals and progressives outside Wisconsin, but I found widespread distrust of Senator La Follette in the Milwaukee labor movement and a belief that he is the pawn of his ambitious brother. Labor also shows great resentment of the fact that Progressive Party elements brought about the election of Senator Wiley by splitting the labor-progressive vote. Senator La Follette apparently retains strong support in the farming areas, among the leadership of the A. F. of L. unions, and in certain sections of the C. I. O. The left-wing elements in Milwaukee, however, are out to liquidate what they term the "phony liberalism" of the La Follettes. They also believe that in trying to build up a liberal league within the Democratic Party Dan Hoan has it in mind to swing these groups, largely the old Socialist element, behind Senator La Follette at the last moment. Neither the Hoan Democrats nor the La Follette Progressives look with favor on the C. I. O.-P. A. C. or the N. C. P. A. C.

John L. Lewis, in 1940, predicted a four-way split in American politics—the rise of a people's movement to the left of the Democratic Party and of a demagogic movement outside the Republican Party. (As I said above, the political situation in many parts of the country is extremely confused: in Illinois a fight is on in Republican ranks between Governor Dwight Green and Attorney General George F. Barrett over the Green-Kelly coalition; in Minnesota it is rumored that Stassen may support Senator Shipstead for reelection in 1946; in California Governor Warren is playing ambivalent "non-partisan" politics.) Many Milwaukee labor leaders associate Lansing Hoyt's demagoguery about the atomic bomb with "Ham" Fish's appearance in Milwaukee and with Phil La Follette's beating of the drums for General MacArthur—who still retains residence in Wisconsin—and also with the recent conference in Washington between Charles Lindbergh and fifteen isolationist Congressmen. They foresee a fancy nationalist coalition in 1946, with third-party "liberal" trimmings, under the leadership of Phil La Follette. They believe that the La Follette Progressives, at their April conference, will decide to remain independent, and that Senator La Follette will run for reelection as a Progressive.

As an organization the Democratic Party in Wisconsin is weak and formless. Many liberals believe that the party leaders have purposely kept the party weak. They point out that Leo Crowley, who brought about the last-minute support of Senator La Follette for Roosevelt in 1940, has given most of the patronage of the state to the La Follettes. They insist that in 1940 President Roosevelt did not need Senator La Follette's support; that, on the contrary, it was the Senator who, as the final vote showed, badly needed identification with the President. However, the Democratic Party is being reconstituted; on November 10 State Senator Robert Tehan was chosen National Committeeman over Lavy Dilweg, the Dan Hoan candidate, by a vote of forty-two to seven. Senator Tehan, I am told, is friendly and cooperative toward the C. I. O.-P. A. C. and the N. C. P. A. C. Obviously the "fences are down" in Wisconsin, and what happens there in 1946 may have an important influence on the developing new alignments looking toward 1948.

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

Wool-Gathering in Washington

WILLIAM C. CLAYTON, Assistant Secretary of State in charge of economic affairs, is one of the busiest men in Washington and, I imagine, one of the most sorely tried. For the past ten weeks or so a good deal of his time has been taken up by the economic-financial negotiations with Britain. On his shoulders has fallen the major burden of trying to persuade Britain to abandon its restrictionist trade policies and lend its support to the State Department program for implementing the fourth clause of the Atlantic Charter. It has been necessary for him to hold forth at length on the evil consequences to world trade of such devices as import quotas and government bulk purchasing. Mr. Clayton appears to have succeeded in this task by securing British indorsement of American proposals for an international trade organization. But it must have been embarrassing for him, to say the least, to be forced, more than once during the negotiations, to rush down to the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue in an attempt to head off some Congressional scheme completely at variance with the principles he was urging on the British.

As an example, let us take a look at the current campaign to save the sheep farmers from "ruin." Under pressure from the American Wool Growers' Association a special Senate Wool Committee has been organized, with Senator O'Mahoney of Wyoming, one of the leading pastoral states, as chairman. Although the sheep herders have the benefit of a very large tariff on imported wool, they complain that they are persistently undersold. After paying duty, Australian wool, it is asserted, is quoted at 7 to 11 cents a pound below domestic ceiling prices, even though these do not cover American production costs. Consequently, it is alleged, the sheep-herding industry is rapidly declining, with the ranges now carrying 40,500,000 head against a ten-year average of 46,406,000.

This decline has taken place in the face of special support given to wool-growers during the war, first, by the policy of specifying domestic fiber for service requirements whenever possible, second, by a commitment of the Commodity Credit Corporation to buy all wool offered at the ceiling. Next June 30 this guaranty will expire, however, which is one reason why the wool-growers are pressing for action now. Another is the existence of the huge stocks of wool held by the Empire Wool Pool, controlled by the British government, which bought dominion war-time crops at a guaranteed price. The pool holds 3,300,000,000 pounds, which compares with a normal annual world production of 4,000,000,000. A surplus of this size is bound to discourage rising prices.

A number of different proposals have been placed before the special Senate committee. The one most favored by the wool-growers is a quota system which would place a definite limit on the amount which each exporting country could ship into the American market each year. If this were to be supplemented by a tariff increase, so much the better, but import duties by themselves, it is argued, would not suffice to safeguard what is euphemistically called the "competitive position" of American wool. A more original plan has been worked out by Dean J. A. Hill of the University of Wyoming, who has suggested that the government should monopolize the purchase and sale of all wool, domestic and foreign, consumed in this country. The advantage of this scheme is that it would enable the government to average the price and resell at something between a high domestic quotation and a comparatively low foreign one. On the other hand, it would put the government into the business of wholesale trading, which, when undertaken by Britain, evokes the condemnation of all right-minded supporters of free enterprise.

Obviously none of these solutions for wool are acceptable to Mr. Clayton. The imposition of import quotas, he told the Senate committee on November 20, "would be contrary to everything the State Department is trying to do to open up the channels of international trade." According to orthodox free-market economics, in which Mr. Clayton is reported to believe, the proper course would be to let the forces of supply and demand settle the volume of American wool production. But since such a proposal would certainly be badly received in the Senate, Mr. Clayton suggested a subsidy—probably the least harmful method of protection.

A subsidy would be a burden on the citizen as taxpayer but a lighter, if more visible, burden than that which would be imposed on the citizen as consumer by the quota-tariff plan. For the latter would add directly to prices and mean increased margins at every point from the sheep to the tailor. Moreover, with the cost of their raw material increased, woolen manufacturers, already uneasy about post-war foreign competition, would almost certainly clamor in turn for higher import duties, even though these already amount to almost 100 per cent on some types of cloth.

It is rather quaint that Senator O'Mahoney, who is apparently committed to more protection for the wool-growers, should be urging broader uses for wool as a solution for the surplus problem. It seems improbable that an additional charge of, say, $5 to $10 a suit is going to encourage me to buy more clothes. Nor is a policy which will exaggerate the difficulties of countries producing large export surpluses calculated to make them prosperous and better able to buy American goods.

Another point that the wool-growers and their Congressional supporters have overlooked in their anxiety for higher prices is that they are beginning to meet competition from a source which cannot be stifled by trade barriers. The weight of rayon consumed in this country is already greater than the weight of wool. Aralac, a synthetic fiber made from milk casein, is on the market at 64 cents a pound, not much more than half the price of wool, and several other processes for manufacturing protein fibers of a wool type, either from such vegetables as the soybean or from animal substances, are ripe for development. Instead of wool-gathering in Washington the sheep farmers ought to be searching intensively for cheaper ways of producing better wool. Otherwise they may find in a few years that they and their flocks have been by-passed on the road of technical progress.

KEITH HUTCHISON

The People's Front

THE fiftieth anniversary of the Coronation of the Virgin of Guadalupe was a feast of folklore, rich in the music and rhythm and visual beauty through which the temperament of Mexico finds expression. But behind the emotion and pageantry was a carefully prepared political mobilization by the Catholic church against the principles that gave birth to the Mexican Revolution.

From sun-up until far into the night of Sunday, October 7, an almost unending stream of 300,000 Mexicans thronged the road leading from Laredo to Mexico City. Ten thousand cars clogged the highway. In the square before the basilica of the Virgin the strains of the Mexican national anthem mingled with those of popular tunes and hymns. The massed flags of Mexico and the Vatican seemed almost to fuse in the breeze. The two most energetic reactionary organizations, Acción Católica Mexicana and the Caballeros de Colón, were on hand, establishing the political character of the celebration. An atmosphere of expectancy held the crowd as they awaited the arrival of the special papal emissary, Cardinal Villeneuve, Archbishop of Quebec. Here, side by side, stood the church mystical and the church militant. But throughout the week-long celebration it was the church militant which dominated the scene.

In direct violation of the Mexican constitution, which provides that "ministers of religion will not be permitted, either in private or in public meeting, to criticize the basic laws of the country, the authorities, or the government," the celebration was a bitter attack on the accomplishments of the revolution. During one week Mexico seemed to be retreating a hundred years to the days before Benito Juárez proclaimed the freedom of conscience and drove the clergy back into the churches. On October 8 inside the basilica a demonstration took place against the Spanish republic in exile, which has been officially recognized by President Avila Camacho. To the music of the Spanish monarchist anthem played on the church organ old Spanish residents who are Franco sympathizers paraded through the church carrying the flag of the monarchy. As they filed past the altar, a Mexican bishop exclaimed with joy, "There is the true Spain."

The clerical offensive staged at the shrine of Guadalupe is not limited to Mexico. It is under way throughout the entire Western Hemisphere. In the final ceremony on October 12, which was attended by sixty-six Mexican and foreign prelates, the Archbishop of Mexico, Monseñor Luis María Martínez, declared, "Our Virgin asks more than a temple in Mexico. She wants as her temple the whole American continent. This we did not understand until now." The Archbishop might have been enlightened earlier had he read a cable by Karl von Wiegand which the Mexican press published shortly before the celebration. Writing from Madrid, an excellent sounding-board of Vatican intentions, the Hearst correspondent said: "Pius XII is studying the way to initiate a reorientation of the Holy See toward the American countries." The Catholic church is worried, he continued, by the advance of communism in Europe. It has lost Poland, and its situation in Rumania and Hungary is becoming increasingly precarious. For that reason, "Rome is busy creating a new papal diplomacy able to deal with North and South America." Actually it is not new, for hundreds of Spanish priests dispatched by Franco to South America have long been engaged in this kind of diplomacy, with no small measure of success, as events in Argentina testify.

Spurred by the success of the Guadalupe celebration, the clerical campaign mounted in intensity. A few weeks later a church-inspired student strike broke out in the University of Mexico. Defying the police, the students intrenched themselves in the university buildings and declared a hunger strike. What they wanted was a head-on clash between strikers and police that would provoke a wave of anti-government sentiment. But with admirable forbearance the rector of the university, Professor Fernandez MacGregor, refused their challenge to violence, and the strike began to peter out. At this point the parents took over from the students and carried on the agitation even inside the university. They created the Sociedad de Padres de Alumnos Universitarios, ostensibly in opposition to the rector, but clearly anti-government in character. I spoke to several professors none of whom can be classified as radical; they were all convinced that the Jesuits had had a hand in the affair.

During the Guadalupe festival the metropolitan press was almost solidly on the side of the church. An outstanding exception was the magazine Tiempo, whose editor, Martín Luis Guzmán, wrote, "If the Mexican Revolution is sincerely disposed to leave the Catholic church in peace, it is on condition that the church leave the revolution in peace. It is naive to expect the revolution to stand by passively while reaction exploits a fanatical section of the population to destroy Mexico's nascent democracy."

To counteract the pro-clerical press campaign, a group of independent intellectuals immediately launched a new magazine entitled 1945. The first issue contained a double-page poster reproducing flaming headlines from the major newspapers during Guadalupe week. The caption read: "Day before yesterday this press was eagerly accepting all the money that Nazi-Fascist agents could offer it. Yesterday, when the victory of the democracies became certain, it dipped into the purses of the most imperialist section of the winning coalition. Today it turns to the clergy for largess. And what has it to give in return? The most vital interests of the 'Mexican fatherland' and 'our beloved country.'"

I was in Canada when Cardinal Villeneuve returned from his mission to Mexico. In public statements and private conversations he boasted of the great victory achieved by the church. But His Eminence forgot one thing—Mexico is not Quebec, and Mexican reaction has always paid with blood for every provocation.

DEL VAYO

BOOKS and the ARTS

GREECE—THE E. A. M. WHITE BOOK

BY L. S. STAVRIANOS

ON FEBRUARY 1, 1945, in the little provincial town of Trikkala, Thessaly, the Greek National Liberation Front (E. A. M.) published its White Book.* This was a collection of 108 documents covering the period from the Lebanon conference of May, 1944, to the conclusion of the armistice between General Scobie and the E. A. M. in January, 1945. The cumulative effect of these documents is devastating—for British Toryism and Greek reaction. If there was ever any question about the nature of British policy in Greece and the responsibility for the tragic fighting in Athens in December, 1944, this book provides a conclusive answer.

Before the liberation of Greece in October, 1944, the principal problem was to establish a national government which would include not only King George's ministers but also representatives of the E. A. M. resistance movement. Various issues delayed the organization of such a government, and British and Greek government spokesmen accused the E. A. M. of obstructionism. The E. A. M., on July 29, 1944, waived all its conditions for entering the Papandreou government except one—that Papandreou be displaced as Premier. Papandreou himself replied by wire on August 5: "I, personally, give you the assurance that . . . the person of the present Premier of the government will not constitute an obstacle to national unity." Naturally this was taken to mean that Papandreou was ready to retire from the scene, and accordingly the E. A. M. made preparations to send representatives to join the Cabinet.

But on August 10 the E. A. M. received the following telegram: "Because of official confidential communication of British government refusing to accept change of government's Premier on the eve of liberation, the Liberal, Progressive, Agrarian, and Democratic parties are making a final appeal to send your representatives to assume their places in the government as it now stands." This was signed by four Ministers—Venizelos and Rentis of the Liberal Party, Sakalis of the Progressive Party, and Mylonas of the Agrarian Democratic Party—none of whom have challenged the authenticity of the dispatch. In other words, even while Greece was still under Nazi rule, the Churchill government was ready to sacrifice Greek national unity to keep its puppet, Premier Papandreou, in office.

After the liberation of Greece the chief task was to obtain, in the words of Papandreou, the "arming of the state and the disarming of the organizations." All parties accepted this formula; the issue was whether the resistance forces alone should be disarmed or whether, as the E. A. M. insisted, the disarmament provisions should be extended to include the Greek government's Mountain Brigade, which was known to be rabidly royalist and bent on the return of the King (see The Nation of December 23, 1944). It was this dispute which disrupted the negotiations and led to armed strife. Hitherto the details of these all-important negotiations have been unknown. The E. A. M. documents show clearly who was responsible for their breakdown. On November 2 Papandreou initialed a plan for the demobilization of the Mountain Brigade as well as the resistance forces. This was acceptable to the E. A. M., and a settlement appeared imminent, when suddenly Papandreou reversed his position and insisted that the Mountain Brigade be preserved, explaining that "this is the opinion of the British government and of the Allied High Command." Although the E. A. M. proposed a compromise plan to break the deadlock, Papandreou refused to budge from his position, and the result was civil war. Evidence from other sources bears out this statement concerning British responsibility for the bloody Battle of Athens. Leland Stowe, after a first-hand investigation in Greece, reported in the New York Post of February 15, 1945, that Papandreou "gave an E. A. M. minister a letter from Scobie which said Prime Minister Churchill would not permit the royalist Mountain Brigade to be disbanded. This is why the attempt to disarm the political factions in Greece first failed, as confirmed by the American ambassador in Greece."

Once hostilities had broken out, the problem was how to end them at the earliest possible moment. Papandreou, apparently frightened by the violence and bloodshed, decided to resign, and the Liberal Party leader, Themistocles Sophoulis, was ready to form a new government with the express support of the E. A. M. But British intervention once again prevented the Greeks from settling their differences peacefully. This is the testimony of Sophoulis, who, incidentally, is an octogenarian, very conservative, and anti-E. A. M.:

> On December 4 I was asked by Mr. Papandreou to form a new government. The left wing and the other parties consented to this, that is, that I head the government. I agreed, as I saw in this step a good solution for the problems which had arisen. On December 5 the British Ambassador informed me that according to the latest instructions he had received, the British Premier was not in accord with any changes in the person of the president of the government in the present situation. General Scobie requested that I support Mr. Papandreou, and I told him that if I consented to support the Papandreou government this would mean that I would be supporting the dictatorship, a thing which I cannot do.

Churchill had his way. Papandreou remained Premier, but the fighting continued; and before it ceased, 11,000 persons were killed, 6,500 of them civilians.

---

* "E. A. M. White Book. March, 1944-March, 1945." Reprinted in Athens. Translated and published in the United States by the Greek American Council, 152 West Forty-second Street, New York. $1.

Harper Books on Timely Issues

AMERICAN LABOR UNIONS

What They Are and How They Work

By Florence Peterson

Director, Industrial Relations Division, Bureau of Labor Statistics, U. S. Department of Labor

Are you puzzled about the effect of labor unions, their policies, their demands, strikes, jurisdictional conflicts and all the other confusions reflected in today's headlines? Here are answers to countless questions arising in the minds of all today regarding the what, why and how of organized labor. ". . . a veritable mine of information and a most useful source of reference."—New York Herald Tribune. $3.00

PRIVATE MONOPOLY

The Enemy at Home

By David Lasser

This bold and dramatic book deals with the struggle of the century—between democracy and the big monopolies. It answers a score of questions on the meaning behind world-shaking headlines. Did the monopolies in nation after nation actually cause World War II? Will they make inevitable World War III—between International Monopoly and International Communism? "This is a fighting book."—Free World Magazine. "In the main his predictions have been justified."—New York Herald Tribune. $3.00

OURSELVES, INC.

The Story of Consumer Free Enterprise

By Leo R. Ward

A vivid personalized story of visits among typical families of the 3,000,000 members of the consumer cooperatives, dramatizing the human values of this growing movement. ". . . immensely concrete, immediate, real. . . . His book is strong documentation of his faith—a book at once entertaining, extraordinarily informing and heartening."—Chicago Tribune. "So convinced that it is convincing, the book is as lively as the subject."—New York Herald Tribune. $2.50

DEMOCRACY against UNEMPLOYMENT

An Analysis of the Major Problems of Post-War Planning

By William H. Stead

Full employment of our peacetime manpower is America's goal. What about a program? What are the obstacles? This penetrating and constructive analysis of the entire problem will be indispensable to every one concerned with a humane and prosperous reconversion. The author's own proposals, written out of long, first-hand experience in federal labor and employment services, throw authoritative light on the programs ahead. $3.00

All books available at your bookstore or from

HARPER & BROTHERS, 49 E. 33d St., N. Y. 16

In order to neutralize outraged world opinion British "public-relations" experts were sent to Athens, where they immediately began to put out stories about the barbarity of the E. A. M. fighters and especially about their uncivilized practice of taking civilian hostages. Here are the facts concerning these hostages. After the first few days of fighting, when it became clear that the "silly little band of Communists"—Ambassador Leeper's estimate of the E. A. M.—was not going to give up easily, General Scobie began to take civilian hostages from the working-class districts, shipping some to North Africa and keeping others in concentration camps in or about Athens-Piraeus. By December 10 the number of British-held hostages exceeded 10,000. The E. A. M. Central Committee protested repeatedly to Archbishop Damaskinos and others, but the arrests continued. In mid-December, therefore, the E. A. M. as a necessary measure of defense for its sympathizers, ordered that civilian hostages should be taken, but on December 28 and on several other days it offered to release all its hostages if Scobie would do the same. No reply to this offer was ever received. While I am on the subject, it may not be irrelevant to mention that at the moment of writing several thousand Greek anti-fascists are held in British concentration camps in Egypt, Libya, and East Africa, their crime being that they "mutinied" in April, 1944, in order to force the British and their puppet, King George, to allow E. A. M. representation in the government in exile (see The Nation of May 13, 1944).

The "White Book" contains many other surprising documents, such as the almost unbelievable telegram of Regent Damaskinos to the E. A. M. Central Committee informing it that it must send an exclusively Communist delegation to the Varkiza peace conference, and even naming two of the three delegates. It is not difficult to imagine how quickly this additional proof of its domination by Communists would have been broadcast had the E. A. M. complied with the Regent's demand.

The Varkiza agreement was signed on February 12, 1945. In return for surrendering its arms the E. A. M. was promised freedom to engage in political activities, and the government guaranteed civil and political liberties and undertook to organize a non-political national army. It is worth noting here that the E. A. M. later published a second White Book—"Violations of Varkiza, February-June, 1945" (Athens, 1945)—showing that the Varkiza agreement had not been carried out. This second collection of documents has not been translated, but it is no secret in this country that the provisions of the agreement were not fulfilled (see The Nation of November 3, 1945). The persecution of liberal as well as left-wing elements in Greece, has approximated a nation-wide reign of terror; the Minister of Justice admitted in July that 13,000 persons were in jail. The new army now being organized is royalist from top to bottom, the National Guard includes a large number of quisling Security Battalion men, and the chief of the Athens police force is a notorious collaborationist who, after serving under Metaxas, retained his position during the occupation. It might be added that an estimated 70,000 British troops are being maintained in Greece to preserve "law and order."

The comprehensiveness and authority of the E. A. M.

White Books become evident when they are compared with the British and Papandreou publications. Papandreou's "The Liberation of Greece" (Athens, 1945) contains documents covering the period from December, 1943, to his resignation as Premier in January, 1945. It is a pity that this collection has not been translated, for one seldom reads an apologia which so thoroughly damns its author. The documents Papandreou excluded are not more damaging to him than those he included. For example, he gives the text of a telegram to Churchill and Eden in which he declared that he was "seriously disturbed by the situation developing in Greece, where the regions evacuated by the Germans are being occupied by the E. A. M." "I consider it my duty," he said, "to communicate to you my conviction that in the face of this developing critical situation, political means for coping with it are no longer adequate. Only the immediate appearance of impressive British forces in Greece, and up to the Turkish frontier, will suffice to alter the situation." The date of this telegram was September 22, 1944. The E. A. M. representatives had entered the government on September 2. Obviously Papandreou could not have consulted them before sending this message to the British leaders. In other words, the Greek Premier, on his own initiative and without the knowledge or consent of his Cabinet, was appealing to the heads of a foreign state to furnish armed forces to be used against an organization which he had invited into his government and to which he had given six of twenty Cabinet seats. A comparison of the Papandreou and E. A. M. documents reveals also that Papandreou failed to publish the key documents concerning the most significant event of his premiership, the outbreak of armed hostilities.

The British government has presented its side of the story in a White Paper entitled "Documents Regarding the Situation in Greece" (London, 1943). This consists of depositions of prominent Greeks and of British diplomatic and military representatives to the effect that the E. A. M. was taking hostages and committing wholesale atrocities. The hostages have been dealt with above. The reports of atrocities seem to have had some influence; they were repeated by Sir Walter Citrine after his mission to Greece to investigate the conditions of Greek trade unions ("Interim Report of Delegation from the British Trades Union Conference," London, 1945). The evidence indicates clearly that undisciplined elements on both sides were guilty of atrocities. But there is no more reason for believing that the E. A. M. excesses were authorized or condoned by the E. A. M. leadership than for holding General Scobie responsible for the excesses of the British and Greek-government troops. And if any reader doubts that both British officers and soldiers committed atrocities in Greece, he is invited to read Document 95 of the "E. A. M. White Book."

Fundamentally, however, the whole atrocity issue is beside the point. This was noted by Sir Richard Acland in his speech in the British Parliament on January 19, 1945. "In any civil war," he said, "the question is never to be settled . . . by asking the question, 'Who has committed the most atrocities?' or 'Who committed any atrocities?' The question is, 'Which party pushed the whole situation over the dividing line which separates the possibility of discussion and compromise from the impossibility of discussion and compro-

A vital sociological survey — in the tradition of Middletown

BLACK METROPOLIS

A Study of Negro Life in a Northern City

by St. Clair Drake and Horace R. Cayton with an introduction

by Richard Wright

"It is profoundly gratifying to welcome a great book in this field . . . By virtue of its range, its labor and its insight, the book seems certain to become a landmark not only in race studies but in the broader field of social anthropology . . . The brilliant Wright introduction is the best single essay in its field I have read. From cover to cover, this is a book of intellectual discipline and talent."

—THOMAS SANCTON, New Republic

"This is an authoritative, carefully documented analysis of the socio-economic status of the Negro in Chicago. The book is forthrightly written. It does not substitute opinion for fact. It evaluates prejudice. This is a must book for all socially-minded citizens."

—WILTON KROGMAN, Associate Professor of Anatomy and Physical Anthropology, University of Chicago.

Charts and diagrams, comprehensive index, 809 pages. $5.00

HARCOURT, BRACE & COMPANY

mise?' " In other words, the important question is not how each side behaved after the shooting started, but which side was primarily responsible for the beginning of the shooting. It is significant that this question has been evaded both in the British White Paper and in the parliamentary speeches of Churchill and Eden. If the British have a case, it is time they produced the evidence. Until they do so, the E. A. M. version remains unanswerable.

NOTES BY THE WAY

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

ON THE WAY to the station the rain whipped my face, the wind whirled my hat away. When, completely disheveled, I finally boarded the Third Avenue local, I was disgusted with the world and the weather. I opened the newest copy of Horizon, which I had picked up as I left the office, and found this poem by Dylan Thomas.

FERN HILL

Now as I was young and easy under the apple boughs
About the lilting house and happy as the grass was green,
The night above the dingle starry,
Time let me hail and climb
Golden in the heydays of his eyes,
And honored among wagons I was prince of the apple towns
And once below a time I lordly had the trees and leaves
Trail with daisies and barley
Down the rivers of the windfall light.

And as I was green and carefree, famous among the barns
About the happy yard and singing as the farm was home,
In the sun that is young once only,
Time let me play and be
Golden in the mercy of his means,
And green and golden I was huntsman and herdsman, the calves
Sang to my horn, the foxes on the hills barked clear and cold,
And the sabbath rang slowly
In the pebbles of the holy streams.

All the sun long it was running, it was lovely, the hay-
Fields high as the house, the tunes from the chimneys, it was air
And playing, lovely and watery
And fire green as grass.
And nightly under the simple stars
As I rode to sleep the owls were bearing the farm away,
All the moon long I heard, blessed among stables, the nightjars
Flying with the ricks, and horses
Flashing into the dark

And then to awake, and the farm, like a wanderer white
With the dew, come back, the cock on his shoulder: it was all Shining, it was Adam and maiden,
The sky gathered again
And the sun grew round that very day.
So it must have been after the birth of the simple light
In the first, spinning place, the spellbound horses walking warm
Out of the whinnying green stable
On to the fields of praise.

And honored among foxes and pheasants by the gay house
Under the new made clouds and happy as the heart was long
In the sun born over and over,
I ran my heedless ways,
My wishes raced through the house-high hay
And nothing I cared, at my sky blue trades, that time allows
In all his tuneful turning so few and such morning songs
Before the children green and golden
Follow him out of grace.

Nothing I cared, in the lamb white days, that time would take me
Up to the swallow-thronged loft by the shadow of my hand,
In the moon that is always rising,
Nor that riding to sleep
I should hear him fly with the high fields
And wake to the farm forever fled from the childless land.
Oh as I was young and easy in the mercy of his means,
Time held me green and dying
Though I sang in my chains like the sea.

It is not a perfect poem. But anyone who doesn't "understand" it, who isn't transported to "the fields of praise" should take out papers in the League for Sanity in Poetry and stay there.

EVA BRAUN'S poor little diary of her romance with Adolf Hitler seems to me one of the more pathetic shards thrown up by the massive explosion of World War II. Eva took pride in the fact that she was "the mistress of Germany's and the world's greatest man," but she will cut a curious figure in the gallery of the mistresses of the great. Yet it is appropriate, no doubt, that Hitler's paramour should have been a simple, rather dowdy little fräulein who sought neither power nor riches from her great connection but only the conjugal affection and attention which are a woman's due in the best of all petty bourgeois worlds.

Instead, Adolf breaks promises and forgets her birthday, leaves town without saying goodby, and hurts her feelings by treating her as if she were his mistress.

> Yesterday we were invited for supper at the Hotel Vierjahreszeiten. I'd sat next to him for three hours and couldn't say a word to him. When taking leave, he handed me an envelope containing money, as he'd done once before. If only he'd at least added a greeting or a kind word I'd have been so happy, but he never thinks of anything like that.

She can't understand why he is so "mean." She is "mortally unhappy" and wishes she had a dog. "If only I had a dog."

Then a rival turns up. The name of the rival is "Walküre," unbelievably, and Eva says "she looks it, including her legs." "If this is true," says Eva, "he'll soon have annoyed her until she is slim." I'm sure Eva burst into tears after she wrote that. . . . She talks of suicide.

Then the diary ends. This was 1935. But Eva stood it for ten years more. She took poison in the Chancellery only after it had been surrounded by enemy troops. And I'm inclined to think that Eva's suicide is "internal evidence" that Hitler is dead. For she would never have deserted him. On the contrary she would have clung to life as long as she thought that he by any chance might be still alive—and savable.

Eva Braun was probably the only human being in the world who loved Hitler "for himself." That is her small distinction. It is also Hitler's only claim to human status. Too good for him—but who can fathom or ever quite dismiss the love of a woman for a heel?

I HAVE ONLY A VAGUE IDEA of what the new philosophy of existentialism is all about. I can only say that it exists. Witness the following news dispatch:

> Paris, November 13 (ONA)—The existentialists, new Paris literary sect, finally found an "angel" to back one of their plays, but he turned out to be a swindler who had stolen the 100,000 francs he advanced them, resulting today in the arrest of one of their leaders on charges of receiving stolen goods.
>
> The arrested leader is Simone Beauvoir, author of the existentialist play "Bouches Inutiles," the play the "angel" was to have backed. The swindler in "angel's" clothing identified himself to authorities as one Néron, "a poet in my spare time." When Jean Sartres, head of the sect, rushed to jail to bail out his deluded assistant, he found her in a cell hard at work on a new play, unmindful of her grim environment.

A friend who reads Les Lettres Françaises passed on another existential item which should amuse everyone but Orville Prescott. It is a cartoon in which two intellectuals greet each other opposite the Café de Flore. One says to the other, "Comment ça va, l'existence?" "Oh," says the other, "comme ci comme Sartre."

An essay on existentialism in its literary aspects will shortly appear in these pages.

A CORRESPONDENT IN BOSTON writes me anent my remarks about the language of censors, as set forth in the decision which found "Strange Fruit" guilty of being obscene.

> But these judges of our Supreme Judicial Court are long-winded, fussy, and not always clear when they are expounding the law of the land, even when they are not censors. Unhappy we, not to be living in the days of Shaw and Holmes—who struck at the jugular vein, who reduced the issues of law involved to a happy epigram.

He adds that the name of the dissenter in the case of "Strange Fruit"—that phrase sounds like publicity for the Fruit of the Month Club—is Henry T. Lummus, "who is capable of wit and the bon mot." It was given as Charles Lumus in the item on which I based my comment. I'm sorry.

FROM OVERHEARING, not listening, to the radio I gather that the thing to do is to take a powder. It makes you attractive. And if it doesn't work in just twelve days your headache will be cheerfully refunded.

Next Week in The Nation
"WARTIME MISSION IN SPAIN, 1942-1945"
By Carlton J. H. Hayes
Reviewed by Thomas J. Hamilton

"A book to buy and read, and read again, and lend your friends."
—Pasadena Star News and Post

The WAR POETS

Edited by Oscar Williams

An Anthology of the War Poetry of the Twentieth Century

"Indisputably the best coverage . . . of much of the best poetry of our era."
—Winfield Townley Scott, Providence Journal

"A copious and interesting survey . . . will have permanent value."
—F. Cudworth Flint, Virginia Quarterly Review

"An unparalleled job."
—Howard Baer, Chicago News

"I cannot too strongly recommend it to all who love essential literature."
—N. Y. Herald Tribune Book Review

Included by the Nation and the New Republic in their lists of Notable Books of 1945.

Among the poets represented:

Wilfred Owen
E. E. Cummings
Thomas Hardy
W. B. Yeats
W. H. Auden
Dylan Thomas
Marianne Moore
Robert Frost
Delmore Schwartz
Lt. Com. Richard Eberhart
Sgt. Randall Jarrell
Cpl. Karl Shapiro
Pvt. Willard Maas

At all bookstores • $5.00

John Day

BORZOI BOOKS

"Mr. Haggin's books on recorded music have been the best of their kind, and by far the best."
—Ralph Bates, The Nation

Fourth Revised Edition

MUSIC ON RECORDS

by B. H. Haggin

The fourth revised edition, brought completely up to recent date, of a guide-book which even the most casual collector of recorded music will find invaluable: information and advice on compositions, performances, recordings, and the care of a record library.

A BORZOI BOOK.
For sale at all bookshops for $2.00 and published in New York by
ALFRED · A · KNOPF

Read THE Human Events PAMPHLET for December

THE ATOMIC BOMB VERSUS CIVILIZATION

by

ROBERT M. HUTCHINS

Can We Save Our World from Destruction?
Read this Straightforward Answer!
Twenty cents a copy, six for one dollar, from Human Events Inc.

608 South Dearborn Street
CHICAGO 5, ILLINOIS

KAETHE
1867-1945
KOLLWITZ

LITHOGRAPHS DRAWINGS
WEEKDAYS 9-9, SUNDAYS 2-6
Books in English, German and French
Large selection of art books and reproductions
THE TRIBUNE BOOK AND ART CENTER
100 WEST 42ND STREET
6th Ave. Subway Arcade beneath Schulte Cigar Store

NOTICE OF CHANGE OF ADDRESS

Nation subscribers should give at least three weeks' notice of a change of address, indicating the old as well as the new address.

BRIEFER COMMENT

The Peoples of America

MUCH THAT IS WRONG with Louis Adamic's "A Nation of Nations" (Harper, $3.50) derives from the fact that its approach to the history of American ethnic groups is a good deal behind the times. In the past, certainly, American peoples of non-English ancestry were pretty much disregarded by historians—partly because historians are likely to be preoccupied with events rather than peoples but partly also because the prejudices of the Anglo-American background were incorporated in their work. Today, however, most American historians recognize the composite character of the American nation and write accordingly. Yet Adamic reverts to the late nineteenth century in order to assail Henry Cabot Lodge and John Fiske for having failed to acknowledge that a sufficient number of Irishmen stood by Washington when the going was tough.

Had Adamic's sense of outrage over the past errors of American historians been tempered by an awareness of recent developments in the field of ethnic historiography, his account might have contained more comment on the social life of ethnic groups and fewer sketchy biographies of prominent people who have come out of them. He should realize that the outstanding individual very likely gains success by casting off the group culture and adopting the dominant mores, and that his accomplishment is therefore but an imperfect reflection of the group. The fact, for example, that "one of Edward R. Stettinius's grandmothers was a Reilly" has not even incidental bearing upon Stettinius's career and tells us nothing about the character of the Irish as an ethnic group. Moreover, Adamic places greater stress upon group contribution than upon group participation and for the most part ignores the acculturative process. Thus, by indirection, he endows ethnic groups in the American environment with a stability they do not in fact possess. Finally, he writes of ethnic achievement in a manner to encourage minority chauvinisms which are as dangerous as the notion of Anglo-Saxon superiority. This is particularly true of the section on the Irish, which is geared to the findings of the American Irish Historical Society and ignores Oscar Handlin's realistic account of Irish impact on Boston.

Over a period of years Adamic has done much to broaden our understanding of the problem of ethnic groups. However, before he proceeds with the ambitious task of editing the Peoples of America Series, to which the present volume is prefatory, he would do well to read Marcus Hansen and Caroline Ware on the writing of the history of ethnic groups.

EDWARD N. SAVETH

Desert Exploit

THE SOMEWHAT ROMANTIC INTEREST in the Near East which causes me to keep on my shelves the books of Lawrence, Bell, Doughty, Stark, and others makes it difficult to arrive at a sound judgment concerning Somerset de Chair's "The Golden Carpet" (Harcourt, Brace, $3.50). The astonishing exploit it describes—the capture of Bagdad in 1941 by the tiny British column that pitted itself against forty thousand pro-Axis Iraqi troops—is itself enough to make the book worth reading. Yet I was disappointed. The desert, because it excludes the machine and imposes great hardships, has a way of pointing up the valor and the wilfulness of action. It was not the fighting in France nor yet Allenby's great drive to Damascus that produced the great book of the last war, but the Arab skirmishing to the south. Exciting as it sometimes is, "The Golden Carpet" contains no trace of the deep thrill of the "Seven Pillars." There is vigor in the telling, though the intrusion of meaningless detail is oftentimes an annoyance. The desert, which almost always compels the true artist to evolve a special style, has had no such effect on De Chair. And, indeed, the desert is strangely missing from this book, the style of which is racy and practical, though frequently marred by patches of really bad writing. There is little of that portrayal of character which is so fascinating in Lawrence. And for all the explicit statement to the contrary, a sense of momentousness is lacking. That the "Kingcol" expedition as described here is an exploit and not a part of history is due to the fact that the author is not concerned with the drama of emergent and conflicting freedoms, as was Lawrence. I know that the conventional military opinion is that the "Seven Pillars" would have been better without the introspective searching and the "wisdom." Captain de Chair's book will stand as one of the best military books of this war, but it is a Golden Carpet without the magic of flight.

RALPH BATES

Labor's Problems and Prospects

THE MAJOR ACTIVITIES AND POLICIES of labor during the war and the outlook for the immediate future are examined in "Labor Today and Tomorrow" by Aaron Levenstein (Knopf, $2.75). Using Sewell Avery as a symbol of the past Mr. Levenstein traces the background of labor's no-strike pledge and the success with which it was carried out. The fight over the issue of union security and the elaboration of the compromise, the maintenance of membership provision, are described. The forms in which this provision were granted by the War Labor Board are not indicated, but the opposition of some managerial groups, notably Sewell Avery, is discussed.

A chapter devoted to the division in the ranks of organized labor does not add much that is new to our understanding; as for the chapter on the influence of Franklin D. Roosevelt, it would be regarded as below standard even in a mediocre book. The aggressiveness of management in the post-war period, its obvious confidence that it can "take on" and lick the unions if necessary, is not unrelated to the departure of Roosevelt. It is not necessarily unwise to postpone domestic controversy, or at least to reduce it to a minimum, while the nation is fighting for its existence. The best and most informative chapter is the one dealing with the influence and policies of the Communists in the labor movement. Mr. Levenstein follows the zigzags of the party line from the Molotov-Ribbentrop pact to the summer of 1945, and the latter-day patriots are revealed for what they are, unprincipled, brazen, and fairly effective. While the book is frequently interesting, it is a bit disappointing. The author knows a great deal about labor, and his judgment is usually

THE
MENORAH JOURNAL

The World's Leading Jewish Magazine

Published quarterly by The Menorah Association, Inc.

IN THE CURRENT ISSUE

THE ROAD AHEAD . Dr. Mark Wischnitzer

A distinguished historian and social scientist inquires cannily into the present state and potentialities of Judaism in America. Are American Jews capable of developing an intellectual and spiritual life comparable in brilliance and influence to the "Golden Ages" in Babylon and Spain?

SCENES AND CHARACTERS FROM THE AMERICAN EPIC . . Charles Reznikoff

Another in a series of sharp vignettes of historic persons and places in our country's history. This time: Gold-Rush Days in San Francisco (1849). By an imaginative writer with respect for facts.

ZIONISM RECONSIDERED . . . . Dr. Hannah Arendt

A masterly 20,000-word analysis and clarification, penetrating and objective, in the light both of Zionism's own development during the past half-century and of the present international situation and events in the Middle East.

BRITISH POLICY IN PALESTINE . . Prof. Carl J. Friedrich

A reply to Sir John Hope Simpson.

THE SAINT AND THE MERMAID . . . André Spire

A subtle tale, interwoven of Hebraic and Gallic wit, by a leading French poet now in our midst. With a portrait of the author and illustrations by Jacques Zucker.

REVIVAL IN FRANCE . . . Edmond Fleg

A Letter from Paris.

IS THERE A "JEWISH MUSIC"? . . Hilda Pinson

Some answer to the question may be found in this brilliant survey of a music season in New York.

GENESIS OF THE ATOMIC BOMB . . . Raymond Swing

The full text of Raymond Swing's famous first broadcast on the atomic bomb.

NEW YORK JEWS AND COUNTRY JEWS . William Zukerman

A pungent comparison.

DISCUSSION OF BOOKS: Koestler's Confession, by Dr. Israel Knox; The Case of Franz Werfel, by Dr. Trude Weiss-Rosmarin; Soldiers of Faith, by Marie Syrkin; What Prospect in Europe? by Dr. Hugo Marx.

Frontispiece by Nat Werner

This great issue $1.50 or free with a year's subscription ($5.00).

Special Rates to Students and Teachers

THE MENORAH JOURNAL
63 Fifth Avenue New York 3, N. Y.

sound. Yet his volume is not well integrated, and he is inclined, especially in the first chapters, to "write down" to his readers. Nevertheless, this volume is a reasonably worthwhile addition to the literature on the current labor movement.

PHILIP TAFT

MOTION PICTURES

RKO NOW

Brooklyn
BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT REPUBLIC
TILYOU
Coney Island
Queens
Keith's
FLUSHING
Keith's
RICH. HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway

"Loud, Lively Comedy." —N. Y. Sun. "Loaded With Laughter." —N. Y. Herald-Tribune

SAMUEL GOLDWYN presents
DANNY KAYE
'WONDER MAN'
In TECHNICOLOR — WITH VIRGINIA MAYO • VERA-ELLEN
— PLUS —
'FOREVER YOURS' GALE STORM

It's Paramount's Gay Whirl of Romance, Adventure & Rhythm!
Dorothy LAMOUR • Arturo deCORDOVA
"MASQUERADE in MEXICO"
WITH
Patric Knowles • Ann Dvorak • George Rigaud

IN PERSON
THE BAND OF THE YEAR
TONY PASTOR and his ORCHESTRA
— plus —
The Nonchalants
— plus —
Paul & Eva Reyes
Extra Added Attraction!
Marion Hutton
Don Baker at the Organ

Midnight Feature Nightly Buy Victory Bonds

NOW PLAYING PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

STAGE PLAYS

Kermit Bloomgarden & George Heller present
DEEP ARE THE ROOTS
A New Play by ARNAUD d'USSEAU and JAMES GOW
Staged by ELIA KAZAN
FULTON THEATRE Forty-sixth Street West of Broadway. Circle 6-6380.
Evenings 8:40, $4.20, $3.60, $3.00, $2.40, $1.80, $1.20. Matinees Wednesday and Saturday, $3.00, $2.40, $1.80, $1.20. Tax inclusive.

"DESERVES ITS GREAT SUCCESS!"—Nichols, Times
Rodgers and Hammerstein present
MADY CHRISTIANS • OSCAR HOMOLKA
in JOHN VAN DRUTEN'S
I REMEMBER MAMA
from Kathryn Forbes' "Mama's Bank Account"
with JOHN TETZEL • ADRIENNE GESSNER • RICHARD BISHOP
MUSIC BOX 45th Street, West of Broadway. Phone Circle 6-4636. Eves. 8:35 Sharp. Mats. Thurs. and Sat., 2:35 Sharp.

MICHAEL TODD Presents
UP IN CENTRAL PARK
Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS Lyrics by DOROTHY FIELDS Music by SIGMUND ROMBERG
BROADWAY THEATRE, Broadway at 53rd Street. Matinees: WED. & SAT.

East Meets West

MOST WRITERS ON THE FAR EAST either deal with some particular section of the Orient as an isolated entity or devote their attention predominantly to the impact of the West on the East. In "New Frontiers in Asia" (Knopf, $3) Mr. Jaffe takes as his initial point of reference the significance of the Orient, particularly India, China, and Japan, for the United States. From the standpoint of economics, and to a lesser extent politics, he makes it clear that the well-being of the American people will be largely determined by the wisdom of our Far Eastern policies. And in the process of this demonstration he provides us with a wealth of information on what is wrong with current American and British policies toward India and the Empire and with American policy toward China and Japan. As the first general book on the Far East to appear since the end of the war, it is particularly helpful in furnishing the background for the post-war crises that have developed through the East. Mr. Jaffe lays much of the blame for these crises on the shortsightedness of British imperial policies. He believes that the Indian and colonial problems could be resolved, and a large part of Anglo-American friction dissipated, if the British would devote their efforts primarily to a modernization of their industrial plant and cooperate actively in the expansion of world economy through a raising of living standards. Apart from the fact that it tends to be somewhat harsher in its criticism of British imperial policies than of corresponding flaws in our own policies, Mr. Jaffe's analysis is both sound and illuminating. The only conspicuous omission, from this reviewer's standpoint, is the author's failure to give more space to the implications of American and British Far Eastern policies with respect to the system of political democracy which both profess to cherish.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

Coming Next Week!

ATOM BOMB SUPPLEMENT

as part of the regular December 22 issue, reporting on the recently concluded Nation conference.

You will want to read the views of Dr. Henry De Wolf Smyth, Leo Szilard, Herbert Evatt, Walter Millis, Helen Gahagan Douglas, Boris Pregel, Thurman Arnold, Charles Bolté, and a host of others on the challenge of atomic power and international cooperation.

THE NATION

Art

CLEMENT GREENBERG

IT IS seldom that so many great pictures can be seen together as at the Brooklyn Museum's present "Landscape" show (through January 1). Starting—a bit paradoxically—with a superb little "Crucifixion" by Lorenzo Monaco in the fourteenth century, it progresses through the Renaissance, the baroque, and the nineteenth century, to come to an anti-climactic stop with a dead bird in the grass executed with meretricious and astounding precision by the young American Andrew Wyeth. The great climaxes on the way are Van Goyen's gray-on-brown portrait of a cloudy sky, called "View of Rynland"; Guardi's "View of Mestre"—rectangular forms suffused with pink, pearl-gray, and light sienna or umber—and Matisse's magnificent "Paysage du Montalban," in which effects are massed not only by design but also by color, green being summarily transposed into black, umber, and gray, and the trunks of saplings dealt with in cerulean blue.

Around these masterpieces are gathered other lesser ones—only to be called lesser because of the presence of the first three—by Sassetta, Veronese, Breughel, Annibale Carracci (who on the evidence of the sample here might have become one of the greatest of all landscapists had not his period and mistaken ambition forced him to pursue the grand style), Seghers, Ruysdael, Rembrandt, Fragonard, Constable, Corot, Courbet, Eakins, Cézanne, Henri Rousseau, and several others.

There are some disappointments: notably the two Claude Lorrains, which in spite of excellent passages are wooden. Renoir, who painted some of the best landscapes of all time, is represented by a picture in which only the foreground is inspired. And the hysteria in the Van Gogh street scene is merely mechanical.

Not all the paintings here are landscapes in the strict definition of the term, but one is grateful in the main for the broadness with which that term has been applied. Yet the looseness of terminology or slackening of taste that induced the museum to include Tchelitchew, Tanguy, Seligmann, Ernst, Berman, Burchfield, and Wyeth in the show cannot be forgiven. Since the museum was willing to go that far, room might also have been made for Mattson, Henry Varnum Poor, Russell Cowles, and Arnold Friedman. The first three are tame, it is true, but at least more solidly in possession of their genre than any other conventional American landscapists of the moment; while Friedman's rose and green mountain scenes can hold their own with anything in the line of open-air painting being produced right now (exception made for two or three Frenchmen). Incidentally, why were Pissarro, Sisley, Derain, Vlaminck, Utrillo, Segonzac, and Bonnard left out? To make room for Thomas Moran, Regis Gignoux, Ben Shahn, Walter Stümpfig, Jr., and a very doubtful and inferior Giorgione?

Käthe Kollwitz died in Germany two months ago and is being commemorated by two shows, one at the Galerie St. Etienne (through December 23) and the other at the Tribune Book and Art Center (through December 17). Apparently a strong talent, she was deflected as well as inspired by her sympathy with the suffering and the oppressed. The problems she proposes herself in her etchings and lithographs are solved sometimes with considerable success, but always within the academic framework, with light and shade used much as Rembrandt would have used them—only more nervously. It is in her woodcuts, where silhouette and texture show Munch's influence, that she tries to attain a greater intensity of expressiveness. Here the power is such that one is disappointed that it is not more. The passion inspired in her by her theme required a complementary passion for her medium, to counteract a certain inevitable excess. Because this excess remains—in our failure to be stirred as much as we feel we ought to be—her art never quite manages to soar into that sphere where Goya and Daumier move. Nevertheless, Käthe Kollwitz will not be forgotten; her seriousness and moral passion suffice to create a lasting personality if not a lasting art.

The oil-painting instalment of this year's Whitney Annual (through January 10) is a cut or two above the "Portrait of America" fiasco at Rockefeller Center, but this does not prevent it from sinking to what seems a new low—but I have this impression every year. Abstract art is copiously represented, but its practitioners do just as badly as everybody else—with a few exceptions, who are Gorky, Adolph Gottlieb, Feininger, and Karl Knaths. There is also a very good seascape by Marin, and a passable picture by Sol Wilson. Léger's large decoration is on a high level but disintegrates around a red-white-and-blue cocarde (the artist's answer to current events).

One's first impulse as a result of this show is to write off a whole generation of American painters. But perhaps here again the jury is to blame—by jury I mean the museum's staff. Or perhaps we have no right to expect anything much better. I don't know. It is possible that I have a jaundiced eye. But I do know that I am fed up with contemporary American art in wholesale quantities.

Records

B. H. HAGGIN

HERE is my pre-Christmas list of important works—well performed and recorded unless I say otherwise—that have been issued on records through November of the past year (the important December recordings I will review very shortly):

Bach: Concerto in D minor for 2 violins; Busch and Magnes with Busch Chamber Players (poor performance, poorly recorded); C Set X-253, 2.50.

Beethoven: Quartet Opus 18 No. 4; Budapest Quartet (recorded sound cold and hard); C Set 556, $5.50. Sonata Opus 57 ("Appassionata") for piano; Rubinstein (bad performance, imperfectly recorded); V Set 1018, $3.50. Symphony No. 7; Ormandy and Philadelphia Orchestra (poor performance; recorded sound strident on wide-range machine); C Set 557, $5.50. Symphony No. 9: Ormandy and Philadelphia Orchestra (poor performance, but preferable to other available versions); C Set 591, $8.50.

Bellini: Mira, Norma duet from "Norma"; Milanov and Harshaw (poorly sung by Harshaw); V 11-8924, $1.

Berlioz: Symphony "Harold in Italy"; Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony (poor performance, imperfectly recorded); V Set 989, $5.50.

Bizet: Excerpts from "Carmen" (including Stokowskian transcriptions of arias); Stokowski and New York City Symphony (bad performance); V Set 1002, $4.50.

Brahms: Symphony No. 3 (for second and fourth movements); Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony (not a good performance of these movements); V Set 1007, $4.50. Symphony No. 4; Ormandy and Philadelphia Orchestra (poor performance; recorded sound strident on wide-range machine); C Set 567, $5.50.

Chopin: Polonaise Opus 53; Iturbi (bad performance, badly recorded); V 11-8848, $1. The same work; Petri (poor performance, poorly recorded); C 17377-D, $1.

Debussy: Piano Music; Rubinstein (not well-performed; imperfectly recorded); V Set 998, $3.50. "Nuages" (poorly performed and recorded) and "Fêtes" (brashly recorded); Ormandy and Philadelphia Orchestra; C Set X-247, $2.50.

Franck: Prelude, Chorale, and Fugue for piano; Rubinstein (imperfect performance, imperfectly recorded); V Set 1004, $2.50.

Gershwin: "An American in Paris"; Rodzinski and New York Philharmonic (performance fair, poorly recorded) C Set X-246, $2.50.

Grétry: Airs de Ballet from "Céphale et Procris"; Defauw and Chicago Symphony; V 11-8825, $1.

Lalo: Symphonie Espagnole; Milstein and Philadelphia Orchestra under Ormandy (poorly recorded); C Set 564, $3.50.

Mendelssohn: "Fingal's Cave" or "Hebrides" Overture; Fiedler and Boston "Pops" Orchestra; V-11-8745, $1. Violin Concerto; Milstein and New York Philharmonic under Walter (performance too tense; recorded sound cold and dull); C Set 577, $4.50.

Mozart: Symphony K. 551 (known as "Jupiter"); Walter and New York Philharmonic (recorded sound strident on wide-range machine); C Set 565, $4.50. Porgi amor and Dove sono from "The Marriage of Figaro"; Steber (orchestral accompaniment not good); V 11-8850, $1.

Mussorgsky: Excerpts from "Boris Godunov" (Rimsky-Korsakov version); Kipnis with orchestra and chorus under Berezovsky; V Set 1000, $5.50. Superior to C Set 563 ($5.50) with performance by Pinza and Metropolitan Opera chorus and orchestra under Cooper.

Rimsky-Korsakov: Suite from "Le Coq d'or"; Mitropoulos and Minneapolis Symphony (performance and recording fair); C Set X-254, $2.50.

Schumann: Piano Concerto; Arrau (poor performance) with Detroit Symphony under Krueger; V Set 1009, $4.50.

Strauss: "Till Eulenspiegel"; Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony (poor performance); V Set DV-1, $4.50 (plastic records, to be used with light pickups only). "Tod und Verklärung"; Stokowski and N. Y. City Symphony (poor performance, imperfectly recorded); V Set 1006, $3.50.

Tchaikovsky: Symphony No. 6 ("Pathétique"); Rodzinski and New York Philharmonic (poor performance; recorded sound strident on wide-range machine); C Set 558, $5.50.

Verdi: Pace, pace, mio Dio from "La Forza del Destino" Milanov; V 11-8927, $1. Parmi veder le lagrime from "Rigoletto," and De' miei bollenti spiriti from "La Traviata"; Peerce; V 11-8926, $1.

Wagner: Prelude to "Lohengrin"; Toscanini and N. B. C. Symphony (imperfectly recorded); V 11-8807, $1. Excerpts from "Tristan und Isolde"; Rodzinski and New York Philharmonic with Traubel (poor performance, poorly recorded); C Set 573, $5.50. Brangäne's Warning from "Tristan"; Thebom; V 11-8928, $1.

JAZZ: NEW PERFORMANCES

Davison, Brunis, Schroeder, etc.: "Tin Roof Blues" and "Royal Garden Blues"; Commodore 556, $1.

Butterfield, de Paris, Bowman, etc.: "How Come You Do Me" and "Struttin' With Some Barbecue"; Commodore 561, $1.

Spanier, Mole, Schroeder, etc.: "Memphis Blues" and "Sweet Sue, Just You"; Commodore 1518, $1.50.

JAZZ: REISSUED PERFORMANCES

Armstrong, Dodds, Hines, etc.: "Wild Man Blues"; Decca 80059, $.75.

Teschmaker, Spanier, Sullivan, Krupa, etc.: "There'll Be Some Changes Made" and "I've Found a New Baby"; Decca 80063.

LANGUAGE IS POWER
. . . Forge ahead, win special assignments, promotion, better job in global peace time opportunities through ability to speak a foreign language.
MASTER A NEW LANGUAGE quickly, easily, correctly by LINGUAPHONE
The world-famous Linguaphone Conversational Method brings voices of native teachers INTO YOUR OWN HOME. You learn the new language by LISTENING. It's amazingly simple; thousands have succeeded. ◆ ◆ 29 LANGUAGES
Send for Free book, Call for Free demonstration
LINGUAPHONE INSTITUTE
81 RCA Bldg., New York 20 • Circle 7-0830

BOOKS FOUND FREE!
WHAT BOOKS DO YOU WANT?
We quote lowest market prices. No charge for locating Hard-to-Find and Out-of-Print Books. All books, OLD or NEW mailed POST-FREE
SEARCHLIGHT BOOK NATION
22 East 17th Street, New York City

Books in Short

"Studio Europe," by John Groth, illustrated by the author (Vanguard, $3.50). A professional artist and amateur reporter summarizes with pencil and typewriter his personal experiences on the way from the Normandy beaches to Berlin, where he made an unofficial entry ahead of the crowd to the displeasure of the brass hats. Mr. Groth's sketches, which incline toward caricature and show him to be a disciple of Daumier, are admirable. As a writer he is less sophisticated, but he tells his story in a straightforward and engaging manner.

"The Cossacks," by Maurice Hindus (Doubleday, Doran, $3). Before the Russian revolution the Cossack was a symbol of tyranny, although, as Mr. Hindus explains, the Cossack peoples originated as bands of outlaws, political fugitives, and escaped serfs who founded a breed of fierce individualists. Only after they had fought the Czars for centuries did they come to terms with them. After 1917 the majority of the Cossacks fought the Soviet government too, and they bitterly resisted collectivization of the land. But once forced to accept the new regime, their drive and daring restored them to a leading role in peace and war. In this book Mr. Hindus gives a brief account of their history, but most of his space is devoted to "the Cossack of today," of whom he writes with first-hand knowledge.

"Hahnemann: The Adventurous Career of a Medical Rebel," by Martin Gumpert (L. B. Fischer, $3). Written in the breathless present tense which is all too popular with modern biographers, this book gives an impressionistic account of Samuel Hahnemann, founder of the homeopathic school of medicine. As a medical man himself, Dr. Gumpert is well qualified to discuss the scientific contribution of his hero. It is a pity, therefore, that he felt it necessary to wrap up what he wanted to say in a more than homeopathic coating of popularization.

"Thomas Jefferson," by Claude G. Bowers (Houghton Mifflin, $10). Ambassador Bowers's biography was previously issued in three separate volumes—"The Young Jefferson," "Jefferson and Hamilton," and "Jefferson in Power." Reviewing "The Young Jefferson" in these pages Henry A. Wallace recommended it as a help to understanding "how deeply imbedded is the essence of American democracy." This applies to the complete work, which in this new and most attractive edition should make a still wider appeal.

CONTRIBUTORS

L. S. STAVRIANOS, a member of the Department of History at Smith College, worked with the Office of Strategic Services during the war. He is the author of "The Balkan Federation: A History of the Movement for Balkan Unity in Modern Times" and "Greece, the War and Aftermath."

EDWARD N. SAVETH, now engaged in research in New York, formerly taught history at City College. He has contributed to the Political Science Quarterly and the New York Times Book Review.

RALPH BATES is the author of "The Olive Field," "The Undiscoverables," "The Fields of Paradise," and other novels.

PHILIP TAFT is a member of the Department of Economics at Brown University.

MAXWELL S. STEWART is an associate editor of The Nation.

The
New Statesman and Nation
England's Leading Weekly Review
may now be obtained through
THE NATION
20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y.
●
Yearly subscription $6.50 including postage
SPECIMEN copy on request

Letters to the Editors

Presenting the Vatican

Dear Sirs: The controversy over Professor Laski versus the Catholic church is welcome because it affords every American an opportunity to form an opinion on a vital subject. The debate revolves around these points: (1) Has the Vatican state any right to participate in international political action? (2) Is the Vatican state in favor of the Spanish government for selfish motives?

There should be no disagreement on the first. The Vatican state, as created by the Lateran Agreements of February 11, 1929, is by its own right a subject of international law, and is therefore entitled to the same rights and privileges as other subjects of international law.

In connection with its attitude toward Franco Spain, it is important to distinguish certain characteristics of the Vatican state in order to avoid erroneous interpretations and conclusions. The Vatican state is an absolute monarchy; this is evident from the fact that the three fundamental powers—the executive, the legislative, and the judicial—are vested solely in the supreme Pontiff. The territory is his; the subjects swear obedience to him; the laws he can abrogate at will. The Vatican state is, nevertheless, an elective-constitutional monarchy—showing its kinship with democracy—inasmuch as the Pope is elected by the College of Cardinals.

The Vatican state is entirely neutral—it abstains from competition for territory. It is a patrimonial state—its territory is the personal estate of the head of the Roman Catholic church. It is a confessional state—it openly confesses its dependence upon God. This means that it professes only principles and dogmas of the Roman Catholic church. The Vatican state has relations, as a state, that are international as well as internal—these are subordinated to what we have explained as its confessional character.

The Vatican state and the church are of the same judicial and moral identity; here we are confronted with the union, real and otherwise, of the two institutions. Canon law, the codification of divine laws, governs both state and church. Relations between the Catholic church and the Vatican state are those established by ecclesiastic doctrines: the state is sovereign in temporal matters, the church in spiritual matters. Conflicts between the two institutions cannot arise since the Pontiff is sovereign of both.

This unique connection between the Vatican state and the church has no replica in modern states.

Strange as it may seem because of the confessional character of the Vatican state, the church, in its relations with all nations, deals with a devil—as Christ did in the desert—for the good of souls. This was one reason which induced Pius XI to agree to the Lateran truce with another dictator, Il Duce; this explains the church's condemnation of pagan Nazi Germany and its life-and-death struggle with atheistic Bolshevism.

The Catholic church reaches the farthest corners of the world; it deals with all kinds of government, disregarding their political structure, on condition that religion is held in due esteem or that at least it is confined to its proper sphere in the life of nations. The church cannot show preference for any one form of government without exposing itself to a protest that might lead to schism and even bloodshed.

Professor Laski has a weak point when he attacks the vested interests of the church. The vested interests of the Holy See are no more venal than the vested interests of any one of the great powers. Winston Churchill openly expressed approval of the Franco regime during the Second World War. Franco was not a menace to the British Empire.

In a world in which capitalism is recognized as legitimate, vested interests cannot be set aside. In this respect the church acts like any incorporate organization striving to survive. In showing dissatisfaction with its vested interests, Professor Laski overlooks the acknowledged concern of the Roman Catholic church for mankind's universal needs.

GIUSEPPE DI GIOIA

New York, November 23

Memo from Indo-China

Dear Sirs: We have read with a great pleasure Andrew Roth's article about Indo-China, published in The Nation of October 27 and reprinted in the New York Herald Tribune's continental edition on November 18. Knowing Mr. Roth of old from his book "Japan Strikes South," we make ourselves bold enough to thank him sincerely in the name of the 25,000 Indo-Chinese resident in France and of our fellow-countrymen at home.

Mr. Roth is one of the staunchest champions of democracy and freedom, and his writings about Indo-China's problems will compel the attention of French and British reactionaries and imperialists.

All of us shall be happy to read more articles of his.

DR. HOANG-XUAN-MAN

General Delegation of the Indo-Chinese
Paris, November 20

Unsolved Political Murder

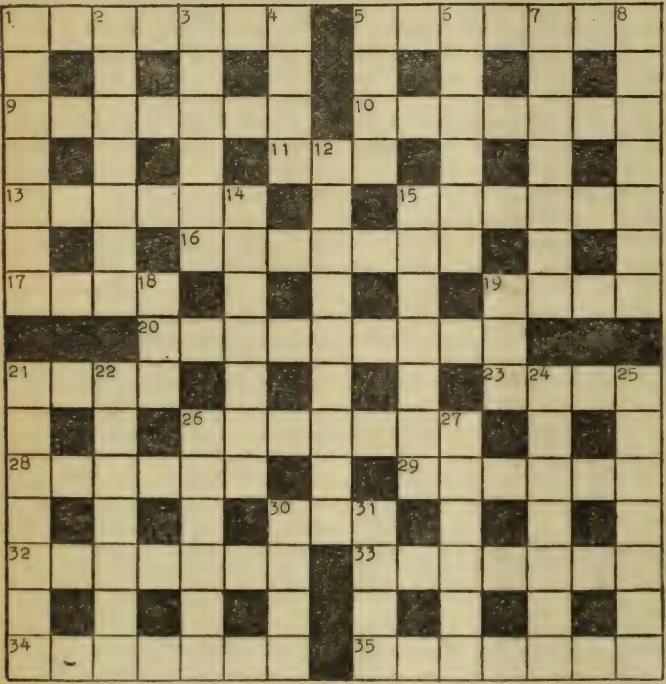
Dear Sirs: With due allowance for the pressure of world events, we are puzzled by the scant attention given by the daily press to a recent report by nineteen responsible individuals of an inquiry into the causes of the delay in finding the slayers of Carlo Tresca, editor of the Italian journal *Il Martello (*the Hammer). The report was issued in pamphlet form by the Tresca Memorial Committee, 112 East Nineteenth Street.

We feel keenly that the public is entitled to know what we discovered about this unsolved murder case. Objectively written, our statement was a conscientious effort to serve the cause of justice by a group which sees great social peril in unpunished political murder.

We pointed to some remarkable circumstances connected with District Attorney Hogan's investigation of the Tresca killing—especially the fact, of which we have documentary evidence, that Assistant District Attorney Louis Pagnucco, long in charge of the Italian end, had received honors and awards from Fascists. Obviously Pagnucco did not belong in a case in which Fascists were under strong suspicion from the start. Yet for many weeks Mr. Hogan refused to do anything about this, acting only when he learned that 117 citizens were about to petition the Governor for a special prosecutor. Then he promised a new inquiry, with Assistant District Attorney Lipsky in charge. But that didn't begin for more than two months, and a few weeks later Mr. Lipsky was working on another murder. Since then a deep fog of official silence has settled over the Tresca killing, committed nearly three years ago. One friend with intimate knowledge of Tresca's political conflicts, whose name was known to the prosecutor's office soon after the crime, has never been questioned.

Crossword Puzzle No. 139

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 Wrote The Night the Bed Fell On Grandfather
5 Old name for Scotland
9 One boy is a blessing to Benjamin
10 The strawberry-tree
11 Essential heart of a thingummybob
13 Red cod in a bale
15 Of a sour temper
16 Formerly the eldest son of French kings
17 Evidently not paid
19 Long-haired Scotch terrier — so long-haired it's hard to make head or tail of it!
20 Be less dear than another
21 America's principal street
23 Three-foot enclosure?
26 Tells or sells
28 When he starts shaking his head it's usually all up with you
29 Ward of Ko-Ko whom Nanki-poo was going to marry (hyphen, 3-3)
30 Easier to catch than to hold
32 Clown in Love's Labor's Lost
33 It appears on the book's title page
34 President who vainly endeavored to avoid war with England in 1812
35 Presage

DOWN

1 Put that in your pipe and smoke it!
2 Enfeeble
3 Being completely smashed, no wonder she is in bad!
4 What would you call one of the handles on a ship's steering-wheel?
5 He offered to share his savings with Orlando (As You Like It)
6 In calling Louis XIV of France this, was Arbuthnot trying to make a monkey out of him?
7 One of the big radio systems, probably
8 Severely simple, or simply severe
12 A capital compartment (two words, 5 & 4)
14 Don't look for any lightning moves from him!
15 Very near
18 It's your money he's after!
19 A tinker, and a sad drinker, in The Taming of the Shrew
21 I cod Mum just a little
22 Indices (anag.)
24 At no particular moment (two words, 3 & 4)
25 Reduced in rank for a witty remark in deed!
26 They installed central heating, warmed swimming baths, and the like, nearly 2,000 years ago.
27 Tommy Tucker had to sing for his 30 Shakespeare once likened England to this semi-paradise
31 It looks like 50 to 1 on the military policeman

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 138

ACROSS:—1 FULL STEAM AHEAD; 9 UNMINED; 10 DEVOTEE; 11 YODELS; 12 TRICKERY; 14 GATELEG; 15 TOSTI; 17 SEVEN; 19 CORRALS; 21 FOREPAWS; 23 ISRAEL; 25 EVINCED; 26 TWOFOLD; 27 BORROWED PLUMES.

DOWN:—1 FOUR YEARS; 2 LAME DOG; 3 SINGLETON; 4 EDDY; 5 MODERN GIRL; 6 HAVOC; 7 ANTHEMS; 8 DEWY; 13 BLACK WIDOW; 15 TOADSTOOL; 16 INVALIDES; 18 VERTIGO; 20 SEA FOAM; 21 FLEE; 22 PACER; 24 STUD.

Mr. Hogan owes it to the whole community to demonstrate clearly that he is doing something definite toward apprehending Tresca's murderers.

JOHN DEWEY
NORMAN THOMAS

New York, November 1

Discontent in Luzon

Dear Sirs: The September 15 issue of The Nation just arrived here and I read the article Who Bosses the Philippines? with a great deal of interest. I have been stationed in Pampanga Province, about sixty miles north of Manila, and have observed much agrarian discontent in this sugar-cane and rice-growing province; I am afraid it will flare up into open violence once the Americans pull out. The big landowners, some of whom were fighting the guerrillas during the Japanese occupation, find it now more prudent to stay in Manila. The same people are dead set against independence.

The army authorities show much naivete in evaluating progressive movements and easily succumb to the red scare. More articles of the kind are needed to give the G. I. a better understanding of the setup over here.

SOLDIER

Luzon, P. I., November 15

R E S O R T S

RELAX, REJOICE with AUTUMN at

Lakecrest

On Hunn's Lake • Stanfordville, N. Y.

90 miles from N. Y. Ideal location in the heart of DUTCHESS COUNTY. Excellent accommodations. Cordial hospitality. Recordings. Library. All seasonal sports. Via N.Y.C.R.R. to Amenia, N. Y. Open all year.

WRITE OR PHONE YOUR RESERVATIONS

EVA BERG, Director — Stanfordville 4168

BREEZEMONT PARK
ARMONK, N. Y.

35 MILES FROM NEW YORK CITY

"A Country Estate in the Scenic Hills of Westchester County"

The nearest of all nearby resorts. Exclusive location. Luxuriously furnished. Dignified. All sport activities. Excellent cuisine.

OPEN ALL YEAR — Phone Armonk Village 955

HUDSON VIEW HOTEL

HAVERSTRAW NEW YORK

A 50-minute ride!

"Deservedly Famous for 25 Years"

Fine Food—Scenic Beauty—Steamheated Private Baths—Sports—Quite Reasonable

Make Holiday Reservations NOW

Dietary Laws — Haverstraw 2076

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 161 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • DECEMBER 22, 1945 NUMBER 25, PART 1

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 673

EDITORIALS

Post-Potsdam Germany 675
Men in the Street 676
The Army Way 677

ARTICLES

Another Inquiry Begins by I. F. Stone 678
The Future Role of Britain by Aylmer Vallance 679
A Plan for Germany by Saul K. Padover 682
Who Owns a College? by Carey McWilliams 684
Victory for the Fatherland Front by Philip Jordan 686
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison 688
The People's Front by Del Vayo 689

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Argument on Rime:
  Karl Shapiro Objects 690
  Mr. Schwartz: Chapter and Verse 690
Hayes Tells All by Thomas J. Hamilton 692
Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall 694
Briefer Comment 695
Films by James Agee 697
Records by B. H. Haggin 698

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 699

CROSSWORD PUZZLE NO. 140 by Jack Barrett 700

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor J. KING GORDON
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

European Editor: J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates
LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS
CAREY MCWILLIAMS REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

PRESIDENT TRUMAN'S STATEMENT ON CHINA enunciates a policy which, if adhered to, will have sweeping effects. In so many words it demands unified democratic rule as the condition of American economic aid. This means that the Kuomintang, in order to survive, must not only make peace with the Communists and the lesser democratic groups but take them into the government. It means that the Communists must not only enter the government, as they are entirely willing to do, but relinquish their claim to autonomous rule in the provinces they now dominate. It means the end of separate armies. There are those who will oppose the new policy as interventionist—and understandably, for American intervention, political or military, calls up ugly associations in many parts of the world. But today, despite Mr. Welles, intervention is not to be avoided. Whether we give or withhold diplomatic recognition, or goods, or loans, our action spells stability or collapse to smaller or weaker states. By merely selling a nation oil we can keep a dictator in power. Our liberal non-interventionists are defending a cause that was lost before 1939. The undeniable danger that pressure will be exercised in support of private interests or reactionary political groups is no longer to be averted by attacking intervention as a policy. It can be averted only if the people of the United States insist that this country's immense influence be used—as the President apparently proposes to use it—to back the effective popular elements in other less powerful nations. Mr. Truman's pronouncement will echo in capitals far from Chungking: if seriously applied it will force Franco and Perón out of power and establish democratic rule at Madrid and Buenos Aires. Its implications should be thoroughly discussed at Moscow, for eventually, if it is to be more than a beneficent form of big-power domination, the policy of intervention in support of representative government must be elaborated and applied by the UNO.

*

THOUGH THE RUSSIAN DEMAND THAT FRANCO be named a war criminal aroused little enthusiasm on the part of its Allies, the Franco regime is on trial at Nürnberg just the same. By using Count Ciano's diary as evidence the Interallied Military Tribunal has established the authenticity of that astonishing document, with its important revelations of the role played by fascist Spain during the war. "By September, 1940," says the diary as summarized in the New York Times last July, "the grandiose plan for an invasion of England was scrapped. Italy and Spain each wanted a share in the glory of defeating Great Britain. Having previously turned down Italy, Hitler also rejected Franco's help in the enterprise because he said it would cost more than it was worth to have Spain's cooperation." Probably the chief reason why Hitler rejected Franco's offer was that he had already committed his country to its greatest blunder—abandoning the plan to invade Britain in favor of an attack on Russia. But the offer was there. Later Franco contributed the Blue Division to the Russian campaign and made the most of this gesture in his anti-Soviet and anti-Allied propaganda in Latin America. Another later Nazi idea, to seize the Canaries and the Azores as a preliminary move against the United States, called for the active participation of Spain. Ciano's assertions, now accepted by the Allies, finally disposed of Franco's cynical pretense that he always opposed war with the United Nations. Apart from all the earlier evidence against him, these revelations provide sufficient material to justify a general break with fascist Spain. The French proposal of a conference with Britain and the United States on the question of relations with Franco suggests that the present anomalous situation cannot last indefinitely. And further encouragement was provided by the visit last Saturday of Dr. Juan Negrín to Acting Secretary of State Acheson, an event which aroused intense interest and speculation in diplomatic circles.

*

THE WORTHLESS MEASURE SUBSTITUTED FOR the original Full Employment Bill by its opponents in the House, and then passed last week, eliminates the principle of government responsibility for full employment and merely sets up a fact-finding mechanism to advise the President on employment prospects. The President is permitted to make recommendations on the basis of this advice, but chiefly as to means for encouraging private enterprise. In emphasis and outlook it is a profits-for-all, not jobs-for-all measure. Rather than oppose this sham bill and make full employment the chief issue of the 1946 elections, the Administration compromised in the hope of salvaging something out of the wreckage in a Senate-House conference. But experience has shown that, in the matter of creating jobs, half a loaf is not necessarily better than no loaf at all. Half-hearted measures for increasing employment such as were taken during the 1930's often have the effect of disturbing business "confidence" without creating the purchasing power necessary to maintain production at a high level and assure employment.

*

THE HOUSE OF COMMONS HAS APPROVED BOTH the Anglo-American loan agreement and Bretton Woods, but it has done so without enthusiasm. For reasons which our London correspondent, Aylmer Vallance, explains on page 679, many Britons regard the loan terms as harsh and fear they include commitments which will be difficult, if not impossible, for Britain to fulfil. A good many people in this country, among them the editors of The Nation, share this view, though they realize that the prevailing state of American opinion ruled out a more generous agreement. Mr. Vallance shows that while the loan offers certain immediate advantages, it may well involve Britain in a financial crisis early in the fifties unless meanwhile the United States adapts its economic policies to its creditor status and takes positive steps to acquire a permanent import surplus. Since this will require not only a reversal of traditional American commercial policy but the achievement of a high and stable level of employment, it is hardly an exaggeration to say that Britain is being asked to gamble on a "miracle." Yet it should be pointed out that if Britain had refused the loan and rejected the concomitant policies of cooperation with the United States, it would have involved itself, and the world, in an even more dangerous gamble. It would then have been forced to organize a self-sufficient economic bloc with the Empire as the nucleus. It would have had to use pressure tactics to induce countries whose supplies and markets it needed to deal with it on a barter basis. It would have been caught up in a Schachtian web of discriminatory practices bound to create serious political tensions. In such circumstances it would be still harder for Britain to lighten its international and imperial liabilities, a step which may well be as Mr. Vallance argues an essential condition of its future political and economic solvency.

*

AS THE LABOR SITUATION GROWS MORE ACUTE, it also becomes simpler. Masks are dropped by both sides; the class struggle is back, no longer concealed under wartime camouflage. The country needs industrial peace almost as much as before V-J day, but the relaxation of public pressure, the lay-offs and cut-backs, the failure of Congress to pass any of the measures designed to cushion the shock of reconversion doomed the hope of a peaceful transition. And business seems to have made up its mind that this is the time for a showdown. To those with good memories, recent weeks have recalled the ugly period after World War I when big industry girded its surpluses for a fight to the finish with organized labor. Industry won then, at least temporarily. Today it is equally sure, equally determined. United States Steel turned down the union's proposals with an arrogance that has not been encountered since 1933. The mood of General Motors was dramatically summed up in the exchange of remarks by Vice-President Anderson of the company and Vice-President Reuther of the union during last week's negotiations. The transcript of that discussion, released by G. M., epitomizes the whole industrial conflict in America in a few angry words. Here you have capital, superior and confident, labor, angry and defiant; and yet, underlying it all a foundation of human equality that might be built upon if the deadlock could be broken. (Reuther throws Anderson's $90,000 income in his face, but when Anderson insists he has worked for it as hard as the "guys in the plants" Reuther remonstrates "Oh Harry!") President Truman's excellent fact-finding board starts hearings this week. Reuther has agreed to submit the union's full case. If G. M. is prepared to present the facts it has so far stubbornly refused to reveal, then we may get somewhere. Otherwise it looks like 1920 over again.

*

AN IMPORTANT PART OF AMERICAN INDUSTRY has set Christmas back to January 1. That is the date when it will go into serious production and begin to let its products move to the storekeepers' shelves. For January 1, 1946, marks the end of the excess-profits tax; from then on industry will pay a tax of only 38 per cent of profits, instead of the 85½ per cent on all profits made above the pre-war tax base. That certain industries have engaged in a deliberate sit-down strike is an indisputable fact but one immensely difficult to document. Good reporters have tried it, only to find that the most elaborate and exhaustive sort of investigation is necessary to disprove the plausible but phony excuses that each plant gives for its failure to produce. But reporters, particularly those on the conservative business journals, know that there has been a manufacturers' sit-down, and so does the OPA. Most certain of all in their knowledge of the situation are the workers in the plants, who cannot be fooled on what production and delivery schedules should be. As a matter of fact, the public, too, has sufficiently convincing proof. No refrigerators, irons, radios, or miscellaneous electrical gadgets are to be bought, and supplies of textiles are below a bare minimum. Yet in all these industries, by their own confession, mechanical reconversion was no problem and took practically no time. In many cases the factories have simply held back in the hope of bludgeoning the OPA into higher price ceilings; in others because of tax considerations. When thwarted consumers grouse to dealers, they are told that the desired product is not available because of "those damned strikes." The dealers' explanation, supplied gratis by the factories in lieu of salable goods, is a correct one, except that the "strikes" aren't the kind the newspapers are talking about.

*

AT THE MOMENT THE PUBLIC PRINTS ARE FULL of stories "exposing" Nancy Bruff, who wrote a "book" called "The Manatee" and used the services of Russell Birdwell, a high-powered, high-priced publicity agent, to promote its sale. "The Manatee" is apparently in a class with that other famous "book" entitled "Forever Amber," and its author is quite as glamourous. Moreover, the jacket of the book, which was published by that highly respectable firm, E. P. Dutton, is decorated with a ship's figurehead of a "bold female torso" which leaves nothing to the imagination. It's a scandal, of course, calling for public protests. But what really burns us up is the fact that all the righteous indignation, the ridicule, and even this belittling comment in The Nation—which did not even consider reviewing the book—will probably be pasted up in the scrapbooks of Mr. Birdwell's office as evidence of his success.

*

THE PLIGHT OF THE REPUBLICAN PARTY IS reflected in the unanimity with which the newspapers have denounced the weasel-worded statement of policy indorsed by the Republican National Committee at Chicago. The New York Sun observed with classic restraint, "It is not remarkable that the statement runs to generalities." The Herald Tribune declared that it was "vague where it should be specific," and the independent Washington Post called it a "jumble of vague promises, shabby phrases, glittering generalities, and vacant viewings with alarm." A cursory reading of this remarkable document gives one the impression that its writers cribbed from the "Thesaurus" long lists of synonyms with an evil connotation to attribute to the New Deal, and assembled a parallel list of virtues which they claimed as exclusively Republican. The Chicago conference made it clear that the Old Guard is more than ever solidly in control of the Republican Party and has learned nothing from its fifteen years in the political wilderness. To judge from its strategy it has never heard of President Roosevelt's death. For the Truman Administration is denounced in exactly the same terms as was its predecessor—for its regimentation, its all-powerful bureaucracy, and, by implication, for its indorsement of alien doctrines. Instead of looking for vigorous, forward-looking leadership to challenge the pedestrian qualities of the present Democratic rule, the two Republicans most talked of at Chicago as available for 1948 were Bricker and Taft. Ex-Governor Stassen has inherited the Willkie mantle and appears to be getting even less attention than Willkie did four years ago. For those who still like to think of the Republican Party as the party of Lincoln, its present impotence must be extremely disheartening; but to those who think of it as the party of Lodge, Harding, Coolidge, Hoover, and Dewey its condition appears the inevitable outcome of a long process of decay.

Post-Potsdam Germany

WITHIN the past few days Secretary of State Byrnes has issued an important statement formulating economic policy in regard to Germany. This document, intended for the guidance of our occupation authorities, declares that with a view to furthering the program adopted at Potsdam four immediate objectives must be pursued: (1) increased export of German coal to the liberated countries; (2) completion of the machinery necessary to execute the reparations and disarmament clauses of the Potsdam agreement, a task which involves "definition of the initial post-war German economy"; (3) organization of centralized German administrative agencies under Allied control in such fields as finance, transport, communications, foreign trade, and industry; (4) prevention of mass starvation in Germany subject to priority for the needs of the liberated peoples.

No one can say that this program deviates from Potsdam or that it dilutes the prescription for a hard peace. On the other hand, it fails to throw any fresh light on the question of whether the Big Three's plan for Germany was in fact a practical design for a solid, permanent structure. There has always been a doubt in our mind about the compatibility of a program of de-industrialization sufficiently rigorous to insure perpetual disarmament and satisfy reparation claims and the promise that Germany would be left with the material basis for a viable economy. This doubt persists despite Mr. Byrnes's prediction that after next spring there will be a gradual recovery of German industry and exports and that by 1948, when the reparations removal program has been completed, the Germans will be within sight of the promised average European standard of living.

The Potsdam program did not go as far as the Morgenthau plan in reducing Germany to an agrarian status, but it certainly implied a very much increased dependence of the German population on their own soil both for food and employment. If that is to be accomplished in a brief term of years, it is not too soon to begin what will in any case be a very complicated adjustment, both mechanically and psychologically. The Russians in their zone have taken one important step by starting redistribution of the big landed estates to working farmers. But in our zone nothing, apparently, is being done to tackle this prerequisite of a new agrarian revolution, and nowhere in his statement does Mr. Byrnes so much as refer to the problem.

In view of the certainty, pace Mr. Morgenthau, that a swollen German population confined in a reduced area will not be able to supply itself with all necessities, any plan for Germany must allow for a volume of exports sufficient in the long run to pay for a minimum of imports. Moreover, for some years, as Mr. Byrnes recognizes, it will be necessary for the Allies to finance a considerable part of German imports. Add to the debt which will thus accumulate the occupation costs for which Germany will be liable, and it becomes clear that if it is to contrive a balance of payments in the future Germany will have to achieve a surplus of exports. For this purpose it will have available its surplus coal production, some minerals like potash, and the products of the light industries it is permitted to retain—ceramics, textiles, leather goods, toys, clocks, and so forth. But will the markets of the world be able to absorb an increased volume of such consumer goods? That is one of the many economic questions Mr. Byrnes has left unanswered.

The implementation of the Potsdam program also involves the solution of political problems, the most immediate and stubborn being that of Germany's western frontier. This, however, is a matter which Mr. Byrnes blandly dismisses with the assumption that the geographical limits of Germany will be those of the pre-Hitler Reich minus the territory east of the Oder-Neisse line. This assumption is, as we pointed out last week, hotly contested by France. And even if French claims for a separate Rhine state are finally disallowed, the question of the disposition of the Ruhr will remain. Is this rich region to be wholly or partly internationalized or is it to revert eventually to Germany subject to limitations on its exploitation for armament manufacture? So long as this point remains cloudy, planning the German economy must be a hazardous business.

Exercise by the French of their veto in the Allied Control Commission is the immediate obstacle to the development of interzonal economic machinery but not the only one. If the Germans, as Mr. Byrnes suggests, are to assume "responsibility for the performance of the German economy," some kind of centralized political set-up is also necessary. There appears, however, to be no sign of preparation for the restoration of political life on a national basis. In so far as anything at all is being done to lay foundations for a new democratic structure in Germany, the job is being tackled in different ways in each of the four occupation zones.

In the American zone at the present time more and more administrative responsibility is being handed over to the local German authorities, not because of a carefully considered policy, but because haphazard redeployment has so greatly reduced effective American man-power. This development is all the more dangerous because in many sectors little has been done to revive the democratic parties, while the process of denazification is far from complete. The result, writes Raymond Daniels in the New York Times, "is that in some places the Nazis are becoming bolder and have begun openly bullying the rather frightened anti-Nazis."

This brings us to the problem of administration, which Saul Padover discusses on page 682. Mr. Padover believes that prolonged military occupation of Germany will be necessary but urges that the army be relieved of all administrative functions. Local government, he suggests, could then be intrusted to the Germans subject to the supervision of a special corps of American civilian officials.

We agree with Mr. Padover about the importance of civilian control but think it should be continued for a comparatively brief period. For we are skeptical about the possibility of imposing reeducation on Germany by foreign rule. Our own inclination would be to limit the occupation of Germany to the period necessary for carrying out the disarmament and reparations program. Meanwhile, to prepare the way for a responsible German government, we should give positive encouragement to the democratic forces while taking steps to destroy the economic base of the reactionaries by confiscating their lands and industrial holdings. This would do more to safeguard the world against future German aggressions than de-industrialization on a scale that threatens to reduce Germany to an economic slum dependent on international charity.

Men in the Street

WITH one million families now living doubled up, and veterans mustered out at the rate of 10,000 a day hunting desperately for homes, President Truman's promise of action on housing comes none too soon. The program he outlined last week calls for the immediate release of government surplus housing and materials, priorities for lower-priced dwellings, and legislative price ceilings on both new and old houses offered for sale. Since the third point must await Congressional action, an early improvement in the situation depends very much on the effectiveness of the revived priorities system. The President proposes to channel 50 per cent of all building materials into the construction of housing units costing $10,000 or less. That is a step in the right direction, but is it a big enough step?

In the present situation, when the demand for houses is out of all proportion to the supply, it is very difficult to prevent a maximum price from becoming a minimum. Thus there is real danger that most new houses will be built to sell very near the limit. According to the realtor's simple rule of thumb, a $10,000 unit rents for about $100 a month. But only 4 per cent of American families can pay $75 or more a month, and it is estimated that only 6 per cent of the veterans can afford to pay more than $50 a month for a home. In other words, in order to stimulate the supply of housing in accordance with needs a much lower ceiling should have been set.

Another objection to the encouragement of $10,000 houses is the fact that such units absorb additional quantities of critical materials and equipment. A house with two bathrooms provides shelter for only one family, but it deprives the builder of equipment essential for lower-priced units which could give homes to two families. Moreover, in the absence of any control over profit margins except that provided by the Federal Housing Authority's valuation system, there is a standing temptation to builders to add gadgets to justify a higher price while skimping on solid construction. Thus the President's new plan provides no guaranty against the diversion of most new housing to a tiny minority of the population, leaving the veterans to be accommodated in abandoned army camps, trailers, and collapsible war housing.

There is, however, pending before the House Banking and Currency Committee a bill introduced by Representative Patman which not only includes power to allocate scarce materials for low-cost housing but provides for price ceilings on all new construction and authority to check speculation in existing houses. "Such authority," wrote John W. Snyder in the memorandum on housing on which the President's action was based, "is essential if we are to avert further skyrocketing of home prices." The bill declares that ceiling prices on new construction should be determined on the basis of actual cost plus the prevailing contractor's margin for similar buildings in 1941. An important feature of the measure is that it would permit some flexibility of action enabling the government to vary its formula for different areas, relaxing or tightening controls in accordance with local needs. The bill has the whole-hearted support of Chester Bowles, chief of the Office of Price Administration, who sees in it a valuable new weapon in the fight against inflation which he is waging so stoutly.

By approving Mr. Snyder's memorandum the President has inferentially given his blessing to this bill. But the building industry and real-estate lobbies have been carrying on a strenuous campaign against it, and if it is ever to emerge from committee there will have to be much more forceful pressure from the public.

One step by the President which may conceivably help to organize public opinion behind this and similar measures to meet the housing crisis is the appointment of Wilson Wyatt as Housing Expeditor. As the war-time mayor of Louisville, Kentucky, Mr. Wyatt demonstrated ability to plan for the future and rare courage and independence as an administrator. Moreover, he made a point of going to the people—Negro as well as white—for direct approval of his ideas for a better community. Mr. Wyatt's municipal experience is an important qualification for his new job, since building is a peculiarly local trade and its problems must frequently be tackled locally in cooperation with contractors, realtors, municipal authorities, and tenants' organizations.

In seeking to remove the many bottlenecks in the housing industry Mr. Wyatt will have to work within existing legislation, which is clearly inadequate, and get along without too much backing from his immediate boss, Mr. Snyder, whose past record has been one of vacillation and retreat. But if Mr. Wyatt will take a leaf from the book of Mr. Bowles and explain clearly to the public what his problems are and what action is needed to overcome them, he has a chance to rally a volume of opinion which will smother the speculative interests. For housing is one issue which can be taken to the man who is, literally, in the street.

The Army Way

A THREE-LAYER cake with alternate good and bad layers is the best description of American policy in Japan. The top layer has the acrid taste of World War III because, despite the decorative icing provided by the Far Eastern Advisory Committee, our unilateral role in Japan is primarily a reflection of the anti-Soviet prejudices which dominate certain government circles in Washington. The second layer—made up of detailed Washington-born directives—has the surprisingly fresh flavor of enlightened democratic thinking. It reveals the fundamental change in the Office of Far Eastern Affairs since the departure of Joseph Clark Grew and the ascendancy of John Carter Vincent. The recent announcement classifying Prince Konoye and some sixty other top non-military oligarchs as war criminals is not only a laudable step, long overdue, but also a measure of the effect of Mr. Grew's departure. Mr. Grew had a genuine liking for the Prince, and some of his closest advisers were actually booming Konoye for the job of post-war Premier. In the face of a good deal of pressure from Japanese conservatives, we have stuck to our promises on freedom of speech and refused their demand that we exclude the Japanese Communists from the air. We have also forced through legislation designed to uproot the semi-feudal system of land-tenure, and we have ended government sponsorship of State Shintoism, inspirer of fanatical jingoism. The Japanese people will further profit by our insistence that their government plan for their relief during the hard months coming.

The third layer of policy—carrying out these enlightened directives—has the familiar stale taste of army expediency. General MacArthur, apparently feeling that his future political hopes hang on the character of the job he does in Japan, is moving energetically to carry out his objectives. But the American army is not a suitable instrument for an intricate job of social engineering and, although it complains of a shortage of skilled personnel, has refused to utilize the talents of some of the State Department men on the spot. As a result, the State Department advisers under George Atcheson, Jr., among whom are several exceptionally qualified men, can exercise influence on MacArthur only by making recommendations to the department, which passes them on to the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who may eventually forward them to General MacArthur back in Tokyo.

Army administration in Japan is further bedeviled by its obstinate refusal to realize how hopeless is the attempt to achieve the democratic reforms to which we are pledged through the present reactionary Japanese regime. Employing a Mitsubishi man like Premier Shidehara as the leading figure in a program pledged to the elimination of big business is tantamount to asking Representative Rankin to head a tolerance campaign. Konoye's cheating of the war guilt trial through suicide shows the danger of special courtesies to upper-crust war criminals. But in spite of exclusiveness, inconsistency, and inadequate execution, the overall impact of American policy upon Japan has been rather good. We have loosened the political strait-jacket and furthered progressive social objectives, and next month Japan will have the most nearly democratic election in its history.

Another Inquiry Begins

BY I. F. STONE

THERE is much that is good to be said of President Truman's appointments to the Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry on Palestine. The American chairman, United States Circuit Court Judge Joseph C. Hutcheson of Houston, Texas, is best known for his decision in the Strecker case. Judge Hutcheson described the attempt to deny Strecker citizenship because of past membership in the Communist Party as "a kind of Pecksniffian righteousness, savoring strongly of hypocrisy and party bigotry." A majority of the Supreme Court agreed with him. Earlier, as a federal district judge, Hutcheson wrote a decision in the Osterloh case which widened the rights of aliens in deportation proceedings. Judge Hutcheson brings a free mind and a sympathetic spirit to the work of the committee.

Of the five men named with Judge Hutcheson, one has devoted a large part of his life to the refugee problem. James G. McDonald was made High Commissioner for German Refugees by the League of Nations in October, 1933. Two years later he resigned in protest against the League's half-hearted attitude. In one capacity or another he has been engaged ever since in trying to help the victims of Hitlerism. No one knows better the elaborate ritual of investigation, conference, and intergovernmental committee with which the Western powers have been accustomed to approach—and evade—the questions involved in this new inquiry.

The four other American members of the committee have had no direct contact with the problems of European Jewry or of Palestine, but there is no reason to believe any of them unfriendly. Former Under Secretary of State William Phillips, once Ambassador to Rome under Mussolini, is a professional diplomat, a type which in the United States tends to be assimilated to the British point of view. But as Roosevelt's special representative to India during the war, Phillips demonstrated an independence that soon made him persona non grata with the Churchill government. Though his mission was to explore the possibilities of compromise with the Indian Nationalist movement, Phillips was denied access to Gandhi and Nehru. His report to the White House was critical of British imperial policy. That background may prove useful in the Middle East.

There is less to be reported about the remaining three committee members. O. Max Gardner, now practicing law in Washington, made a good record as Governor of North Carolina and is well regarded by Southern progressives. Frank W. Buxton is the respected veteran editor of the Boston Herald. He won a Pulitzer prize back in 1924 for an editorial called Who Made Calvin Coolidge? The editorial, reread today, inevitably has a kind of Currier and Ives flavor. It is unnecessary to produce credentials for Frank Aydelotte, director of the Institute for Advanced Study at Princeton. He is American secretary of the Rhodes Trust and a good friend of Britain—but one need not be an enemy of Britain to dislike the White Paper or distrust Ernest Bevin.

Of the six British members of the joint commission, the one known to us at The Nation—if only as his occasional, though admiring, readers—is R. H. S. Crossman, assistant editor of the London New Statesman and Nation. About the others the only facts available are biographical details supplied by the British Ministry of Information. Lord Morrison of Tottenham is one of the New Labor peers, an old-timer in the party, once parliamentary secretary to Ramsay MacDonald. Sir Frederick William Leggett has been in the Ministry of Labor since 1917. Major Reginald Edward Manningham-Buller is a barrister and a Conservative M. P. Wilfred P. Crick is economic adviser to the Midland Bank, one of the so-called Big Four banks. Sir John Edward Singleton, chairman of the British contingent, has been a judge of the King's Bench since 1934. It is not an exciting list.

These are, I am sure, good men, and I intend no disrespect to them when I say that it is difficult to write of the new inquiry temperately. Such inquiries, to judge from past experience, represent a kind of "heads I win, tails you lose" gamble. If the commission finds that surviving European Jews are begging for a chance to stay in Germany and Poland, and only a handful of Zionists want to go to Palestine, we may be sure the findings will be fully and immediately "implemented." But if the commission finds that most of the survivors wants to go to Palestine and should be permitted to go there, we may be equally sure that the recommendations will bog down. This process is well understood in Palestine.

I spent an evening, in Haifa, with one of the leaders of the current civil-disobedience campaign against the British authorities. I began by trying to convince him that it might be wise to do nothing until the committee had brought in its report. He ended by convincing me that the Jews of Palestine are justified in feeling that they cannot wait. Before the war, during the war, and now again since the war, they have seen a series of inquiries and conferences. There was one at Evian. There was another at Bermuda. Nothing came of them. As the number of inquiries grew, the number of Jews declined. Many Palestinian Jews feel—and I fully share that feeling—that a kind of "non-intervention" was practiced by the Western powers against European Jewry. "Six million Jews died in Europe while we waited for the democratic powers to act," said one Palestinian. "Thousands more of the remnants will die if we sit here with hands folded during the winter while they investigate again." The Palestinians, who did such quietly heroic work rescuing their brethren from Axis Europe, are going on with the job of rescuing them from "liberated" Europe—despite the White Paper.

In London I found the atmosphere as complacent as that in Palestine was desperate. The problem in London is just another of those headaches of empire. In Palestine half the Jews are folk who got away barely in time to escape Belsen and Oswiecim; the dead were their kinsfolk; the survivors are their kinsfolk, too, the last of whole families. I spoke with Jewish boys in British army uniform who had found friends and relatives in the camps. "More than food or clothing these people need hope—the hope of having a home at last." The British are a kind people, but they have troubles of their own. In Palestine the Jews are building a nation, and the plight of European Jewry is not merely sentimental or peripheral but as intense and central a matter as the massacre of Britons and the succor of the survivors would be for Englishmen. For Palestinians illegal immigration is a Jewish Dunkirk across the Mediterranean, an urgent and inescapable duty.

There are sympathetic folk in England who express the opinion that Bevin proposed the commission of inquiry as a means of giving him a way out with the Arabs. They point to the possibility of interim reports by subcommittees as a wedge to open Palestine's doors to increased immigration. It is difficult to reconcile this theory with the news from Germany that Field Marshal Montgomery has ordered new refugees from anti-Semitic Poland turned back at the border of the British zone lest they "aggravate" the Palestine problem. It is hard to reconcile any optimistic theory with the British Labor government's foreign policy elsewhere, from Greece to Java, where Bekasi seems to have provided a fair imitation of Lidice. My own opinion is that Bevin wanted the inquiry in order to get America to share, not the responsibility for a genuinely equitable solution in the Middle East, but the odium of shutting off Palestine to further Jewish immigration. Bevin's concern is not a decent break for the surviving Jews of Europe but the building of an anti-Soviet bloc in the Middle East at the expense of Jewish aspirations for a refuge and a national home.

The Future Role of Britain

BY AYLMER VALLANCE

(The Nation's London correspondent)

London, December 7

ALL the uncertainties in today's picture of Britain—its future standard of living, its progress, swift or halting, toward real socialism, its wisdom in borrowing dollars—center in one question which neither the people of this country nor the Labor government has yet had the mental toughness to face. Is Britain to attempt in the atomic age, with the world divided geopolitically between the two land masses of America and Russia, to play the part of a great power, with all that that implies in diversion of resources to armaments and in dependence on economic aid, on terms, from the United States? Or is it to cut its coat according to its modest cloth and accept, as its future destiny, the role of "middle" power, leading the smaller nations of Western Europe in a "neutrality bloc" and resolutely declining, in foreign and imperial policy, to assume responsibilities or pursue objectives that are incommensurate with its own strength?

That question might well have been debated when the all-embracing motion of censure was offered by the Tory opposition in Parliament this week. In fact, the issue was burked on both sides: the government is not ready with its answer, and the Tories, with their sentimental heritage of nineteenth-century imperialist patriotism, will never get round to thinking realistically about such fundamentals. The result is that in contemporary British politics there is an air of unreality, of shadow-boxing, while events take shape by default. But as your correspondent's duty is to chronicle what is actually happening in the British political arena and not to present merely an existentialist picture of what is not happening, he must interpose here a brief summary of the past month's developments. They have been twofold: the opposition has declared total war, and there has been a significant "tightening of the ranks" behind the government.

At the beginning of this parliamentary session it looked as if the Tories were inclined to concede that the electorate had given Labor a clear mandate for a big instalment of state planning and intervention in the national economy, and as if they would confine themselves to constructive, semi-benevolent criticism of individual measures. Mr. Churchill, indeed, promised to refrain from opposing nationalization schemes which did not involve "questions of principle"; this Parliament, he hoped, would be "fruitful." Gone is that attitude.

Though many of the big industrialists, like Sir Clive Baillieu, president of the Federation of British Industries, have publicly declared their readiness to accept the framework of over-all state planning and to cooperate with the government in a policy of full employment, provided reasonable scope for private initiative is left in non-nationalized industries, the Tory line is now an all-out anti-Socialist crusade. One or two of the more liberal-minded Conservative front benchers, such as Harold Macmillan, are probably unhappy about this policy. They can hardly fail to be aware of its incongruity with the fact that a committee appointed by Mr. Churchill's administration, and presided over by the chairman of Unilever, Ltd., has just recommended unanimously the transfer to public ownership of the gas industry —on rational grounds of promoting more efficient organization. This handful of "progressive" Tories would really like to follow the Liberal Party's line and try to discover a way of dovetailing smoothly the working of private and state enterprise in their respective fields. But this "compromising" policy has been vetoed by the Tory party managers, and Winston Churchill recently proclaimed the end of non-belligerency.

In their new attitude the Tories make no appeal to reason. Their slogan is, "The People Versus Socialist Tyranny." Are there shortages? Blame Cripps; he is deliberately imposing austerity for doctrinaire ends. Is reconversion going slow? Blame the Socialists' passion for bureaucratic red tape. Are pockets of unemployment already visible? The government is robbing you of your job in order to prove that capitalism can't work. Do you lack a house, a Christmas turkey, a sense of "Happy Days Are Here Again"? Then you ought not to have listened to Labor blandishments; the old Tory firm would have delivered the goods; the land would have flowed with milk and honey. These were the implications behind every Tory speech in the censure debate; and even Mr. Churchill's rhetorical invective could not disguise the weakness of the opposition's position.

Coming from a party which has no intelligible positive policy for reconstruction and whose only plan is to have no planning, the Tories' attack on the government's "incompetence" cuts little ice with the majority of the public. With the aid of a predominantly Conservative press every sort of irrational discontent—at rationing, queues, form-filling, and so forth—can doubtless be exploited. Parliamentary time can be wasted in motions of censure and endless, factious amendments to bills. Schemes of nationalization can be held up by inordinate demands—now being made by the coal owners—for compensation. Some employers can be persuaded to "go slow" with production: this is happening now in the motor industry. If there were really large-scale unemployment, there might be an audience for the Tories—or even for the fascist "Christian Reformers," who proclaim the deity of Hitler, and for Blackshirt Mosley, now launching a publishing venture. But, for the moment, it would take more than these ranting Tory tactics seriously to embarrass the government; and when Tory headquarters tries to discredit Labor's behavior by calling for recruits to form bodyguards for speakers "liable to receive rough treatment," the average voter just laughs.

In Parliament the natural reaction of Labor members would in any case have been to rally behind their leaders. During the censure debate they plunged with gusto into the fray. But apart from this the morale of the party, slightly deflated, as your correspondent has previously reported, by doubts whether the Cabinet would have the courage to move on from the uncomfortable halfway house of "negative" state control to more positive Socialist action, had been greatly stiffened by Aneurin Bevan; and in the hitherto depressing background of foreign policy Ernest Bevin's last speech had raised hopes of a saner approach to fundamental problems. In his Building Materials bill the Minister of Health gave the first clear indication that if capitalist enterprise is no longer ready or able to provide the initiative for production on the state's terms, the state will assume the responsibility. Not merely will the Ministry, at need, undertake building by labor squads in its direct employ; it is going in for manufacture of housing components by state-owned factories in a big way, and is planning to make the wholesale distribution of all building materials and fittings a state monopoly if it has any trouble with price rings. This was the forthright stuff that Labor back benchers, impatient at apparent hesitations, wanted to hear.

As for Mr. Bevin, the party has been disappointed with the meager results of Mr. Attlee's American visit: the Study Commission on Atomic Control was generally regarded as an unpromising effort to find a way out of the vicious circle created by American reluctance to abandon, until conditions of confidence had been established, an aggressive weapon whose monopoly by one nation made realization of those conditions, in a world of uncompromisingly sovereign states, impossible. A more imaginative lead from Mr. Attlee had been hoped for; and in his speech last month Mr. Bevin seemed to give it. He came out boldly for the pooling of sovereignty in a world government: if real security was to be achieved, federalism it must be, and nothing less. Not ignoring the obstacles—in Moscow no less than in Washington—the Labor back benchers cheered lustily; here, at least, were signs of a real breaking away from Churchillian imperialism.

How real is it? Here we come to the crucial question with which this dispatch began. The one irremediable mistake which this country could make would be to follow the fatal example of France in the 1920's and to maintain the foreign policy and armaments of a great power when it cannot afford to do so. A simple sum in terms of man-power is conclusive. In 1939, with 500,000 men in the armed forces and 1,500,000 unemployed, Britain had a labor force of 3,000,000 available for the manufacture of consumers' goods. The total post-war labor force will be no larger than in 1939, and the numbers needed in the production of food, coal, houses, and capital goods and in distribution and other services will not be smaller. Assume 500,000 fewer unemployed: it will still be impossible to have armed forces exceeding 750,000 men, without crippling the output of consumers' goods, of which a proportion much greater than in the inter-war years must be allocated to exports. So far the government talks as if it contemplated having over 2,000,000 men more or less indefinitely in the services. This would kill all hopes of securing a reasonable standard of living in this country; socialism would stand condemned as the architect of penury.

We must, then, lighten our commitments, and this means modeling our foreign policy not on yours or Russia's but rather on that of Switzerland or Sweden. If one could be sure that Mr. Bevin and his colleagues accepted realistically Britain's enforced future status as the biggest of the minor powers, one would feel less disquiet about the implications of Britain's dollar borrowing.

Irrespective of political parties, the greater part of informed British opinion regards the terms of the dollar loan with grave disquiet, which is likely to increase as the full implications of the complicated provisions are appreciated. The immediate advantages from our standpoint are obvious. First, we shall avoid a hard period of still more drastic rationing of consumption goods, which the government's enemies would have exploited politically. Secondly, and more importantly, we shall have an opportunity to make speedier economic recovery by ampler immediate imports of raw materials and reequipment plant. These gains, however, are outweighed by a formidable list of disadvantages.

In the first place, though Britain retains the right to maintain quantitative import restrictions, it is pledged to make no discrimination between countries. That is, it forfeits the ability to switch its purchases—for example, of petroleum—to the sterling area and may be compelled even to contract its trade with the dominions if a shortage of dollars compels it to restrict imports from the United States. Secondly, there is extreme uncertainty whether we can actually honor the commitments assumed. Britain's balance of current external payments is estimated to show a deficit of five billion dollars in the next three years, thus absorbing more than the dollar credit line now opened. Furthermore, even assuming that the blocked sterling balances are partly liquidated by use of the existing dollar resources in the sterling pool and partly scaled down and funded, nevertheless, liabilities to sterling creditors will still be an immense future strain on our balance of payments. Considering that Britain's obligation to terminate, by the end of 1946, the whole existing sterling-area mechanism means giving a free run in the Empire to an intensive American export drive; can Britain rely on achieving, by 1951, an export surplus sufficient either to meet interest and amortization on the dollar loan or to enable us to implement the "free-exchange" obligations of Bretton Woods? The answer is yes, provided a miracle occurs.

That miracle would be the willingness of Congress, in the scheduled International Trade Conference, to authorize your Administration to make big tariff concessions without reciprocal gains from others, thus creating a real probability of a permanent American import surplus. Unless that eventuates, and the United States also successfully maintains high stable employment, it is considered here inevitable that Britain will be faced after 1951 with a dollar shortage necessitating, first, invocation of the interest-waiver clauses in the loan terms; second, invocation of the "scarce-currency" escape clauses in Bretton Woods; and third, in all probability, Britain's resignation from the Monetary Fund. For Britain, therefore, acceptance of the loan terms represents a gigantic gamble dependent on an unknown factor—your willingness to pursue a liberal trade policy and accept the "good-neighbor" obligations of your creditor position. If the gamble fails, Great Britain will be in the unpleasant situation of an insolvent debtor who has seriously weakened his own economic independence.

A final doubt is whether the present agreement will ultimately preserve good Anglo-American relations. Parliament will doubtless ratify the agreement next week; but it will do so believing we have really secured five years' interest-free prolongation of Lend-Lease aid, repayable only if America creates conditions making repayment feasible. If Congress fails to make radical changes in American trade policy, then Britain can sidestep both Bretton Woods and the loan repayment, declaring that Congress is solely blameworthy for a horse-trading deal which took insufficient account of Britain's war sacrifices. If this be the upshot, Congress will naturally indict British trickery. In view of the probability of this deplorable result, it is felt here that it would have been wiser for Britain, at the cost of immediate hardships, to forgo a loan on terms so pregnant with future disagreements.

BOTH (MENACINGLY) "TELL YOUR FUTURE, DEARIE ?"

There is no occasion for Socialists here to wring their hands or cry, "All is lost." Neither the loan terms nor the provisions of Bretton Woods preclude the British government from maintaining the minimum controls essential to a planned Socialist economy; and whatever Congress may be led to suppose, there is no question of our surrendering on these fundamental principles. Nor would it be a constructive attitude to await passively the breakdown which is foreseen for 1951. What we must do, so far as our relations with the United States are concerned, is to go forward to the International Trade Conference with a program aiming at an expansionist commercial policy based on full employment, and hope for the best. But in matters within our own control we are more than ever bound to husband our resources and develop them for civilian production. The one thing we cannot afford to do is to use your dollar facilities as a means of maintaining grandiose armaments in support of a Palmerstonian foreign policy. We must lighten our liabilities in India and the Middle East; we must seek friendships in Europe both with our near neighbors and with countries in the Russian sphere. We must exercise influence, not by armed strength, but by unaggressive leadership of states which have renounced power politics. Otherwise our borrowing will mean not only the loss of our independence but economic and moral ruin.

A Plan for Germany

BY SAUL K. PADOVER

(Historian and political scientist; during the war a member of the army's Psychological Warfare Division)

WHETHER as a result of criticism or in recognition of its own limitations, the army has apparently decided that government of Germany by the military should be discontinued. Some weeks ago Major General John H. Hilldring, head of the Military Government (Civil Affairs) Division, quietly announced the policy that "civilians, directed by civilian agencies of our government, should take over."

This decision will be applauded by all who have been properly critical of Military Government. But where does it leave us? It is easy for the army to say to civilians, You take over. The fact is, there is nobody to take over. We have so bungled our planning for Germany that we have no civilian personnel trained to administer the American zone. So far as I know, no governmental civilian agency exists to which the responsibility for ruling Germany can be transferred.

I do not know what the time-limit for improvising and guessing is, but I do know that the Administration in Washington cannot continue such a course much longer without running into serious trouble. It must make up its mind what to do with the Germans and then it must act decisively. Clear thinking on the subject can be aided by the recognition of certain paradoxes: first, that Military Government in Germany is not desirable, but that a military occupation is necessary; second, that the Germans should be allowed local self-government, but that major decisions should not be left in their hands.

If we continue to maintain a large occupation force in Germany, a time will come—possibly as soon as the next Presidential election—when the crypto-fascists and neo-isolationists will start a campaign against wasting the taxpayers' money by keeping soldiers in a disarmed country. Such a campaign would probably have the support of pacifist and pro-German elements. But should our armed forces really pull entirely out of Germany, the whole European balance would be upset and the dormant Nazi elements encouraged to come out of hiding. Moreover, Great Britain and France would be confounded.

To avoid this possibility, we should keep in Germany a permanent small force consisting of a number of fixed garrisons and a compact air force disposed at strategic points. A number of army posts could be transferred bodily from the United States to the American zone to act as garrisons. Members of the regular army could be sent to these posts for training, being rotated every three months. A man can get his military training as effectively in Kassel as in Kansas, and with little additional cost to the taxpayers. These regular army garrisons in Germany would have the duty of protecting our interests, but would do no governing.

The local government of Germany should be intrusted to German officials, but always under the supervision of American civilians. It is important to recognize the bleak truth that most Germans today are without experience in self-government, that they have few political interests or desires, and that it may take decades to overcome their civic inertia.

We must also keep in mind that the present generation of Germans is not promising material for a democracy, although there are exceptions among the older people. To leave any great responsibility, without proper guidance, in their hands would, I am convinced, lead to a new dictatorship. I recall talking one day in the Ruhr to a large group of workers, many of them former Social Democrats, and asking them about their political ideas for the future. They replied with one voice: "Wir müssen den richtigen Mann finden" ("We must find the right man").

German youth presents a special problem. Roughly speaking, boys and girls under sixteen or seventeen are probably redeemable; those over that age are poisoned perhaps beyond recovery. The Edelweiss Society, which organized the only "revolt" against the Nazis that took place under Hitler, consisted largely of young kids who were disgusted with the compulsions of Nazism. There were thousands of them, principally in the Catholic regions. These youngsters had no positive political ideas; they were simply against regimentation and against the deprivations they were undergoing. Properly directed, such young people could be turned into decent democratic citizens.

The question is: Who can do it? The great majority of the teachers cannot be trusted. Most of those who are not Nazis are ultra-nationalists and pan-Germans. In one German city we went through a list of 328 grammar-school teachers, and after making all due allowances we were left with only 18 who were not Nazis or extreme reactionaries. Hitler had set up a large number of normal schools (Lehrer und Lehrerinen Bildungs-Anstalten) to train teachers in the Nazi spirit—a fact not generally known. Students were recruited from families which the Nazis considered reliable, and the underlying philosophy of the curriculum was Rassenkunde. Hitler had personally given the order, a superintendent of schools in a big German city told me, that "no German child should leave school without a thorough orientation in racial science."

The first crop of these Nazi-trained teachers took over around 1942. Today all the younger teachers are probably Nazi, not nominally but in spirit. It would be wise not to employ any of them. This means that we should either have to close the schools for a time—in the Ruhr many schools have been closed since 1943—or employ right-thinking but ill-trained non-professional pedagogues. Possibly some of the refugees in this country and in England might be persuaded to return to Germany as teachers and trainers of teachers; or German-speaking Swiss might be induced to undertake a teacher-training program. Education in the long run is a more important problem than the dismantling of German industry. The army is not equipped to solve it. And obviously the Germans themselves, even democratic Germans, cannot be expected to carry through the pedagogic revolution that is called for. We should not repeat the mistake of the democratic Weimar Republic in leaving the reactionary, militaristic, monarchist teachers unmolested.

Whatever steps we take to solve this particular problem, we must follow a democratic line and, if necessary, follow it without regard to policy in the other zones. It is unfortunate that the division of Germany into four zones makes a unified educational, as well as political and economic, policy difficult if not impossible. But within the limits of the Potsdam agreement the United States can carry on experiments. If these experiments should be successful, they might be adopted by the British and French and perhaps also by the Russians. In any case, the United States is in a position to influence, if not the whole German nation, at least one-fourth of it.

I believe that the President, with the consent of Congress, should set up an Occupied Lands Authority as a permanent agency. The OLA should consist of those members of the Cabinet who have a direct interest in foreign areas—the Secretaries of State, War, the Treasury, and perhaps others. The first step of the OLA might well be to organize a Foreign Civil Service Division, the second to set up training schools. The army had such schools at Charlottesville and elsewhere, and so did the OWI and the OSS for different purposes. The experience of these schools is available, as is probably much of the personnel. The OWI and the OSS at one time or another employed our ablest specialists on foreign countries, and the OLA might do some useful recruiting among their former members. A civil service for Germany, and probably for Japan too, would require psychiatrists, educators, editors, writers, economists, sociologists, jurists, political scientists, and police administrators. It would not need engineers or firemen or public-utilities experts; there are plenty of Germans trained in those fields.

In place of the Military Government officers, the President, through the OLA, would appoint civilian high commissioners for each of the German provinces under our jurisdiction. Each high commissioner would be, so to speak, a viceroy and would have veto power over the German Minister-President. A similar scheme could be worked out for the bigger cities: every Bürgermeister would have an American civilian commissioner over him.

It would be imperative that all the commissioners should be men of the highest caliber with experience in democratic administration. I can think of a number of such individuals—for example, Harold Stassen, Milton Eisenhower, Herbert Lehman; I am merely suggesting the type, not offering recommendations. For the sake of the object lesson, one of the high commissioners might well be a Negro. The high commissioners and commissioners need not know German, but their staff of specialists should speak the language. The specialists would not occupy administrative posts but would serve solely in the capacity of friends and advisers to the German officials. I believe that the American staff would be most effective if it did not interfere too much but let the qualified German administrators take responsibility. Obviously only democratic and anti-Nazi Germans should be intrusted with power, and they should be given considerable freedom of action.

Another consideration: power, as the saying goes, has a tendency to corrupt. To guard the American occupation officials from temptation and to protect the Germans against the Americans, constitutional safeguards should be set up. We should proclaim in our zone a charter of basic rights—including the right to speak and write freely (within the limits of military security), the right of habeas corpus, and the right to trial by jury. After all, the way to teach democracy is to practice it.

Any planning for a Foreign Civil Service must also consider certain imponderables. Americans can be terribly lonely in Germany and to escape the depressing monotony may be driven to liquor and—"fraternization." It would therefore be desirable to permit wives to accompany their husbands. I think, too, that the American civil officials should wear a semi-military uniform. In Germany a uniform commands respect, and a democratic civil service would find its work greatly facilitated if its members wore good-looking and somewhat ceremonial attire.

But however wise our policies and however skilled our personnel, a certain amount of trouble must be expected. I am convinced that a fascist-nationalist underground is inevitable in Germany. For one thing, historical experience tells us that an occupying authority inevitably arouses opposition. For another, unemployment is bound to cause discontent and unrest. In fact, the amount of opposition to the occupation will probably be determined by the economic situation. Again and again Germans, especially workers, said to me that all they wanted from the Americans was "Brot und Arbeit" ("Bread and Work"). Without employment—on one level or another—any democratic experiment will probably fail. Too many Germans still have painful memories of the hard times that persisted under the Weimar Republic. Not to solve this problem now would be to link the concepts "unemployment" and "democracy" permanently in the German mind. Hitler's greatest claim to loyalty and support from the German masses was his success in creating work for all.

Creation of employment under present conditions will undoubtedly require a fundamental shift of the population from the cities to the villages. Last spring German farmers complained bitterly to us that they had no labor to help them, particularly after the Polish and Russian slave workers left. There has always been a shortage of farm labor in the Reich, and it has been made more severe by the war casualties. German city workers do not like farm labor, but they will have no choice. The light industries that are permitted to continue will certainly not be sufficient to absorb the industrial workers. For the next generation or so the German people will be able to support life only if they are largely de-industrialized. This, in my opinion, is not a matter of anybody's wish—it is simply the legacy left by Hitler.

By long-range planning we can, I believe, rule Germany with a small corps of American civilians, reeducate German youth, and prepare the German people for ultimate incorporation in a society of free nations. With a few fixed military garrisons we can meet our international obligations and secure European stability. Not the least advantage of the plan I have proposed is its inexpensiveness. A small staff of civilian specialists trained to govern Germany would cost no more than the construction and maintenance of a battleship.

[This is the fifth and last of a series of articles on the Military Government of Germany.]

Who Owns a College?

BY CAREY McWILLIAMS

(Contributing editor of The Nation*)*

Chicago, December 5

ROOSEVELT COLLEGE of Chicago was formally dedicated on November 16, when Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt affixed a bronze plaque bearing the inscription "Dedicated to the Enlightenment of the Human Spirit" to what will some day be the cornerstone of an institution of learning named after the late President. The story of Roosevelt College concerns all persons interested in education, for it raises the pertinent question: Who really owns a college?

For the beginning of that story we have to go back to 1936, when Dr. Edward J. Sparling, who had recently become president of Central Y. M. C. A. College in Chicago, made an interesting discovery. Central College was one of some twenty colleges maintained by the Y. M. C. A. in Chicago and directed by the board of the local "Y" in cooperation with the central board. Dr. Sparling found that Negro students were required to pay an annual physical-education fee but were not allowed to use the swimming pool, gymnasium, or other athletic facilities of the local "Y." As soon as he learned of the discrimination, he ordered gymnasium fees refunded to all Negro students and then discontinued the athletic program of the college until such time as the local Y. M. C. A. was prepared to allow Central College students to use its facilities without regard to race or color. At a later date Dr. Sparling learned that the Edgewater Beach Hotel, where the college graduation ceremonies were scheduled to be held, followed a Jim Crow policy, and he canceled the arrangements. Then in 1944 the college sponsored the publication of a booklet written by Dr. Gordon Allport on the subject of scapegoats. These actions, while not particularly revolutionary, seem to have aroused considerable anxiety among the highly conservative members of the board of directors.

In August, 1944, Mayor Kelly called a conference on race relations in Chicago. Dr. Sparling, who was one of the speakers, condemned restrictive covenants as "un-Christian, undemocratic, and un-American." At the same conference, however, Newton C. Farr, a member of Dr. Sparling's board of directors, upheld the morality of such restrictions and their social "justification." A millionaire real-estate operator, Mr. Farr is known to Chicago Negroes as "the man who tightened the Black Belt." He is a former president of the National Real Estate Association, a member of the board of Lincoln Memorial University and the Illinois Institute of Technology, a trustee of the Edith Rockefeller-McCormick trust, a vice-president of the Chicago Title and Trust Company, and extremely active in the Oakland-Kenwood Property Owners' Association, which is credited by Chicago Negroes with having established the prevailing pattern of restrictions in Chicago. Oddly enough, Mr. Farr is a devoted admirer of Abraham Lincoln and has long been a member of the Civil War Round Table Club of Chicago, which meets to discuss rare items of Lincolniana and the Civil War. The owner of a large library of volumes about Lincoln and the Civil War, Mr. Farr considers himself quite an authority on the Reconstruction period. "Gone with the Wind," he believes, is a "nearly factual" description of Reconstruction, while Howard Fast's "Freedom Road" is of "doubtful authenticity."

For an admirer of Lincoln Mr. Farr holds some extraordinary views about Negroes and Jews. In an extremely frank interview with Richard Durham of the Chicago Defender, printed on February 17, 1945, Mr. Farr said, "Negroes enjoy sex too much. They are inclined to be promiscuous. They are mostly uneducated, and the majority of them are poor, ragged, and dirty. They're underfed. They make undesirable neighbors." And he was certain that Abraham Lincoln, if he were alive today, would indorse the idea of restrictive regulations. "If restrictive covenants were dropped today," said Mr. Farr, "and if a thousand Negroes moved into Hyde Park or Oak Park, there would be war. There'd be hell to pay." His prejudices, unlike his covenants, are not restricted to Negroes. "Take Jews," he declared in the same interview. "As a race they too have certain undesirable characteristics. Especially the poorer Jews. They're gluttons. They eat too much. They get fat, sloppy."

After Mayor Kelly's conference on race relations Mr. Farr expressed a desire for a private "heart-to-heart" talk with Dr. Sparling about restrictive covenants. When the meeting took place, Mr. Farr insisted that "Negroes enjoy more brotherhood among themselves" than they would enjoy if they were permitted to associate freely with whites. Dr. Sparling disputed this. Mr. Farr spoke with enthusiasm on his private project, the George Washington Carver Homes, an all-Negro project in the Negro section, calling it the type of building which might bring about a solution of the acute Negro housing problem in Chicago. Questioned by Dr. Sparling, he admitted that although the units were not completed he already had 1,000 Negro applicants for the 54 apartments in the project. Needless to say, this conversation did not bring about a reconciliation between the president of Central College and its most influential director.

At a meeting of the board in November, 1944, Mr. Farr asked Dr. Sparling how many Negro and Jewish students were enrolled at the college. Dr. Sparling replied that he did not know, since under his administration no records of this sort were kept. Other members of the board joined Mr. Farr in insisting that the information be supplied. "The board of directors," they said, "is running this college." Dr. Sparling finally agreed to obtain the facts but said that if the information were used to establish a quota system, he would feel compelled to resign the presidency. The figures showed that under his administration the enrolment of Negroes had increased from 4 per cent of the student body to 25 per cent. In some departments—for example, in the classes in stenography—Negroes were more heavily represented than in others; Dr. Sparling explained this by the fact that most of the local business schools and colleges would not train Negroes for secretarial or clerical positions. (After voting to compel Dr. Sparling to supply this information, the board instructed the secretary to strike from the records the names of the men who had moved and seconded the motion.)

The friction between the administration and the board over quotas and general racial questions was increased by sharp differences of opinion on other issues. The chairman of the board, William P. Wiseman, another wealthy Chicagoan, criticized Dr. Sparling for tolerating the discussion of such "controversial subjects" as "racial, religious, and labor problems" in the college. When Dr. Sparling suggested that the college should "service labor" in the community in the same manner that it had long been "servicing" business, the suggestion was promptly and coldly turned down by the board. At the time of the Montgomery, Ward strike, Dr. Sparling spoke at a mass-meeting called by the striking union; this of course, did not enhance his popularity with the board members. Yet Dr. Sparling had made a fine record at Central College. When he became president in 1936, the college had an indebtedness of $75,000. By February, 1945, this debt had been paid, and the college was $11,000 ahead for that month in the year. In addition, Dr. Sparling had managed to add $100,000 to salaries, had created a $52,000 stabilization fund, and had increased endowments and enrolment.

At a board meeting on February 7, 1945, Dr. Sparling was told that his "qualifications were not compatible with the requirements of the position of president," and it was suggested that he look for another job. A member of the board added that since he seemed to be interested in Negroes, he might want to get a job with the Rosenwald Foundation or possibly "go down and live with the Negroes." On April 17 Dr. Sparling resigned under protest. The faculty promptly met and by a vote of forty-nine to fifteen indicated lack of confidence in the board of directors, and then, by a vote of sixty-two to one, decided that it would be desirable to have the college severed from Y. M. C. A. control and direction. This decision was supported by a large section of the student body, which voted 488 to 2 in favor of it—not all the students who wanted to vote could crowd into the small auditorium at the school.

In the meantime Dr. Sparling had managed to interest Marshall Field, the fairy godmother of American liberalism, and Dr. Edwin R. Embree of the Rosenwald Foundation in the idea of starting a new college. Large funds were not needed, for Central College—and the fact is quite remarkable—had been able to pay nearly 90 per cent of its expenses out of tuition fees. Originally Dr. Sparling planned to call the new college the Thomas Jefferson College, but after the death of President Roosevelt in April letters, telegrams, and telephone calls poured in suggesting it should be named Roosevelt College.

Thus within a few weeks Central Y. M. C. A. College had severed itself from the Y. M. C. A. and become Roosevelt College. There is no precedent in American educational annals, so far as I can discover, for the action of the faculty, who not only supported the stand taken by Dr. Sparling but followed him out of Central College and into Roosevelt College. Approximately 80 per cent of the faculty resigned their positions when Dr. Sparling resigned as president. Today in its new headquarters at 231 South Wells Street, Chicago, Roosevelt College promises to become an important institution of learning. Some 1,400 students are enrolled—and no questions are asked about the number of Jewish or Negro students. Since Chicago has no publicly supported liberal college offering education above the sophomore year, Roosevelt College, with its relatively low tuition fees, will fill a real need in the community. Only one-fifth of the 20,000 high-school graduates in Chicago now go on to college.

To their amazement the board of directors of Central Y. M. C. A. College discovered that a college is something more than its charter, board of directors, equipment, desks, furniture, books, and bank account. It discovered that a college is primarily a community of students and educators, and that the community is really the owner of the college. This ownership was proved when the faculty and students walked out. Nothing was then left of Central College except an irate board of directors, some empty offices and unused equipment, and a discredited Jim Crow heritage.

In setting up Roosevelt College Dr. Sparling decided that he would try to have a board that would never want to dictate an undemocratic policy to the faculty. The board of Roosevelt College is drawn from labor, management, capital, cooperatives, government, the professions, social scientists, the press, and educators. Five members of the faculty are represented on it. The chairman is Dr. Edwin R. Embree; the vice-chairman is Percy L. Julian, the brilliant Negro chemist. For some reason, Newton C. Farr is not on the new board. He is scheduled, however, to be elected president of the Civil War Round Table Club in January.

[This is the second of several letters from the Middle West and West.]

Victory for the Fatherland Front

BY PHILIP JORDAN

(The Nation's correspondent in Southeastern Europe; formerly the London News-Chronicle's chief foreign correspondent)

Sofia, November 18

HOWEVER illiberal and undemocratic the principle on which the Bulgarian elections were held yesterday, the actual voting was conducted in a manner with which no impartial observer could have found fault. Foreign observers were free to go where they wished, to arrive at any place without warning, and to be present in the booths during the actual voting. No doubt if they had possessed the necessary competence they could have watched the counting of the votes, but none did; and none, therefore, have a right to doubt the final figures issued by the government this evening. These final figures show that 86 per cent of the eligible population voted, and that 88 per cent of the 86 per cent cast their ballots in favor of the Fatherland Front, as the somewhat doubtful amalgam of parties calls itself. This means that just under three-quarters of the entire adult population, less those few who have been deprived of their civil rights, voted to maintain in power the combination which has governed since the so-called revolution of September 9, 1944, when the Germanophile government of King Boris was thrown out just before the Russian army occupied the country. But while an impartial observer must pay tribute to the absolute secrecy of the balloting, he cannot uphold the way the elections were staged.

In itself the Fatherland Front is an admirable idea. It contains the seeds of an effective democracy, having originally comprised all those parties in the state which were hostile to the Germanophile policies of the late Czar. Its leadership fell naturally to the best-organized, the best-disciplined party in the country, the party which had had years of experience in underground work. The Communists were a minority, but their fanaticism, and their close ties with the Soviet Union, made them the general staff of revolt.

When the Germans were finally driven out of Bulgaria by the advance of the Red Army and the success of the British and American forces on the western front—to hear a Bulgarian talk you would think they had fought the Germans single-handed—the necessity for one party's leadership came to an end. But supported by the presence, rather than the active interference, of Russian troops on Bulgarian soil, the Communists insisted on dominating the Front. And though a minority, they were able to dominate it because they retained in their hands the Ministry of the Interior, which controlled the entire life of the country through its police.

This insistence lead to schisms, and the major party in the nation, the Agrarians, walked out of the Front, leaving behind a mere rump subservient to the wishes of the Communist Party. It is almost impossible to say what proportion of the Agrarians walked out and what proportion remained beneath the banner of the Hammer and Sickle. The only measure that the outsider can discover is the sale of the newspapers which each branch controls. It is a rough-and-ready guide but probably a fairly accurate one. On November 1 the newspaper Zemedelsko Zname, organ of the Agrarians remaining in the Front, had a sale in Sofia of 1,900 copies. On the same day the Narodno Zemedelsko Zname, organ of the opposition Agrarians, sold 35,250 copies, which was, incidentally, the largest number sold by any newspaper circulating in Sofia. The next largest sales were those of the Otechestven Front, the official government organ—28,760 copies—and of the Rabotnichesko Delo, the Communist Party's daily—32,150 copies.

A third important section of the Fatherland Front is the Zveno, the political branch of the former Military League. The Zveno is nominally headed by Kimon Georgiev, the Prime Minister, but is actually the instrument of General Damian Velchev, at one time one of the most ardent persecutors of Communists that even this country has produced. But if necessity makes strange bedfellows, so does expediency, and so does cynical opportunism; and today General Velchev tucks up with as remarkable a man as this country has yet given to the world, Georgi Dimitrov, legendary hero of the Nazi Reichstag-fire trial and one of the first European fighters against fascism. It is not a pleasant sight to see these two heads lying on the same pillow; and when one finds the representatives of the Communist newspapers of the world clapping a speech by Velchev, one may, I think, be forgiven if one asks them if they can recall the dishonoring words they so properly wrote about the man only eleven years ago, when by a coup d'état he abolished the only semblance of liberal government this country has ever enjoyed.

The rest of the Fatherland Front is made up of political odds and ends split off from the remaining parties, somewhat as the tail of a lizard splits off from the body without doing it any noticeable injury. There are a few Social Democrats, an Independent or so, and a small group of characters who call themselves Radicals and have no discoverable principle unless the desire for power be counted as one.

The opposition consists mainly of the vast body of Agrarians who have few or no political objectives and to whom security is all that matters. They form a large proportion of the population, though just how large one cannot say. One may doubt that they include as high a percentage of the small-holding peasants as the leaders claim. A new spirit has come from the east and north, a new hope, and it has been dinned into peasant heads without respite since the Germans left. Some have certainly embraced that hope, far more probably than any British or American observer could determine, though it is likely that any absolutely free election would still show a majority for the opposition.

Here it must be said that if ever an opposition displayed complete lack of common sense this one did. It was maladroit in the extreme, and by unscrupulously exploiting the non-recognition policy of the United States and Great Britain it succeeded in identifying our two countries in the majority of minds with the worst possible form of reaction. Indeed, you hardly hear any mention of the Western democracies; they are spoken of as "Western reaction." Until the day of the election there were actually people in this capital who were afraid to be seen in public places with American or British citizens lest they should lay themselves open to a charge of collaboration with the enemies of the people.

The responsibility for this attitude lies not so much with the government as with its opponents, who have pursued a policy of absolute non-cooperation with the Fatherland Front in the belief that British and American power was behind them and would see to it that one fine day the reins of government were handed to them. Up to the last minute they believed the visit of Mark Ethridge, special observer for Secretary Byrnes, would succeed in postponing the elections. They could not have misread the situation more if they had tried deliberately to do so. The power and prestige of the Fatherland Front depended absolutely on the punctual holding of the elections, which had been postponed once. That was priority number one. If the elections had been delayed farther, the dominant Communist faction within the Front would have been decisively defeated and might never have regained its power. So smart a tactician as Dimitrov knew this as well as anybody, and for him and his followers, till yesterday evening, there was nothing that could begin to compare in importance with the elections.

Not that British and American wishes have been entirely neglected. On the contrary, thanks largely to the energy and frankness of the United States Minister, Maynard Barnes, and thanks also to the mere presence in Bulgaria of Mark Ethridge, the Fatherland Front has begun to adopt a more conciliatory attitude toward those who disagree with it. From them the Front has nothing to fear so far as internal affairs are concerned. The opposition is hopelessly split, has no leaders worthy of the name, no policy beyond a wringing of the hands, and is firmly convinced that it is for Britain and America to pull it out of the mess created by its own ineptitude.

Dimitrov's speech three days ago offered rights to and imposed duties on the opposition if it wishes to play a part in modern Bulgaria. His speech indicated a complete change of attitude. Only ten days before, on his arrival from Moscow, he had threatened fire and the sword to those who opposed the Fatherland Front. The speech was a failure: even the faithful, who had governed for more than a year on the orders which he telephoned from Moscow, were upset. Even they had hoped for some measure of conciliation. Dimitrov, an adroit and experienced politician, trained in the logical expediency of Kremlin politics, was quick to see his mistake. He changed his tune, and his speech was welcomed both in government and in opposition circles with a sigh of relief. It foreshadowed, despite its bitter attack on "Western reaction," a policy designed to win with as little delay as possible that recognition from the Western democracies which the more vocal and intransigent Communists declare to be a matter of indifference to them. The contrary is the truth: now that the elections are out of the way, recognition has become the new priority number one.

The predicted reign of terror has not materialized; once it became certain that the elections would no longer be postponed, the need for violence disappeared. Not all the King's horses nor all the King's men—to say nothing of the President's—can undo what was achieved yesterday. If the new government proves politically wise, practices a decent moderation, and tolerates the pinpricks of an impotent opposition, it will surely receive recognition. There may be some delay: the government is well aware of that, but it can afford to wait, the more so as both the British and the American authorities are inclined to resume at least commercial relations.

How far the Soviet Union interferes in Bulgarian affairs it is hard to determine. By garrisoning the country with a minimum of 100,000 men it commits, of course, an act of the highest interference, and it can no more claim to be disinterested than the British can claim to be disinterested in Greece. The Russian troops here have behaved well but are none the less a burden on the somewhat strained economy of the country. Their mere physical presence is an immense aid to the government, encouraging people who might think twice about it to vote for the maintenance of the Fatherland Front as at present constituted. Certainly the actual membership of the Communist Party has at least doubled since the war began drawing to an end in this part of the world; many new adherents have come from the ranks of those who are either frightened or desire jobs. My own impression, which would be disputed by both the American and the British Mission, is that in any free election the Communists would have received perhaps 30 per cent of the votes, certainly no more; and they know it or they would have willingly consented to the holding of such free elections. As it is they dominate the government; more, they swamp it. The coalition has granted them approximately 50 per cent of the seats, and the other 50 per cent, held by the Agrarian rump, will be filled with Communists masquerading as Agrarians.

Yet however much one may deplore this open jury-packing, it is impossible to withhold admiration altogether from the Fatherland Front. The contribution of Bulgarian partisans to the war was negligible, but they did create a spirit in this country which can shake it from its apathy and give self-respect to its citizens. They began a revolution which is but half finished. They began it on the old model—terror, intimidation, murder, and plunder; but they seem to be going to finish it on the new model—persuasion, good government, and tolerance of the enemy once his claws are drawn.

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

Friction in the North Atlantic

AFTER a wordy battle operators of North Atlantic air routes have settled down to an uneasy truce pending a meeting in early January, when an effort will be made to prevent the development of rate wars. For the time being Pan-American World Airways and American Overseas Airways are both to charge $375, the pre-war rate, for passengers flying from New York to England, and both have permits to make seven round trips a week, though provisionally they are regularly scheduling five each. Presumably the British Overseas Airways Corporation will adjust its rates accordingly, but at present it is hardly competing with the two American lines, for it is not yet equipped for winter flying over the North Atlantic and its two flights weekly are on a roundabout southern route.

The recent ructions were precipitated when Pan-American announced it was slashing one-way passenger rates from the war-time level of $572 to $275. It justified this cut on the ground that it had been able to reduce costs by switching from its old sea-planes to more modern land-based aircraft which could be operated more cheaply. Other operators raised their eyebrows at this claim. For while there is no doubt that when really large planes with a carrying capacity of two hundred or so are available much lower fares will be economically possible, it is questionable whether with the Douglas DC-4's now being used to transport twenty-five or fewer passengers, Pan-American's cut rates would cover all costs. It has been noted that on its Latin American routes, where it has less present and prospective competition, Pan-American has been content with a much more modest revision of fares. In fact, it has left the Miami-Rio de Janeiro rate at $425, while that to Buenos Aires has been marked down by only $5 to $490. Hence there is some reason to suspect that in offering its transatlantic bargain the company was following chain-store merchandising practice and putting an attractive "loss-leader" in its show window.

Pan-American, it must be remembered, has a well-deserved reputation as an aggressive fighter. For years before the war it successfully blocked every attempt by other American air lines to break into international flying. Then when the domestic companies banded together to press their claims for post-war overseas routes, Pan-American put on a great campaign to get its de facto monopoly legalized. Senator McCarran, its "chosen instrument" on Capitol Hill, brought forward a bill to create a single American "flag line" to which all overseas traffic would be intrusted. Domestic air lines would have been permitted to participate in this venture, but obviously Pan-American would have formed its core. Senator McCarran pushed this plan hard, but it bogged down in committee after the Administration plunked for the principle of competition abroad as well as at home.

Last summer the Civil Aeronautics Board allotted North Atlantic routes to American Overseas Airlines and Transcontinental and Western Air over the protests of Pan-American. The latter's recent rate cut, therefore, seems to say very clearly, "You asked for competition; very well then, we promise you a bellyful." That is not to say its tactics are just a matter of spite. On the contrary, Juan Trippe, chairman of Pan-American, a cool and calculating strategist, is surely thinking in terms of long-range policy. By announcing his cut, even though he was almost immediately forced to withdraw it, he advertised his company as the protagonist of cheap air travel. He has done something to remove the horns of monopoly from the public image of Pan-American, substituting for them the halo of the thwarted pioneer. In time to come, if the competitive system raises too much hell on the North Atlantic, his record may be put to profitable use.

Meanwhile the threatened rate war has served to call attention once again to the lamentable results of the failure of America and Britain to reach an agreement at last year's Civil Aviation Conference in Chicago. It will be recalled that no compromise was reached between opposing points of view on the third and fourth "freedoms of the air," which involve the right of authorized air-transport operators to land passengers and freight in any country and to pick up traffic destined for their country of origin. The American delegation insisted that these freedoms should be enjoyed competitively, with no economic controls except those imposed on operators by their own governments. The British maintained that unless competition on international routes was regulated by an international authority, it would be impossible to avoid rate wars leading to competitive subsidies.

This unresolved issue not only blocked a general agreement at Chicago; it has served since to delay a bilateral agreement between America and Britain providing for reciprocal commercial air rights. Hence the obsolete agreement of 1937, which allowed for two weekly round trips by the air lines of each country, still holds. The additional flights which Britain has in fact permitted to American operators represent an uncovenanted act of grace. That is why the British government was able to discipline Pan-American, when it effected its rate cut without prior consultation, by reducing its schedules to the original two a week.

Hopes of a new agreement now depend on the success of the North Atlantic operators' conference which is meeting under the auspices of the International Air Transport Association next month. If this body is able to establish machinery for fixing minimum rates and maximum schedules and for preventing rate wars, the British may regard it as a voluntary substitute for the authoritative International Aeronautics Board they failed to obtain at Chicago. In this case auspices should be good for a new Anglo-American agreement providing for a much-expanded volume of traffic between the two countries. But Britain will not offer facilities for a competitive free-for-all which, in view of the commanding lead enjoyed in civil aviation by this country, would mean American domination of the international air. Before condemning this attitude it might be well to bear in mind that the United States is equally unwilling to leave its merchant marine at the mercy of free competition.

KEITH HUTCHISON

The People's Front

ALMOST simultaneously England and France have passed laws to nationalize banking. The parallelism of these projects marks the profound social transformation that is taking place in Europe, a transformation born of the conviction that the road to recovery runs to the left, in the direction of socialism. The parallel is all the more striking because the economies of the two nations are so different. England is an industrial country which for more than a century has had to import the bulk of its foodstuffs. France, on the other hand, has been until now one of the few industrial countries capable of feeding itself. The war has accentuated these differences: in spite of the blitz England's industrial plants and transport are relatively intact; those of France have been largely destroyed. Yet British Labor and the French resistance are moving in the same direction.

Disappointed by the foreign policy of the British Labor government, many people are apt to lose sight of its accomplishments in the domestic field. Here at least it is conscious of its power. Harold Laski said to me the other day, "Those who predict a short life for the new government are fooling themselves; this time Labor is in power for ten years." That explains the new tone in the speeches of the Labor Ministers. It is not as it was in 1924. Sharp-tongued Ellen Wilkinson and Aneurin Bevan, long recognized as one of the most eloquent speakers in the House, bear little resemblance to their counterparts in the government of Ramsay MacDonald. Even quiet Hugh Dalton in his budget speech gave the impression that Labor is ready to embark on a genuinely Socialist program; for the first time a Chancellor of the Exchequer dared to define prosperity not in terms of dividends but of production and purchasing power. He spoke with still greater assurance in introducing the bill to nationalize the Bank of England. Four days after the second reading two more nationalization measures—cable and wireless and air transport—were proposed. And while nationalization of railways is not included in the legislative program for the current session of Parliament, the railway companies have already gone on the defensive with propaganda designed to prove that their performance during the war was excellent and that nationalization can only result in a decrease of efficiency. They have revived the old saws about "removal of the competitive spur" and "introduction of control by stick-in-the-mud bureaucrats." But the Labor press has retaliated with the reminder that the fastest scheduled run on the British railways, that of the privately owned L. N. E. R. line's "Coronation," holds fifty-second place in the list of the world's high-speed runs.

Twenty years ago a hesitant and conciliatory Labor Party government faced an aggressive Tory-Liberal majority in Parliament. The Liberals have remained true to this old marriage of convenience; two weeks ago they supported Churchill's motion of censure against the government. But this time Labor has an absolute majority in the House; and when Mr. Churchill accuses the government of driving England to socialism, even the gentle Mr. Attlee retorts that it was for this the British people put Labor in power on July 5.

In France the picture is the same. During the Popular Front the "Liberals" of France, the Radical Socialist Party, held the majority. They could—and did—write the death warrant of any Cabinet that even whispered the word nationalization; directly or indirectly they sabotaged every measure that meant a change in France's social or economic structure. Last week, however, by a vote of 521 to 35, the Constituent Assembly approved a proposal to nationalize the banks that goes even farther than the British act; it includes, in addition to the Banque de France, six other powerful banking and credit houses, among them the Crédit Lyonnais, the Société Générale, and the Comptoir d'Escompte. The new law has its weak points, especially in regard to compensation, but it marks a big step forward: the Prime Minister will no longer, as in the time of Léon Blum, be at the mercy of the directors of the Banque de France and the "two hundred families." The Socialists and Communists together had enough votes to pass the bill, but they were joined by the M. R. P., which as a party created by the resistance also knows that there can be no return to the old big-business dictatorship of French political life.

In the devastated countries private capital has launched the slogan, "You can't socialize ruins," but the contrary is the truth: only by socializing ruins can Europe recover. In England, in France, in all of Europe, popular thinking is focused on Socialist planning, just as half a century ago liberal thought revolved around the problem of political freedom. Among the highly industrialized democratic countries Czechoslovakia has adopted a program of 70 per cent nationalization, including even pottery, porcelain, glass, cement, and textiles. In those agrarian countries where land reform takes the place of industrial nationalization, the same trend can be discovered; by last August Hungary had broken up its feudal estates and distributed four million acres of land to three-quarters of a million peasants.

Everywhere the desire for change is visible. The other day as he was passing through a little village at the Hungarian-Yugoslav frontier on his way to Belgrade, Kingsley Martin, editor of the London New Statesman and Nation, saw a poster which read, "We have no need of the past." If those Americans to whom the word socialism is anathema were to cross the Atlantic, they would find few allies apart from those who financed Hitler and Mussolini or the Romans who are urging a ten-year American military occupation of Italy to forestall "disorders." And the editorial writer of the New York Herald Tribune who recently denounced the "silly and irresponsible" Laski would discover that free enterprise and market economy are becoming as obsolete in Europe as horse cars are in the streets of New York. DEL VAYO

BOOKS and the ARTS

ARGUMENT ON RIME

Karl Shapiro Objects

DEAR SIRS: With your permission I would like to make a reply to Delmore Schwartz's review of my "Essay on Rime" in The Nation of November 10—Delmore's remarks are set off by quotes.

1. Shapiro has discovered that "the modern poet depends too much upon scansion by count of ear." This statement appears nowhere in my book, either by inference or by assertion and betrays a wish on Delmore's part to have me condemn all of modern poetry.

2. Shapiro confounds scansion by count of ear "with such devices as Cummings's typography and with his own misunderstanding of Bridges's analysis of Milton's blank verse." I have numbered the lines of my book for people like Delmore who lose the place. If Delmore will turn to line 500 and begin reading he will see that I consider "typography" an entirely separate branch of modern poetry, having no connection with scansion by count of ear. My own "misunderstanding of Bridges's analysis of Milton's blank verse" is just one of those things. I read Bridges's book and Delmore read it as he read "Essay on Rime." Bridges wrote a book called "On the Elements of Milton's Blank Verse in Paradise Lost," in which Bridges discovered that the typical line has (1) ten syllables, (2) with five stresses, (3) in rising rhythm. All these elements Milton varied according to an elaborately schematized system of supernumerary syllables, elisions, contractions, and stress inversions—as I said in simpler language in my essay.

3. "In belief, the failure is disbelief, the effort to find beliefs, and an acceptance of the doctrines of Freud." Delmore will please notice that I defend the literary uses of Freud in Joyce but not in the case of the literary amateur. Delmore will deny that any such distinction between Joyce and, say, Delmore exists.

4. Delmore asserts that the "Essay" contains "countless errors of fact and interpretation," but manages to root out only differences of opinion. If Delmore is preparing a large-scale study of my errors, he can put me down for ten copies. Delmore thinks Marianne Moore's line about disliking poetry is ironical. I disagree with Delmore and therefore commit an error either of fact or interpretation. Ex cathedra Delmoris. Delmore takes exception to my naming psychoanalysis a therapy and italicizes the word in horror. Here I commit not an error but a sin, because to Delmore psychoanalysis seems to be a religion. Delmore objects to my calling Poe the Lenin of the symbolists. On second thought and in deference to Delmore I am having this changed to the Trotsky of the symbolists.

5. "If it seems contradictory to praise the master for qualities for which the follower is censured, and the whole of modern poetry condemned, the explanation is that Shapiro's praise is really half-hearted and ambiguous." I like the word "ambiguous." Delmore wants like hell for me to condemn "the whole of modern poetry" in order to classify me safely as an "anti-intellectual and philistine." This classification would fill one or two of the empty pigeonholes in Delmore's head. It's no fit, Delmore. I do not condemn "the whole of modern poetry"; I am too ambiguous.

6. "Shapiro condemns intellectuals more than anyone else." Delmore wants like hell for me to condemn intellectuals, but the fact is that I defend Gertrude Stein, Ezra Pound, Eliot, Auden, Joyce, Lucretius, Donne, Yeats, Lawrence, Hart Crane, Barker, MacNeice, Freud, Poe, and even Dante. What I do attack is—but look, Delmore, I wrote a book on that subject. The name of it is "Essay on Rime."

7. Shapiro's condemnation of intellectuals "suggests powerfully that the attack on criticism is a fear of critics, and the hatred of the intellectual a fear of the intellect." My "condemnation of the intellectuals" (see paragraph 6, supra) suggests powerfully no such thing, Delmore. No poet of my generation has had more decent and generous treatment from critics than I. I fear no critic, even you, Delmore. Nor does my "hatred of the intellectual" suggest powerfully a fear of the intellect. I fear no intellect, even yours, Delmore. I do confess that your criticism baffles me somewhat, which is not the case with the "intellectuals" above. I put this down as a blind spot in my make-up.

I would like to register a protest with The Nation's literary editor for printing a piece of criticism as invidious and deliberately falsified as Delmore Schwartz's review of "Essay on Rime." I make no claims for my book and am interested solely in an honest representation of its contents. There seems to be a slump in the art of book reviewing when the personal rancor of an embittered young man passes for literary judgment in the pages of The Nation. KARL SHAPIRO

Mr. Schwartz: Chapter and Verse

DEAR SIRS: Karl Shapiro's objections to my review show the same ignorance as his book. Some of his seven points are merely personal abuse, and the others, except for the first one, come from an extraordinary misunderstanding of what I said in my review and what some authors have said in their books. At the same time Shapiro sidesteps or ignores many of the critical objections which I made in my review.

Point 1. The phrase "scansion by count of ear" is an error in the review for which The Nation is responsible. I wrote "scansion by count of eye," and the change must have been made in the proof. Point 2 is closely connected with Point 1 and can be answered at the same time. In "Milton's Prosody" Bridges tried to show that Milton was able "to invert the accent of any foot" (Bridges, page 35), if he restricted every line to ten syllables, by means of such devices as elision. Bridges then attempted to go farther than Milton and write syllabic verse in which accent was entirely disregarded: the only measure of the line was the number of syllables. Shapiro confuses Milton's inversion of accent with Bridges's disregard of accent, a very different thing. Shapiro further confuses both of these practices with imagist meters, which depend wholly on accent and disregard the number of syllables in a line. The confusion becomes enormous when Cummings's use of the look of print on a page is also named by Shapiro as one more example of "visual prosody," to use his strange solecism. As I said in my review, such errors would not matter if Shapiro were not writing about prosody as such.

Point 3 is an example of Shapiro's pretense of defending an error when he is merely making a personal attack upon his critic. I do not deny that there is a distinction between James Joyce and myself. I cannot conceive even by means of fantasy how anything I've ever said suggested such an identification, even in terms of literary influence. Meanwhile by means of slipping into a senseless personal attack, Shapiro evades the very issue he has raised: What is wrong with the beliefs of modern poets? The question of Joyce's use of Freud is Shapiro's red herring.

Point 4 is a confusion in part of Point 3. The confusion is so complete that it is necessary to separate out three elements. First, Shapiro thinks that I italicized the word "therapy" because I think that psychoanalysis is a religion. I think nothing of the sort. Even if I thought it a religion, it is still inconceivable that I would deny that it is a therapy. Shapiro's failure to understand the italics is an instance of his general incompetence as a reader. The italicizing of therapy was an effort to note one of Shapiro's countless errors, for he wrote that Freudian therapy is deductive and deterministic, while as a therapy, as a method of curing nervous illness, the analyst depends upon the emotional transformation of the patient, the liberation of repressed emotional patterns by means of transference, the analysis of dreams, free association, and the like, none of which is either religious or deterministic. Shapiro's error is to take Freud's assumption that all mental acts are caused and attach it foolishly to the actual practice of the analyst. This brings us back to the literary uses of Freud, Joyce's or my own. When Shapiro speaks of "Finnegans Wake" as "an exercise in Freudian philology," he misrepresents Freud, philology, and "Finnegans Wake." Philology is the science of liguistics. Freud was not interested in philology but in the way that uses and misuses of language, especially free associations, make clear the unconscious motives of the psyche. Joyce made use of these Freudian and Jungian discoveries in "Finnegans Wake," but he made use of many other important devices. The phrase "Freudian philology" is actually without meaning.

Second, Shapiro's misunderstanding of Marianne Moore's line is not a matter of interpretation but of fact. If there is no distinction between errors of fact and errors of interpretation, then anything can be said about anything. Apart from the clear absurdity of thinking that a practicing poet like Miss Moore actually dislikes poetry, the poem itself says: "Reading it [poetry], however, with a perfect contempt for it, one discovers in it, after all, a place for the genuine . . . these things [of poetry] are important . . . because they are useful . . . if you demand . . . what is genuine, you are interested in poetry." It is a pity to disfigure thus a wonderful poem, but the poem is too long to quote entire, and the reader will have to read it as a whole if he doubts that it is a matter of

There's no better gift!

THE NATION for your friends

52 TIMES A YEAR for only $3

You can give The Nation as a gift to as many people as you wish at the special rate of only $3 each. And with it goes the usual greeting card. You can renew your own subscription now or whenever it expires at the regular yearly rate of $5, or if you want to make a real saving, you can renew for two years for $8 or three years for $11. Just fill out and mail the order form below.

GIFT ORDER FORM

THE NATION ASSOCIATES, Inc.
20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

Please send gift subscriptions of one year of The Nation to my friends as indicated below, at the special gift rate of $3 each.

☐ Also renew my own subscription to The Nation at the regular rate for .... years.
☐ Don't renew my subscription now.
☐ Remittance enclosed. ☐ Please bill me.

My name is ....
Street ....
City .... Zone & State..................

REGULAR RENEWAL SUBSCRIPTION RATES
One Year $5 Two Years $8 Three Years $11
For Foreign and Canadian subscriptions add $1.00 a year for extra postage.

→ List Gift Subscriptions Here ←

Name ....
Street ....
City .... Zone & State..................
Gift Card should read from ....
☐ Send Gift Card to me for mailing.

Name ....
Street ....
City .... Zone & State..................
Gift Card should read from ....
☐ Send Gift Card to me for mailing.

Name ....
Street ....
City .... Zone & State..................
Gift Card should read from ....
☐ Send Gift Card to me for mailing.

12-22-45

fact, not interpretation, that Miss Moore does not dislike poetry and wrote an ironic line.

Shapiro again appears to be incapable of understanding what I said when he suggests that in objecting to Poe as "the Lenin of the symbolists" I was making some kind of political point which would be rectified by substituting the name of Trotsky. The foolishness, which I thought palpable, was in the incongruity of the comparison: one might as well say that Longfellow was the Kerensky, Baudelaire the Bukharin, Mallarmé the Molotov, and Valéry the Stalin of the symbolists. The point, to state it with the utmost directness, is that Poe and Lenin do not resemble each other.

Point 5 begins with an equivocation upon the word "ambiguous," which means doubtful and uncertain. Any number of passages illustrate Shapiro's condemnation of the whole of modern poetry. On page 19 of his book he writes: "Though some have strength that penetrates and burns/ The total is aberration" (my italics). On page 48 he says that he cannot agree with Yeats that the last forty years have produced more good poetry than any generation since the Elizabethans. On page 68 he concludes his attack by speaking of "the norm and type of modern rime" (my italics) as "senseless violence," "a brawl of vocatives," "the vestigial proof of nothing," and as a synoptic title he uses the phrase, "the dead hand and exhaustion of our rime." It is true that elsewhere Shapiro eats and praises his cake before he denounces it, and the quotation from page 19 is a brief instance of this effort to deny and affirm at the same time. In my review I cited his praise of "Ulysses," which is contradicted by the statement that "the price that he [Joyce] paid for greatness is too dear." Shapiro makes no effort to show that this is not a contradiction, in so far as it makes any sense whatever.

Shapiro's list of the authors whom he admires and defends is either disingenuous or an evasion. The example of Joyce can stand for all of them, for the same process of mind is involved. In his poem Shapiro says that for "the breakdown" in language "Joyce is as much to blame as any man." I pointed this out in my review, and Shapiro ignores the point. Is it possible that he does not understand that you cannot accuse a man of being responsible for the breakdown in language and at the same time claim that you admire and defend him? Is it possible to speak of the breakdown and confusion in prosody, language, and belief, and yet claim that you are not attacking the character of modern poetry?

Points 6 and 7, like Point 5, are efforts on Shapiro's part to repudiate what he says in his book again and again. On page 2 he writes, "My only answer is that criticism/ Has charted poetry into dangerous narrows/ And dashed its own brains out upon the rocks/ Of absolute meaning," whatever absolute meaning may mean. On page 65 he objects to the way in which "Our talk . . . dilates on right and wrong,/ Values in point-of-view, criteria/ In taste, and criticism in everything." If Shapiro is not objecting to criticism here, then he is saying nothing. On the same page he speaks of how poetry "as a vision of the soul," whatever that may signify, "Descended . . . into the poetry of ideas," and then Poe as Lenin leads to the statement that "the yeast of criticism worked, and rime/ Declined to verbiage" (my italics), which is to say that after Poe poetry degenerated. If this is not an attack on modern poetry, on criticism, on the critic and the intellectual, then words do not mean anything.

There are a number of other passages which might have served as well to show that Shapiro does condemn the whole of modern poetry, the critic and the intellectual, but it is obviously impossible to quote at length from a book which is bad throughout—bad as poetry, ignorant as criticism, and shocking in its inaccuracies and misconstructions. Shapiro's letter adds to his book in this sense; he shows himself either unaware of the nature of his opinions or unwilling to take any responsibility for them. DELMORE SCHWARTZ

Hayes Tells All

WARTIME MISSION IN SPAIN, 1942-45. By Carlton J. H. Hayes. The Macmillan Company. $3.

ALREADY the interest in Professor Hayes's self-congratulatory memoirs is mainly antiquarian. At San Francisco the United Nations Organization resolved that it would not admit Spain as long as the Franco regime remained in power; this decision was confirmed at Potsdam; President Roosevelt's instructions to Norman Armour, when he replaced Hayes last spring, made it clear that the United States, like all other decent governments, wants nothing to do with Franco. Hayes does not refer to any of these important statements, which are in such contradiction to the policy he pursued, but they explain the defensive tone of an apologia which manages to be both ill-natured and complacent.

Hayes tells us, with candid self-approval, that the newspaper comment on his appointment as ambassador to Franco Spain was "almost universally favorable and commendatory." Only The Nation "expressed dissatisfaction," but he explains that this publication "could hardly be satisfied by any action affecting Spain short of a declaration of war." Hayes's self-satisfaction continued, and he finds now that he made only one small error—he failed to anticipate Franco's grant of a special extra credit to Hitler—against scores committed by the BEW, the OWI, the State Department, under pressure from the "extremist press" to be sure, and even by Sir Samuel Hoare. Hayes had had no diplomatic experience, he could not speak Spanish, he had never been in Spain; but he tells us that he had written some Spanish history and was a Catholic, so that was enough for Roosevelt, whose policy toward Franco is the most inexplicable failure of his Administration.

More important considerations apart, "Wartime Mission in Spain" will at least lay to rest the curious supposition that Hayes had any affection for liberalism or democracy. Actually, his book "The Generation of Materialism, 1871-1900," published in 1941, is one long sneer at liberal European statesmen and their reforms in the age of Gladstone. Like Archbishop Spellman, Hayes adopts the device of setting down the more outrageous statements of Franco, Jordana, et al. without direct comment but with implied approval. But he lacks the urbanity and the smooth rhetoric of the Archbishop. He would have been well advised to leave his defense to Messrs. Lindley and Weintal, whose apologia in Harper's of December, 1944, was a much smoother job.

Hayes was ambassador in Madrid from May, 1942, to January, 1945. As early as 1943 he had informed the State Department of his great work: "Keeping the Axis-created regime out of the war," he said, "and bringing it progressively to the side of the United States will eventually be adjudged by informed public opinion as one of the outstanding diplomatic victories of the war and one which, through insuring Allied control of the Strait of Gibraltar and of the western Mediterranean, may prove decisive in bringing about the defeat of the Axis." He makes bold, in fact, to claim that he changed Franco from pro-Axis "non-belligerency" to pro-Allied "benevolent neutrality," despite the "sniping" from the "extremist" American press.

There is, of course, no doubt that from the time the United States entered the war, and particularly after the success of our landing in North Africa, Franco began to see that his Axis pals were losing. Hence we may accept Hayes's claim that many Allied airmen, French patriots, and Jewish refugees from Hitler did get out of Spain. (I have talked to many Jews and Frenchmen who spent months in concentration camps during this period, however, and they do not share the Ambassador's enthusiasm for Franco.) It is true also that Spain eventually shipped less wolfram to Germany than in the early days of the war, and finally stopped it entirely. But the Germans, as BEW records will show, until the eve of our invasion of France continued to get all they really needed—including the wolfram supplied by Salazar and shipped through Spain—and the embargo was imposed only because the State Department, over Hayes's violent protests, had cut off Franco's supplies of oil.

Hayes's major claim is that he prevented the Germans from attacking us through Spain when we landed in North Africa. That was in November, 1942, and for months we kept 250,000 men, who were badly needed at Kasserine Pass, on guard at the Spanish Moroccan border. There was a bare possibility then that the Germans might come through Spain, though Franco, foreseeing their defeat, did not want them to. It would have been far different if the Germans had had the foresight to attack Gibraltar in the summer of 1940, or even as late as 1941. But it was the German attack on Russia, not Hayes, that saved Spain. It is typical equally of his egotism and of his bad judgment that Hayes considered the threat from the Germans even greater after the conquest of North Africa, and even after the capture of Naples, than it was before. So he busied himself all the more getting oil for Franco and an American visa for the son of the Foreign Minister, Jordana. It may come as a shock, even to those who knew some of Hayes's activities in Madrid, that he also wanted the United States to supply military matériel to Franco, who needed modern equipment and was still relying, as he had been since 1936, on Hitler. (Hayes tells us this himself, explaining that he wanted to keep the Nazis from getting extra pesetas, but Franco solved the problem by giving Germany a special credit.)

Hayes devotes much attention to the "success" of the American preemptive buying program in Spain. His summary of the resultant benefits to the Spanish fascists and their unwillingness to impose an embargo on wolfram shipments to Germany is of course sympathetic. It is also unconsciously revealing. "If the Germans," as he says, "couldn't get wolfram from Spain, the Allies, who didn't really need it, would at once stop buying it. A panic would follow the boom. And how then could Spain meet her requirements for foreign imports of petroleum, wheat, fertilizer, machinery, and arms?" (italics mine). It would indeed have been regrettable if this flourishing Nazi-Falangista trade had been stopped.

With as much anger as sorrow Hayes admits there was a time indeed when our State Department unaccountably got tough, and despite his strenuous objections, appeals to Roosevelt, and the like, did cut off Franco's oil. This was its reaction to the Laurel "incident," as Hayes calls it, when the Franco regime, to the great satisfaction of the Japanese, sent a special message of good wishes to the head of the Japanese puppet government in the Philippines. This was at a moment when Hayes was assuring the department that he was doing marvels, and he could not understand the department's anger. It was all just a clerical error by Jordana, "an honest and kindly man unmistakably pro-Ally, especially pro-American," and Hayes "saw the incident in perspective." And when a couple of fascist thugs made an attack on the American consulate in Valencia, also to the annoyance of the State Department, Hayes tells us that "the actual facts, as I explained to the department, were that two Falange youngsters, aged nineteen and twenty-two respectively, misbehaved."

Hayes's expertness in logic as well as diplomacy is demonstrated by this explanation of the reasons for his trust in Lequerica, Jordana's successor, who had been Franco's contact man with Pétain: "I felt, at my first meeting with him, that he would adjust himself to changing conditions readily and vigorously. The very fact that he had been associated for four years with Vichy and was reputed to have been pro-Axis, at least in 1940-41, was likely, I reasoned, to render

WHY—SMASH—ATOMS?—

NEW REVISED EDITION

By Arthur K. Solomon

THIS is the book that startled the world when it first appeared—the what, the how, and the why of atom-smashing, authoritatively explained for the general reader in a language he can understand. This revised edition includes important data released by the Government on the atomic bomb, and twenty excellent new photographs in addition to the original ninety-eight illustrations. $3.00 him all the more anxious to cooperate with us now that our arms were triumphing." It is evident that in Hayes's estimation there should be more rejoicing over one turncoat than over the thousands of Spanish patriots who had been fighting on our side since 1936.

HARVARD
University Press
CAMBRIDGE 38, MASSACHUSETTS

Hayes's mission, with his naive enjoyment of his contacts with the Spanish dukes, and his bickerings with Hoare—the British appeaser didn't like Franco and wanted a monarchy—is over, and he is now back at Columbia. The evil he has done, however, lives on. He is right, I am afraid, when he insists that the average Spaniard did not want to get into the war, does not want a civil war, even to expel Franco. The reason is obvious. Both during the Spanish civil war and ever since, the United States and England have given continuous assistance to Franco. This has not merely strengthened the fascist regime but clearly weakened the resolve of many Spaniards who stood fast in the defense of democracy as late as the summer of 1941, when I left Spain. The World War began in Spain, but Spain is not yet liberated. Hayes and his cohorts in the State Department and the Foreign Office are responsible.

The return of Spain to a democratic, decent government is inevitable. Franco can only delay it by pretending to do away with the more obvious marks of fascism, or even, in extremis, by bringing back a puppet Vichyite king; a resolute stand by the United States and England will hasten his fall. The important thing is to prevent such blunders from being repeated, not only in Europe but in Asia and in South America. It is encouraging to find Hayes admitting that the majority of American public opinion was against him, and that campaigns by PM, Winchell, and other "extremists" at times goaded the State Department—for a short while—into taking a stand in favor of democracy. If we extremists can do more effective work hereafter, we may prevent blunders that in an atomic age will be irretrievable. Hayes's book should be a guide and an inspiration for further efforts. He has raised himself a monument more lasting than professorial brass.

THOMAS J. HAMILTON

KAETHE
1867-1945
KOLLWITZ
LITHOGRAPHS DRAWINGS
WEEKDAYS 9-9, SUNDAYS 2-6
FOR CHRISTMAS
Books in English, German and French
Large selection of art books and reproductions
THE TRIBUNE BOOK AND ART CENTER
100 WEST 42ND STREET
6th Ave. Subway Arcade beneath Schulte Cigar Store

Bi-nationalism for Palestine?

Were you interested in I. F. Stone's suggestion for a bi-national solution for Palestine? Do you know that a strong section of Palestinian labor has fought for that idea for years? Do you know that Hashomer Hatzair in America, as in Palestine, has consistently advocated Jewish-Arab cooperation and bi-nationalism?

If you'd like to know more—fill out and mail the coupon below.
YOUTH AND NATION presents a new interpretation of Zionism.

YOUTH AND NATION
c/o Hashomer Hatzair, 305 Broadway, New York 7, N. Y.

Gentlemen:

☐ Enclosed find two dollars ($2.00) for one year's subscription to YOUTH AND NATION.

☐ Please send me more information about your work and program.

(Signed) ....
(Address) ....
....

NOTES BY THE WAY

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

DIANA TRILLING, who is playing hooky for the moment from Fiction in Review—she will be back shortly—asked me to read and report on "Days and Nights" by Konstantine Simonov (Simon and Schuster, $2.75), which has had overwhelming praise from the reviewers if I may judge from an advertisement which recently appeared in The Nation. The book arrived late, it is more than 400 pages long, and I read every word of it. Hence this tardy comment.

"Days and Nights" is a narrative of the Battle of Stalingrad. Its author has written plays and poetry; he is also described as an outstanding war correspondent. It was the war correspondent who wrote this book. The desperate day-by-day struggle—for a ruined building, for a few feet of ground, for the bit of the shore of the Volga which the Germans briefly reached—these are its substance and background. The "story" follows the fortunes of a group of officers and a nurse. Ordinary soldiers, curiously enough, do not figure in the book at all except as they are referred to, but not portrayed, as units in military movements—which produces, I must say, somewhat the effect of "Hamlet" without Hamlet. There is a villain in the piece, a traitor who is caught before he does any great damage. There is love interest—the hero, Captain Saburov, falls in love with Anya, the nurse. They both survive for a putative happy ending.

"Days and Nights" sold 400,000 copies in Russia, and it is quite understandable that a Russian reader who brought to this book the intense emotions which the Battle of Stalingrad aroused would find in it a satisfying evocation of the struggle. Even for a non-Russian it serves to recall the emotions generated by the long-drawn-out ordeal. To recall, but not to recreate. For though we may assume that Simonov was himself deeply involved, emotional intensity is just what his book lacks. From the evidence here he is a reporter, not a novelist, and I shouldn't be surprised if his newspaper stories of Stalingrad conveyed its reality far more vividly than this fictional account, if only because he was not called upon to create characters.

I would not have finished an American counterpart of "Days and Nights." I finished Simonov's book because it is written to the current Soviet pattern and has moreover been hailed as an outstanding example of Soviet writing. I was curious to consider the significance of that pattern in the context of world literature.

The current Soviet pattern is nationalist, collectivist, monolithic. In Simonov's book the timeless human emotions—courage in the face of death, love of the village and the land, the hope of happiness when the wars are done—are all set within this triple frame of reference.

What struck me first and most forcibly was the degree to which nationalism—though it patently has validity for Russian writers and readers at this point in Soviet history—has become outmoded as far as the arts are concerned. For in the arts at least the world state has long since been established and national sovereignties discarded.

To illustrate my point: it is simply not possible to imagine the best of contemporary writers, say a Malraux or a Silone, writing a novel in which the concept of nationalism was accepted as it is in "Days and Nights," because the main stream of human thought and imagination, of which they are a part, has long since broken out of that narrow channel.

Collectivism, of course, is in very different case. It has a future. But in Simonov's book, though it is often referred to, it figures curiously little, by comparison with patriotism, as a motivating force.

The monolithic element is most vividly reflected perhaps in the reader's awareness throughout that Simonov is a "public writer" and that his story of Stalingrad is also an exercise in public education. This factor, however relevant it may be, again, for Russian writers and readers, sets up for the non-Russian who approaches the book as literature a barrier to that direct communication between writer and reader which is surely one of the ends of literature.

I think that even John Hersey might agree that "Days and Nights" is not important from the point of view of world literature, though it may be a landmark in Soviet writing. (Personally I think Sholokhov is a better writer.) At least he took pains, in an inordinately long and cozy piece in the New Yorker about Simonov and his book, to say that "Days and Nights" is no "War and Peace" and that it cannot compare with "Man's Fate." Yet the total effect of his article was to give the impression that "Days and Nights" was somehow of surpassing significance. And in general the reviewers appear to have been stampeded—perhaps by the fact that it is a book about Stalingrad by a Soviet author—into behaving as if it were a good deal better than it actually is. But then of course reviewers are always being stampeded by one thing or another into behaving as if most books were a good deal better than they actually are.

In this particular case I find support for some of my own reservations—about the writing and the choice of characters —in a strange quarter. Mr. Hersey quoted, in order to dismiss, two opinions from Soviet critics. One said that Simonov had written his book with a "nerveless and indifferent hand." The other criticized the omission of "the portrait of the common soldier. . . . Without this, the picture of the fighting at Stalingrad loses greatly."

BRIEFER COMMENT

A Catholic View

FRANCIS E. MCMAHON'S liberal democratic views are well known to those who read his newspaper column. But since he touches upon the relation of his faith to his political and social views only occasionally in his journalistic writings, it is helpful to have a book from him—"A Catholic Looks at the World" (Vanguard, $2.75)—expounding the deeper religious convictions from which he draws his social views. A part of the book is devoted to criticism of Catholic conservatives and another part to a criticism of non-Catholics who identify the church too simply with social reaction. McMahon's own views are similar to those of Jacques Maritain, whom he frequently quotes. There are certain questions about the relation of an authoritarian religion to the democratic process which are not explored too profoundly. In that sense

Victory
through Education
Victory
through Justice

The race is now between Education and Catastrophe!

WILL YOU see that the Torch of Education and the Scales of Justice prevent the destructive uses of the Atomic Bomb?

Most authorities agree today that the world's problems are economic. Henry George saw this sixty years ago and offered the answer to these problems in his masterpiece PROGRESS AND POVERTY.

IF YOU KNEW the fundamental principles of Henry George you would at once realize that you could help to shape the destiny of civilization. You would see how economic ills could be cleared up, how every type of production . . . manufacturing, farming, etc., could zoom along and how there would be more jobs than men to do them. You would immediately recognize this is the "something" we need to revitalize Democracy. Tolstoy said: "People don't argue with George's teaching. They simply do not know it."

You can LEARN these fundamental principles in a FREE 10-LESSON COURSE. There is no charge for tuition to gain this liberal education. Clip the coupon below and mail it TODAY to The Henry George School, International Headquarters, 50 East Sixty-ninth Street, New York 21, N. Y.

HENRY GEORGE SCHOOL
International Headquarters
50 E. 69th St., New York 21, N. Y.

Enclosed find One Dollar for which send me a copy of PROGRESS AND POVERTY and enroll me in your FREE correspondence course, as advertised in THE NATION.

Name ....

Street and Number..........

City ....Zone No. ....State ....

VICTORY-THROUGH EDUCATION VICTORY-THROUGH JUSTICE

MOTION PICTURES

Manhattan
ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST.
86th ST.
58th ST.
near Lex.
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENT
RIVERSIDE
23rd ST.

Bronx
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

Westchester
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

Brooklyn
BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT REPUBLIC
TILYOU
Coney Island

Queens
Keith's
FLUSHING
Keith's
RICH. HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway

RKO

Merry Christmas Show
BEGINNING TUESDAY, DEC. 25
"One of the Best Times You've Ever Had!"
—Walter Winchell

'THE DOLLY SISTERS'
STARRING
Betty GRABLE
John PAYNE : June HAVER
In TECHNICOLOR—A 20th Century-Fox Picture
—AND—
'CARIBBEAN MYSTERY'
JAMES DUNN • SHEILA RYAN

LAST 5 DAYS – Thurs. to Mon., Dec. 20-24

Manhattan, Bronx, Westchester
'UNCLE HARRY'
George SANDERS • Geraldine FITZGERALD
— and —
'Shady Lady'
Ginny SIMMS • Charles COBURN

Brooklyn and Queens
'JUNIOR MISS'
PEGGY ANN GARNER
— and —
'Isle of the Dead'
Boris KARLOFF • Ellen DREW

B. G. DeSylva presents
BETTY HUTTON in
"THE STORK CLUB"
– with
BARRY FITZGERALD
DON DE FORE
Robert Benchley • Bill Goodwin
Iris Adrian • Mikhail Rasumny
Mary Young
and introducing ANDY RUSSELL
Midnight Feature Nightly

In Person
WOODY HERMAN and his ORCHESTRA
— featuring —
FRANCES WAYNE
— plus —
DOROTHY KELLER
Extra added attraction
BUDDY
LESTER
Don Baker at the Organ

NOW PLAYING PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

CONCERT

TOWN HALL, SATURDAY EVE., DECEMBER 29th
S. HUROK presents
RICHARD DYER-BENNET
The 20th Century Minstrel
TICKETS NOW AT BOX OFFICE: $1.20 to $3.00 (Tax Incl.)

STAGE PLAY

Kermit Bloomgarden & George Heller present
DEEP ARE THE ROOTS
A New Play by ARNAUD d'USSEAU and JAMES GOW
Staged by ELIA KAZAN
FULTON THEATRE Forty-sixth Street West of Broadway. Circle 6-6380.
Evenings 8:40, $4.20, $3.60, $3.00, $2.40, $1.80, $1.20. Matinees Wednesday and Saturday, $3.00, $2.40, $1.80, $1.20. Tax inclusive.

STAGE PLAYS

MICHAEL TODD PRODUCTIONS
"The greatest show in town."
—ROBERT GARLAND, Journal-American
MAURICE EVANS
In His New Production of Shakespeare's
HAMLET
COLUMBUS CIRCLE THEATRE B'WAY at 59th ST.—COlumbus 5-1173
Eves. 8:40—Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:40

MICHAEL TODD Presents
UP IN CENTRAL PARK
Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS
Lyrics by DOROTHY FIELDS
Music by SIGMUND ROMBERG
BROADWAY THEATRE, Broadway at 53rd Street. Matinees: WED. & SAT.

"DESERVES ITS GREAT SUCCESS!"—Nichols, Times
Rodgers and Hammerstein present
MADY CHRISTIANS • OSCAR HOMOLKA
in JOHN VAN DRUTEN'S
I REMEMBER MAMA
from Kathryn Forbes' "Mama's Bank Account"
with JOHN TETZEL • ADRIENNE GESSNER • RICHARD BISHOP
MUSIC BOX 48th Street, West of Broadway. Phone Circle 6-4636.
Eves. 8:35 Sharp. Mats. Thurs. and Sat., 2:35 Sharp.

the book is a little too journalistic. Yet it ought to be read by non-Catholics who fail to do justice to the contribution of socially progressive Catholics to the democratic cause.

One of the advantages of a democracy is that it allows us to cooperate with many groups on various cultural, religious, and political levels according to the degree of common conviction we may be able to find on that level. It is both idle and dangerous to insist that we must have common convictions on all possible issues to be able to cooperate on those issues in which we do share a common purpose. Books such as this, therefore, have a creative function. They help us to know our friends across barriers which sometimes threaten to divide us from them completely.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Concerning Saints

RENE FULOP-MILLER in "The Saints that Moved the World" (Crowell, $3.50) rises to something like eloquence in the longest chapter, that devoted to St. Francis; for the rest, his book is rather dull and badly written. Labeling the subjects of his study with single attributes—St. Anthony stands for Renunciation, St. Augustine for the Intellect, St. Francis for Love, St. Ignatius for Will Power, St. Teresa for Ecstasy—Mr. Fülöp-Miller imposes on himself a simplification which it is hard to redeem in a presentation of such complex characters as these. Neither the case for St. Augustine's intellect nor that for Ignatius's claim to sanctity is made very convincing; will to power, in fact, seems more like it in the case of the latter, all that drive, all that insistence on political organization, overshadowing, in the author's presentation at least, whatever charity there may have been in the spirit of the founder of the Jesuit order. Quoting many scientists in his introductory address to the modern reader, Mr. Fülöp-Miller protests against the too materialist views of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries; he offers the reader in addition an extensive bibliography for supplementary study. The book also has an index.

ROLFE HUMPHRIES

Films

JAMES AGEE

WHILE I watched the movie which Billy Wilder and Charles Brackett have made out of Charles Jackson's story about alcoholism, "The Lost Weekend," I was pretty consistently gratified and excited. When I began to try to review it, I could not forget what Eisenstein said, years ago, when he was asked what he thought of Lewis Milestone's "All Quiet on the Western Front." He said he thought it was a good Ph.D. thesis. I am afraid that applies to "The Lost Weekend," too. I don't mean that it is stuffy: it is unusually hard, tense, cruel, intelligent, and straightforward. But I see nothing in it that is new, sharply individual, or strongly creative. It is, rather, a skilful restatement, satisfying and easy to overrate in a time of general dereliction and fatuousness, of some sound basic commonplaces.

On that scale, of course, excellent things can be done. I don't see how the drunkard's first experience of the d. t.'s could be improved on by any means except possibly a dragging-out and brutalization of its climax. Frank Faylen's performance as a male nurse is fully as right and powerful; so is a shrieking free-for-all in an alcoholic ward—which is fought, however, by an incredibly mistaken use of "background" music. Ray Milland's performance as the alcoholic Don Birnam is debatable at first, but so absorbed and persuasive as the picture moves along that he all but wins the picture and the doubters over. There are also some first-rate re-creations of place and atmosphere—a soft-leather, soft-noised cocktail lounge, and a perfect setting of the Birnam apartment, and some shots of New York streets and times of day. At best there is a purity of tone and an acuteness about a city and the people in it which belong high in the movies' great classical strain of unforced, naturalistic poetry. While you watch it, it entirely holds you.

Thinking it over, though, there are curious and disappointing things about the picture. Good as he is, Milland is too robust for the best interests of his role; and in the earlier reels, when he is still sober enough to be assessed as a normal human being, it seems clear that neither he nor the director happens to know very much about the particular kind of provincially born, genteelly bred failed-artist Milland is supposed to be playing. None of the other players seem thoroughly at home, either, in the commonplace yet extremely specialized kind of apartment they use, though Philip Terry's gentle performance as the brother is of itself good, and Jane Wyman is knowingly cast as a Time researcher. Howard de Silva plays the ambiguous bartender well and with force, but the force and his face, in this context, turn it into ambiguity for little tots. The players miscast as Miss Wyman's ultra-bourgeois parents are probably not to blame, but they turn a sequence where intelligence and restraint would have been particularly gratifying into heavy caricature.

The causes of Don Birnam's alcoholism were not thoroughly controlled or understood, I thought, in the novel. In the movie they hardly exist. It may have been the better part of valor not to try to tackle them, and not to dabble in streams of consciousness, but when you add to this the fact that Mr. Milland cannot convincingly put before you this particular kind of thirsty man, you can see that the picture is bound to lack certain important kinds of depth, warmth, and intensity, not to mention plain dramatic interest. It becomes, too much of the time, just a virtuoso piece about a handsome, practically unidentified maniac. In one or two scenes you get with some force the terrible humiliation which is one of the drunkard's experiences; but considering the over-all quality of the film, it is remarkable how much you seem to have been given, and how little you actually get. There is very little appreciation, for instance, of the many and subtle moods possible in drunkenness; almost no registration of the workings of the several minds inside a drinker's brain; hardly a trace of the narcissism and self-deceit which are so indispensable or of the self-loathing and self-pity which are so invariable; hardly a hint, except through abrupt action, of the desperation of thirst; no hint at all of the many colorings possible in the desperation. The hangovers lack the weakness, sickness, and horrible distortions of time-sense which they need.

It is irrevelant to the carefully developed, finely photographed, wholly objective scheme of the movie, but I cannot help suggesting that many of these failures might have been avoided if the work had been done from a little farther inside. In some respects the method would still have been objective. A few minutes of dead-silent pantomime (without music, please!) of deadly weakness, in hangover, for instance, might have made definitive a good deal that is here only sketched; it should be the kind of weakness in which it is virtually unbearable to lift a hand, and for some reason necessary to do much more than that. Much of the wrestling of minds and moods too, I suspect, could have been registered from outside, through lines, business, mere close-up, and posture: Chaplin, after all, has made incredibly complicated things articulate in pantomime. Surely, for one simple instance—most obviously perhaps after the dawn escape from the hospital—it would have been possible to show the abject shattering coldness to which even temperate men are liable; and perhaps also to capture, through it, the sudden annihilating loneliness and fear of God—or whatever more terrifying it may be—which are so common, if peculiar, an experience. For certain other things you would have to take your camera and soundtrack part way inside the mind. Not to mention the curious enhancements and dilations which the outside world takes on for a drunken man—and I don't mean distortions in any "artistic" or "fantastic" sense but only such qualities as withering, euphoria, and tumescence. In the aftermath of drunkenness one is liable to be excruciatingly oversensitive to things touched, and to sound, and to light. Touch would have had to be carried by business—and might surely have been used to convey feverishness as well. Sound and light peculiarities could have been impacted in the film and track by appropriate, dry exaggerations. A knocking radiator, an abrupt auto horn, coupled with the right kind of playing, might have told the audience as much in an instant as an hour of pure objectivity could. The light

LANGUAGE IS POWER
. . . Forge ahead, win special assignments, promotion, better job in global peace time opportunities through ability to speak a foreign language.
MASTER A NEW LANGUAGE quickly, easily, correctly by LINGUAPHONE
The world-famous Linguaphone Conversational Method brings voices of native teachers INTO YOUR OWN HOME. You learn the new language by LISTENING. It's amazingly simple; thousands have succeeded. ◆ ◆ 29 LANGUAGES
Send for Free book, Call for Free demonstration
LINGUAPHONE INSTITUTE
81 RCA Bldg., New York 20 • Circle 7-0830

BOOKS FOUND FREE/
WHAT BOOKS DO YOU WANT?
We quote lowest market prices. No charge for locating Hard-to-Find and Out-of-Print Books. All books, OLD or NEW, mailed POST-FREE
SEARCHLIGHT BOOK NATION
22 East 17th Street, New York City

equivalents of flashing traffic on a sunny autumn day, as Birnam would experience them, might drive an audience moaning from the theater, unless their exact realism were modified into art.

I undershtand that liquor interesh: innerish: intereshtsh are rather worried about thish film. Thash tough.

Records

B. H. HAGGIN

THOUGH the sound of the Philadelphia orchestra in Columbia's most recently issued recordings has been clear and bright and natural, Columbia has not achieved the warmth and richness of Victor's recording of that orchestra—for example, the recording, made presumably before 1942, of its performance of Tchaikovsky's "Nutcracker" Suite under Ormandy (Set 1020; $3.50). The orchestra plays beautifully; Ormandy's treatment of the music has its normal quota of questionable tempos and prettifications.

This Philadelphia recording is an example of the type of Victor orchestral recording that I like best—in which everything is correctly placed in space and, as in the English recordings, cleanly defined in live but unreverberant quiet. Another example this month is the beautiful but—for me—saddening Dream Pantomime from "Hänsel und Gretel," well-performed by the National Symphony under Kindler (11-8948; $1).

The other type reproduces the reverberation of the empty hall, and at its best (the noisy confusion of the Boston Symphony's "Harold in Italy" is an example of its worst) achieves the somewhat hard clarity and brilliance of the sound of the Chicago Symphony's performance of Respighi's Suite "The Birds" under Defauw (Set SP-14; $2.25). The music is charming; the performance is very good; and again Victor charges $.25 for a useless "album."

The record of Waldteufel's "Skaters" Waltz (11-8947; $1) reproduces faithfully the hard, reverberant sound that N. B. C.'s Studio 8H gives to Toscanini's N. B. C. Symphony performances instead of the warmth and splendor of their sound in a normal concert hall. What Toscanini does with this Waldteufel piece is as astounding as what he does with Sousa marches: the plastic perfection of the modelling of the slow introduction brought tears to my eyes; and the grace and liveliness of the waltz were enchanting.

This is an example of the best that Victor has achieved in Studio 8H. There is also a worst: the harsh and coarse Mozart G minor, the cold and harsh Beethoven Fifth, the hard and excessively unresonant Beethoven "Eroica"; and to these Victor now adds a recording, made at the broadcast, of Toscanini's performance of Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 3 with Rubinstein on October 29, 1944 (1016; $4.50). It gave Toscanini the opportunity it has given me to hear again the orchestral part played like Beethoven, the piano part played as if it were Chopin—for example, the florid melodic passage in thirds in the second movement played exactly as Rubinstein plays the florid passages in thirds in the second movement of Chopin's E minor Concerto—and to hear also the orchestra and piano badly out of gear for several measures after the cadenza in the first movement. Correctness of style and rhythmic precision are things which Toscanini is fanatical about; and I must therefore wonder at his approval of the performance for release. In addition, orchestra and piano are badly reproduced and their relative volumes of sound are often incorrect, so that occasionally piano figuration blankets orchestral melody, or an orchestra tutti that should burst in fortissimo sounds a mile away. Again, therefore, I must wonder that Toscanini and Victor should issue such a glaringly bad recording when they have withheld the 1941-42 recordings he made with the Philadelphia Orchestra because of defects that are very slight in comparison: an obscured oboe note at one point, a few clicks or a noisy surface at another point, which one would gladly put up with for the sake of the wonderful performances and the otherwise beautiful reproduction of their sound in the Academy of Music. If, in the case of the Beethoven concerto, it was decided that what Victor calls "slight mechanical imperfections" should not deprive "the world of music-lovers . . . [of] the thrill of hearing this great artistic triumph again and again," it should also be decided that the slighter imperfections should not deprive music-lovers of those memorable Philadelphia performances of Berlioz's "Queen Mab," Debussy's "La Mer," Schubert's C major, Tchaikovsky's "Pathétique."

The notes for Bach's "Goldberg" Variations played by Landowska (Set 1022; $6.50) quote excerpts from this passage in my review of her February, 1942, performance of the work in Town Hall: "Compared with the statement of the [opening] aria in the performance that Landowska put on records some years ago this one was more spaciously elaborated in greater detail—detail which was more richly inflected, now with power, now with subtlety, and always with extraordinary rhythmic continuity. These qualities of phrasing, together with masterly use of the instrument's tonal resources, imparted exciting life even to some of the more mechanical examples of the variation process that followed; and they made the spacious statements of the wonderful slow variations in minor mode, the affecting restatement of the aria at the end, overwhelming." The notes also quote Virgil Thomson's review of that performance, containing one of his discussions of rhythm about which there is always the same thing to say—that he may know what he is talking about but I haven't been able to find anyone else who does. However, he makes one observation, the truth of which I can appreciate: "Most artists, by the time they have worked out that much detail, are heartily sick of any piece and either walk through it half asleep or ham it up." By the time Victor recorded Landowska's performance, in June, 1945, she had hammed it up: the elaboration of detail had been pushed to the point where everything is over-blown, over-projected, over-dramatized, where the shape of the phrase in those slow variations in minor is distorted, the rhythm obscured. Her instrument, in addition, is coarser in sound than the one she used for the old H. M. V. performance; and this difference is emphasized by the brighter Victor recording. The volume must be turned down far below the normal level to achieve the small sonority which the harpsichord should have; and even then there are a couple of sides from which the sound suddenly leaps out at you and fills the room with the chiming of bells.

James Melton sings Il mio tesoro from "Don Giovanni" (in Italian) and Dies' Bildnis from "Die Zauberflöte" (in English) with competence but with no refinement or vocal style or musical phrasing, in his volume of operatic arias (Set 1013; $3.50). The results are more acceptable in the Prize Song from "Die Meistersinger" and "In fernem Land from "Lohengrin" (both in German). There are also two arias from "Manon."

With one exception the Mozart Sonatas for organ and orchestra recorded by Biggs and the Fiedler Sinfonietta (Set 1019; $3.50) are inconsequential. The performances are good; their recorded sound reverberant and a little brash.

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

To Our Readers

THE CHRISTMAS SPIRIT could not be more fittingly expressed in these troubled times than by gifts to organizations trying to relieve the destitution caused by the war. The agencies listed below are collecting clothing to aid those people in many parts of the world who are facing a winter of suffering. The Nation heartily commends them to your attention. Clothing may be sent to the addresses listed.

International Rescue and Relief Committee, 130 Orchard Street, New York 2.

United Yugoslav Relief Fund of America, 877 Broadway, New York 3.

American Committee for Yugoslav Relief, 235 East Eleventh Street, New York 3.

Foster Parents' Plan for War Children, Merchandise Receiving Depot, 991 First Avenue, New York 22.

Russian War Relief, 2331 Twelfth Avenue, New York.

Victory Clothing Collection, 100 Maiden Lane, New York 7.

American Friends Service Committee, Friends' Sewing Room, 144 East Twentieth Street, New York 11.

Spanish Refugee Appeal Warehouse, 715 Second Avenue, New York 16.

Untapped Reservoir

Dear Sirs: I was very much impressed with your recent editorial comment concerning the Spanish Refugee Appeal and its present clothing drive. So much so that it occurred to me that you might be interested in being reminded of a tremendous untapped reservoir which is expanding daily.

While the courageous heroes of Spain face the coming European winter with no real help apparently in sight, American demobilization is sending millions of men and women home equipped with a good deal of clothing which, in many cases, will see no, or almost no, service. From my own private observation it appears that the average G. I. hopes never to wear or use this equipment again, once he has made his initial adjustment and transformation into civilian life and apparel. The clothing includes warm overcoats, blouses, pants, shirts, woolen underclothes, socks, and possibly shoes. For all men already out of the service and those of us who will join them soon here is an opportunity for a worthy gesture to our predecessors in arms.

I feel certain that if we ex-service men and women were made fully cognizant of the great need, and of the debt owed these allies, we could provide a satisfying portion of the material needed by the Spanish Refugee Appeal.

ST.SG. HERBERT H. SEGERMAN

Indianapolis, December 2

Wonderland, 1945

Dear Sirs: "Everyone pities the Jews. Palestine must admit 100,000," said the Red Queen.

"And we must take the rest," said Alice.

"Well," said the Red Queen, "we might allow some to go to Philadelphia or Pittsburgh."

"Why these two?" said Alice.

"Both commence with P," said the Red Queen.

"And any left over can come to New York," said Alice.

"My dear," said the Red Queen, "certainly not! I live in New York."

JOHN BUCHANAN

Nova Scotia, December 6

The Gift of Song

Dear Sirs: The Music Library Committee of the American Friends of the Hebrew University, whose members include many distinguished music scholars, solicits music and books about music for the Hebrew University Library, Jerusalem, Palestine. Music in good condition, instrumental, chamber works, orchestral, and opera scores, vocal music, and books on all phases of music are sought.

The Music Section of the Hebrew University Library now possesses a considerable collection of music literature. But the great demand by students and music lovers in Palestine, Jews, Arabs, and Christians, alike, requires a greatly expanded collection.

Packages may be sent directly to the Hebrew University Library, Jerusalem, Palestine, or to the office of the American Friends of the Hebrew University, 10 East Fortieth Street, New York.

AMERICAN FRIENDS OF THE HEBREW UNIVERSITY

New York, November 29

Dr. Henry Pratt Fairchild, Editor

DICTIONARY of SOCIOLOGY

THE SOCIAL structure of the world is of primary importance today. All who are interested in human relations will find this work of great value: social workers, statesmen, students, lawyers, teachers, librarians, research workers, guidance counsellors, et. al.

• Typical of the Nearly 3,600 Entries • geophagy. The practice of eating earth. Clay is eaten by numerous poverty-stricken people in the tenant farm areas of Alabama and Georgia as a food substitute, primarily to make up for dietary deficiencies.

ahimsa. The doctrine of non-violence. as practised in India by Gandhi and his followers in their civil disobedience campaigns. The term includes all nonviolent forms of resistance, but excludes rioting, which often accompanies such campaigns.

"Represents a tremendous amount of work by a board of distinguished sociologists assisted by nearly 100 contributing editors. Will be consulted frequently and with profit."—John A. Fitch, Columbia University.

"Definitive, really informative and, strangely enough, readable!"—Child Development.

Limited Edition. Order Now. $6.00

Philosophical Library, Inc., Publishers
15 E. 40th St., Dept. N, New York 16, N. Y.

Please send me............copies of The Dictionary of Sociology, at $6.00 each. I enclose payment of $..............................

Name ....

Address ....

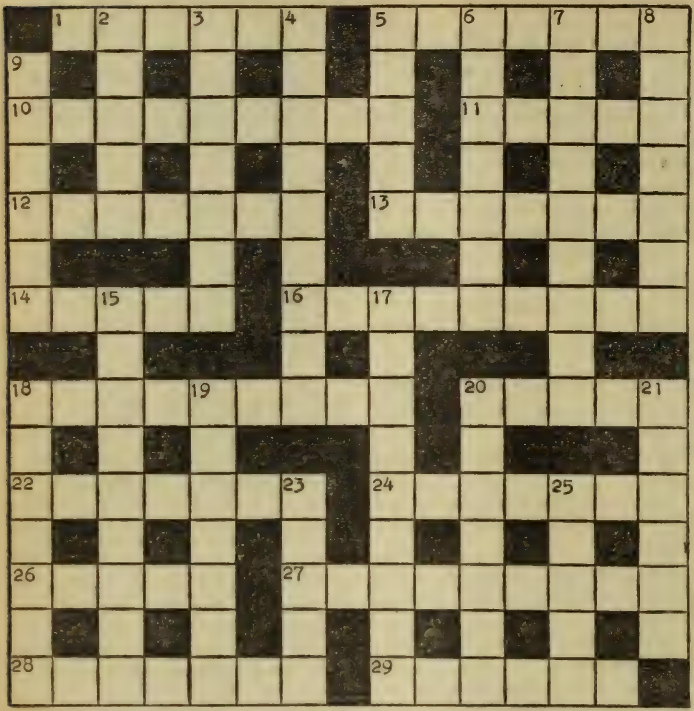
★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Buy Bonds—To Keep

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Crossword Puzzle No. 140

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 He beat Messala in a famous chariot race (two words, 3 & 3)
5 Tool of Fagin, and an artful dodger
10 Hero of John Bunyan's famous allegory
11 Heaven's first law, according to Pope
12 Arrange
13 Metal plate for marking a crate
14 Athenodorus advised Caesar to repeat the alphabet to himself when he was this 16 A hat, Polly, is one way to make you feel better
18 "Keystones" is probably a better word for them
20 It might be worse
22 They give people nasty looks
24 Composer whose Americana suite is more frequently heard abroad than here
26 All that was left of the Cheshire Cat
27 The gloomy poet in Patience
28 Entertainment provided by a boy and an insect
29 By no means a sedentary profession

DOWN

2 Husbands of countesses
3 What we learn at school is conservative for the most part
4 A pity, in the sequel, that Eve troubled to make such a fuss (two words, 5 & 4)
5 Headless patron saint of France
6 Praised a thing in writing—overpraised it a little, perhaps (two words, 5 & 2)
7 Points to there being at least one household pet in the Indies
8 Makes Rhys ill when disordered
9 Longfellow makes it the subject of his poem, Evangeline
15 Fluting puts back horse-power into Goering
17 Ancient name for Portugal
18 Summons on the telephone? (two words, 5 & 2)
19 This girl starts to say something
20 Take what comes (two words, 5 & 2)
21 The thing is to spot him before he is 23 Say, bo, this is some footwear!
25 Nothing in the barn? Might be a bit of beef

* * *

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 139

ACROSS:—1 THURBER; 5 ALBANIA; 9 BENISON; 10 ARBUTUS; 11 GUM; 13 CORDED; 15 MOROSE; 16 DAUPHIN; 17 OWED; 19 SKYE; 20 UNDERSELL; 21 MAIN; 23 YARD; 26 RETAILS; 28 DOCTOR; 29 YUM-YUM; 30 EEL; 32 COSTARD; 33 IMPRINT; 34 MADISON; 35 PORTEND.

DOWN:—1 TOBACCO; 2 UNNERVE; 3 BASHED; 4 RUNG; 5 ADAM; 6 BABOON; 7 NETWORK; 8 AUSTERE; 12 UPPER CASE; 14 DAWDLER; 15 MISERLY; 18 DUN; 19 SLY; 21 MODICUM; 22 INCISED; 24 ANY TIME; 25 DEMOTED; 26 ROMANS; 27 SUPPER; 30 EDEN; 31 LIMP.

CONTRIBUTORS

KARL SHAPIRO is the author of "Person, Place, and Thing," and "V-Letter and Other Poems." His latest book of verse is "Essay on Rime."

DELMORE SCHWARTZ is the author of "Shenandoah," "In Dreams Become Responsibilities," and "The Imitation of Life and Other Problems of Literary Criticism." He is on the staff of the Partisan Review.

THOMAS J. HAMILTON, now on the staff of the Washington bureau of the New York Times, is the author of "Appeasement's Child: The Franco Regime in Spain."

ROLFE HUMPHRIES is the author of several books of verse, including "The Summer Landscape" and "Out of the Jewel." He has published a translation of Lorca's poems and edited the Spanish Loyalist anthology "And Spain Sings."

RESORTS

RELAX, REJOICE with AUTUMN at

Lakecrest

On Hunn's Lake • Stanfordville, N. Y.

90 miles from N. Y. Ideal location in the heart of DUTCHESS COUNTY. Excellent accommodations. Cordial hospitality Recordings. Library. All seasonal sports. Via N.Y.C.R.R to Amenia, N. Y. Open all year.

WRITE OR PHONE YOUR RESERVATIONS

EVA BERG, Director Stanfordville 4108

BREEZEMONT PARK
ARMONK, N.Y.

35 MILES FROM NEW YORK CITY

"A Country Estate in the Scenic Hills of Westchester County"

The nearest of all nearby resorts. Exclusive location. Luxuriously furnished. Dignified. All sport activities. Excellent cuisine.

OPEN ALL YEAR Phone Armonk Village 055

HATHAWAY SKI LODGE

OPEN ALL YEAR

Formerly the palatial 592-acre Macy estate in the beautiful "Hills of the Sky." Large, luxurious rooms, many with open fireplaces and private porches. Winding Mountain Trails, Ski Tow. 700-foot Ski Slope. Delicious food. Easy transportation.

Attractive Winter Rates

For reservations or further information write or call
HATHAWAY LODGE, Haines Falls, N. Y.
Telephone: Tannersville 299

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 161 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • DECEMBER 22, 1945 NUMBER 25, PART 2

I. IS SECURITY POSSIBLE?

Introductory Note

The addresses in this supplement were delivered at the four regular sessions and the dinner which comprised the three-day forum on "The Challenge of the Atomic Bomb" conducted by the Nation Associates at the Hotel Astor in New York on December 1, 2, and 3. The editors have tried to give as complete a resume as possible of the material presented at the forum. Space limitations have, however, necessitated condensation and deletion which we regret. The discussion from the floor could not be reproduced even in part, although it was of high quality and contributed greatly to the interest and value of the proceedings. We want to take this opportunity to thank all the participants, active and passive, for their help in making the forum a success; and to inform our readers that mimeographed copies of the complete texts of addresses are available in limited numbers.—EDITORS THE NATION.

The Pattern of Destruction

BY HENRY DEWOLF SMYTH
Chairman, Department of Physics,
Princeton University

ANYONE who has been associated with the Manhattan Project for five years must believe that anything is possible. I am not willing to say that there cannot be any military defense against the atomic bomb, but I do not at present see any likelihood of an adequate military defense.

Atomic weapons put a high premium on surprise attack. Defense against such an attack therefore becomes the problem of maintaining in peace time for twenty-four hours of every day, year in and year out, a system of radar networks covering this entire country, together with constantly alert anti-aircraft and fighter-plane defense. The cost of such a system of defense both in terms of taxes and of implications for our attitude as a nation makes it an expensive program in every sense of the word. Even if it were attempted, I doubt that it could possibly be completely effective. It has been said recently that we could develop a system for exploding atomic bombs at a distance before they reach this country, even if they come as rockets or jet-propelled planes. To evaluate such a statement, it is necessary to consider what has already been published about the nature of the atomic bomb.

The atomic bomb depends for its power on a neutron chain reaction in U-235 or in plutonium. The nature of this reaction is such that it cannot take place in less than a certain amount of the material, known as the critical size. In other words, if we have less than the critical size of U-235 or of plutonium, an atomic explosion cannot occur. If, on the other hand, we have more than the critical size, there will always be some neutrons present from cosmic rays and these neutrons will suffice to start a chain reaction. Thus, for less than the critical amounts of atomic explosive it is impossible to start an explosion; for more than the critical amounts it is impossible to prevent an explosion. No official statement has been made of what the critical amount of plutonium or U-235 is, but an early estimate has been published which indicates that for U-235 the critical amount is between 5 and 250 pounds. No official statements have been published as to just how the atomic bombs that we have used operate, but evidently they are detonated by the sudden bringing together of subcritical amounts of the explosive material.

These facts have a bearing on the statement that atomic bombs could be exploded at a distance. Such an explosion is obviously impossible by any direct action on the explosive material in the bomb itself. To set off the explosion when desired, any action must be indirect and would have to be on fuses or other auxiliary equipment in the bomb. Thus, the problem becomes exactly similar to the problem of exploding any other kind of bomb at a distance. We are forced back, therefore, on the methods used for ordinary bombs or for the German V-1 or V-2 bombs. It was possible to destroy many V-1 bombs by firing at them shells aimed by radar control and containing proximity fuses, because the V-1 bombs flew at low altitudes and at relatively low velocities. So far as I know, no defense was successful against V-2 bombs. The nature of the atomic bomb and the speed of its approach make it highly questionable that any anti-aircraft or other defense can be developed against it which will be one hundred per cent effective. Some atomic bombs would inevitably get through, and it would need only a few atomic bombs penetrating the defense to cause destruction. It is perhaps conceivable that we might develop some sort of counterweapon against atomic bombs carried in V-2 projectiles. I confess that at present the problem of developing effectively such counter-weapons seems to me impossibly difficult.

There is an incidental point here which may be of interest, although it is not directly concerned with defense. Since rocket bombs might be sent in a few moments from any spot on earth to any other spot, it could well prove impossible, in the event of an attack by atomic bombs, to know from which country the attack had come.

The atomic age has made possible still another method of surprise attack. There is no scientific reason why atomic bombs cannot be shipped in trunks or boxes in peace time to key industrial and population centers, and detonated at the moment desired by remote control wireless or other means. Atomic bombs last for a long time after they are made, and can be stored or hidden with slight possibility of detection. As we know from the facts about them which have already been published, they do not explode until properly detonated. Against such secretly planted atomic bombs the only conceivable defense would be an elaborate peace-time system of coast and frontier guards, and continuous X-ray inspection of every item of freight or baggage coming into this country. I do not believe such a permanent defense system could be maintained with anything near complete effectiveness. But even if it could be maintained, its implications would certainly make much more difficult our peace-time relations with other countries.

There have been various methods suggested for defense against atomic bombs on the international level. These are chiefly police methods of inspection and control. It seems to me too early to pass judgment upon such methods, which have not yet been clearly outlined. I would only comment in passing that history has shown us that police methods, however necessary, are never more than a partial and imperfect solution for social unrest.

The atomic age is here. War in this age would almost surely mean surprise attack. Defense against such attack along the lines I have indicated might be possible with vast expenditure, great and sustained effort, and in the open atmosphere of international suspicion. Such defense measures could never, in my opinion, be completely effective. Our best possibility for survival in an atomic war would be to have our industries and population dispersed, many of our factories and bomb plants underground, and launching platforms for atomic rockets located throughout the country so that in the event of attack we would retaliate, even though our cities and industries were largely annihilated.

There is still one other alternative for defense against the atomic bomb. It is to build with our fellow-nations a world in which there is no need to resort to war.

On the question of the value of secrecy, I would like to point out only one or two aspects.

The fundamental principles on which the atomic bomb is based were well known to scientists everywhere by 1939. There are at present two categories of secrecy about atomic energy maintained by this government. One category consists of technical tricks of manufacture and final assembly of the bomb itself. The second category consists of a mass of information, acquired in the last five years, about artificial radioactivity, the biological effects of radiation, and other scientific topics bearing only indirectly on the production of atomic bombs. I do not believe we should release at present the first category of secret information, that is, the technical tricks of making the bomb. To be sure, any industrial nation can learn these tricks for itself within a few years and probably improve on them. But I do not see why hurriedly showing other nations how to make bombs is going to further world peace. I believe the information we now have on how to make atomic bombs should be released only to an international agency able to maintain control of them. But I do believe we should release a great part of the second category of secret information, that is, the information on nuclear energy acquired in the last five years and not directly concerned with making atomic bombs. This information would be of the greatest value to such sciences as medicine and biology and to engineering and industry generally. It is absolutely essential for further developments in physics and chemistry. To keep this information secret any longer is to retard seriously our development in many fields. If we release it nationally and internationally, we would evidence our intention to cooperate fully with our fellow nations and to return to that free interchange of ideas which is the tradition and strength of science and of the whole field of thought.

The most important technical resource of a nation is neither raw materials nor equipment, but educated men. Obviously we will need an increasing supply of such men in the postwar period. Under war-time policy the training of such men practically stopped. The policy of the Selective Service has made students in the sciences almost non-existent. The resumption of training must be encouraged in every possible way. The scientific men from the universities on the war-time projects should be returned as soon as possible to their normal activities of teaching and research. The welfare and safety of this country can be assured only by leaving them free to pass on what they have learned to a new generation of educated and trained men. If we lock our scientists up in secret laboratories, neither they nor the country will develop. The free interchange of ideas, nationally and internationally, is the strength of science, as indeed it is of every other department of men's lives.

Ideas are a common inheritance from thoughtful men in all countries and all civilizations. To speak of continued secrecy in the field of thought and discovery is to deny our moral birthright and the very tradition which has brought us this far from savagery. Secrecy in any field in peace time is fatal to man's growth and to any hope for a world society.

FORUM PROGRAM

I. IS SECURITY POSSIBLE?
December 1, 9:30 A. M. Presiding: Freda Kirchwey

II. THE SOVIET UNION AND THE BOMB
December 1, 2 P. M. Presiding: Freda Kirchwey

III. ATOMS AND INDUSTRY
December 2, 9 A. M. Presiding: J. King Gordon

IV. THE PROBLEM OF CONTROL
December 2, 2 P. M. Presiding: Edgar A. Mowrer

V. DINNER FORUM
December 3, 6:30 P. M. Presiding: Leon Henderson

Facts About Defense

BY IVAN A. GETTING

Massachusetts Institute of Technology; consultant for War Department

MY ROLE in this war was in developing those parts of radar applications which had to do with anti-aircraft control, with the guidance of strategic and tactical bomber missions, with the use of radar in directing buzz-bombs and other types of guided missiles. I appeal to this experience in presenting my arguments because obviously I cannot go into all the technical details, all the figures and theories and scientific knowledge which are required to arrive at some of the statements I shall make.

The problem of a defense against any weapon can be divided into two main parts. Let us consider explosives, regardless of whether they are atomic explosives or something mild like the usual high explosive. The first part of the problem is to prevent the enemy from putting the explosive where he wishes to put it. The other is what you do at the place where you expect the explosive to be put.

In the first case, you do everything possible to keep the enemy from finding out where to put the explosive and from arriving at the spot—you mislead him, jam his radar, ruin his communication, and so forth. In the second case, you try to protect yourself bodily from the explosive itself. This you do by scattering, going underground, building huge concrete structures, and by many other methods.

Considering this problem in terms of atomic explosives, we must ask, first: What is the probability that from a technical standpoint we can effectively prevent the enemy from getting the explosives to our front door? The use of the parcel-post or of trunks as conveyors of atomic explosives is not a matter on which scientific opinion is of any particular value. Your opinion is as good as mine. But on the question of delivering explosives by means of long-range rockets, V-2's, airplanes, guided ships, and such things, I believe I have something to contribute.

We developed during the war several navigation systems which depend on radio and radar. Some of these systems will be adopted after the war for commercial use. The whole world will soon be covered by a radio network which will make it possible to navigate an airplane or navigate a ship from any point on the earth to any other point well within the accuracy of about one mile. This means that any potential enemy is provided with an automatic way of delivering atomic bombs by conventional aircraft using conventional auto-pilots with a conventional "Loran" receiver —that is the code name of this system. We need not wait for those rockets which fly from one side of the earth to the other. Today, with existing equipment, existing bombs, existing aircraft, existing navigational aids, we can already fly from any one part of the world to any other without a single human operator in the aircraft.

You may say that when the war breaks out we can just turn off these "Loran" stations. You may, but the enemy may not. It is a simple thing for him to set up his own system, which he turns on after the first night, because on the first night he certainly can use our system, the international "Loran" system. It is perfectly possible for the enemy to set up at remote places of the earth or in the middle of the ocean, by means of submarine or other types of ships, radio light-houses which will guide the normal aircraft on its mission. I will admit, as an expert on anti-aircraft and on radar and on gunnery, that we could shoot these planes down. However, we must consider the frailty of human beings. In the defense of London against the buzz-bomb, the British Army deployed three hundred batteries of heavy anti-aircraft guns. These batteries were equipped with the most modern radar developed in the radiation laboratory, with computers developed by a well-known laboratory here in New York, and with American and British guns. It is true that after six weeks we were shooting down over 90 per cent of the buzz-bombs. Only eight per day arrived in London. However, in the first few weeks over 40 per cent got through. It took constant drill, exercise, education, practice with real live bait before the efficiency of the troops had risen to 90 per cent from the original 60 per cent.

It was very lucky for us that the buzz-bomb was a well behaved airplane. It flew in straight lines, at a constant speed, and that is just what we like in anti-aircraft. If the Germans had had any sense they would have forced these missiles to fly in curved, jerky courses, and this could be done. They also would have added what we were adding at the radiation laboratory, radar remote control by which a man sitting back in Paris could have guided these things by a little joy-stick in front of automatic plotting equipment and brought the buzz-bomb to the correct site on any type of course he desired.

Ivan A. Getting

So it is true London was saved from TNT by modern anti-aircraft—but let us look at the obvious. If any of those eight buzz-bombs that arrived in London each day had had a ton load of the type of bomb we used in Hiroshima or Nagasaki, London would not have been saved.

Now it was fortunate that we had three hundred batteries in England. It was fortunate that the buzz-bomb was so close to the conventional aircraft. Suppose that the buzz-bomb had been a new device? How long would it have taken us to get ready for it? It takes from a year to five years to develop a military weapon; even after you know just how to go about it. It takes six months to a year to train troops and then another space of time to get the equipment into the field with spare-part depots in the right places.

So, we must accept the fact that if the enemy develops a new way of bringing atomic bombs to our doorstep, and if it happens that no one was smart enough to have thought up, one to five years ahead of time, a defense weapon with which to stop that particular missile, then we can do nothing about it except take the punishment, if we can. Take as a small example the V-2 bomb. The same radar that was used against the buzz-bomb was also used to track the V-2. It was my group at the laboratory which had developed the SCR-584. They were my boys who in Belgium and England were putting this equipment to proper use. Now we could pick up the V-2's by radar. We could track them, provided we were located in a reasonable position. We could tell within two or three city blocks where the V-2's were going to land. We could not stop them. The V-2 lent itself to almost no method of successful counter-defense. Any missile which is designed for speeds above the velocity of sound is tapered with such a sharp nose that, hit head-on by radar, it is the best camouflage target you could design. The radar energy is scattered in all directions and none of it comes back to you. You cannot see the V-2 with radar except from the flank. It is true, of course, that enough radar stations placed up and down the coast could provide data as to where the V-2's were heading. And if these data were sufficiently accurate, it would be presumably possible to send your own missiles into the air and meet these V-2's; but here again there are many problems.

A V-2 is a steel structure. It can be armored. It is moving very rapidly—six times as fast as sound—so that anything that strikes it will in truth be itself struck head-on at a glancing angle; under these circumstances the effective strength of the steel will be much greater than that of any ordinary missile which can be sent against it. There is no way to stop V-2's except by disintegrating them or by actually colliding with them with a mass approximately their own size. In making a study of this problem for the United States Army, I could not find any hopeful way—nor could my colleagues find any way; nor could the British find any way—to stop them; and this is a matter of military record. The V-2 is simply one device. Given a little time, I am sure every scientist and engineer in this country can dream up other methods of delivering atomic explosives. And while I believe that, if you gave me enough money and enough men, I might be able eventually to shoot down a V-2, I will never guarantee to shoot down any new thing that you may think up. Since the aggressor, in the next war, will have the advantage of surprise, I will still have to beg for from one to five years to develop a defense (assuming that I know how) against new ways of delivering atomic explosive.

The atomic bomb has introduced one chief new element into the problem of defense, and that is its tremendous intensity. In the last war of the previous era—now just behind us—if we shot down from 5 to 10 per cent of the German planes, or if the Germans shot down from 5 to 10 per cent of our planes, the morale of the pilots cracked. It was possible then to say that anti-aircraft was a very important defensive weapon because it was able to destroy more than 5 to 10 per cent of the German planes that came over. But 5 to 10 per cent losses did not demoralize the buzz-bombs. Nor did 90 per cent demoralize them; it just increased the cost to the Germans. Atomic explosives demand not 90 per cent, but 100 per cent defense. This, we do not know how to achieve.

The conclusion to which we are driven, as men experienced in designing equipment and seeing it put into the field, is that there is no adequate defense possible against atomic explosives when the enemy has a free choice of all the possible technical ways of delivering such explosives.

Cooperation is the Key

BY VICTOR WEISSKOPF
University of Rochester; member of Association of Los Alamos Scientists

THE problem of international control of the bomb is a political one, not a scientific one. The question as to whether control is technically feasible is misleading. Of course if you have access to all production facilities you can find out where a bomb is made. If, however, a country is resolved to deceive the world, it will be able to do so. One can probably fabricate bombs underground and avoid any radio-activity to penetrate to the outside. It will be expensive, but it is a soluble problem. If a country is out to break the rules, no control system is sufficient.

It should not follow from this that goodwill among nations alone is sufficient. Control is necessary to establish confidence, especially if it makes a circumvention of the agreement difficult, and if special effort and elaborate deceit have to be used to break the agreement.

There are a few points in the character of our problem that make a partial control more efficient than it seems at first glance. The personnel that has to be used for atomic bomb development is very specialized and limited in numbers. The key nuclear scientists are well known. The industrial methods are completely different from those in any other production, and are easily recognizable if no specially great effort is put into camouflage.

It seems, therefore, that measures which may appear weak and insufficient have a chance to go further than one may think. For example, if the pre-war collaboration between scientists is reestablished, and if scientists are encouraged by their own governments to exchange scientific views and results in frequent international meetings, then it would be hard to have the key nuclear physicists in one country work on atomic-bomb development without arousing the strong suspicion of their colleagues in other countries. The problems in modern physics are new and hard and they need concentrated effort. The atomic bomb will not be developed successfully by scientists unknown to the rest of the world.

A more radical step would be to have experienced scientists work as guests for long periods in foreign countries. It would be difficult for a country to use well-known men and equipment for illegal purposes without arousing the suspicions of visiting scientists, especially if the latter were in close touch with the educational institutions and laboratories.

Finally, if the nations consent to have a commission visit any factory they please, extreme caution and expense would be necessary to hide production or development.

One condition of successful international control is successful national control. It is obvious that national legislation must be strong enough to insure that no nuclear research or technological development could be carried on in secrecy, unknown to the government.

International control, however, can succeed only if it is introduced not in the spirit of mutual distrust but in the spirit of mutual reassurance within the frame of a basically well-defined policy.

II. THE SOVIET UNION AND THE BOMB

The Weapons of Peace

BY HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS

Member of Congress from California

WHAT is our real attitude toward the Soviet Union? I don't think we know. I don't think we have thought it out.

I know what it appears to be to one of our fighting men still in the Pacific. I have a letter written by a 19-year-old Texas boy. He volunteered for enlistment in the navy before he was through high school—not because he had any illusions about the "glory" of war, but because he felt there was a job to be done. His letter was dated November 11, 1945—Armistice Day. He wrote:

> They have just sent the mailman over to the FPO, which is a landing ship tank. I hope there are some letters and packages for me. It is getting hard to write, not knowing what is going on back there. I might as well tell you now there hasn't been any change out here. Everything is just as SNAFU as ever. In fact, it seems that, instead of getting faster with the discharging, they are getting slower.
>
> Well, Miss, I hope you are having a grand time and enjoying the peace. From what I hear over the radio, it isn't going to last much longer. I guess we will start a fight with Russia. From the things we say and write and preach about them, they should be ready to fight now. Every time I hear a news broadcast or read a newspaper, some loudmouth is slamming Russia.
>
> Why in hell, don't we stop screaming about who owes who and try to help Russia? I have talked with men who were in Russia during the war. They say the Russians don't want to fight us; they don't want anything to do with us. All they want is to help their own people, build up their country, better themselves. If we had the sense of a jackass, we'd do the same.
>
> One thing I always had faith in was our Government. Even that is gone.

The American people are a peace-loving people. Except for an hour of parade here and there, they don't like gold braid and martial music in their lives. Peace is our foreign policy. Peace is our most profound desire. But we cannot have peace by just wishing for it.

There are weapons of peace just as there are weapons of war. The most powerful weapon for peace is friendship. Franklin Roosevelt understood this. That is why, when he first came to the office of President, he began to cement the bonds of friendship in this hemisphere. That is why he called for collective security in 1935. That is why, under his leadership, throughout the war, we continuously moved toward the building of world understanding and cooperation, because these are the very few foundations of peace. Even in the darkest days of war, when we were running the scientific race of all time, he sought to strengthen our bonds of friendship with Great Britain and Russia.

Why? The reasons are clear enough: No single country can keep the peace alone. To maintain and build the peace, it is necessary to develop, maintain, and strengthen the solidarity of the United Nations Organization. There is no United Nations Organization unless the Big Five stay together. The core of the Big Five is formed by the United States, Britain, and the Soviet Union. These are the three most powerful nations in the world—the only three nations which can in themselves win a war or win a peace. If any one of these three nations falls out, there is no practical likelihood of the United Nations working.

M·Bernstein

Helen Gahagan Douglas

It is an agony to watch our fears separate us from our future, an agony to watch certain forces play upon those fears, to watch them label as "anti-American" those of us who merely face the facts and point out that, if there is to be peace, it must begin with the United States, Great Britain, and Russia. We are not pro-Russia or pro-Britain. We are pro-man. We are pro-life—not pro-death. For in the new world into which we have been blown by forces of the universe which we have let loose, there are no boundaries. There are really no differences in tongues. There are just people—black people, white people, yellow people, Russians, Americans, English, French, Chinese, Hungarians, Greeks, Germans, Slavs. And our future is indivisible.

I don't believe we really hate Russia. I don't think we are driven on by a relentless passion to go to war with Russia. We got along all right with Russia before the war—and we got along with her during the war. We can live together again in peace. But there is a nameless fear we have never analyzed. Is Russia our natural enemy? Is it a belligerent nation, a nation bent upon domination of the earth by force of arms, as Germany was? Is this the root of our suspicion? I don't think so. An examination of the facts does not bear this out. Not when we remember that Russia stood for international disarmament, advocated this in the League of Nations, backed President Roosevelt's program of collective security, urged honest non-intervention in Spain, warned against the aggressiveness of Germany, and wanted to go to the aid of Czechoslovakia even though Russia was kept out of the Munich Conference.

Why should Russia want to go to war? It has all the land it needs—one-sixth of the globe. It is rich with people—rich with natural resources. What Russia needs is peace and the kind of security in the world that will enable it to put its resources and energies into a peace-time program for its people. Moreover, Russia has paid a terrible price in this war. Ten million dead, millions more wounded, cities destroyed, factories demolished, fields and farms devastated.

Do we fear Russia economically? No, we welcome the markets she offers us.

Then what is this fear? Is it a fear which grows out of the anxiety which was born of the Russian Revolution, an anxiety that our own economic free-enterprise system is somehow endangered? But if we take this fear out and examine it from all sides, we find that it dissolves, for there is no basis in fact for antagonism between ourselves and this great sister nation. Those who have this fear have themselves little confidence in our economy and in our ability to realize goals of human happiness for our people.

The idea of apprehension or anxiety or fear among the people of a nation as powerful as the United States is utterly preposterous.

If we set for ourselves here at home, along with the goal of international peace, a goal of full employment and prosperity and really fight to win these objectives, we shall at the same time be an example to the world which will win for us not only friendship and cooperation, but a belief in our way of doing things. We can win this kind of friendship only through example—never through force.

The Heritage of All

BY M. J. COLDWELL

Member of the Canadian Parliament

As a Canadian, I am deeply interested in the relationship between the United States and Russia, for Canada is the country which lies in between them. In the event of difficulty, Canada would be the cockpit of North America. Then, too, Canada is the source of the material that made possible the discovery and production of atomic energy. We have in our country El Dorado, the mine from which uranium is at the moment being produced.

To me as a layman, the discovery of the secret of atomic energy seems comparable to man's discovery of the use of fire or the wheel long ages ago. This discovery means a revolution in man's way of life, so fundamental that we can scarcely conceive it. There is no doubt that, with the information available to the leading scientists throughout the world, its utilization for human needs is in immediate prospect. Attempts to divide the nations into two groups—those in possession of the knowledge and those without it—are bound to fail. It is against the interests of human progress and of universal peace to try to hide this knowledge.

This afternoon we have heard proposals for the sharing of this knowledge with Russia, which would place it among four nations—three powerful and large nations and one smaller nation—my own country, which we sometimes speak of as a middle power. Speaking as a representative of a little power, or a small nation, I do not believe that the sharing of this knowledge among a few nations is good enough. It must be the heritage of all nations, not a few.

Therefore, obviously, at the moment the body to which the control should be given is the United Nations Organization, which is about to be set up. Until government at the international level is evolved, only UNO can prevent the atomic bomb from remaining what in fact it has become during the past four months—a divisive influence among the nations of the world.

As early as August 18, 1945, when speaking in Toronto, I made a strong plea for placing this revolutionary discovery under the Assembly of the United Nations, not under the Security Council. I was speaking for one of the smaller nations. We do not like the veto power. This could be done without amending the charter by establishing under one of its principal organs—the Social and Economic Council—a new specialized agency consisting of the leading scientists of the world, who would be charged with the exchange of information, continued research, and such recommendations as may be necessary for the intelligent use of atomic power. Reporting as it does to the General Assembly, the Social and Economic Council could thus make available to all members of the United Nations the specialized opinions of the world's foremost scientists.

By making the discovery available to all nations, great and small, Russia and France, Yugoslavia and other nations, the objections raised by the middle and small powers to the domination of the world by two or three large powers, would to some extent be removed and the danger of the continuance of power politics minimized.

Canada assisted materially in the discovery, and is the present source of uranium—the mineral which provided the basis for the splitting of the atom. But it is certain that, once split, atoms of various elements can also be split and uranium may not long remain the basic element required for atomic energy. This being so, it makes the consideration of the question of international and public control of atomic research a matter of primary importance.

We cannot allow this revolutionary discovery to be controlled by private industry. Its implications are too vast and too dangerous. We know from bitter experience that "big business" in all our countries observes no national loyalties or human ethics where profits are concerned. We have seen how this desire for profits by giant monopolies and through international cartels has caused secret agreements, jeopardizing the welfare and security of all the people throughout the world, written largely in your own Congressional Record, written in your own documents, tabled in our Parliament, regarding the operations of monopolies and cartels before and during this war. Yet atomic research is largely in the hands of du Pont in the United States, Imperial Chemical Industries in the United Kingdom, and their creature—Canadian Industries Limited in Canada.

This is a highly improper and dangerous situation. The countries concerned should remove the members of the chemical cartel from the control of research and atomic energy and establish publicly owned organizations to carry on these important functions.

It is essential that atomic research should be on an international level. Its results and benefits should be utilized only for the good of mankind. Government ownership of facilities and control of research is necessary to prevent powerful and unscrupulous private interests from utilizing the principle of atomic energy for their own ends.

Only in this way can we insure that the work will be directed to peaceful purposes and needs. The world cannot afford to allow secret experimentation which has for its purpose the development of increased atomic killing power. The small nations of the world must insist that this most dangerous armament race in history shall be prevented. A thoroughly awakened and aroused labor movement could play a vital role in this regard.

A consciousness of the implications of atomic energy would enable organized labor to demand that workers employed on the project should work only in properly government-owned and internationally-inspected plants. Together with organized scientific workers labor could oppose any attempts to carry on unauthorized and secret work in this connection.

A fully aroused public opinion, demanding government control of the facilities and the international exchange of information, could make it possible to harness atomic energy for the good of the world. The danger of the present policy is that it may be used as political blackmail through the ever-present threats of war.

Share and Share Alike

BY WALTER MILLIS

Editorial writer, New York Herald Tribune

I THINK we should recognize from the outset that the political problem of the atomic bomb is the problem, for the present period at any rate, of our relations with the Soviet Union; and conversely, that the problem of our relations with the Soviet Union has to an unhappy degree become the problem of the atomic bomb.

It seems to me useless to discuss the one except in the direct, explicit context of the other. It seems to me perfectly idle (though no doubt diplomatically necessary) for President Truman or Prime Minister Attlee to speak in a generalized way about publishing the technical secrets of the bomb when it is abundantly clear that the only nation at present in a position to make use of those secrets is the Soviet Union. That is what nine-tenths of the argument has been about, and I believe the time has come to admit it frankly.

That is why I am glad that the agenda of this conference starkly puts the question of whether the secrets of the bomb should be given to Russia.

My own answer to the question is unhesitating. I think we should immediately offer full publication of our own technical data in return for a reasonable reciprocity on Russia's part in the publication of its scientific and technical material. That is the only proviso I would attach to the offer. In advancing it, however, I would point to the many obvious dangers latent in the unregulated development of atomic energy and would request Russia's assistance and counsel in devising an adequate structure of international control.

It may be said that this is, in essence, what the Truman-Attlee communiqué proposes. I cannot agree. I don't think that the Russians agree. The communiqué expressly reserves the vital technical data. To be sure, the United Nations Organization is to be asked to set up a commission, charged with the formidable task of answering all the innumerable questions—political as well as technical and military—which Mr. Truman and Mr. Attlee and Mr. King left unanswered in their somewhat hurried conference between airplanes. But while the commission pursues its labors, the United States will not only retain all the technical knowledge but will go right ahead manufacturing bombs, as it is continuing to do. When, as, and if the commission has produced a solution satisfactory to all—which, under the circumstances, means satisfactory to the United States—the data will be generally published. So far, Moscow has failed to greet this proposal with the enthusiastic acquiescence which was apparently anticipated. I, for one, am not surprised.

I think President Truman made a tragic mistake when he failed to realize, from the very first moment, the crucial identity between the problems of atomic energy and the problem of Russia. The appalling military terrors implicit in the bomb absolutely demanded a firm settlement of political differences between Russia and the West. It seems to me it might not have been wholly beyond the powers of statesmanship to use the technical discovery for the constructive adjustment of the political issues. Let us glance back at what was actually done.

At Potsdam Mr. Stalin was apparently given only a most guarded and grudging disclosure of the fact that a test bomb had been successfully fired in New Mexico. When the time came for the military use of the bomb, no Russian observers were, so far as I know, invited to be present in order that they could at least judge its potency for themselves. The discharge of the bomb at Hiroshima was, however, immediately announced to the world in a blaze of extravagant official publicity, all built around two ideas: that the United States had developed (with some little assistance from Britain, Canada, and a bunch of dreamy foreign scientists) an invention absolutely decisive in war and revolutionary in peace; and that the magic "secret" of this staggering achievement was and would be guarded from everyone under the most extreme restrictions of top-secret security. Perhaps this publicity was inevitable; for it was, after all, an extravagant moment in world history. I ask you only to consider the sort of impact it must have had upon our Russian allies, who were at that moment loyally preparing to fulfil to the letter their commitment to give Japan the coup de grâce. The fact is, at any rate, that from that moment our relations with Soviet Russia have steadily deteriorated.

After the official publicity there came the private outgivings, the statements of Congressmen, the savage May-Johnson bill. Through all this the idea rose ever more prominently, expressed under increasingly transparent veils, that whatever we did we could not give "the secret" to the Russians. We distrusted the purposes, aims, and colossal power of the Soviet Union too deeply. How much this did to inspire the Russians with trust in our own purposes may be guessed. Perhaps it may be seen more directly in the catastrophic breakdown of the Foreign Ministers' Conference.

Finally, there was President Truman's disastrous statement that the technical secrets would be given to no one, and that anyhow no other nation in the world had the knowledge, resources, or skills to discover them for itself over a period of many years. Even then, when the muddle was about as complete as it could be made, it required Mr. Attlee's initiative to induce our government to do something about it. The result is the communiqué to which I have referred.

I ask you to try for a moment to reverse this history. Supposing that it had been the Russians, and not ourselves, who had exploded this thing at Hiroshima just as our naval and air forces believed that they themselves were knocking Japan cold. Supposing that Mr. Stalin had announced that the secrets of the staggering discovery would be given to nobody, that anyway only a nation with Russia's vast resources and totalitarian economic organization could produce a bomb, and that it would take many years for the backward and chaotic capitalist democracies to catch up, if ever. I think the reaction in this country would have been both violent and unfortunate. Suppose that Mr. Stalin, confronted with that reaction, had rather belatedly proposed that the UNO set up a commission on the matter, with a tentative promise that when the commission had worked out an international control system satisfactory to Soviet Russia, the secrets would be imparted to it, but that meanwhile the Soviet Union would go right ahead manufacturing bombs for "test purposes." I think we would have regarded those "test" bombs with a fierce suspicion. I think we would have seen at once that the commission, in working out a regulatory system satisfactory to Russia, would all but inevitably find itself involved in most of the political issues that at present divide us. It would have to decide them, too, in a manner satisfactory to Russia. I think we would have regarded the whole thing as a Communist trap. I think that we—with our unbounded, war-bred confidence in the power of our technology, comparable to that which the Russians feel in theirs—would have decided that the easier course would be to get busy at once and develop our own atomic bombs. It might take us some years, but we would know that we could count on a decade or so of substantial peace. We would calculate that when we had our bombs ready we could go back to the Russians on an equal footing and so get a genuinely agreed and rational solution of the control problem.

That, I think, would have been our decision. And that, I think, is the Russian decision. I suspect that the one most significant thing that has been said about the atomic bomb since the initial announcement was the brief paragraph in Mr. Molotov's anniversary speech announcing simply that Russia "will have atomic energy, too." I think that Russia means to have it; that she can probably—as Dr. Urey pointed out the other day—develop the leads she has already obtained more quickly than we can in time of peace, and that she will have atomic energy in a military form within a few years.

The resultant situation is well-calculated to breed distrust on both sides, to exacerbate all political issues between the two countries, and to drive both Russian and American diplomacy to extremes. And by the time the Soviet Union has amassed its own stock of atomic bombs and is ready to come back and talk control on equal terms, the whole problem may have got out of hand, and it may be too late for any solution. Meanwhile, the situation is also calculated to cripple the non-military development of atomic energy and nuclear research in general. In our passion for "security" we are threatening finally to disrupt that marvelous and creative "international of science" which is responsible for all our technical triumphs. Our own nuclear research workers have just protested MacArthur's destruction of the Japanese cyclotrons, comparing the act to the Nazi book-burnings. There, I think, is a notion which should give us pause.

All this is the result of the policy of "keeping the secrets." It is late now to reverse the policy. It may take us a long time to undo the damage which has already been done. But I believe the policy should be reversed. I don't believe we can afford to wait on the United Nations Organization. I think this country should immediately take the initiative with a policy based not on keeping the secrets but on pooling the secrets—all of them. This then would mean that the military and non-military secrets of Russian technology as well as those of our own would be in a common pool.

For Russia has secrets too. It is no use blinking the fact that the extreme secretiveness of the Soviet Union, in technical, cultural, and political as well as military matters, is a major factor in this whole business and one of the most unfortunate elements in the contemporary international world. By sitting now upon our own store of secrets concerning the overwhelmingly important development of nuclear energy, we are simply compounding and encouraging this Russian tendency. We are promoting a general drift backward into nationalistic compartmentation in almost the only great field in which a genuine and constructive internationalism has survived—that of technical advance and scientific investigation.

It seems to me that our present possession of the so-called atomic secrets could be used now, not to promote this tendency but to arrest and reverse it. I think we can make a full and frank offer to pool with the world the great mass of knowledge and data we have accumulated, and that with this offer in our hand we can then ask a similar frankness from the Soviet Union and all other great powers in the publication of both general technological and specifically military development. If we meet with refusal, that will, of course, create a new situation. But we have not tried yet. If we try and succeed, I think we shall then have laid the first absolutely necessary foundation for a working international control of the atomic horror—which is frankness, confidence, and above all knowledge.

What I propose seems to me the one constructive political use that can be made of our present possession of the bomb. I do not think that we can browbeat the Soviet Union into conforming with our wishes by using the bomb as a threat—especially when Moscow knows perfectly well that the people of the United States are not in fact going to launch an atomic war upon Russia in any proximate future. I do believe that we can use an offer of our present knowledge as proof of good-will and a means of securing Russia's powerful aid in dealing with what is in fact a problem of humanity. To take the attitude that we will do nothing until the rest of the world has solved the problem for us means only that our stock of bombs and our knowledge of how to make them will be put to no use at all during the next few years when they might serve constructive ends, but saved up for a more remote period when their effects will simply be calamitous.

III. ATOMS AND INDUSTRY

The New Energy

BY STUART CHASE
Economist and Author

LET us take a speculative look at some of the peace-time effects of splitting the atom. As we do so, we will not forget the warning of Dr. Harold C. Urey, who helped to split it: "The peace-time applications of atomic energy are of no importance whatever unless the danger of atomic bombs is banished from the earth."

Thorstein Veblen in his grave must now be permitting himself a sardonic smile. His technicians and scientists have come roaring into their own as the acknowledged and undisputed arbiters of human destiny. He traced the trend in a series of books a generation ago, but few paid much attention. The philosophers were off in other pastures. Now the trend has culminated in a self-generating flood of neutrons which can blow up the world. For the first time, scientists are developing a social conscience, and even daring to dispute the generals and politicians. Veblen used to dream of a governing council of technicians. If the politicians do not look alive, it might come to that. They look pretty dead in Congress now.

Energy is a determiner of civilization. Low-energy cultures absorb most of their man-power in getting food. High-energy cultures such as the United States, or Western Europe, in recent years, can release more than half their man-power for the service trades, education, and the arts. The atom may release 90 per cent for higher things—if enough higher things can be found. Not 10 per cent will be needed for farming, mining, and manufacturing. Even before the war, learned committees were worrying about the problem of leisure. Presently they are going to have a superlative opportunity to worry!

Dr. A. H. Compton sees the first use in large central power plants, and most scientists agree with him. A reasonably efficient plant, using superheated steam for driving a turbine, could be put in operation within a year, he says. But costs at first would be high. The generating heat unit will be a pile weighing not less than 50 tons. This dissipates, for the present at least, those bright dreams of lump-of-sugar prime movers, to drive a plane from Chicago to Shanghai.

A pound of uranium now costs $3, about the same as a ton of coal. But it can deliver as much energy as 1,000 tons of coal under present firing methods. This is the comfortable margin atomic energy has to work on. Dr. Compton expects many big central plants within 10 years, especially in areas where power is now expensive. China and India come to mind as candidates for rapid industrialization. These plants will be easy to operate without smoke or fumes of any kind. Lethal rays must be carefully controlled, but safety methods have already been worked out at Oak Ridge and Hanford.

Atomic energy can be used as a heat for making bricks, cement, ceramics, and glass. It can be used for smelting metals. Dr. Langer of the California Institute of Technology has suggested that iron might be smelted in the ore bed. Others have suggested that highways in certain areas might be built and surfaced by fusing the ground to lava—as happened under the bomb in New Mexico.

The new energy can work wonders in providing both cheap heat and cheap power for the host of synthetics and plastics which are already revolutionizing industry. The virtue of a plastic from the manufacturing point of view is that it can be molded to unvarying form, and run through the assembly line without the grinding and chipping and shaping needed for natural products, like lumber, stone, and metal. Lavish production of plastics is bound to bring a vast increase in economic self-sufficiency. Synthetic rubber, nylon, and vinyl esters are just the beginning.

Stuart Chase

Controlled neutrons have a great many medical applications, such as the irradiation of deep cancers, the tracing of physiological processes by tagged atoms. They can make the dream of the alchemists—the transmutation of elements—a commonplace. We could perhaps change all our lead to gold—if we were that foolish. Atomic energy can air-condition cities in the tropics, and warm up polar housing for the comfort of man. By the electrification of soils and other innovations, it might change the whole crop pattern.

This outline is only a bare summary of uses now being suggested, but it is enough to indicate a shattering impact on the structure of business-as-usual. The mining of coal will be hit hard, petroleum only less hard. John L. Lewis can be expected to issue a papal ban against nuclear physics any day now. The steel industry, and metals generally, may be turned upside down. Railroad and steamship lines may lose up to 40 per cent of their revenue freight. Technological unemployment could grow to catastrophic proportions, if everything is left to God and the National Association of Maufacturers, to use Alvin Johnson's phrase.

If we try to go on operating some such economic system as we had before 1930, it does not take an especially discerning eye to see that atomic energy will soon break it to pieces. We have here an economic bomb of great explosive power. No nation, except the United States, has any apparent intention of continuing its pre-war economic system. Other states may be expected to nationalize atomic power, easing it into the economic structure under carefully controlled conditions, with regard for both the human beings and the industries made obsolete. It will be a large and complicated operation.

Can the United States avoid a similar course? Professor Hayek's disciples will vigorously protest, but how can any community endure the million to one shock of this new energy without planning for it? On the practical level, how could a wildly disorganized America hope to compete with other powers when they had organized the flow of neutrons?

Before the war no industrial country devoted as much as 1 per cent of its national income to scientific research. This ratio is now destined to leap upward. J. D. Bernal thinks it may go as high as 20 per cent. Not only research, but education and training on all levels, on a scale hitherto undreamed of, are an absolute must for survival in the atomic age.

As the first item on the educational agenda, I respectfully suggest that another two billion dollars be allocated, this time to the social scientists. An equally urgent directive should go along with it. Perhaps after some time in the laboratory and plenty of courage and effort, they can show us how to live with the unbelievable power the physical scientists have loosed upon us.

Power and Progress

BY BORIS PREGEL

President, Canadian Radium and Uranium Corporation; expert on radioactivity

AS SOON as the roaring of the atomic explosions over Japan began to resound in the press, in the statements, and in private conversations, I tried in vain to find some indication of interest in the peaceful application of atomic energy. With the exception of a few general remarks, the whole interest was concentrated on the bomb and the dangers of a varying nature attached to it. A few statesmen and scientists who ventured some remarks concerning the peace-time field were in a rather negative mood and predicted that we needed more than a generation—and some of them even spoke about a 50-year period—before we could see any possibilities for the peaceful applications of atomic power.

But what a change has occurred during the last few weeks! One may say that they have at last seen the light. Suddenly, from all sides, and sometimes even from the same people who were so pessimistically inclined only a month ago, we hear that the applications of atomic energy to civilian life are possible, imminent, and even unavoidable.

The aims of our forum are constructive. We believe the principal importance of atomic energy lies exclusively in its possibilities for peace-time development. We firmly believe that everything must and will be done to prevent the use of the atomic bomb in war. If this cannot be achieved, we should eliminate further discussion on the subject, because the atomic bomb with its terrific destruction will leave the remnants of the surviving humanity in no condition to think of any kind of cultural or industrial developments.

Ten days ago, Dr. J. Robert Oppenheimer, one of the leading men of the atomic energy project, said in an interview:

> The atomic bomb was not a step on the road to the production of controlled atomic energy. The bomb itself was the end result, the solution of a military problem that had been given to us. In coping with that problem we learned how to create and control atomic energy a year and a half before Hiroshima. But we had to pass that point. We had to find ways to make that energy explode. The production of atomic energy was merely a step on the way to that goal.
>
> It is quite feasible that a city the size of Seattle should be completely heated from an atomic energy source in less than five years.

We may accept this authoritative opinion, in view of the fact that the author has always been very cautious in his statements. What can we expect from the development of science in nuclear physics? What is in the immediate future? We think the first important application of atomic energy will be the production of cheap power by large plants, the locations of which are not dependent on any natural resources of the country. This is a tremendous advantage, especially for desert regions—for backward world areas—and for the development of countries with limited natural resources.

These powerful units will be able to distribute this cheap power to large areas. It is easy to understand what such a phenomenon will mean for these areas. Cheap power in unlimited quantity means abundance of cheap products, and the reduction of working hours.

Science has made important progress in the last few years in the fields of electronics, electrometallurgy, medicine, biology, agriculture, and so on. In all these, the possibility of cheap energy would mean immediate application of a series of new inventions and improvements on a large scale, and an immediate rise in the standard of living of the population.

The application of the cheap power, facilitating the creation of new industries, may reduce the production of certain metals and fuels which are the backbone of our present economy. But they will be replaced by new products, rationally manufactured under better conditions, and in the interest of the progress of the community.

The production of energy by the big power plants will be accompanied by a quasi unlimited production of artificial radioactive materials. Artificial radioactive elements which emit electrons are already being used now for biological, medical, and agricultural experiments, as so-called tracer elements. With the aid of such elements it is possible to investigate the metabolism of men and plants, to recognize and avoid diseases, and to improve the yield of plants.

Artificial radioactive elements, such as emitters of electrons, possibly can replace our electric installations, because electrons are carriers of our electric stream. Collected on plates, they produce electric potentials from which the electricity can be conducted. The replacement of the heated wires in the electronic tubes by radioactive materials makes us independent of heavy storage batteries, or batteries of great current capacity. We do not even need small batteries for collecting the charge of the emitted electrons, if we bend the electrons with a magnetic field to the place we want to charge. As it is possible today to make very strong magnets, we are independent of any electrical installation. We also can produce heat in metallic plates and wires without any electrical installation, directing the electrons to the parts we want to heat. The heat will be produced in the parts where the electrons are absorbed. Mechanical effects can be produced by ironization current, due to the heavy ironizating radiation. With photo-conductive materials strong relay effects can be obtained.

New aspects are open for television: transmission stations without powerful central stations will be possible.

Also, it is not impossible that we will be able to imitate cosmic radiation, either with the energy of a uranium pile or with a special apparatus. In this case, we would deal with radiation of such an energy that evaporation of atomic nuclei will be possible. That means we could convert any kind of matter into energy, and we would not be limited to the use of rare and expensive materials, such as uranium. All kinds of matter existing in the world could be used as a source of energy.

But perhaps the most important thing that we will learn from all of these experiments is not only how to decompose matter but also how to construct it. And we will be able to produce artificially any kind of material needed, because we will have at our disposal tremendous energies necessary for the artificial production.

Science and philosophy of the pre-atomic era were based on the concept of matter. The new science and philosophy of the atomic era are based on the concept of energy. The possibility of transforming matter into energy, and vice versa, changes completely our philosophical point of view with all the consequences, such as values of power and materials.

Until our time there has been no discovery equal to that of atomic energy. The greatest discoveries up to now advanced humanity a maximum of 50 years. The development of atomic energy moves humanity forward several centuries. It opens up the doors to the golden age without revolution or war, and even without very painful transitional periods. It brings equalization to peoples without large natural resources. It creates the possibility for peoples from the backward areas of the world to enter the family of advanced peoples on equal terms. In other words, the atomic-energy era means—equality, peace, and happiness.

"I can think of no single periodical in the United States whose continued existence is of more importance to American democracy than The Nation.—RAYMOND SWING

Every week since 1865: Liberal analysis and interpretation of world events together with criticism of current books, plays, films, and music.

Rates: 1 Year $5, 2 Years $8, 3 Years $11.

Single Copies 15¢.

THE Nation

20 VESEY STREET NEW YORK 7, N. Y.

For the Benefit of All

BY JAMES CAREY

Secretary-Treasurer of the C. I. O.

JUST one month ago, a group of labor leaders, members of the General Executive Board of the C. I. O., met in Washington to discuss the question of atomic energy. One may ask why ordinary labor leaders presume to discuss a scientific phenomenon such as this. I believe it grows out, in part at least, of the change that has taken place in the labor movement in recent years. The C. I. O. is not concerned solely with wages, hours, and working conditions. It considers every important economic, political, and social question, and attempts to formulate a program in the interests of all the people, believing that it can thus best serve the interests of its members.

Labor leaders have a right to speak out because their activity makes it necessary for them to know the possibilities and the dangers in the development of an atomic bomb. They are required to know something about industrial developments in all countries of the world, including their own. In other countries, they may have better access to the factories and to the people than do our diplomatic representatives. We cannot talk about a central pool of information regarding atomic energy, the development of atomic bombs, and the use of atomic energy in good living as well as for destructive purposes unless the workers in the plants are conscious of their responsibilities to workers in other parts of the world.

As we develop our international organization in the field of labor, I believe for the first time we will have an opportunity to get the real facts regarding what is being produced in any given nation. In that way, perhaps, we will cut across these ultra-nationalistic attitudes and make a contribution to peace and security in the world. These workers know what they are producing. They have perhaps a better idea even than those who invented these mechanisms, of how they can be translated into positive and concrete methods either for good use or for destructive purposes. We believe more emphasis must be given to the good that can come out of this important development in the field of science, but like every other step in progress, a great deal of harm can also be anticipated.

We have had other cases of a similar nature; for instance, the development of aircraft was brought about in large part during the stress of war. Yet we had peace-time uses for this tremendous development. Tremendous technological gains have been brought about in this nation under the compulsion of war, the need for production. We have reason to fear that some of those great gains, made through the patriotic effort of the people of this nation, may operate against their interest, and that because of their efforts they may be confronted with the hazards of mass unemployment. We are not able to digest all of our advances, and we still find that many gains made in scientific fields are not transmitted to the people. Unless we pass on such gains for the people, it creates a danger to our society. Perhaps the atomic bomb can serve to awaken the people of the world to the need of moving at a greater pace in solving the simple little problem of living together in peace.

IV. THE PROBLEM OF CONTROL

Several speeches at this session have had to be omitted, among them an excellent extemporaneous comment by Justice Jerome Frank, and remarks by Cord Meyer, Jr., and Kingman Brewster.

Unite—or Else

BY EDGAR ANSEL MOWRER

Columnist and foreign correspondent

EVER since World War I, it has been apparent that world government offers the only visible hope of saving mankind from ultimate destruction. Material techniques have outstripped political institutions. World War II came—as Wilson had predicted it would, and with consequences even worse than Wilson foresaw.

Aviation alone threatened to terrorize mankind. By the end of 1943 Air Marshal William A. Bishop of Canada uttered a warning. In a little book that attracted far less attention than it should have, the greatest Allied ace of World War I pointed out the futility of nations quarreling over their several economic systems if all these systems, regardless, were going to be blown to bits by an aviator "laying" a few blockbusters.

Shortly after this volume appeared, in 1944, V-1's began falling upon London. Allied airmen also discovered a way of shooting many of them down short of their mark. Then the V-2's began to fall. Against them no defense was ever found. London—heroic to the last—just "took" them. Meanwhile normal, garden-variety aviation hammered Germany into surrender. When Germany collapsed our people found more than the launching platforms for V-2. They found the plans for V-10. This was a rocket-propelled bomb that would cross the Atlantic Ocean in the stratosphere. Against it, once more, no defense was known.

Shortly after came Hiroshima and Nagasaki. All existing explosives became obsolete. Mankind entered the atomic age. And it threatens to be his last.

Having spent many hours with the scientists who made the bomb and who certainly know the most about its potentialities, present and future, I am not impressed by laymen, generals, admirals, senators, bankers, and miscellaneous bigmouths who hastened to assure us that the discovery of the atomic bomb had really changed little or nothing. It is a question of definition. I follow the scientists. These men agree: 1) the atomic bomb cannot be kept secret; 2) the atomic bomb will soon be built by all industrial nations; 3) the bombs that razed Hiroshima and Nagasaki are just a faint foretaste of the bigger and better atomic bombs to come; 4) against the atomic bomb there is no adequate defense—and will in all likelihood be none; 5) similar bombs will soon be made in relatively small buildings and ultimately perhaps by lunatics in the kitchen sink; 6) the effect of sudden atomic aggression on the victim country would be not only murderous but would probably so weaken the receiving country that its capacity for retaliation would be crippled; the only way to prevent mankind from atomizing itself is to make sure that atomic weapons will never be used; finally, the only way sure to do this is to make sure there will be no more war.

For the last decades, it has been growing obvious that technological invention was rendering the system of sovereign states economically and politically obsolescent. Economically obsolescent because it no longer contributed to the material well-being of mankind. Its tariff walls, regulations, red tape, my-country-right-or-wrong thinking, were a hindrance to maximum human prosperity. Politically, obsolescent because it had ceased to provide even relative security for most of mankind. Before the discovery of the bomb, in planning a world organization, we accepted the fact that only three states—the United States, Britain, and the Soviet Union, could enjoy real security on their own. The other countries were asked to "trust" to the good will of these three—the word is that of Secretary of State Stettinius at San Francisco. As though great powers had ever given mankind any reason to trust them!

The atomic age put an end to the security of the three giants as well.

If you accept the fact that mankind must banish war, then inevitably—if you can think straight—you reach the conclusion that mankind must achieve world government. Nothing less can do the trick.

No Middle Ground

BY THOMAS K. FINLETTER

Lawyer and Author

MY MODEST little subject, "Is World Government the Answer?" may be divided into two parts: (1) Can the United Nations Organization be preserved? and (2) Is world government possible in the immediate future?" Both of these questions come down to the same thing: that is, are we going to continue our present system of arm's length dealing between independent nation-states or are we going to set up a world state?

We cannot discuss these questions intelligently, I think, unless we define for ourselves, much more clearly than we have, just what we mean by world government and what the consequences of our adopting it and of our not adopting it are. The discussion of these questions so far has been extremely confused. Often those who deny the practicability of world government will propose steps which amount to exactly that. Often those who are convinced that nothing short of world government can stop atomic war shrink from the necessary implications of a super-sovereignty and make proposals which in fact merely perpetuate the concert system on which the League of Nations and the United Nations Organization are founded. They want world government in the abstract not in the particular. There is a need for a definition.

There are only two alternatives before us in this matter of the organization of peace. The first is a world government. The other is an agreement between nations based on good will. There is nothing in between. There are variations in the two categories. But the inescapable fact is that either you have an enforceable world law or you haven't. I emphasize this because there is at the moment an almost frantic search for a middle ground—something that will be more than the old system of agreements between governments, but yet will avoid the violent upheaval in our political concepts and our national independence inherent in the setting up of a super-state. No such middle ground exists or can be created.

Both alternatives—world government or agreements between governments—carry with them certain very disagreeable consequences. We have not, I think, fully taken in what a world government would mean in terms of surrender of national power by the United States. On the other hand, I am sure that we have not yet realized how serious will be the military regulation of our economy and our people—especially the urban populations—if we are to be compelled to live in a world of independent nation states armed with modern weapons of mass destruction. This is a choice between two pills both of which are hard to swallow. But I cannot believe that when we fully consider the alternatives we can reach any conclusion other than that world government is the only course which holds any prospect either for a decent way of life or for the avoidance of atomic war.

First let us see what we mean by world government, not as a broad conceptual matter but in practical terms. The way to do this is, I think, to take one by one the steps necessary to set up an effective control of the modern weapons of mass destruction under a rule of law.

The first proposition is that we cannot stop the use of these weapons except by preventing their manufacture. If they are allowed to come into existence they will be used. Therefore, we must start with a rule enacted by some international organization prohibiting the manufacture of certain types of weapons. The United Nations Organization is a convenient medium for this purpose. Therefore, the UNO Charter should be amended so as to include, as one of its principles, the rule that certain specific weapons shall not be manufactured.

By itself, such a rule would be merely a statement of good intentions like the Kellogg-Briand Pact of 1928 by which 65 nations solemnly and forever renounced war. Therefore, UNO must be given the physical power to enforce this rule. How to give UNO this power is a technical military matter. The political principle is that the power shall be sufficient. If UNO does not have the physical power to see to it that its rules are obeyed, there will be no effective law. Whatever law may mean as a matter of philosophy, for this purpose it means a rule which as a practical matter can and will be enforced.

But even this is not enough. For once you start on this business of setting up an enforceable system of stopping the manufacture of certain weapons, certain consequences inevitably follow. There is a package of minimum requirements. If any component part of that package is withdrawn the system ceases to be enforceable and becomes a mere promise between sovereign governments based on their good will and good faith.

Thus, UNO would have to have the right to send its inspectors into all parts of the world to know whether its rule was being violated. The refusal by a government to let the inspectors inspect would have to be illegal, bringing down with it all the sanctions necessary to compel the recalcitrant government to allow UNO's orders to be carried out. Also, there would have to be some way of supplementing the basic law against the manufacture of certain kinds of weapons—to add new weapons to the proscribed list, to specify the methods of inspection, and generally to keep up with the enormous and changing complications inherent in any effective system of control by law. In other words, UNO would have to have a legislature with the power to make law within its constitutional powers. And such a legislature could not operate by unanimous voting, but would have to act by a majority. And representation in such a legislature could not be on the undemocratic basis of one vote for each nation state.

Another fundamental change would be necessary. The Security Council could not function as it does now as a political body, with the power to act or not to act as its sovereign members choose. If the Security Council is to be the executive of UNO it will have to act as any other executive. If there is a law, it must be enforced automatically. It must not require a new political decision each time a specific case comes before it that the law shall be enforced. Only the manner of enforcement must be open for discussion. This means that the steps to stop a violation of UNO's fundamental law cannot be taken by the present voting system of the Security Council. A majority vote of the Council would be one way, or the setting up of a different kind of executive body of UNO.

Moreover, UNO's law would have to operate directly on the individual citizen. If the UNO inspectors report that plant A in Country X is making atomic bombs, UNO may first tell the government of X to stop the manufacture, but if government X fails to comply, UNO will have to act directly against the offending plant. If UNO were to act only through the government of X, the enforcement of the law would take the form in each instance of a negotiation between UNO and the government of X, with all the delays and inaction such a negotiation would entail. No law can be enforced in this way.

Also, if this enormous power were granted to UNO some judicial body (presumably the Permanent Court of International Justice) would have to determine whether a violation of UNO's law had taken place. UNO could not subject an alleged offender (say a manufacturing plant in a great city) to the frightful penalty of being bombed, or even to any lesser penalty, without having it clearly and judically established that it had broken the law.

To summarize: If you want to make a rule that certain weapons shall not be manufactured and to set up an effective system to enforce that rule, you unavoidably, as an absolute minimum, call for a world government which (1) works under a fixed rule of law; (2) has a legislature to modify that law within the limits of the powers of that government's charter, (3) has an executive whose duty it is to apply the law directly against the offending individuals, with no right to debate, as a political matter, whether it shall or shall not do so, (4) has an information system which will keep the executive informed of what is going on, (5) has a judiciary to determine whether a violation has taken place and (6) has overwhelming physical force to enable it to stop any violation of its fundamental law.

There may be other conditions which would follow if an effective control of armaments is to be set up. I think there are. Thus it is not enough to make illegal the manufacturing of certain weapons if you are to have peace—which is, after all, what we are trying to get by all these mechanics. It will be necessary to make any form of war, civil or otherwise, illegal. But such a law in turn would freeze the status quo and would raise the question whether a peaceful change provision would not be necessary—something like the enactment as law of the principle of self-determination. But I do not want to get into these further complexities at this point. I want only to make it clear that those who are suggesting an effective control of weapons of mass destruction, based on enforceable law, are in fact demanding world government with all its component parts.

It is no wonder then that many people, even of those who can contemplate change without distaste, are appalled by the implications of an attempt to control the manufacture of these weapons. World government adds up to—world government, the setting up of something more powerful than the Government of the United States. It is not surprising that there is this search for a middle ground—something in between doing nothing and this crossing of the Rubicon into the land of the World State.

[At this point Mr. Finletter discussed at length several "middle ground proposals."]

The implications of world government are very serious. But what about the implications of not having world government? Clearly, tremendously important questions of domestic policy depend on which of these two solutions is adopted. If we had a world state we could, and indeed probably would, be required to disarm almost entirely our national forces. It would be against the law for us to have weapons of mass destruction and there would be no point in having substantial amounts of the others. We would have put all our armament eggs in one basket of world government. But if we decide to go the other course and to continue our experiments with the agreement or good faith method, prudence demands that we take on a defense program the like of which this country has not yet dreamed of. For the agreement method means—unless all history is wrong—that war, some time or other, sooner or later, is inevitable; and we would have to be ready for it.

What these preparations would have to be is a matter which only the military men and the scientists can talk about with authority. But the laymen have to consider these things and, as matters look at the moment, it seems we should think along the following lines:

> (1) The important thing is defense against sudden attack. We will be on the receiving end at the beginning of the next war. The attack will probably be extremely violent and without warning.
>
> (2) We will have to make arrangements which will protect our military installations, industrial centers and urban populations from being destroyed in such an attack, so that we will have something to retaliate with to protect ourselves against invasion and conquest.
>
> (3) Until such time as we learn that other nations have developed atomic and other weapons capable of such an attack—say three to five years or possibly a short time longer — we can, and probably will, disregard the danger. But once we are confronted with the possibility of such an attack, we will have to submit to drastic regulation of our industry and our urban populations. The need for these defensive preparations will increase sharply as we withdraw our troops from Germany and Japan.

Thomas K. Finletter

> (4) What form our preparations for defense against atomic attack will take will depend on (a) the recommendations of the military and the scientists in the light of the armament of other nations, and (b) the political feasibility of putting into effect what they recommend—that is, the willingness of the American people to put up with drastic regulation of their industry and urban populations. A case may well arise where it will be politically impossible for any United States government to enact the kind of law which the experts will say is necessary for the national defense. The people may prefer having the country open to devastating attack rather than accept the drastic regulation of their lives which may be necessary in the light of the then existing weapons in the possession of other countries. This is another way of saying that democracies will always be at a disadvantage.
>
> (5) But even so, if we keep our international organization on the basis of reliance on the good will of the other nations of the world, we will necessarily adopt a high degree of interference by the federal government with the liberty of the individual. If we were to have only a race in the preparation of atomic weapons for offense, this would not greatly increase the control of the government over the affairs of the individual. The difficulty comes from the necessity of preparing the country so that it can take an atomic attack and still be able to strike back. How much this will lead in the direction of total control by the government over the location of industry, the right of individuals to live in crowded urban centers, complete military service and the totally militarized state may be left to the imagination.

The people of this country thus have quite a decision to make—whether to try to achieve world government before the nations get involved in an armament race, or, on the other hand, to get busy about winning that race.

The decision will probably be made within the next few years, that is within the period of grace allowed to the United States, Canada and the United Kingdom by their exclusive ownership of atomic engineering know-how. If by that time some effective world law preventing the manufacture of these weapons is not set up, the armament race will begin of its own accord. Once started, it will be very much harder to stop it than before it began. It is one thing to get the nations to agree not to manufacture certain weapons; it is very much another thing to get them to agree to give those weapons up.

For this reason the UNO commission called for by the Truman-Attlee Atomic Declaration is of the highest importance. A reading of that Declaration shows that it can go either way. It opens up the road—indeed it fairly clearly envisages—world government. It calls for "effective enforceable safeguards against (the) use (of atomic energy) for destructive purposes . . .," the "control of atomic energy to the extent necessary to insure its use only for peaceful purposes, . . . the elimination from national armaments of atomic weapons and all other major weapons adaptable to mass destruction, . . . effective safeguards by way of inspection and other means" and "the rule of law." Certainly the necessary implication of such measures is world government.

On the other hand, the atomic declaration makes it clear that the work of the UNO Commission is to "proceed by separate stages, the successful completion of each one of which will develop the necessary confidence of the world before the next stage is undertaken." There is thus no commitment of the British and American governments to work toward the immediate creation of a world state. The commitment is only to try to create the conditions of mutual confidence which will make the setting up of the "adequate safeguards" possible.

Now what does this policy of gradual stages imply? It can mean one or two things. First, that the governments of the United States and Britain are not sure that their own peoples are ready for world government and that they must be led into it, if at all, by easy stages. Secondly, that no world government can be set up unless Russia agrees, and that the only way to get her to accept it is to take the matter up with her tactfully and gradually.

I believe that the Atomic Declaration means both these things. The first lies within our own power to satisfy. If the American people will show what I believe to be the fact, that they are willing to accept the implications of membership in a world government if they believe that to be the only way of stopping war, then their government can act with vigor in putting this view up to the governments and peoples of the rest of the world.

The other difficulty is beyond our immediate control. I have no idea whether the governments of Great Britain and Russia would agree to set up "enforceable safeguards" against war in the form of a world government. I am however reasonably certain of one thing, and that is that there is only one way in which we can find out, and that is to offer it to them.

But, we will be told, all this is impossible; the people are not ready for such a drastic step. Perhaps they are not. But we must, I think, be careful not to lay the blame for our failure to bring our antiquated international machinery up to date on shoulders where it does not belong. Are we sure that this failure is not caused by an unjustified lack of faith in the political and moral maturity of the peoples of the world? Are we sure that the peoples would not willingly go along with any sensible plan which would give them some hope of living decently and in peace?

The Veteran's View

BY CHARLES G. BOLTE

Chairman, American Veterans' Committee

OURS is a most extraordinary world, a world in which technological developments have led us into such a literally revolutionary time, that we must also revolutionize our political thinking.

Our situation is dangerous because the present organization of society vests control of extraordinarily destructive weapons in the hands of men who owe their allegiance to some power less inclusive than the sovereign power of all men. It is obvious that we must change our political arrangements, and change them quickly. I agree entirely with what Beardsley Ruml said a few days ago: we need a triple-decker, three-way program. We don't have to say we are in favor of one thing and drop everything else. We can work hard through existing diplomatic channels at the problem of how to get along with Russia and relieve the tensions developing between us. At the same time we can do everything possible to insure support of the United Nations Organization, get the necessary legislation through the Senate, and do what needs to be done to make the meeting in January a success—even work for strengthening amendments to the Charter. Doing either or both of those things does not mean that we cannot at the same time work for world government, for a quick and radical transformation of the UNO into a real world government.

The proposition that we can gradually achieve that third phase—world government—is a little like Norman Cousins' illustration of the man standing at the edge of a wide chasm with a forest fire creeping up behind him, looking across and saying, "I can't make the whole jump at once; I guess I better take one step at a time." To improve relations with Russia and to improve the UNO, is not to make that gradual approach. Although you have to take the jump all at once, you need a running start. Trying to relieve the tensions, build up as much community of interest as possible, and strengthen the UNO, perhaps will be our running start for world government.

There is not much time, but we can go much faster than we think. We shall have tremendous support from many of the men who fought the war. Sovereignty doesn't seem like much of a defense to a man who has been in a B-29 over Tokyo, with the flak rattling off the cabin walls, or to a man who has lived in six inches of water in a foxhole for two months. That sovereignty, if it is sovereignty, is something we value little. It is a sovereignty which will be no protection to us. It is a false sovereignty in that it ignores the true sovereignty, which is of us, all the people here in this country, and in this world, who feel that we would like to go on living. There will be no veterans of the next war.

Science Must be Free

BY LOUIS N. RIDENOUR
Physics Department, University of Pennsylvania; Radiation Laboratory, M.I.T.; War Department consultant

NATIONAL and international control of this terrible weapon that has been put into our hands is important and perhaps, within the immediate future, crucial. However, one aspect of this general question which is all too seldom discussed is who, if anyone, is to control the future progress of basic, fundamental science. In the very considerable discussion concerning ways and means of saving man from the armageddon which the invention of the atomic bomb has made relatively cheap and practicable, the question of world-wide scientific freedom versus restrictive nationalistic control of science has scarcely been noticed. Many people, including several competent scientists, feel that it is idle to discuss this question of scientific freedom while the much larger issues of the survival of mankind, or of civilization, cannot yet be dealt with adequately.

I cannot agree with this position. It seems to me that when the view is widely held that it is actually possible for a nation to keep a secret composed of some fragments of knowledge about the interaction of matter and of radiation, and when our army destroys the cyclotrons of Japan presumably on the assumption that these are weapons of war instead of instruments of scientific investigation, and when our treatment of individual scientists in the conquered countries suggests that we are on the verge of regarding these men individually as war criminals, it is necessary to consider the scientist's view of science and the possibility of its control.

Briefly put, the scientist believes that there is a fundamental understandability about nature. He further believes that the virtue of scientific ideas in his field lies in their agreement with experiment, so that ultimately there is no such thing as opinion in science. There is only relative truth, an idea which agrees with experiment, and relative falsity, an idea which does not agree with experiment. Just as ultimately there is no such thing as opinion in science, so ultimately there is no such things as concealment in science. Given then the unscientific belief in the fundamental understandability and universal accessibility of nature, one comes naturally to the scientist's pre-war method of conducting his science: it is in every sense of the word international.

German, French, and English were the universal languages which every advanced student had to learn to read, at least, and scientific papers were always published in one of these three languages. Students and staff members, research workers at all levels, were interchanged between countries. Every country engaged in research and in investigation to the ultimate limit of its desirability and, most important of all, there was immediate international publication of all scientific results. Scientists recognized that in a discipline whose aim was the elucidation of the universe, it was idle and wrong to regard the results of experimentation and of speculative thought as being less than the property of all men.

For reasons of military secrecy, with which no one would take issue while our country was in peril, the pre-war freedom of science was entirely lost during the war. Most basic scientific work was stopped, too, because scientists made themselves useful as engineers, applying what was already known to design, an outstanding example being the design of the atomic bomb. However, the war is over now and we have the very interesting present-day situation in which our political leaders and virtually everyone responsible is giving voice to the most pious remarks about the necessity for political internationalism, eventual world government, and a planet-wide brotherhood of man, while at the same time there seems to be little attempt to restore the old internationalism of science. Instead, people seem to assume that science will henceforth be conducted on a nationalistic basis.

Criticism of the nationalization of science, based on idealism, is remarkably easy to make, but it is not likely to move practical people in an age when the threat of an atomic war is as near and as frightening as it is today. What I should like to do is point out that one can make a strong indictment of the nationalization of science on a practical nationalistic basis. Even if we are America Firsters, even if we want our country to prosper in spite of the rest of the world or at its expense or to become strong enough to conquer the rest of the world, it would not be practical to attempt to nationalize science. Science is far less a body of information than it is a group of men who understand this information, who have the knowledge and the ability to make use of it and expend it. The country whose scientists are members of a cult or a secret lodge, a country which restricts its scientific knowledge so that fact A can be taught in the colleges and fact B cannot, is well on the way to destroying its scientific traditions and dispersing its scientists. Even from the standpoint of pure nationalism, this is a bad idea. It is basic to any sort of secrecy that someone must decide who is to be let in on a particular secret. It is equally basic to scientific thought that no man is competent to judge what a person must be told in order that he may make a scientific discovery or an advance or construct a theory or do a meaningful experiment.

It should also be observed that such nationalization of science creates quite natural suspicion of national motives. Since the supposed benefits of scientific nationalism in the minds of those who favor it are limited to its expected usefulness in war, any attempt on our part to nationalize science will be regarded by other nations as part of our preparations for a war. Thus, an attempt to nationalize science can stand in the way of the trust and understanding between nations, which must precede any control of the atomic bomb. But this again is an idealistic argument and I must apologize for advancing it.

Let us say, instead, that any attempt of this sort will cause other countries to put an intense effort into attracting good men to scientific pursuits. It will cause them to finance scientific investigation and, if they are clever, to maintain the most rigid scientific freedom so that their scientists can work effectively. This may enable other countries to be better prepared scientifically for a war than we would like to see them. Our policy of scientific nationalization would have been responsible.

Apart from the type of national control of science that I have so far considered—control of scientific publication and dissemination of scientific information—there is another sort of control which has been suggested as wise or necessary. This is a kind of supervision which will prevent the scientist from harming the public at large by his practice in the dark arts. There seems to be a confusion in the minds of many people between scientists and scientific knowledge, on the one hand, and so-called scientific weapons of war, on the other. There seems to be a belief that there is something inherently bad about scientific knowledge that fits it uniquely to be turned over to the destruction of other men. Scientists, I am afraid, have done their part to heighten this impression by being proud of the war-time achievements in engineering weapons. It is difficult not to be proud of a good job. However, I think it is time we pointed out that a body of scientific knowledge and a group of capable scientists, as a natural resource, are quite comparable to a steel mill and the people necessary to run it. You can make either sewing machines and typewriters or machine-guns and cannon out of the steel that comes from the mill. We don't need to fear science and scientists in a world at peace; we need fear only those persons who would lead nations into war.

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED AT THE FORUM

AT THE close of the last session of the forum Freda Kirchwey presented to the delegates the series of Propositions" which had provided the framework of the discussions. After some debate it was agreed unanimously that the Propositions be accepted as expressing the sense of the forum, and Miss Kirchwey was instructed to formulate resolutions based upon them. A proposal that a paragraph be inserted calling directly for the creation of a world government was rejected because lack of time made adequate discussion impossible. But it was clearly the feeling of the meeting that changes in the United Nations Organization, to increase its authority and convert it as rapidly as possible into a body whose decisions would have the force of law, should be vigorously pressed.

The resolutions agreed upon by the forum follow:

SINCE the basic scientific information about nuclear fission is known everywhere and it is only a matter of time before the production of atomic bombs is possible in all industrially advanced countries; and since the development of aviation, particularly of rocket-propelled robot planes, will soon annihilate distance and minimize the human factor in attack, eliminating the possibility of effective, long-range defense against aggression with atomic weapons; and

SINCE we are therefore faced with the problem of finding political rather than mechanical methods of dealing with the overwhelming dangers created by the discovery of atomic explosives and other new destructive devices; and

SINCE effective political methods can only be devised if the nations succeed in minimizing such existing political factors as (a) long-continued differences of interest and policy between the Soviet Union and the Western powers and (b) the effect on other nations of America's monopoly of the secret of atomic-bomb manufacture and of our continued production of these bombs—

THEREFORE, we are agreed:

1. That the plan for international control through the United Nations Organization proposed by President Truman, Prime Minister Attlee, and Prime Minister King should be fortified by consultation with the Soviet Union so that assurance of full cooperation by the Soviet government may be secured in advance of the UNO Assembly meeting in January;

2. That the United States take the initiative in arranging further consultation concerning conflicts of interests in areas of tension such as the Balkans, Iran, the Near East, and the Far East in order to replace the present dangerous tactics of provocation and counter-provocation by conciliation or, if necessary, honest collective bargaining;

3. That, at the same time, plans for establishing atomic control through the UNO should be energetically pushed and the program outlined in the Truman-Attlee-King statement more sharply defined;

4. That one of the first acts of a control commission set up under the UNO should be the outlawing of the manufacture of atomic explosives and the destruction or conversion for industrial uses of those bombs already built by the United States;

5. That since wars and the danger of atomic destruction will be eliminated only when the superior authority of a world organization is accepted by all nations, an essential step in this direction is the abolition of the veto rule which today gives dictatorial power to a small group of great nations;

6. That in order to avoid control by private monopolies, national or international, over the industrial exploitation of atomic energy—which control would hinder the development of a new era of economic security and abundance —the government must keep in its own hands the sources of fissionable material and nationalize the actual production of atomic energy;

7. That Congress must devise control machinery which will insure the security of the country, prevent improper private exploitation of atomic developments, and at the same time encourage scientific experimentation by protecting freedom of research and a free exchange of scientific information;

8. And, finally, that to accomplish these ends a federal control commission must be composed of representatives of the people as a whole, including scientists, labor, the professions, business and industry, the government, and the armed forces, such commission to remain, however, under full civilian control.

V. DINNER FORUM

"We Turned the Switch"

BY LEO SZILARD

Atom-bomb scientist; Metallurgical Laboratory, University of Chicago

ON MARCH 3, 1939, Dr. Walet Zinn and I, working on the seventh floor of the Pupin Building at Columbia University, completed a simple experiment to which we had been looking forward rather eagerly. Everything was ready, and all we had to do was to lean back, turn a switch, and watch the screen of a television tube. If flashes of light appeared on the screen, it would mean that neutrons were emitted in the fission of uranium, and that in turn would mean that the liberation of atomic energy was possible in our lifetime. We turned the switch, we saw the flashes, we watched them for about ten minutes—and then we switched everything off and went home. That night I knew that the world was headed for sorrow.

The Dinner on December 3, celebrating The Nation's Eightieth Anniversary, concluded the forum. Leon Henderson, former head of the OPA, presided, and Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt made a brief extemporaneous speech. Another guest of honor, Dr. Urey, also spoke extemporaneously, and his remarks as published here are consequently much abbreviated. Dr. Evatt spoke by radio telephone from Los Angeles. The main speech of the evening, by Harold Laski, chairman of the British Labor Party, was printed in full last week.

From March, 1939 until October of the same year work in the field of atomic energy was carried on by a handful of men who lacked many of the things they needed and most of all official recognition. From October, 1939, to the end of 1941 we still lacked many things, but we suffered from too much official recognition. Our increasing anxiety about what the Germans might be doing made our slow speed all the more intolerable.

At the end of 1941 there was an important change for the better. This change came in the wake of a visit which Dr. Oliphant of Birmingham, England, paid to this country around the middle of the war. Dr. Oliphant attended one of the meetings of the Uranium Committee as a guest and was not very much impressed by the organization and official guidance of our work. Disregarding international etiquette, he told anyone who was willing to listen what he thought of us. Considerations other than military secrecy prevent me from repeating the exact expressions he used. But he got results.

After the reorganization of our work at the end of 1941 we were all happy for a while. Sometime during 1942 the army was brought into the picture, but the officers who were attached to us realized that they did not know what it was all about and did not make life difficult for us. Toward the end of 1942 and during the first half of 1943 all sorts of troubles developed, not all of them originating with the army. At that time it became evident to most of us that unless our organization could be changed quickly, we would have no bombs ready by the spring of 1944, when we expected the invasion of Europe to begin. We saw no way of bringing about a change without a major row, and we could not take the risk of losing thereby more time than we might gain. During 1943 and part of 1944 our greatest worry was the possibility that Germany would perfect an atomic bomb before the invasion of Europe. I myself was firmly convinced that the Germans were ahead of us in this work. Today I know that I was wrong and that when the war ended the Germans had not reached the point from which we started when our work began in earnest.

In 1945, when we ceased worrying about what the Germans might do to us, we began to worry about what the government of the United States might do to other countries. Discussion of the subject started in Chicago in March of this year. There were those among us who thought that we should not set the precedent of using atomic energy for the purposes of destruction. About sixty of us at Chicago took the view that Japan was essentially defeated and that it would be wrong to attack its cities with atomic bombs as if atomic bombs were simply another military weapon. Many atomic scientists at Oak Ridge took a similar view. The use of atomic bombs against Hiroshima and Nagasaki did not end but rather stimulated the discussion of this question.

For some four to six weeks after Hiroshima atomic scientists expressed no opinion on the political implications of the bomb, having been requested by the War Department to exercise the greatest possible reserve. Our response to this request does not mean that we were intimidated by the War Department. We kept silent because we all believed that Hiroshima was immediately followed by discussions between the United States, Great Britain, and Russia, as indeed it should have been, and we did not want to embarrass the President or the Secretary of State.

Then, early in October, in a visit to Washington, I happened to pick up a copy of the May-Johnson bill and brought it back with me to Chicago. We were somewhat alarmed when we read in the papers that hearings were held for one day before the House Military Affairs Committee and then closed down for good. Our alarm increased when on October 9 we discovered that the War Department's early requests to us to exercise discretion in our public utterances were not occasioned by any negotiations with other powers but by its desire to have the May-Johnson bill passed "without unnecessary discussions in Congress."

This caused the Atomic Scientists of Chicago to issue a manifesto calling for adequate hearings in Congress on the general issue involved before any bill on the domestic control of atomic energy should be passed. Our statement marked the beginning of the fight of the scientists against the May-Johnson bill, a fight which has so far not been lost.

Feeling the need for a better understanding of what was happening in Washington, I went there and stayed six weeks. These are my conclusions: The most hopeful aspect of the situation in Washington is the fact that the problem of controlling atomic energy has so far not become a political problem, that is, the essential difference is not between Democrats and Republicans or between progressives and conservatives but rather between those who understand what atomic bombs may mean and those who do not understand it. The most important task would therefore seem to be somehow to impart to everyone a realization of the essentially non-terrestial nature of the atomic bomb.

I would like, therefore, to present tentatively the suggestion that the best way to put our foreign policy on a sound basis might consist in staging a demonstration of an atomic-bomb explosion for members of Congress, the President, and such other citizens as ought to witness it. Those of my friends who saw the tests in New Mexico on July 16 tell me how shaken they were by the experience. Most of them were ten miles or more away; if they had been nearer, the psychological effect would no doubt have been even greater. The risk which the statesmen would run individually by watching from a lesser distance appears to me small in comparison to the risk which we shall all incur collectively if we do not succeed in bringing home to them the non-terrestial nature of the phenomenon.

Naturally, I am not really worried about the future, except perhaps the next fifteen years. If we manage to get through the next fifteen years, alive, we shall probably emerge immune to atomic bombs. It seems to me that the greatest danger facing us at present is the possibility of a war which would arise more or less automatically out of an arms race in which the United States and Russia built up stockpiles of atomic bombs.

Is it possible to avert this danger? Let us assume that the United States and Russia agreed to have no stockpiles of atomic bombs and to permit no manufacture of atomic bombs on their territory. Let us, moreover, assume for the sake of argument that they both reserve the right to abrogate this arrangement at any time. Could Russia and the United States, under present-day conditions, make arrangements through which they could convince each other, as well as other nations, that secret violations of the agreement would be detected and would become known to the world? My answer to this question is emphatically Yes. Clearly the arrangements would have to include the right of inspection on the part of some international agency.

If Russia and the United States wanted to reassure each other concerning secret violations, they might go about it in the following way: After the agreement is ratified and becomes the law of the land, the President of the United States could call on all American engineers and scientists and ask them to pledge themselves to report to an international agency all violations committed on the territory of the United States. The Espionage Act would have to be modified so that it would no longer cover information of a scientific or technical nature, whether or not relating to national defense. All men classed as scientists or engineers would be invited to spend each year four weeks' vacation or six weeks' if you wish, abroad with their families as guests of the United Nations Organization. The Russian government would be expected to take similar action with respect to its own scientists and engineers.

No arrangement of this sort, of course, could rule out the possibility of war, and in case of war, sooner or later, atomic bombs would drop from the skies. Yet under such an arrangement war would break out only if one of the parties actually decided to start an arms race and risk a war. It would give us a respite which would be worth having, provided we know how to make use of it for building a permanent peace.

The Task Before Us

BY HAROLD C. UREY

Atom-bomb scientist; winner of Nobel Prize

THE year 1945 will go down in history as one of the most crucial, the most epoch-making of many centuries of the past. One can never speak about the future. Future history, in fact, may not last very long. It depends upon what we do with the very important period immediately before us. The point at which we have arrived in history, which is highlighted by the atomic bomb, is this: We have made technological warfare so dreadful that we cannot survive if we practice it. We have that choice to make. Do we wish to have this civilization, which has been built so laboriously for thousands of years, terminated at this point, or do we wish to see it go on? Do we wish to see our own race, evolved through almost endless time—hundreds of millions of years—terminated? Do we wish to go on with this sort of playing with very great fires and have a devastated earth?

These are things which I think can reasonably be expected to be ahead in the next decades if we wish to continue in this direction.

Of course, the problem first of all is how can we impress people with the seriousness of the situation. We need, first of all, to be thoroughly frightened. Of course, fright that leads to hysteria doesn't do us much good, but if we can channel a real good fright into the direction of constructive effort, great benefit may come from it.

As Dr. Szilard has said to you, we need to use equal imagination, equal courage in breaking with the past, in our experience in human affairs, that we have used in developing the atomic bomb. I think that it is possible to arouse the people of this country to the seriousness of the situation and induce them to think differently about the changed situation. Any solution that the scientific fraternity has been able to think of, or any one else has been able to suggest that I know of, involves some legal means of preventing war.

The essential problem of preventing war was considered by the founders of this country. Our own federal government was the result of these discussions. I should like to see the time come when the manufacture of atomic bombs and other weapons of war will be handled by a world organization such as counterfeiting is by our government. I believe this may happen sooner than we think. There should be laws against the manufacture of atomic and other weapons of war, and a police force to detect violations and arrest people (not states) who violate the law. There should be courts of justice to try those accused of violating the law. If guilty they should be imprisoned. I am convinced that only such a proceedure will prevent war.

This control of war can come about only when the people of this country and those of other countries are willing to serve as policemen, judges, and juries and give moral sanction to the law. The ultimate source of law and its ultimate enforcement resides in the moral conscience of the citizens of a country and the world. As sovereignty in this country resides in the people of this country, so sovereignty of a world government must also reside in the people. We have atomic bombs and other countries do not. We should lead and not ask others to do so. This is our responsibility and opportunity.

A Stronger UNO

BY HERBERT VERE EVATT

Foreign Minister of Australia

THE advent of the atom bomb has dramatically illustrated but not essentially changed the problems of world security and world organization that were faced at San Francisco. At that great conference it was agreed by all that the human and physical devastation of war was so vast that it could be prevented only by a world organization armed with drastic powers to curb an aggressor.

Although the atom bomb had not yet been used in the war, the delegates to San Francisco thought that another world war would bring an end to our civilization. The devastation wrought in Europe is sufficient evidence that the world cannot endure another war even if the atom bomb is outlawed. However, the atom bomb has made more urgent the need for getting the new organization into working order.

The recent Three Powers statement on atomic energy points to the establishment of an agency under the jurisdiction of the United Nations with power to inspect the plant and laboratories of any nation in order to discover if there has been any violation of the proposed ban against atomic weapons. The setting up of a special atomic commission, the agreement to eliminate atomic weapons from national armaments, and the establishment of machinery for inspection will have to be fully discussed in the assembly of the United Nations Organization and in the legislature of the individual nation. But once international agreement is entered into and the new agency is established, obviously there can be no place for a veto power on the decision of the agency.

Here I desire to state most emphatically that the atom bomb, like every armament both old and new, is clearly covered by the United Nations provision giving the Assembly a right to take the initiative with respect to international agreement for armament regulations.

Above all, we must not lose sight of the fundamental principle that the objectives of the United Nations Organization are, first, to prevent wars; second, to suppress aggressors by force if necessary, and third, to remove the underlying causes of war—economic and otherwise. It would be a great setback to these objectives if the main forces of the United Nations Organization were thought to be the laying down of rules by which future wars should be conducted.

Again the United Nations Charter places a positive obligation on each member nation to place at the disposal of the Security Council not only its armed forces but its warlike "facilities." In my opinion, no nation can carry out its duties to the organization unless it is prepared, subject of course to reasonable safeguards, to bring all its armaments and all its weapons within the general jurisdiction of the organization.

For these reasons, it is entirely wrong to suppose that the destructive aspects of atomic energy can be regarded as outside the purview of the United Nations Charter. On the contrary, they can be and are included within its scope. Therefore, I do not agree that it is necessary for us to concentrate on world government, i. e., establishing new machinery for some form of federal government. What is necessary is to concentrate on making the existing United Nations Organization a success.

Herbert Vere Evatt

All this shows how important it is to stress the positive factors of cooperation that must go into the setting up of a United Nations Organization and the building of a world community. Too many have overemphasized the fear that has been almost universally engendered by the atom bomb and suggested that this fear may stampede us into a solid world organization. But in my opinion fear can never prevent this positive creative quality. Fear may drive us underground. Fear may force us to disperse our industries. Fear may induce a nation to strike a first and decisive blow. But fear will not make us feel more kindly toward our neighbors, and this feeling of kindness and comradeship is vitally necessary if we are to have any world organization that will survive.

What is the task before us? What is needed is an abandonment of mere power politics and the support of all forms of international participation designed to meet the desperate needs of the peoples of the world. Let us not think that our present favored position and apparent economic security leave us immune from future economic disaster.

The urgent necessity of the displaced and starving peoples of Europe and Asia must be met by increasing the resources of the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration. The Food and Agriculture Organization should be given a larger role to play. The Economic and Social Council of the United Nations Organization must be assigned special tasks in furthering the development of resources in the interests of the people themselves. The trusteeship clauses of the Charter must be given practical application. There must be an extension of international cultural and scientific exchanges. With the peaceful development of atomic energy, the old economic conflict, the struggle for living room, the jealously guarded economic rights in power resources—all contributing to the likelihood of war—can be made things of the past. Mankind has the possibility of entering into a cultural heritage hitherto undreamed of.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 161 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · DECEMBER 29, 1945 NUMBER 26

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 721

EDITORIALS

Truman and Labor 724
Old Game: New Rules 725

ARTICLES

Middle Eastern Tories by I. F. Stone 726
Trouble Ahead for Veterans by Charles G. Bolté 728
In the Wind 729
If I Had Been Forrestal by Thomas J. Hamilton 730
Japan's Political Ferment by Andrew Roth 731
Iranian Checkerboard by Sydney W. Morrell 733
C. O.'s: Second-Class Citizens by Vincent Heath Whitney 735
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison 737
The People's Front by Del Vayo 738

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Gabriela Mistral by Mildred Adams 739
Briefer Comment 740
Verse Chronicle by Randall Jarrell 741
The Art of Cézanne, by Clement Greenberg 742
Drama by Joseph Wood Krutch 744
Records by B. H. Haggin 744

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR 746

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 141 by Jack Barrett 748

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor J. KING GORDON
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

European Editor: J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates
LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS
CAREY MCWILLIAMS REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

AT LEAST THE GUNS ARE SILENT. AT LEAST THE sudden terrible thought that at this moment a son or a brother, a husband or a friend may be dying on a far Pacific island or sinking in a strange sea need no longer be faced. At least on these counts it is a happier New Year than the last or the one before the last or the one before that. But the silence of the guns only makes more audible the sad insistent sound of human suffering that rises from the continents, rings the world, and beats against the walls of that warm, safe, well-provisioned house, the U. S. A. You hear it every time you open the door of the refrigerator to take out the butter or the Grade A milk. You hear it every time you put the extra blanket on your bed or open the window that still has its quota of panes, or, as a matter of course, give a child all it wants to eat when it is hungry. And when you open the morning newspaper and look at the advertisement in which the lovely lady says, "Now you see why I just had to have mink," the sound becomes so loud that you go beserk for a moment and dream of seizing mink coats, piling a ship high with mink coats, and distributing mink coats on the first street corner in Europe. Have a Happy New Year! Perhaps you deserve it. But don't forget the million neediest cases. And before you sally forth in your Christmas finery make sure that you have taken out of your closets and dispatched to the nearest relief station all the warm clothes that you can spare; make sure that you have sent or financed as many food packages as you can afford; and don't fail to send a New Year's card to your Congressman and Senator reminding them that an appropriation for UNRRA is not just another appropriation but a gauge of the ordinary human decency, the gratitude and sympathy, of the luckiest people on earth, who escaped the worst only because other peoples bore its brunt.

*

HERBERT LEHMAN'S 1946 FORECAST OF UNRRA'S requirements outlines a program of relief which, though unparalled in history, barely meets the most elemental of human needs and alleviates only the most intolerable of human suffering. Take this paragraph from the Director General's report on Byelorussia and the Ukraine: "The enemy took virtually all the agricultural machinery away; the livestock herds were terribly depleted. All movable stocks of food and even of seeds were removed. Millions were left homeless. City after city was totally destroyed, and countless cities and villages were heavily damaged. More than 25,000,000 are without shelter save such as they can get in caves and dugouts and ruined dwellings. Whatever assistance UNRRA will be able to provide to these brave people will be infinitesimal in proportion to the need." And so the story goes for Italy—"the utter destitution of Italy is well known and does not require recounting here"—for Austria, Finland, Korea, Formosa, China, where new programs are being set up, and for Albania, Czechoslovakia, Greece, Poland, and Yugoslavia where relief programs are well established. Reinforcing Mr. Lehman's estimates is the careful survey just completed by the National Planning Association. This survey stressed the fact that UNRRA did not reach many of the countries, either Allied or enemy, which had suffered severely during the war. It recommended that the United States make a gift of one billion dollars in food and feed over and above the UNRRA appropriations "to keep the peoples of the liberated countries of Western Europe, the United Kingdom, and the ex-enemy countries from hunger or starvation this winter." If we could forget for the moment the practices of power, the sharp bargains of the market-place, the mechanical safeguards of national integrity, we would see that a billion dollars in food was a slight enough gesture in the direction of a world community and the peace that must ultimately be based thereon.

*

MACKENZIE KING OF CANADA IS THE FIRST HEAD of a great or middle power to urge the necessity of some form of world government as a means of guaranteeing security in an atomic era. It is patently absurd, said Mr. King in a speech to the Canadian Parliament, to suggest that the problems created by the bomb have a mechanistic solution. Atomic energy cannot be controlled "as if it were a new and dangerous drug." A solution must be sought in the realm of world politics and in the terrible light of the implications of the uses to which atomic energy may be put. What is clearly called for is some surrender of national sovereignty. "With a limited surrender of national sovereignty, there must be instituted some form of world government restricted, at least at the outset, to matters pertaining to the prevention of war and the maintenance of international security. . . . The United Nations Organization is not a sufficient answer to the problems of peace and security which the world is now seeking. It is the first step, and an all-important step. . . . It is not, however, the only, much less the final, step. . . ." Prime Minister King's words are all the more impressive because of his reputation as a cautious statesman with deep political wisdom and sensitive ear for the currents of popular opinion in his own country and throughout the world.

*

THE NOMINATION OF ELEANOR ROOSEVELT AS one of our representatives in the UNO General Assembly will be widely approved in this country and throughout the world. It is good to have the name "Roosevelt" associated with this new effort to lay the foundations of peace. Apart from this consideration, Mrs. Roosevelt has earned by her own efforts the right to be a spokesman for the country. To millions of Americans she is a friend who can be relied upon to voice their deepest aspirations for a better world; to millions in other lands she is a symbol of the most generous aspects of our nation. Mrs. Roosevelt is the one independent member of the American delegation; the others were necessarily chosen ex officio. Secretary of State Byrnes has, quite properly, been asked to attend the inaugural session of the Assembly, and Edward R. Stettinius had already been appointed as American representative on the Security Council. Senators Connally and Vandenburg take their places as the ranking Democratic and Republican members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. There will be more criticism of the alternates named by the President. The choice of Representatives Bloom and Eaton of the House Foreign Affairs Committee can be justified both by their positions and by their record on international questions. But we regret the inclusion of John Foster Dulles, who because of his reputation as an "expert" on foreign affairs may be able to exercise a disproportionate and pernicious influence on his fellow-delegates. The last two alternates, former Postmaster General Frank Walker and former Senator John G. Townsend, are apparently being included a a reward for political services. We are glad to note that their selection was sharply challenged by Senator Fulbright of Arkansas, who pointed out that even though they may be fine upstanding citizens they have no particular qualifications for representing the United States on so important a mission.

*

HOPES ARE HIGH IN CHINA AS GENERAL Marshall begins the complicated and difficult task of carrying out President Truman's admirable directive. The Kuomintang and the Communists are reported to be vying with each other in concessions designed to impress our new ambassador. At Chungking the Communist delegation to the forthcoming Political Consultative Council has gone so far as to propose an immediate truce in China's undeclared civil war. The presence in Moscow of one of the State Department's leading China experts has encouraged the idea that a Soviet-American understanding on China may result from the Big Three conference. Although the effect of our repudiation of the Hurley policy is evident in these developments, it would be wise to avoid extreme optimism. The record of previous Kuomintang-Communist conferences makes it evident that both factions will seek to drive hard bargains. The Kuomintang will be reluctant to yield any power to the Communist or democratic groups, and the Communists will not surrender their military autonomy unless wide democratic reforms are assured. The real test of American policy will come if negotiations bog down. How then will President Truman's directive be carried out? The State Department's action authorizing General Wedemeyer to assist in moving additional Kuomintang troops to Manchuria and North China suggests that intervention in behalf of the Kuomintang is still a possibility. The temptation to try to settle the issues by force will remain strong as long as our marines stay in China.

*

A PREMATURE JAPANESE ELECTION WOULD UNDO many of the favorable results of our occupation policy. While Germany—defeated months earlier—is restricted to local elections, Japan is on the verge of national elections which will have a marked influence on the character and extent of its reform. Although Japanese political life, which is discussed elsewhere in this issue by Andrew Roth, has shown encouraging vigor, more time is needed to give forward-looking elements an opportunity to educate and organize the newly unshackled and greatly enlarged electorate. Reactionary politicians who have monopolized public life for two decades, retain the advantages of strong political machines and considerable finances. On the other hand, democratic and leftist groups have barely begun to reach the people. Furthermore, the elections would show a greater swing from the past if they were held after, rather than before, a series of dramatic, well-publicized trials of Japan's war criminals.

* * *

AMERICAN PRESTIGE ALL OVER THE COLONIAL world has been raised by the State Department's demand for negotiations between the Dutch and Indonesian leaders "in harmony with the principles and ideals" of the UNO charter. The statement was a diplomatic but unmistakable slap at Britain's anti-nationalist activities, for it also distinguished sharply between the repressive functions which the British have arrogated to themselves and the legitimate activities indorsed by the Allies—disarming and removing Japanese troops, rescuing Allied prisoners and refugees, and so on. Added support was given the statement when the Export-Import Bank held up a Dutch request for a $100,000,000 credit for the reconstruction of the East Indies. This new attitude represents a defeat for the ultra-conservative policies of Assistant Secretary of State Dunn, and a victory for the liberal director of the Office of Far Eastern Affairs, John Carter Vincent. Progressive and experienced men in Vincent's division had previously made several proposals for an enlightened policy in Southeast Asia, but because the colonies are governed by European states—although geographically in the Far East—these proposals went to the Office of European Affairs. There they were promptly killed at the "French desk," the "Dutch desk," or the "British desk" by officials in tune with Mr. Dunn's desire to strengthen the Western European countries as a counter to Russia. It is certainly significant that it was John Carter Vincent and not his superior, Mr. Dunn, who accompanied Secretary of State Byrnes to Moscow.

* * *

ITALY'S NEW PREMIER, ALCIDE DE GASPERI, IS doing his best to look as if he were following in the footsteps of his predecessor, Ferruccio Parri. His first statement of policy, calling for revision of the armistice and an improved interim status for Italy, echoes the demands of the previous regime. The six parties of the Committee of National Liberation are represented in the new government, and all but three of the ministers held posts in the Parri Cabinet. But political tension has not abated, and Parri himself, one of the most promising leaders to emerge from the resistance movement, remains outside the Cabinet. Meanwhile, Italian liberals are alarmed by the growing popularity of the newly formed L'Uomo Qualunque (Everyman's Front). In the present atmosphere of misery and despair L'Uomo Qualunque gives the superficial impression of an exciting intellectual adventure, aggressive, witty, and ultra-modern. But it evokes uncomfortable memories of the Marinetti vogue that preceded the rise of Mussolini or of the Spanish literary movement of the late twenties that led to the creation of the Falange. Although its founders disclaim any relationship with fascism, the new "front" is imbued with the same spirit of political nihilism that has animated fascist parties everywhere. Of more immediate gravity is Parri's revelation that the Allies have refused the government's request for police arms, perhaps because the police are controlled by the Minister of the Interior, who happens to be a Socialist. As a result the only armed force in the country on election day, April 30, will be the army, which retains its reactionary leadership and swears allegiance to the House of Savoy. Despite the denials of Mr. Bevin, Anglo-American policy in Italy is still largely geared to the preservation of the monarchy.

* * *

THE PRESIDENT'S PLAN TO ADMIT TO THE United States displaced persons up to quota limits is humane and necessary. Even though it offers relatively small-scale relief and cannot really get under way until spring, it will enable thousands of suffering Europeans to face the winter with better heart. And it may well provide a wedge to pry open other national gateways which war and prejudice have closed. We hope the plan will not be seized upon as an argument against the admission of European Jews to Palestine. Logically it should have the contrary effect, for as long as this country maintains war-time barriers against immigration, we are in a weak position to demand relaxation of restrictions elsewhere. It would be easy to criticize the President's proposal as timid and niggardly. He could have urged that quotas unused during the war years be added to those now available. Instead, he made a point of the fact that this was not being suggested; admissions, he said, would be held strictly within the current quotas. He also emphasized that welfare organizations or relatives would be held responsible for the costs of transporting refugees and for any subsequent expenditures; in short, this act of mercy would not cost the taxpayer a penny. But if these precautions seem to damage the generous spirit of the document, they none the less conceal the wisdom of the serpent. For by holding his plan within the limits of the existing law, the President can carry it into effect through an executive order, avoiding a showdown with a Congress badly infected with anti-alien virus. At the same time his careful explanations and his assurance that "this directive will not deprive a single American soldier . . . of a berth on a vessel homeward bound . . ." should largely disarm public criticism. We are glad he included in his order provisions for accepting as residents the men and women in the relocation camp at Oswego. This news will be the best Christmas present they have had in many years.

* * *

THE STORY OF JOHN AMERY, WHO WAS HANGED as a traitor in London last week serves as a reminder of the appeal of fascism to the social misfit as well as to the plain thug. In the striking portrait drawn by Rebecca West in the New Yorker of December 15, we see him as one of the boys who never reach maturity, who remain infantile exhibitionists throughout adult life. Son of a highly respected conservative political leader, Amery grew up with what is called "every advantage." At fifteen he was already showing a mixture of mental precocity and moral irresponsibility by dabbling in company promotion and selling "blue-sky" to innocent investors. At twenty-four the effort to cut a dash as a financial genius, coupled with a penchant for expensive living on credit, landed him in the bankruptcy court. Equally irresponsible management of shiny, fast automobiles—adolescent symbols of power—led to seventy-four convictions for motoring offenses. He left England for his country's good, a failure with a persecution complex, and characteristically settled in Spain, Franco's Spain. After the fall of France he moved to Paris to enjoy the companionship of the fascists Doriot and Déat. Another step and he was broadcasting for Goebbels and seeking to subvert British internees to serve in an anti-Bolshevik Free Corps. So he achieved a mission and a sense of importance. He had found in the amoral Nazi world freedom from frustration and fulfilment of his fantasies. The real world caught up with him again when he was captured by Italian partisans at the end of the war. He probably died feeling a martyr, and no doubt he will be numbered among the "saints and heroes" of the British fascist movement. In death as in life, neurotics of his type are all too easily exploited by megalomaniacs like Hitler and his numerous would be successors.

Truman and Labor

MR. TRUMAN'S statement last week that earnings are always relevant to a trade dispute was a welcome declaration for Walter Reuther but hardly a gift. For Reuther had already won his fight after battling against unparalleled opposition ever since V-J Day. The logic of his arguments and the support they had gained ruled out any other decision. The effect of the President's intervention, therefore, was merely to end an argument, at least before government tribunals, which General Motors and the rest of American industry were prepared to carry on for months without end.

Mr. Truman asserted, first, that "since wages are paid out of earnings, the question of earnings is relevant" to a wage dispute; second, that a fact-finding panel investigating such a dispute must therefore take into account earnings, or ability to pay; third, that in order to perform this task effectively it must have the right to examine a company's books. Any other conclusion would have been ridiculous, General Motors' vehement protestations notwithstanding. For to argue that a fact-finding board could pass on the reasonableness of a wage claim without considering profits was comparable to saying that the skipper of a lifeboat could prescribe the optimum ration of drinking water without taking account of the amount in his casks and the probable duration of the voyage. As Reuther has put it, "You can't talk about wages in an economic vacuum."

The fact that the White House ruling was a statement of the obvious does not detract from its importance. The relevancy of company earnings to wages, together with the corollary proposition that wage increases must not be rendered meaningless by concurrent and co-equal price increases, has been and still is the big issue in labor relations. That the dispute between General Motors and the Union of Automobile Workers goes far beyond the question of what wages are paid by an individual company is about the only point on which union and management agree. Thus the fact-finding panel headed by Lloyd Garrison had no option but to allow this larger issue to be debated on the first day of hearings.

The argument proved most revealing. Reuther admitted that he was fighting for an economic theory of adequate national purchasing power, for a precedent in making wage decisions on the basis of "the arithmetic of the future." On the other side of the table, as counsel for General Motors, was Walter Gordon Merritt, who almost forty years ago in the Danbury Hatters' case won the spurs he has since been gouging into the flanks of labor. He complimented Reuther on his frankness and was equally frank himself in insisting that he was fighting against a "revolutionary approach" in wage negotiations. Almost naively he pointed out that "this is not the normal collective-bargaining situation," and he protested that the union has raised a barrier to settlement by its "obsessions." C. E. Wilson, president of General Motors, facing Reuther for the first time in the four months' negotiations, pressed the same point when he said pathetically, "If you could pull this thing down to your union, Walter, and to our company, I could help in a settlement; but I can't handle it on this big issue." He was simply saying, of course, that the decision rested with big industry as a whole, which is fighting the Reuther heresy with a united front.

Clear proof of this fact was provided by the behavior of the oil-industry representatives when they faced the same question before another government fact-finding board earlier in the week. They met after one company, Sinclair, had already reached an agreement on wages with the C. I. O. oil workers' union and thereby set the pace for the rest. Knowing they were going to settle out of court—as they are now doing—the oil companies had no longer an economic interest in the fact-finding proceedings. But their hearings were on a Monday, while the General Motors panel was not due to convene until the following Thursday. Someone felt it necessary, therefore, for the oil boys to stall, to keep a foot in the door lest an unfavorable precedent on the scope of fact-finding be created before the other team took over the field. Then, when the General Motors hearings began, the oil companies told their panel that its services could be dispensed with and went home to work out settlements on the Sinclair formula.

With its plea for a blindfold decision by the fact-finders blocked by the President's declaration, General Motors is left with three choices. It can settle with the union directly, it can open its books and attempt to prove inability to pay, or it can defy the President by standing pat. The great press barrage that has opened against the thesis that profits, prices, and wages are inseparably intertwined suggests an attempt to prepare public opinion for the third course.

Typical of this outburst of propaganda is an article in the New York Times of December 23 which reports that business men view Mr. Truman's ruling as a "threat to capitalism." If wage rates in any industry, it is argued, are to be determined by the profit-making capacity of the most prosperous companies, then smaller and less efficient concerns will be bankrupted. We wonder whether those who employ this argument are prepared publicly to follow it to its logical conclusion—that wage levels should be established on the basis of what the least efficient unit in any industry can pay.

It is true, of course, that the U. A. W.'s settlement with General Motors will set the pace in negotiations with other employers in the industry, but it is not true that the union has made demands calculated to absorb all of that corporation's earnings and therefore, by implication, to leave less profitable companies with a loss. The union's case is that General Motors can raise wages by 30 per cent, maintain present prices, and still enjoy bumper profits. It is waiting to be shown wherein its arithmetic is wrong.

By his common-sense definition of "essential facts" in a labor dispute Mr. Truman has given important backing to the union demand for information. We have no doubt that his declaration represented a sincere belief, but it also clearly represented a political gesture. The President, in fact, appears to have realized that his request to Congress for fact-finding and cooling-off legislation has disturbed labor without bringing him any compensatory support on the right. Someone, perhaps, has been asking him, "Who do you think is going to vote for your party in 1946? And for you in 1948?" We may therefore view his wages-profits formula, his statement last week on the Fair Employment Practices Commission, and his strong veto of the appropriation bill to which Congress had attached a rider abolishing the United States Employment Service as efforts to reenlist the liberal support he has been rapidly losing.

We should be surprised, however, if the C. I. O. hastened back to the band-wagon on the strength of these moves alone. Certainly it is happy that the President has backed its arguments, and it will no doubt cooperate with any additional fact-finding boards which the Administration sets up. But it is hardly likely to revise its opinion of the proposed labor legislation. The C. I. O. has found that its partial break with Truman, designed to force him to perform instead of coasting along on nice words and New Deal memories, is getting results. It is therefore likely to operate on the theory that a cool response to the President's wooing will serve to test the ardor of the suit and, perhaps, to increase the size of the dowry.

Old Game: New Rules

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

WE AMERICANS have an incurable propensity for putting other people in our shoes rather than vice versa. It expresses itself in an enthusiastic insistence that elections be held in Bulgaria and China just the way they are supposed to be held in America; and in an impatient brush-off if a Bulgarian or a Chinese points inquiringly at certain practices in this country—in Jersey City, for example. For obviously Jersey City is our business; whereas Sofia is our business too. Perfectly simple, once you understand the premises.

Azerbaijan offers a good recent instance of this propensity. The State Department and most editorial writers seem to regard the upper lefthand corner of Iran as if it were the upper righthand corner of the United States—as if the State of Maine had suddenly declared its autonomy and threatened a union with New Brunswick. The idea of Downeasters acting that way is preposterous, and the same with the Azerbaijanis or whatever they call themselves.

Few of us, it seems, have taken the trouble to look at one of those ethnological maps printed in different colors to show the different peoples that live along that troubled border; and fewer have stopped to ask whether there may not be a genuine impulse among the Iranian Azerbaijanis to draw closer to their brothers in the Soviet Republic of Azerbaijan; whether the Armenians in that province may not have a similar urge toward the Armenians in Russia and Turkey; and whether the Kurds, those passionate nationalists without a nation, are not perhaps eager for any old change, on the theory that it is bound to be for the better. Few look at the map or ask any questions. We know a plot when we smell one. We send a note of protest, and then march off to Moscow to fix things up.

We don't even look at the history books. We forget the long struggle between Britain and Russia—a struggle that has nothing on earth to do with communism or freedom or self-determination, but everything with oil and warm-water harbors and the road to India. An old struggle and never an idealistic one. John Galsworthy devoted some lines of rather formal passion to it many years ago in a poem called "Persia—Moritura" addressed to his own country.

> Home of the free! Protector of the weak!
> Shall We and this Great Gray Ally make sand
> Of all a nation's budding green, and wreak
> Our winter will on that unhappy land?
> Is all our steel of soul dissolved and flown?
> Have fumes of fear incased our heart of flame?
> Are we with panic so deep-rotted down
> In self, that we can feel no longer shame
> To league, and steal a nation's hope of youth?
> Oh! Sirs! Is our Star merely cynical?
> Is God reduced? That we must darken truth,
> And break our honor with this creeping fall?
>
> Is Freedom but a word—a flaring boast,
> Is Self-Concern horizon's utter sum?
> If so—today let England die, and ghost
> Through all her godless history to come! . . .

There is more, but those lines are enough to remind us that the game of power politics in the Middle East whose intricacies are so well set forth by Mr. Morrell in this issue, did not begin with Messrs. Churchill and Stalin. From Napoleon on down, British and Russian interests have plotted for advantage in Persia, competing for the control of purchasable Shahs, playing the game of court favorites and political cliques; Iran has never been a country where the people's voice was noticed or often raised. Now the rules of the old game have been shoved aside by Soviet diplomacy, in Iran as throughout the Near and Middle East, and it is inevitable that Britain, and America too, should be annoyed. For Russia is using popular discontent as well as ruling-class cupidity. In the British-controlled part of Iran, by far the larger part, nothing at all has been done to oust the old functionaries who served Hitler before they were bought by Britain; the people are as miserable as before, the politicians as corrupt and reactionary. Russia has encouraged the variously named left party, in and out of its sector, and has offered the people hope of reforms and a decent life. The discontent, the nationalist emotions were not made in Moscow. They were made in Iran by greedy rulers and greedy economic imperialists. Moscow needs only to use what it finds.

It is safe to be cynical. Russia wants both oil and ports. Russia will use any means it finds effective to get them. Russia wants to be sure of a friendly government in this next-door country. But one of the complexities so often overlooked is the interweaving in Soviet diplomacy of tough self-interest and honest support of reforms that mean more to a people robbed of the primitive decencies of life than even the best American-style election. Russia, as a Socialist state, can afford to arouse the people against both their rulers and their rulers' rulers.

We Americans are romantic egotists: carriers of a democracy created in our own image; of a diplomacy built for the protection of powerful private interests; of a dream fantastically compounded of mass-produced mechanisms and delusions of superiority. Secretary Byrnes, a guest in Moscow, at his first press conference refused to receive any except Anglo-American correspondents. No Czechs, no Yugoslavs, no Chinese, no French, no Poles. Why? Perhaps they didn't speak American, and Mr. Byrnes preferred not to be bothered with all those outlandish languages. Perhaps—but let's not try to think up reasons. There could be no acceptable reason for a gesture so offensive, so uncivil, so lacking in diplomatic perception. Last Sunday the New York Times printed one of those solemn articles on the "enigma of the Russian mind." One trouble with Russia's top leaders, it says, is that they don't get around; not one of them has traveled extensively abroad or knows the Western world well. Naturally they are awkward at international conferences. Of course it is different with us. Mr. Truman was a captain in the field artillery in France in World War I, and Mr. Byrnes—well, Mr. Byrnes went to Yalta last winter with President Roosevelt. The Russians are noted for their courtesy to guests. Undoubtedly they will wait until Mr. Byrnes has left before they print an article on the enigma of the American mind.

Middle Eastern Tories

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, December 20

I HAD the good fortune in Cairo to obtain a copy of a confidential study of British policy in the Middle East. The document in my possession is a collection of three papers "by a study group of the Cairo group of Chatham House." Chatham House, at 10 St. James's Square, London, is the headquarters of the Royal Institute of International Affairs. The institute is the equivalent, in a sense, of our American Foreign Policy Association, but is far more authoritative. Its personnel and pay roll during the war interlocked closely with the Foreign Office, the Colonial Office, and the Ministry of Economic Warfare. The Royal Institute reflects the informed, conservative, imperial point of view, and it speaks for the experienced and thoughtful elements among the permanent bureaucracy of the Foreign and Colonial offices. The Cairo group of Chatham House, which prepared this study, includes many of Britain's leading colonial and diplomatic officials in the Middle East, and I am told that the head of the Cairo group is or was Sir Walter Smart, the veteran Oriental counselor of the British embassy in Egypt.

The study made by the Cairo group is called "The Interests of the Commonwealth in the Middle East," the commonwealth, in this case, being a euphemism for the empire. It is dated February of last year, and the typescript bears the name of the institute as publisher. The American members of the Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry on Palestine could do worse than obtain copies of this document for their own use. Its 25,000 words provide a comprehensive bird's-eye view of the Middle East and the best available candid exposition of what the men in actual charge of Britain's relations there are thinking. What these men—diplomats, intelligence officers, soldiers, experts, and colonial officials—are thinking does not necessarily determine what the new Labor government will do, but one can hardly deny the immense influence they have on top-level decisions and hesitations in London. Nor does it take more than a glance around the world, from Greece to Java, to see that the Labor government is maintaining a continuity in foreign, imperial, and colonial policy which these permanent officials must find very gratifying. The Cairo study, to my mind, reveals the real undercurrents of British policy in the Middle East far better than the elaborate balancings of Mr. Bevin's statement on Palestine or the appalling incomprehension and vulgarity with which he admonished the survivors of Belsen not to try to get to the head of the queue.

The Middle East is described, quite correctly, in this Chatham House study as "a social and economic slum" in which "the greater part of the cultivable land is owned by large landowners." "Almost everywhere" in this area "the peasants are heavily in debt to moneylenders." The only country districts "with a free, enlightened, and comparatively prosperous peasantry are to be found in Lebanon and among the Jewish settlements in Palestine." Everywhere else "the peasants are still ignorant, diseased, and unchanging." I would say, from my own observations, that this is unfair to many of the Arab villages in Palestine; perhaps complete fairness would have involved an unwelcome admission of the benefits Jewish immigration has brought to the Arab. Britain's long-standing interests in this ancient slum are described as having "always been largely negative"—which may help to explain why it remains a slum. Britain's major concern was seeing that the Middle East did not fall into hands "strong enough to employ its strategic advantages as a means of crippling Britain's world position." This major concern was long served quite simply by "a policy of supporting the weak Ottoman Empire, of 'bolstering up the Turk.' " The "negative interest" dictated the keeping of a weak, corrupt, and inefficient power in charge of the slum. British imperialists did not then and do not now want to see a Middle East strong and progressive enough to stand on its own feet athwart the route to India.

The Chatham House document is strongly anti-Zionist. In discussing Britain's experience in the Middle East during the war, it glosses over the treachery and difficulty encountered in Iraq, Egypt, and elsewhere and says not one word about the great contribution made to the British war effort by Palestinian Jewish soldiers, the skilled Jewish workers of the naval base at Haifa, and the Jewish underground in Vichy Syria and Axis Europe. Britain's obligations to the Jews under the mandate are slurred over, and the White Paper is put forward as the only possible compromise for the Arab-Jewish political controversy in Palestine. "The White Paper," the study says ingenuously, "demands sacrifices from both sides: the Arabs must recognize the position of the half-million Jews already in the country; the Jews must be satisfied with what they have and look elsewhere for a solution of the problem of European Jewry." No compromise solution along bi-national or similar lines is envisaged in this report; it would have British official opinion believe that the choice is between complete stoppage of Jewish immigration and the establishment of a Jewish state. The Chatham House Middle Eastern experts seem to share Bevin's hope that the Jewish problem can somehow be solved in Central and Eastern Europe without opening the doors of Palestine. "There seems good reason to believe," the study says optimistically, "that the consequences of a restoration of reasonable conditions in other parts of the world would be a substantial re-immigration of Jews from Palestine." One can just see the Polish Jews streaming back.

The Chatham House report is anti-Zionist but hardly pro-Arab, except on the one narrow issue of a Jewish homeland. Characteristically, the report indicates a wistful belief that if the White Paper is carried out and Jewish immigration and Jewish land purchases in Palestine are shut off, the Arabs there would be willing to accept "a postponement or at least a very gradual fulfilment" of the White Paper's further promise of a self-governing independent state in Palestine. The Cairo experts of Chatham House are full of pious observations on the failure of the French to comport themselves in Syria and the Lebanon in accordance with the Atlantic Charter. They are pro-Arab as against the French and pro-Arab as against the Jews, but they are decidedly pro-empire and anti-Arab as against Arab aspirations in British-controlled areas. The experts envisage the building of an Arab bloc at the expense of the French and the Jews but hardly at the expense of British interests. They favor Arab unity, but under British control. They say that Britain "must be in a position to make unfettered military use of the Arab countries during a war, and to deny such use to her enemies or those who might become her enemies." They say that Britain must have the right "to use the harbors and aerodromes of the Arab countries" and to control the main lines of communication across them, including the oil pipe-lines. "Neither her military nor her economic position can be assured," the Cairo experts say, "unless the Arab countries, or at least those of them in which her main interests lie, are subject to stable governments which are either themselves under British control or are friendly and willing to conform their policy to hers in matters of concern." Few Arab nationalists would regard that as a "pro-Arab" position.

The Chatham House experts do not contend that Britain "should, even if she could, try to make the Arab world as much her exclusive concern as, for example, India." They say that neither the Arabs nor the other great powers would permit that. Furthermore, "it would be too great a strain on British resources." They propose a system of bases in the Arab countries under a kind of international trusteeship. "This does not mean," the experts hasten to add, "that the actual occupation should be carried out by a group of powers; such mixed enterprises are not likely to be successful. What it means is that Great Britain should act as trustee on behalf, for example, of a Middle Eastern Commission, which itself would be responsible to the all-embracing international authority." Thus international authority would be used to ease that strain on British resources. The new United Nations Organization would come in handy in another way. The new Arab states in this scheme would be guaranteed "equality" rather than "independence." "If all nations give up something of their sovereignty to an international authority," the Cairo experts explain, "the Arabs will no longer claim that their sovereignty should be unrestricted." Thus imperialism would take on the trappings of internationalism.

In this grandiose plan for British control of the Middle East the Jews and the French also have a place—as burnt offerings to Arab nationalism. The Chatham House experts say the policy they have outlined "would probably be indorsed by most reputable British officials [are there any other kind?] in the Middle East." It would also "be accepted by the wiser and more intelligent of the Arab leaders." Unfortunately, "there are other leaders, and with them a large proportion of the rank and file, who have been so embittered by British policy in the last twenty-five years that they are no longer willing to cooperate with Great Britain." Britain must help the moderates to gain ascendancy, but this can only be done if "certain immediate issues are settled satisfactorily." And what are these? "The two most vital, obviously, are those of Palestine and of Syria and Lebanon." The Palestine solution, as we have already seen, is to stop Jewish immigration and land purchase. In Syria and Lebanon it is to persuade the French not to "insist on being given a position similar to that of Great Britain in Iraq." This is as frank as it is funny. Elsewhere in this study we are told that the Anglo-Egyptian and Anglo-Iraqian treaty relationship "is now the official model for British dealings with the Arabs," and similar treaties are proposed with the other Arab states. What makes the Cairo experts think British restrictions on Arab independence would be any less palatable than French? Is the anti-British feeling in Egypt any weaker than the anti-French feeling in Syria?

Politically, this program makes no sense. One does not need many days in Egypt to discover that the Anglo-Egyptian treaty relationship is hardly a fit model for British relations with the Arab states. The Arabs want some kind of federation and they want independence. A new "Ottoman Empire" with the effendis, pashas, kinglets, and sheiks as the tools of the British will not satisfy them. The "moderates" on whom the Cairo experts rely are not genuine moderates. They are political potentates and landowners who are more fearful of popular unrest in their own countries than of the British. They want to see British supervision continued, to protect them and their privileges against popular demand for reform and change. They share British imperial phobias about the Soviet Union, and they are considerably less progressive even than the right wing of the British Colonial Office. Men of Sir Walter Smart's type are well aware of the social conflicts brewing in the Middle East, and see the need for some measure of reform. But reform is reform at the expense of the big landowner. "If we begin to press the effendis for reform," one British official said, "they'll ask, 'What's the difference, then, between you and the Bolsheviks?' " You cannot make an alliance with the most reactionary elements of the Arab world and expect social reform—or stability.

Britain has no right to rule the Arab world. But it does have a legitimate interest in communications and oil. That interest will best be preserved by an international solution of the Palestine problem. A growing Jewish community there will continue to dissolve feudal Arab relationships, to raise living standards, and to make reform inevitable. If Arab fears are stilled by insistence on a bi-national Palestine instead of a Jewish state, if Arab aspirations are satisfied by the inclusion of a bi-national Palestine in an Arab federation, if Arab and Jew are helped by a United Nations program for land, water, and power development in the Middle East, the "slum" can be reclaimed, the old sore point of world politics healed, the Jews given a home, the Arabs given a break. This way, and not in disingenuous power politics, nineteenth-century style, lie peace and stability for the Middle East.

Trouble Ahead for Veterans

BY CHARLES G. BOLTE

(Chairman of the American Veterans' Committee and author of "The New Veteran")

A FEW WEEKS ago I found myself, in company with some five hundred other citizens, being hauled by the Long Island Railway at an unwontedly early hour to Mitchel Field, where the army air forces held an all-day conference on the reintegration of the veteran with the community. The air forces put on a wonderful show, as they always do: much brass, majors distributing programs, excellent food (one meal in the enlisted men's mess to let us civilians taste "G. I. food served in the G. I. fashion," as the program had it), a Lowell Thomas broadcast direct from one of the forum halls, a protracted refreshment period between the afternoon and evening sessions so that all the guests might revive their flagging spirits. But not the spirits, nor the message from President Truman, nor the four-star generals reading their carefully written scripts, nor the evident good-will and earnestness and high purpose of all concerned could conceal the fact that the conference should have been held two years ago.

It would have been a pretty good conference even one year ago. In December, 1945, with the armed forces half demobilized and slated to be almost entirely demobilized in another six months, it was not very useful. It advanced many excellent suggestions too late for them to be put into effect in most communities. And despite its good intentions, it did not put into the hands of those who listened—social workers, business and labor leaders, representatives of community groups, veterans' organizations, and the like—the specific tools for the job that needs to be done in the home towns. This is a serious matter, for present national arrangements for dealing with "the human side of demobilization" are so inadequate that the home towns have got to do the job. The responsibility of the communities is even larger than workers in this field had originally expected, as was pointed out at the conference by General Omar Bradley, chief of the Veterans' Administration:

> Washington alone can no more reestablish the veteran than Washington alone could win the war. While we can assist with benefits and offer guidance, it is the community that must do the grass-roots work.
>
> For it is in the community, in his daily association with his neighbors, that the veteran rubs shoulders with so many of the troublesome problems Washington cannot hope to solve. . . . The job is too big for the government or any federal agency. It's too big for any single organization within the framework of the community. It will be solved only when we pool the efforts of the federal government, the states, and the resources of all localities.

It is perhaps an index of how badly off we are that the statement of such an obvious truth can be the keynote of a national conference and can still make news. Moreover, although nearly every speaker talked about coordinating federal, state, and local programs, and about the need for community service centers, none explained how the programs were actually to be coordinated on the various levels, and only one described a service center in operation.

There are not many communities these days which can muster enough imagination, resourcefulness, and good-will to meet the requirements of an effective counseling and referral center for veterans. Several outstanding centers are in operation—New York, Los Angeles, Bridgeport, Flint come readily to mind. Altogether there are about 1,500 centers, in the 23,000 communities in the United States, and they range from very good to very bad. It is apparent that the federal government must fill in, counsel, provide funds, collate pertinent information, suggest procedures, and institute training programs for personnel. At this stage, if the communities have not acted, the government must act.

I say this, believing it to be true; but I cannot think that it will be done. It is not useful to counsel despair, but I think we must anticipate a real breakdown in government services to veterans and, indeed, in the whole rehabilitation picture. General Bradley told me at Mitchel Field that there were 300,000 unopened letters in the mail room of the Veterans' Administration when he left Washington the day before. He added that he was now getting to work on the job that should have been done a year earlier. The VA is short-handed in every category, especially in doctors and in claims adjudicators. Its low scale of pay makes it difficult to recruit personnel. It is so highly centralized that red tape accumulates upon itself in Washington; but office space is almost impossible to find outside, and further time would be consumed in moving. The VA was simply not ready for the end of the war, any more than it was ready for the whole fantastic expansion of its activities which should have been anticipated when 12,000,000 of the nation's young men registered for the draft. Some of the criticism of the VA which led to the replacing of General Hines by General Bradley was pooh-pooed at the time as exaggerated. It is now revealed to have been an understatement.

General Bradley is doing what he can, and is surrounding himself with some able administrators; the medical program of the VA seems slated to improve considerably; more flexibility in the labor market may ease the personnel shortage. But no sudden or radical improvement can be expected.

The other government agency engaged chiefly with veterans' problems is the Retraining and Reemployment Administration, which has had a checkered career since its creation was called for in the Baruch-Hancock report on the human aspects of demobilization nearly two years ago. After a slumbrous period under General Hines the agency began to function vigorously a few months ago when it was put in the care of Major General Graves B. Erskine, a tough and intelligent marine with a combat record in the Pacific, who showed his understanding of life in the twentieth century when he said at the conference that we must realize how our own jobs depended on "the tremendous fact" of jobs for all.

The RRA's particular job is to coordinate the rehabilitation, retraining, and reemployment of war veterans and war workers in the nation, the state, and the local community. One of its responsibilities is the setting up of community service centers. It is a real omnibus agency, with a grandly vaporous directive, an enormous field in which to operate, and apparently a tremendous opportunity for useful work. General Erskine started his job in the fall. He now has the imposing total of fifteen executives to carry out this vast program, practically no money, and as yet no clearly established authority to do the things expected of him.

That is why there were 300,000 unopened letters in the Washington mail room of the Veterans' Administration three weeks ago. That is why many veterans snort contemptuously when they hear glowing descriptions of how their country has prepared to receive them home again.

There is plenty of dynamite in this fast-developing situation. It isn't ready to go off quite yet. But in another six months listen for a succession of explosions, starting in the grass roots, running toward Washington, and getting louder all the time. The loudest explosion may not hit Washington until the fall of '48.

In the Wind

OLD CHINA HANDS, Hurley-era vintage, will be interested in an excerpt from the mimeographed newssheet published aboard a transport carrying occupation troops to Korea last fall. The item says MG officers en route were briefed for their forthcoming job with the statement: "One of the principal missions of military government in Korea will be to form a bulwark against communism." The briefing officer, the paper says, was "quoting from material gained at the recent conference in Tokyo with General Crist."

THERE'S A MAN IN CHICAGO, a miniature collector named Joseph H. Gray, with a fine sense of literary perspective. He is reported to own a twelve-volume set of Edgar Guest's poetry—and each volume is three-quarters of an inch tall.

THE ANCIENT CHINESE had a proverb which was invoked by New Mexico's Senator Hatch in urging strong international cooperation to meet the challenge of the atomic bomb: "What is the use of having a thousand-league horse if you do not have a thousand-league man to ride him?"

WE WERE FLATTERED to discover that Clare Boothe Luce had read into the Congressional Record for November 29 The Nation's recent article on veterans' housing by Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr.; so flattered that we will pretend not to notice that the heading on the entry was "The Luce Bill on Veterans' Housing."

WE'VE BEEN WONDERING about this and are sure you'll be as relieved as we were to have the matter cleared up: a G. I. in the Far East occupation troops reports authoritatively that Thanksgiving, under MacArthur, was celebrated in pre-New Deal style on November 29.

JOURNALISM NOTE: the Virginia Press Association is working on a plan for inviting newspapermen from the various United Nations to take temporary staff positions on Virginia papers as a means toward "more detailed understanding of American everyday life."

GRIM-VISAGED WAR, all unbeknown to us, has been haunting the austere halls of the Macmillan publishing company. A recent ad of theirs broods: "Nobody knows the trouble we've seen. . . . The grim story of paper shortage and manufacturing difficulties . . . keeps us awake nights. . . . We'll simply say this: your bookseller now has copies of 'Forever Amber.' "

FLORIDA'S GOVERNOR CALDWELL, according to an A.P. dispatch, refused to take action against Sheriff Lonnie Davis, of Madison, in connection with a lynching "because stupidity and ineptitude are not grounds for removal."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. We will pay $1 for each item accepted.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

If I Had Been Forrestal

BY THOMAS J. HAMILTON

(Member of the Washington bureau of the New York Times and author of "Appeasement's Child: The Franco Regime in Spain")

Washington, December 20

THE President has spoken at last, and, at least in theory, the greatest debate since the Founding Fathers ratified the Constitution, certainly since the Hopkins-Ickes dispute of 1934-35, is stilled. It was the Commander-in-Chief who spoke, and hereafter mere generals and admirals will hold their tongues. The army and the navy and the army air forces must be united, unified, merged in one Department of National Defense. No more recriminations, no more uncertainties—for the man from Missouri has been shown. And James Forrestal thinks it is time to up anchor and head northward. He and the navy got short shrift from the unification message. Forrestal remained discreetly silent, but Carl Vinson, who as much as any man (except Roosevelt) has ruled the navy these dozen years and more, growled back that it smacked of Germany under the Kaiser or Hitler, that it was military power politics, that unification would "sink the navy." If anybody keeps the navy afloat from now on, it will be Vinson—and I think he will do it.

Nevertheless, there is no question that the navy has lost not merely the opening skirmish but a major battle. For this the blame must rest primarily on Forrestal. Mr. Truman very probably would have backed the army no matter what was said or done by the navy. But the fact remains that the navy's handling of the case was inept. I do not suppose that Forrestal can be blamed for the poor performance of Admiral Nimitz before the Senate Military Affairs Committee; the Admiral cannot pretend to the fine showmanship which comes so naturally to Eisenhower. Still, less than a year ago at Pearl Harbor Nimitz had told the visiting Senators he was for unification, and a lot of people, quite unjustifiably, claimed that the Admiral reversed himself because the navy did not intend to reward unorthodoxy with appointment to the key post of Chief of Naval Operations. General Geiger of the marines tried to make friends and influence Senators by lambasting the army air corps (which has a lot of friends in the country, General, even if it doesn't fly like it says in the marines' flying book). But it was Forrestal himself who made the politically suicidal statement that the debate over unification ought to be carried on before a "higher forum." (His friends insist he meant to say "on a higher plane," but Senators, who are as one on questions of their dignity, don't forget slips of the pen like that.) And all the navy spokesmen kept saying that the navy won the war and that the unification plan would wreck the navy, never taking into account that Senators—and plain citizens—don't care what happens to the navy qua navy but are intensely interested in seeing that we have the most efficient defense possible.

In the last few weeks things had improved somewhat, thanks to the fact that a trio of very intelligent rear admirals—H. B. Miller, the navy's public-relations officer, Arthur Radford, and Forrest Sherman—had taken over the navy's publicity. Many features of the navy's security plan, which was prepared by Forrestal's close friend, Ferdinand Eberstadt, were worthy of study, even though the plan itself was obviously too unwieldy. But the improvement in tactics came too late, and Truman's message was for the plan, the whole plan, and nothing but the plan as perfected by General Marshall.

It would have been very simple for Forrestal to have opened his testimony with a tribute to the work of the army and the army air forces. After all, they did a job. Perhaps naval aviation was the greatest single factor in the Pacific (I think it was), but certainly the achievements of the army and the army air forces in North Africa and Europe were worth mentioning. A tribute to the men in khaki would have made possible an equally deserved and more graceful tribute to the achievements of navy and marines, and army, in the Pacific; would have created the atmosphere for recounting the achievements of the entire United States. We went a long way after Pearl Harbor, and Forrestal would have been justified in saying so. He would have been justified also in asking what was so bad about the system that won the war.

The United States still likes to imagine that fighting machinery comes cheap, and Eisenhower, Marshall, and Somervell were at their most effective when they claimed that unification would save us money. The navy offered no effective rebuttal, although it had ample material. After all, army and navy did get together before the war and standardize vehicles, small arms, and many other pieces of equipment; they did have a joint Munitions Board. These measures were not enough, but they were a start. And in February, 1945, army and navy made a tentative agreement to set up a Director of Matériel, with Joint Matériel Chiefs, who would exert much the same authority over procurement that the Joint Chiefs of Staff did over strategy—it was not the navy but Somervell that revealed this.

As for the Joint Chiefs of Staff, army and navy officers know the increasingly close control they came to exert over tactics as well as strategy in the closing stages of the war. When they sent a task force to bomb Japan they specified not merely the targets but the weight and type and fusing of the bombs used. They also had a lot to say about the training and equipment of the forces sent to the Pacific. If the Chief of Staff of the united armed forces is not to be ubiquitous and omniscient, he will have to depend upon a staff almost exactly like the Joint Chiefs. It is hard to see, in fact, what a unified Department of National Defense can accomplish that would not be accomplished equally well by creating something like the Joint Matériel Chiefs and establishing the Joint Chiefs of Staff on a permanent basis. With unity of command in the operating theaters now accepted practice—though honored more in the breach than the observance in the divided Pacific empires of Nimitz and MacArthur—these changes would give us unity where it counts, in the field and in the war room in Washington, while retaining the benefits of competition and flexibility in the training and deployment of soldiers, sailors, and marines.

Mr. Forrestal and his admirals did emphasize the benefits of competition, but the effect of their testimony was lessened by the fact that they seemed to be thinking first about the navy, second about the United States. None the less, it was fortunate for the United States that the naval and marine-corps aviators concentrated on dive-bombing and close support of troops in the field, while the army air forces went ahead with their high-level bombing. Both, as it turned out, were needed. If there had been a single Chief of Staff he might well have chosen one type of bombing and allowed the other to be neglected. There will be similar decisions to make in the future, and Mr. Forrestal might have pointed out that true economy means giving the United States the best possible chance to survive.

He might also have pointed out that the well-known cumbersomeness of army and navy today would be far greater under a unified command, with a common procurement service, medical corps, and the like. Watching the army machine work in France or the navy machine work at Pearl Harbor, I used to wonder how anything ever was accomplished under the flood of paper. With unification, it would be much worse. It is all very well for Mr. Truman to say that hereafter there must be a single commanding officer, with full responsibility for the defense of his base. At the small auxiliary naval air station where my squadron trained in California there were three commanding officers—one for the air station itself, one for the air group training there, and one for the "Casu" (Carrier Aircraft Service Unit), which took care of the planes and fed the pilots. Space doesn't permit me to go into the reasons for this, but they were good ones. Mr. Forrestal might have used similar illustrations, even though they came from echelons far removed from the Navy Department.

Well, Mr. Truman proposes but Congress disposes; and I don't think the navy need yet put on a mourning tie. Senator Walsh of the Senate Naval Affairs Committee is ready to fight a delaying action after the Senate Military Affairs Committee ratifies the President's message. In the House, unification will have a really tough time, thanks to Vinson. He and Chairman May of the House Military Affairs Committee already have jointly introduced a bill to take the army air forces away from the War Department and establish a Department of Air Forces. This apple of discord will disrupt the unification forces, or else a veteran Georgia Congressman is way off in his calculations. But the row is not doing the navy any good or the country; it is diverting energies that are sadly needed to cope with the problem of the atomic bomb.

Japan's Political Ferment

BY ANDREW ROTH

(Author of "Dilemma in Japan")

JAPAN'S political pot is boiling furiously. Millions of its citizens—from the hungry inhabitants of burnt-out slums to the well-fed and sumptuously housed—are looking forward to the approaching national elections, which will be the broadest and most nearly democratic in its history.

The results of the elections will determine the character and the rate of Japan's reforms. The retiring Diet—chosen in Tojo's heyday, the spring of 1942—has deliberately delayed the execution of reforms ordered by the occupation command. The new Diet is certain to be more cooperative and may possibly speed Japan's democratization by going beyond the goals set for it by General MacArthur.

All groups are eagerly awaiting the results, for this election is part of a striking change in the character of political activity. Before the defeat, power was tightly held by an oligarchy of militarists, economic monopolists, court aristocrats, top bureaucrats, and large landowners. This oligarchy made the decisions; the Diet served as a mere sounding board. But its grip has been loosened by defeat. Its leading members have been labeled war criminals. Occupation directives make it impossible for this small group to monopolize the air waves and press or to terrorize its opponents any longer.

Under the popular pressure that has been unleashed and the prodding of the occupation authorities, political activity is moving from the secret council rooms of the few into the open forum. Industrialists and workers, landlords and tenants, men and women—all realize that their future role in their country's affairs is dependent upon their ability to secure representation in the future Diet. From all this new political activity a number of minor parties have arisen, such as the picturesquely named Party of Long-Nosed Goblins (Tenguto), organized by a handful of medieval-minded rightist fanatics; but the great majority of the people are likely to vote for one of the four major national parties—the Progressive (Shimpoto), Liberal (Jiyuto), Socialist (Shakaito), and Communist (Kyosanto) parties.

REGRESSIVE PROGRESSIVES

The Progressive Party—despite its name—is composed mainly of unrepentent, ultra-conservative professional politicians. Among its adherents are some 300 of the 466 members of the outgoing Diet, virtually all of them former admirers of Tojo who were elected in 1942 with the strong-arm support of the totalitarian Imperial Rule Assistance Association. The party is closely linked to unregenerate imperialists, semi-feudal landlords, freebooting industrialists, and authoritarian bureaucrats.

Under the skilful leadership of Tsuneo Kanamitsu and Yusuke Tsurumi the Progressives have been busy donning the cloak of political respectability. Kanamitsu is a hard-bitten machine politician with twenty-five years in the Diet behind him. He is widely considered the strongest political figure in the outgoing Diet, having been the leader of the Greater Japan Political Association (Dai Nippon Seijikai), the totalitarian "sure-victory "group set up early in 1945. The brilliant and ambitious Tsurumi, once a familiar figure on American lecture platforms, is a renegade democrat, adept at constructing liberal façades to hide the ugliness of reaction. The party has made deliberate effort to exclude the most blatant fascists and keep others in the background. One of its very skilful bits of camouflage has been to secure as parliamentary spokesman the venerable Takao Taito, one of the few Diet members with a consistent anti-militarist record.

Its program is studded with glittering generalities masking its devotion to the status quo. The only specific points unmistakably set forth in its platform are its bitter antagonism toward communism and its "absolute and unqualified defense" of the emperor system. Although the program is silent on the subject, the party revealed its opposition to land reform by resisting in the outgoing Diet the passage of even the Shidehara government's inadequate proposals.

The onus of the past is bound to lose the Progressive Party many votes, despite the fact that most of its candidates have elaborate political machines under their control. The war-criminals list now contains a score of its leaders, including Masataka Ota, chairman of its Political Affairs Committee.

CONSERVATIVE LIBERALS

The Liberal Party is likely to profit by the sagging of the Progressives' political fortunes, and confidently expects to add 100 seats to the 50 it has in the outgoing Diet. Its candidates find little difficulty in obtaining financial support, for it is pre-eminently the party of the giant monopolistic combines and has close connections at court. It stands for "benevolent capitalism," a balanced budget, free trade. Its leaders favor the conversion of the Emperor into a British-style constitutional monarch but insist that he be retained as a bulwark against communism.

Ichiro Hatoyama, an unscrupulous machine politician who has served thirty-one years in the Diet and two terms as Minister of Education, and a self-proclaimed friend of ex-Ambassador Grew, is the organizing brains behind the Liberals. An astute politician, he is making a clever play for the votes of women—who will vote for the first time—by advocating equal educational facilities and the right to hold public office. He attempted but failed to secure as parliamentary spokesman the dean of Japanese democrats—deaf, eighty-eight-year-old Yukio Ozaki.

Three key men in the Shidehara Cabinet have been tagged as Liberal Party stalwarts—the brain truster (Chief Cabinet Secretary), Daizaburo Tsugita; the legislative chief (Director of the Cabinet Bureau of Legislation), Wataru Narahashi; and the Foreign Minister, Shigeru Yoshida. Yoshida is an important possibility for Prime Minister in the event of an impressive Liberal victory. He is a career diplomat, the son-in-law of the famous Viscount Makino—former Lord Keeper of the Privy Seal and principal link between big business and the court, who was a close friend of ex-Ambassador Grew. Yoshida was arrested in June, 1945, for plotting secret peace negotiations through British channels but was released in August and appointed Foreign Minister by Prince Higashi-kuni as one likely to be favorably regarded in British and American circles. Yoshida feels that the constitution, which has strait-jacketed Japanese political life for the past fifty years, requires only "minor adjustments."

MODERATE SOCIALISTS

The Socialist vote is likely to skyrocket as a result of popular dissatisfaction. Although the party commands only 15 seats in the retiring Diet it may capture as many as 100 in the new, partly because of the reputation of its leaders. Dr. Toyohiko Kagawa, generally rated the greatest living Oriental exponent of Christianity, was once a militant, left-wing Socialist but during the war used Christian phrases to cover support of Japanese aggression. After the war he was indorsed by former Premier Higashi-kuni as suitable to lead Japan's "moral regeneration." Kanju Kato, who was twice elected to the Diet by Tokyo workers and twice jailed by the police for anti-war activity, was formerly head of the Proletarian Party (Musanto) and the left-wing trade-union organization (Rodo Kumiai). The former Baroness Shizue Ishimoto (now Mrs. Kanju Kato), well known as a charming and courageous exponent of feminine rights and planned parenthood, was the first woman to announce her candidacy for the Diet and is expected to attract considerable feminine support to the Socialist ticket. The party embraces virtually all labor leaders except the outright Communists and has a considerable following among intellectuals. In early December two Tokyo universities gave it first place in a test poll.

In fact, although its program calls for democratic socialism, its adherents range from near-conservatives to near-Communists. Its chief spokesman, Chozaburo Mitzutani, is a turncoat who so trimmed his sails to the prevailing military-fascist winds that he was able to be elected in 1942 without exciting the opposition of the dominant Tojo forces. On the other hand, Seido Takatsu, who was imprisoned four times and tortured for his opposition to fascism and war, is a member. This wide range of attitudes within the party has caused sharp conflicts over such controversial subjects as the future of the emperor institution. The Christian Socialist Dr. Kagawa has stated that "the Japanese monarchy and democracy are not irreconcilable." The left-wingers feel that Hirohito should bear some of the war guilt and that the future of the system should be decided by a plebiscite. The party is on record as supporting the emperor system as part of the government in the present stage, and Mizutani has hopefully suggested that Hirohito commit suicide "to preserve the monarchy free from war guilt."

LEGAL COMMUNISTS

One of the striking features of the campaign has been the weight of artillery unlimbered against the infant Communist Party. Its National Congress early in December—the first held in nineteen years—was spotlighted by the discovery of an assassination plot against its top leaders by a group of ex-Kamikaze pilots. Although in mid-December the Communist total of paid membership was only some two thousand, conservative orators have been painting a lurid picture of the looming "proletarian dictatorship."

A substantial Japanese Communist movement seems in the offing. Communists are able to operate legally for the first time in their history and can capitalize on the fact that they are the only group which has consistently opposed aggression. The opening of the political prisons freed hundreds of party members, including the leaders Kyuichi Tokuda and Yoshio Shiga. Tokuda, a fifty-one-year-old Okinawa-born lawyer, was one of the secret founders of the Communist Party in 1923 and has spent a third of his life in jail. Shiga, now editor of the reborn party organ Red Flag (Akahata) is a Tokyo Imperial University graduate who edited the magazine Marxism (Markishizumu) before his arrest seventeen years ago. The Japanese people were able to hear these men over the radio for the first time in round-table discussions broadcast by the Allied-controlled official radio.

In 1927 the Communist-sponsored Workers' and Peasants' Party (Rodo Nominto) polled 200,000 votes, and in the early thirties Japan was surpassed only by the Soviet Union and Germany in the volume of Marxist publications. At present the Communists have branches in nearly all of Japan's forty-seven prefectures, and by February they expect to have ten thousand paid members—the number they attained in 1928 when they were illegal but had not been pulverized by mass arrests.

At the recent party congress Tokuda informed the three hundred delegates that without the abolition of the emperor system and the establishment of a democratic republic the people's livelihood could not be stabilized and Japan could not become a trusted member of the family of nations. The delegates cheered the inclusion of the late Prince Konoye and some sixty other oligarchs on the war-criminals list and recommended an additional two thousand names. They disagreed with the contention of the Socialists and the Allied authorities that landlords should be recompensed in the transfer of land to tenant farmers. Although they have come out heavily for a "democratic front" and close cooperation with the Socialists, the offer has been cold-shouldered and the Communists will have to go it alone.

They will probably play an important role in the future, but they seem unlikely to win more than a dozen seats in their first election. More than several weeks of legality are needed to rebuild a political organization and a leadership that has been battered by two decades of dogged persecution and is still harassed by the police. Tokuda is very sick and has a crippled hand as a result of prolonged imprisonment and brutal beatings. Susumu Okano—his real name is Tetsuo Nosaka—the leader of the China-based Japanese People's Emancipation League and the only major figure who has not spent most of the last twenty years in prison, has been out of Japan for over a decade and is still reported in Yenan, the Chinese Communist capital.

These new forces will undoubtedly move the center of political gravity away from the discredited extreme right. The first post-war election will probably show a centrist trend, with the conservative Liberals and moderate Socialists emerging as the two largest parties. But the new government will be confronted with the pressing problems of food shortages, black markets, mass unemployment, runaway inflation, and war guilt. Unless rapid progress is made in their solution, the next election is likely to reveal increased radical strength.

Iranian Checkerboard

BY SIDNEY W. MORRELL

(A war correspondent who spent considerable time in the Near East on special missions for the Allied governments)

WHEN the flag of revolt was raised over northern Iran, it signalized much more than independence for the Azerbaijans, until then one of the world's unconsidered minorities. It was a sign that the power politics of the Big Three, for better or worse, had taken definite shape. Most persons who have been following the course of international relations, whether hopefully or cynically, have realized that in the end Washington, London, and Moscow must develop mutual trust on major issues, including the atomic bomb, or revert to the pattern of checkerboard politics. The Azerbaijan revolt, part and parcel of Big Three maneuvering in the Middle East, proves that the trend is toward power politics. It is appropriate, therefore, that the current conference of foreign ministers, should consider the incident.

The revolt was not a spontaneous affair; the conditions which provoked it were not new. The revolt could, in fact, have taken place at any time since December, 1943, and under almost the same circumstances as today. That fact is fundamental in any consideration of the present crisis.

In 1941 the Red Army moving from the north and the British army moving from the west (Iraq) invaded Iran and took the country into protective custody. The Allies feared at the time that Hitler's plan for world conquest involved a double thrust through Russia and Egypt which would meet in Iran and from there go on to link up with the Japanese in India. Hitler's armies were moving toward the Caucasus in the north and within striking distance of the Nile Delta in the south. The Japanese were making threatening gestures in the direction of India. A large German minority in Iran waited for the Reichswehr to appear at the frontier. Ready to serve it were iron foundries that had been built on credit by the genius of Hjalmar Schacht at sites commercially unprofitable in peace but invaluable to an invading army from the north—one was at Kazvin, north of Teheran; in the barren southern deserts through which lay the road to India were enormous wheat silos, with enough storage space for three times the population of Iran.

Fortunately a premature Nazi-inspired revolt in Iraq, Iran's western neighbor, betrayed the enemy's strategy while there was still time to act. It became clear that an elaborate schedule had been worked out by the Germans. A chain of airfields in Syria had even been placed at their disposal by Vichy France to aid a full-scale paratroop invasion. The revolting Iraqi army occupied Bagdad. A surprise attack on the R. A. F. base at Habbaniyeh near by failed, but the British garrison there was besieged. The German minister to Iraq appeared at Mosul, center of the British oil fields in the north; the oil fields and installations were seized, and Luftwaffe planes brought in Nazi technicians who knew the function of every knob and dial.

Only the British gift for improvisation in an emergency prevented the rebels from gaining complete mastery. Troops were rushed from India to Basra, the Iraq port at the head of the Persian Gulf, and quickly subdued the resistance there, making it possible to fly supplies from the local airfield to the hard-pressed garrison at Habbaniyeh, which had been reduced to lobbing home-made bombs over the side of antiquated observer planes on to the massed ranks of the Iraqi army. The Arab brigade of Major Glubb piled into old trucks and taxicabs and plowed across the desert from Transjordan to relieve the defenders. Suddenly the Germans lost their nerve, and the oil technicians fled from Mosul. Their leaving without destroying the installations can only be explained by the supposition that they expected an imminent breakthrough in southern Russia and then a concerted drive on the heartland of the Middle East.

At this stage Churchill and Stalin decided that the preservation of a neutral Iran between British and Soviet spheres of interest in the Middle East might prove too expensive a luxury. On August 25, 1941, the British and Russian armies marched simultaneously into the country, meeting only spasmodic resistance from the German-trained Iranian army. The Shah, Reza Khan, abdicated in favor of his son. Iran concluded a treaty with the Allies, and by general consent an attempt was made to forget the invasion, which was tactfully referred to on all subsequent occasions as "the unhappy event of Shahrivar" (Shahrivar is the Persian calendar month from August 21 to September 21).

After Pearl Harbor the United States opened a supply route to Russia across Iran and established the Persian Gulf Service Command under Major General Connolly. Connolly's men were almost all technicians, engaged in operating the railroad across Iran and a fleet of Diesel trucks. To the British army was delegated the role of safeguarding the supply line as far as the Russian zone, at which point the Red Army took over.

One would like to think that in this zone where the American, British, and Russian armies first met, there was fraternization among the troops, and on higher levels inter-Allied cooperation which could be used as the foundation for cooperation after the war. Unfortunately, however, there was nothing of the kind. Fraternization between American and British troops was less extensive than in any other war theater I have visited. Fraternization between Red Army troops and either Americans or British was almost non-existent. Among the officers the best that can be said is that an efficient liaison was built up. Meetings were on a purely business basis, except for the occasional official party or reception given as a matter of course by the heads of the three commands.

The Russians, however, did not neglect to foster political and cultural contacts with the Iranians. After the collapse of the Reza Khan dictatorship, which for years had prohibited Iranians from having contact with the British and Russians in the country, several new parties came into being. Among these was the Tudeh, or Workers' Party, which was subsidized and otherwise supported by the Russians. Economic hardship and political unrest provided fertile soil for its growth and the Tudeh, organized in Teheran, spread quickly to the provinces. Critical of both British and American influences in the country, it organized agitation against the economic mission of Dr. A. C. Millspaugh, who was attempting to bring order into the country's finances, disrupted by shortages and rising prices. Dr. Millspaugh was hampered by the fact that the best food-producing areas of the country, the fertile rice and wheat districts round the Caspian, were in the Russian zone, sealed off from the rest of the country. The Tudeh Party ignored this circumstance and attacked the mission as inefficient.

By June, 1944, the party felt sufficiently strong to join forces with certain parliamentary deputies from Azerbaijan. The new group in the Parliament took the name of "Liberty" group, and proceeded to attack what it described as unjust conditions in the north and the oppression of Teheran.

That summer the governor of Azerbaijan, an Iranian appointed by Teheran but functioning by grace of the Russian military authorities in the area, came out with a demand that the northern zone be given autonomy. He was hastily recalled to Teheran and a new governor sent out. The Russians accepted the new official and left the world to guess what was behind the incident.

When the British realized their post-war weakness in the Middle East, they tried to induce the United States to share responsibility in that critical region. Their oil negotiations with Secretary Ickes in the summer of 1944 had this end in view; oil concessions for the United States in the Middle East, they believed, would arouse American economic interest and, eventually, a general awareness in the people. While the Ickes talks were proceeding in London, two American oil experts were negotiating in Teheran with the Iranian government for oil concessions.

As is well known, the oil deal never came off, partly because the large American oil companies opposed what they called the unwarranted interference of government with private enterprise and partly because the Soviet government, on learning of the Teheran oil talks, filed its own application for oil concessions in the country. The Iranian government then found itself in the embarrassing position of being unable to refuse the Russian application without at the same time refusing the American, which it had privately welcomed. When both applications were refused, the Soviet government showed no ill-feeling beyond pressing for a new Russo-Iranian economic agreement. Our entry into the Middle East was postponed until a new approach could be devised.

This new approach is found in the assumption by America of joint responsibility with the British for solving the problem of Jewish immigration into Palestine. It is a more logical approach, for the human issues of Palestine are nearer to the American heart than the oil wells of Iran. Of course, the Palestine question involves not merely the Jews but Moslem communities far beyond the Jordan.

Against this background the Azerbaijan revolt is seen partly as a Russian attempt to counter America's move on the Middle Eastern checkerboard. The more quickly America acts to follow up its entrée, the more completely will Russia throw its weight behind an independent Azerbaijan.

Russia is getting tougher with Turkey. It is hard at work in Syria and Lebanon. Efficient Soviet information bureaus are functioning in both Damascus and Beirut. The Patriarch of the Soviet Republic of Armenia has recently toured the Armenian communities in Syria and Lebanon for the purpose of setting up youth hostels in those two young republics.

As significant as the status of Azerbaijan are the demands of the Armenians in Azerbaijan for union with the Armenians in eastern Turkey, and of the Kurds in Azerbaijan for union with their fellow-Kurds in the Mosul oil fields of northern Iraq. These are minority problems such as the late President Wilson never dreamed of when he formulated the theory of the self-determination of peoples.

C.O.'s: Second-Class Citizens

BY VINCENT HEATH WHITNEY

(On leave from the Department of Economics and Sociology of the University of Maine; formerly adviser to the National Service Board for Religious Objectors)

IN THE Second World War more than 15,000 American men applied for complete exemption from military service on grounds of conscience. Numerically, these men are unimportant beside the several million men in the armed forces. Their significance lies in the precedents which have been created by the way they have been treated in war time by a nation unequivocally committed to an all-out war effort.

From the outset Congress showed a willingness to make some type of provision for non-military alternative service. It was influenced undoubtedly by the example of England and by a desire to avoid the ineffectual brutalities of World War I; the treatment of conscientious objectors at that time has been called "one of the darkest chapters in the story of American liberties."

There is, of course, no general constitutional right to exemption from military duty on grounds of conscience. Such exemptions as exist are legally viewed as Congressional grants of privilege, and obviously Congress has the power to determine the boundaries of such exemptions or, if it sees fit, to grant none at all. It is another matter to recognize that the exercise of such negative power would merely effect the transfer of a difficult and unwanted problem to the military and the prisons.

In the war just ended the army was spared a repetition of its World War I experience, when C. O.'s were dumped wholesale into its arms; and it is to its credit that this time it followed the common-sense policy of transferring C. O.'s whom it had received through classification errors to non-combatant duty with the medical corps. On the other hand, World War II brought increased problems to the federal prison system. Some 5,000 men—roughly ten times the number in World War I—were committed to prison for average terms of three and a half years. A number received second and even third sentences. The principle of double jeopardy was held not to apply to them on the argument that each failure to comply with a provision of the Selective Service Act was a separate offense.

This somber record was chalked up in spite of a law considerably more liberal than that of the last war. Then assignment to non-combatant army service was permitted for "a member of a well-recognized [pacifist] sect." The new law permitted both non-combatant army duty and "work of national importance under civilian direction" for all persons opposed to participation in war because of "religious training and belief." At the same time Congress refused to follow the highly workable English law, which provided exemption from any service whatever for recognized absolutists, and individual paid service in socially useful positions—often their own pre-war jobs—for men opposed to army non-combatant duty.

One of the major defects of our law has been the vagueness of the religious test, which in practice has resulted in individual inequities. In the Kauten and Phillips cases, heard in the United States Circuit Court of Appeals in New York, it was early established that exemption was to be based upon "the existence of a conscientious scruple against war in any form rather than allegiance to a definite religious group or creed." There has been sharp variation, however, in the practices of local draft boards and of the courts. Some have granted exemptions to men who are primarily humanitarian or political objectors. Others have narrowly interpreted the religious requirement and sent such men to the army or, if they refused to go, to prison.

What is more, the lack of separate tribunals to hear C. O. claims has forced this difficult task on to local boards, which have seldom been equipped to determine the sincerity of the men and frequently have lacked a full understanding of the procedures involved in their separate treatment. A few boards, influenced by strong personal opposition to alternate service, apparently resolved to grant no 4-E classifications; others, with no clear idea of how to handle C. O. cases, took no action to call up registrants for a physical examination. Obviously, considerable criticism can be made of a system under which so much depends upon the chance assignment of a man to one local board rather than to another.

In some larger centers boards which realized their own inadequacies followed a uniform policy of classifying all C. O. claimants 1-A and advising them to appeal. This procedure automatically transferred the investigation to the FBI, whose studies of each individual were thorough and careful. At the end of each investigation the FBI presented its evidence to a specially appointed hearing officer. The appealer, however, had no opportunity to rebut any unfavorable evidence; in fact, he was not allowed to know what the evidence against him was. Nor was he permitted counsel. The Appeal Board, to whom the hearing officer reported, received no record of the extensive evidence of the FBI and no transcript of the testimony at the hearing and, as a result, customarily rubber-stamped the decision of the hearing officer. The wide variation in the percentage of appeals granted by different officers would call into question the impartiality of some. Thus a procedure which appeared to offer a liberal opportunity for an examination of adverse decisions by local boards was riddled with possibilities for discrimination.

For their part, the courts have customarily refused review of adverse decisions until after military induction of the individual. This has, in effect, denied review to genuine C. O.'s, unable because of their belief to enter the army. Furthermore, if a C. O. had entered the army, he would immediately have subjected himself to the likelihood of court martial. Nearly 3,000 C. O. claimants, refusing to appear for military induction, have received prison sentences.

Another major defect of the law itself proved to be its failure to specify the type or conditions of "work of national importance." In consequence, a system of isolated forced-labor camps was created by administrative fiat, a far cry from the expressed intention of Congress to provide an equal alternative to military service. In these camps, which on V-J Day contained slightly more than half of all 4-E's, non-emergency work of a type inherited from the CCC program has been performed without pay, at the expense of the individual inmate or of one of the sponsoring church groups. Many highly trained men whose skills might well have been used in the national interest, men who in civilian life were university teachers, lawyers, scientists, economists, and welfare workers, have been limited to this type of work or to the frequently dirty and disagreeable, though badly needed, duties of attendants in mental hospitals. Too frequently the leaf-raking, the log-carrying, the snow-shoveling have been so palpably useless as to emphasize the custodial nature of the camps. The Washington Post, recognizing the punitive aspects of the program, commented: "If there is any sense in this wasting of a man's skill . . . any justice in this punishment of a man because of his conscience, it is beyond our discernment."

Although the Selective Service Act provided for pay for C. O.'s not to exceed that of an army private, Selective Service refused to ask for an appropriation. What is more, men in Civilian Public Service have been asked, as one churchman put it, "to pay $30 a month out of their own pocket for the privilege of working for nothing." Some men are now in their fifth year of unpaid labor, and in addition are ineligible for dependency allotments, medical expenses, and other privileges extended to men in the armed forces.

The issue of forced labor without compensation has been appealed to the courts but without result. Yet as a special committee of the American Civil Liberties Union has pointed out, such a policy has placed C. O.'s in "a status lower than prisoners of war, lower than interned enemy aliens, or even convicted criminals, all of whom are paid for their work." Furthermore, the committee noted, "this inferior status [has been] imposed on them solely by administrative fancy." Such a policy constitutes an unhealthy precedent for future anti-democratic controls through labor drafts.

The public has shown an unexpectedly high degree of tolerance for the conscientious objector. The frequent brutalities of World War I have not reappeared. Ministers and laymen have been hired for or retained in important positions without reference to their attitude toward the war. There has been no large amount of anti-C. O. legislation either in Congress or in the state legislatures. Louisiana, Kentucky, and Florida passed laws denying certain public employment to C. O.'s. On the other hand, Tennessee and other states rejected similar legislation. And in California Governor Warren unexpectedly vetoed a bill passed by the 1945 legislature, which would have required all prospective public employees to state their views on war. Such legislation, he said, was an encouragement to "witch-hunting."

In Miami a public-school teacher, Edward O. Schweitzer, lost his appointment on the sole ground of his registration as a C. O., and the Florida Supreme Court upheld the School Board. Even more important was the five-to-four verdict of the United States Supreme Court sustaining the refusal of the Supreme Court of Illinois to admit Clyde W. Summers to the Illinois bar solely because of his C. O. beliefs. If permitted to stand, the decision may bar all C. O.'s from the practice of law and possibly of other professions.

For drafted men demobilization will show whether or not Congress sincerely desired to provide an equal alternative-service program. Selective Service's announcement of a point system for the discharge of men in Civilian Public Service after the end of the European war brought immediate Congressional response in the form of a bill introduced by Representative Winstead of Mississippi. As favorably reported out by the House Military Affairs Committee, the rewritten bill, by forbidding any point system, would have the effect of holding all C. O.'s in service as long as any conscripted military personnel remain. On the floor of the House Representative Winstead's request that the bill be placed on the Unanimous Consent Calendar has just been blocked by the objection of Representatives Judd of Minnesota, Keen of New Jersey, and Tarver of Georgia. The new bill will come up in regular order—a matter of months.

In another action Representative O'Toole of New York has proposed that all C. O.'s be sent abroad as occupation troops, at least until "every last man who has seen service" is returned. Most C. O.'s, of course, have as great an aversion to policing other men as to killing them.

Selective Service, for its part, has followed an ambivalent course. Officially, it has indicated its intent to end the Civilian Public Service Program unless forbidden to do so by Congress; and yet actual demobilization proceeds with painful slowness. In the Friends' camps, which can be taken as representative, 10 per cent of the men in C. P. S. on V-E Day had been discharged by mid-November. During the same period 34 per cent of the army was released. Official plans called for the discharge of 55 per cent of the army by January 1—as compared with only 15 per cent of the C. P. S.

Congress can still forbid any demobilization of C. O.'s, or it can insist that the process be rapidly completed. Selective Service can maintain its slowdown in discharge, or it can let go at once at least those men with two or more years of service and with families. What is done will show whether or not it is true that American conscientious objectors have become second-class citizens.

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

British Coal

IT WAS in 1920 that a Royal Commission on the British coal industry, presided over by Justice Sankey, declared, "The present system of ownership and working . . . stands condemned and some other system must be substituted for it." But it is only today, after a quarter-century of blood, sweat, and tears, of strikes, unemployment, mounting inefficiency, and low wages, that the recommendations of this commission are being carried out by the Labor government's bill to nationalize the coal mines.

If in 1920 the situation of British coal was critical and the need for action urgent, today it has become desperate. Coal is Britain's one important native resource and the foundation of its industrial life. Despite intensive extraction for over 150 years, underground supplies remain abundant, although some of the best deposits have been exhausted. But today British householders shiver on meager rations, industry is barely supplied, export demands cannot be filled, and costs of production have soared about 100 per cent above the pre-war level. More and cheaper coal is an essential pre-condition for industrial recovery.

After the last war Lloyd George staved off a strike in the minefields by appointing the Sankey Commission and promising to abide by its findings. To the consternation of British conservatives a majority of the commission, including its chairman, decided that public ownership was the only way to overcome the "waste and extravagance" inherent in the industry under private enterprise and to eliminate the friction between mine-owners and miners that was a standing menace to stable and efficient production. Lloyd George, whose parliamentary majority was mainly composed of "hard-faced men who looked as if they had done well out of the war," dared not accept this solution and reneged on his promise.

In the years between the wars the British coal industry carried on as it had always done, and the evils which so impressed the Sankey Commission were magnified. The operators combined to beat down wages and, at times, to raise prices, but they would not combine to increase efficiency. They could not agree to merge small undertakings so as to attract new capital and make mechanization an economic proposition. Technologically British coal mines lagged far behind not merely those in this country but those in Germany, Holland, and Poland. In the period between the wars output per manshift in Britain rose only about 15 per cent; in Holland it increased about 100 per cent and in the Ruhr about 50 per cent. This difference was not due to geological conditions, for Continental coal formations are fairly similar to those in Britain; it was due to the larger scale of German and Dutch operations, to better lay-out of the mines, to much greater use of machinery, and to improved training methods.

Last year a committee of mining technicians discussing the reasons for the backwardness of the British industry pointed out that "the employers, as a body, have been prepared neither to accept the principle of survival of the fittest nor fully to abandon their traditional individualism. In relation to their own undertakings the short view has too often prevailed." Believing that vitally needed technical changes could not be "carried through by the industry organized as it is today," the committee recommended the establishment of a statutory authority with effective powers to merge it "into units of such sizes as would provide the maximum advantages of planned production."

If the Tories had won the general election in Britain last summer, it is probable that they would have attempted to tackle the coal problem along these lines. For even the operators had come to recognize that drastic reorganization was essential. Their own solution was the cartelization of the industry under the top government of a "Central Control Board," which was to act as "trustee for the public" and govern the industry in the spirit of "national service." Characteristically, however, neither the public nor the miners were to have any voice in the election or decisions of this body; it was to be purely the creature of the owners. Thus the coal companies' alternative to public ownership was not competitive free enterprise but uncontrolled private monopoly.

Apart from all other objections, that solution would have been totally unacceptable to the miners, and without the cooperation of the workers reorganization of the mines on a more efficient basis is impossible. Their opposition to increased mechanization—the result of years of under-employment—has to be softened; so does their antagonism to the two-shift system, without which the overhead costs of mechanization may prove too heavy. Again, unless there is an improvement in the workers' attitude toward the industry, it will be difficult to overcome the present acute shortage of man-power. During the depression years tens of thousands of miners migrated from the coal fields, and few of the 100,000 who were drafted in the war expect to return. Moreover, miners have been increasingly reluctant to allow their sons to follow a trade so dangerous and so unstable. Consequently, recruiting is insufficient to balance retirements.

Nationalization will not eradicate all the plagues of the coal industry overnight, but it will offer a hope of improvement which should serve to arrest the drift from the industry and to stiffen labor morale. The transitional period, however, may present difficulties. The workers, a hard-headed union leader from Durham said to me when I was in England last year, had come to look upon nationalization as a cure-all. Consequently there was a danger of disillusionment when they found that it would not mean much immediate betterment of their condition. They would have to learn that the primary objective of nationalization was national benefit —not just short hours and high pay—and that a higher standard of living must depend on increased productivity.

In their long, bitter war with the "bosses" the miners have been conditioned to resistance. Now they will be called upon to cooperate with management and to adopt new standards of discipline. It will not be an easy psychological adjustment, but the problem is openly acknowledged, and the Ministry of Fuel and Power, in conjunction with the National Union of Miners, has already begun a campaign of reeducation.

KEITH HUTCHISON

The People's Front

WHEN the honorable representative of the Dominican Republic steps to the podium, the delegates to the inaugural meeting of the United Nations Assembly will undoubtedly hear a most eloquent address on liberty and peace. The Dominican delegate may find it difficult, however, to work the name of Rafael Trujillo into his speech; history does not record the "Gran Benefactor" among the creators of the Atlantic Charter. But perhaps by some trick of rhetorical prestidigitation he can include an account of Trujillo's accomplishments at home.

In the Dominican Republic practically every street, every school, every two-story house bears the inscription "Built by the initiative of the Benefactor of the Nation." The bigger the house, the longer the inscription: in the smart suburban districts to the title "Benefactor de la Patria" is added "Restaurador de la Independencia Financiera de la República." In the frequent patriotic celebrations peasants wear signs on their backs reading, "Dios en el cielo y Trujillo en la tierra"—"God in heaven, Trujillo on earth."

If it is too difficult to list all these glories in a short speech, the Dominican representative might limit himself only to those which have won for Trujillo an international reputation. It would begin with the massacre of 12,000 Haitians in 1937. At home his record is more modest: to date he has killed only 3,000 political opponents and these without any unpleasant publicity which might disturb Washington. His method has been admirably efficient: for years a gang of pistoleros operated regularly between midnight and dawn assassinating enemies or potential enemies of the regime. He had to abandon this simple procedure when a foreign diplomat returning one night from a party ran smack into one of these shooting affrays and lodged a protest with the authorities. Thereafter, political prisoners were seized quietly in their homes, taken to the little port of Caleta three miles outside of Ciudad Trujillo, and thrown to the sharks. In fairness to Trujillo it must be said that the number of killings has diminished in the last few years, perhaps because the General finds himself in the unhappy position of the Argentine caudillo Paez, who, when asked on his deathbed to forgive his enemies, replied sadly, "Father, why didn't you ask me that years ago? Now there is not one left for me to forgive."

Until a few years ago the "Restaurador de la Independencia Financiera de la República" believed that the economic prosperity of the country was synonymous with the prosperity of the Trujillo family. Every member of the clan down to the most distant cousin-in-law received a post in the administration or the army; in return he had only to contribute a small percentage of his salary to the Benefactor. But with an increase in the size of the army, whose job it is to maintain order, Trujillo prudently decided to distribute some of his benefits among the generals. General Federico Fiallo, chief of the Dominican Gestapo, has been one of the chief recipients of Trujillo largess. Aside from keeping the army clique in line through this "share-the-wealth" system, Trujillo has only one other preoccupation, that of courting the United States. To this end he has permitted American capital to buy up the sugar plantations and to pay Dominican and imported Haitian workers wages that rate among the lowest in Latin America.

The Dominican representative to the UNO will have a worthy rival in the person of the delegate from Paraguay. President Morinigo is less vain than the dictator of the Dominican Republic but he can match him when it comes to dealing with the opposition. At the national trade-union conference in Buenos Aires this month Porfirio Nuñez, the Paraguayan representative, described the unbelievable tortures inflicted on prisoners in the concentration camps of the north Chaco jungle. Recently a hundred men—journalists, professors, doctors, and political leaders—were arrested for plotting to establish a "Communist dictatorship" in Paraguay. I met some of these men when I visited Paraguay as chairman of the League of Nations Commission on the Chaco war; these potential "Communists" are about as communist as Harry Hopkins. They belong to the Unidad Nacional, a movement which includes such distinguished persons as the former President of Paraguay, Dr. José P. Giggiari, former Senator Vicente Rivarola, and the former president of parliament and delegate to the Pan-American conference at Montevideo, Geronimo Riart. "Our only crime," declared one of the prisoners to a correspondent of the Montevideo newspaper El Pais, "is that we are anti-Nazis."

The Himmler of Paraguay who discovered the "plot" is Colonel Heriberto Florentin, who delights in supervising personally the torture of prisoners, especially when the prisoner is the seventeen-year-old student Sallimben or the anti-fascist woman leader, Petrona Arzamendia. Recently he intensified repressive measures after the democratic elements of Paraguay staged an impressive protest against the Argentine dictatorship during a visit of General Farrell, Argentina's puppet President, to Asunción.

The other day I received a letter from one of the Paraguayan leaders whose name I cannot reveal for obvious reasons. He asked why it is the people of the United States do not recognize the danger to this hemisphere if Perón should be elected President of Argentina on February 24. "With the help of Morinigo," he writes, "and the other would-be Morinigos of Latin America, Perón will seize control of Paraguay and Bolivia; within four or five years he will have become so strong that the United States, in order to oppose him in Latin America, will be obliged to wage a war."

Can I reply to my Paraguayan friend that few people in the United States are interested in Latin America; that fewer still know what is happening in Paraguay or in the Dominican Republic or in Argentina; that some of those who do know helped to open the door of the United Nations Organization to the Perón regime?

DEL VAYO

GABRIELA MISTRAL

BY MILDRED ADAMS

THE gulf between North and South American culture revealed itself with startling clarity in the recent public reaction—or lack of it—to the news that the 1945 Nobel Prize for literature had been conferred upon Gabriela Mistral of Chile. Miss Mistral is the first Latin American to win the coveted award. Her name is a household word south of the Rio Grande: her poetry is deeply loved, and some of her ideas are the subject of passionate debate. Yet North Americans seem only dimly aware that such a person exists. And this despite the fact that her first book of poems was published by the Instituto de las Españas at Columbia University.

Miss Mistral's first recognition in this country came in 1922, partly because the publication of her book set up echoes of the discovery of a poet so important that she cracked the language barrier, partly because her glorification of the rural teacher and her deep compassion for the neglected country child attracted teachers. Also it caught the attention of José Vasconcelos, Minister of Education in Mexico and a figure well known in the United States, who was undertaking to reform and improve Mexican country schools. He invited Miss Mistral to direct that campaign. North Americans in the fields of education and child welfare watched with interest, and a few of the poet-teacher's verses were translated by admirers here. In 1931 she came to give lectures at Barnard College and at Middlebury. After the publication in 1938 of her third book, "Tala," with its touching dedication to the Basque children who had fled before Franco's Moors, she again visited this country and was officially entertained in Washington.

None of this brought her to the attention of the general public here. Nor did the fact that she had been published in at least five European languages make any impact on a people seldom aware of foreign poets who have not obvious publicity value. Her recent elevation to Nobel Prize status was met mostly with a blank stare and an interrogative eyebrow.

Because Gabriela Mistral's poetry reflects the experience and emotions of her own life, it is important to know at least the outlines of that life. She was born Lucila Godoy Alcayaga, in 1889, in one of those deep Chilean valleys where the sun shines only a few hours each day. At fifteen she began to teach primary students in country schools so poor that, as she says in one of her famous poems, when she wanted to comb a child's hair she had only her own fingers with which to smooth the long black locks. She taught for ten years, and then for eight more, with a growing literary fame at once feeding and being fed on her teaching career.

Then came the publication of her first book of poems, widespread recognition throughout Spanish countries as a major poet, and the invitation to take charge of the reform of rural primary schools in Mexico. She stayed there for two years, and still refers to that land as "my Mexico." Never again did she go back to the hard career in which she had spent her youth and made her first fame. Instead she became a civil servant and was granted an honorary pension by the state but expected to work for it. She was for a time Chilean member of the Institute for Intellectual Cooperation attached to the League of Nations. She has been consular representative of Chile in Palermo, Madrid, Lisbon, Rio de Janeiro, and other capital cities of Europe and America. It is largely an honorary post in the Latin manner, giving her time for writing, and for lecturing at colleges and universities.

Her work came out in three volumes, widely separated in time and place. "Desolación" was published in New York in 1922; "Ternura," a book of poems for children, in Madrid in 1924; "Tala," written out of "my love for the blood of Spanish innocents," appeared in Buenos Aires in 1938. A fourth volume, "Lecturas para Mujeres," which she compiled in Mexico at the request of José Vasconcelos, contains, with other material, some of her prose and verse. There is said to be a good deal of verse and prose still uncollected. She herself speaks of her "dejadez criolla" in matters of publishing, which could be translated as a native tendency to procrastination.

Miss Mistral made her first reputation with three "Sonnets to Death," which won a Chilean poetry prize for her in 1914. Her first volume, published eight years later, is full of passion and tragedy—the suicide of a lover, the anguish of the woman who quarreled with him and lost him, the deep longing for his child which she would never bear. With these themes go her love for and keen observation of country places and country children and her sense of the teacher as a consecrated being. The tone is simple, direct, almost primitive. She talks to Christ as freely as to a child. Her expression is devoid of modern mannerisms and romanticist pretensions; her lyric tone is pure. Friendly critics say that her masters were the Bible, Dante, Tagore, and Tolstoy.

Her later volumes carry the same clarity of expression, the same threads of mingled mysticism and paganism, the same moving force of love and tragedy. She has not had an easy life, and the anguish of it is laid open and served up bleeding. Her sympathies are with the downtrodden and forgotten—the shy, wild children in lost Chilean valleys, the Basque orphans scattered "among strange peoples in countries of impossible tongues and bitter climates." The Spanish war she took—as did so many other poets—as a personal catastrophe, and she castigated her continent for not welcoming its exiles. This point of view did not increase her popularity with people who had already objected to her frankness and her anticlerical sentiments.

Even when young she was "more sphinx than nymph." Nowadays she is a monumental figure, heavy set, the mouth down-curving, the eyes somber, the body still as though carved out of basalt. Thunder clouds gather easily on the heavy forehead, and the fine eyes under arched brows shoot fire at any suspicion that she is not taken seriously. One of her Mexican friends calls her only part human in her continual insistence on the tragic side of life. Gabriela is unteachable and unchangeable, he insists. She has no sense of humor that would be so recognized by a North American, but with children she is whimsical and gay. In a group she is silent, a stone image of a woman listening. Yet her dialogue with a sympathetic friend can be witty as well as wise.

Gabriela Mistral's poetic reputation has been founded on the quality of her song, her compassionate insight, the expression she gives to the deepest emotions that move the human heart. Her secure position in literature written in the Spanish tongue is unchallenged even by those who disagree with her philosophy and deplore the tone of seer and prophet which infuses much of her later prose writings. The move to seek the Nobel prize for her began around 1940, and enlisted aid all over South America. Its granting will be interpreted as shedding luster not only on the poet but also on the woman and on the continent.

For that very reason it is necessary to raise the question as to which of the three factors—achievement, sex, or geography—really won her the prize. A major poet she surely is, but three volumes of verse, the latest of which appeared in 1938, is a slender basis on which to gain worldwide recognition in 1945. Meanwhile other poets have risen to challenge her ascendancy, some of them writing Spanish on her own continent. One thinks of Pablo Neruda, of Alfonso Reyes, of Nicolas Guillen, with his cry of the oppressed, of Cesar Vallejo, who died so tragically young yet with such fine work already done. All of them can lay claim to having come closer to the glory and the anguish of these later years. Their production is considerable, their themes are universal, their verse is powerful.

The uncomfortable suspicion persists that the prize may have been awarded to Miss Mistral this year because her poetry, being fine, was also safe and in the main non-controversial. Her poems are deeply human, and in style and content they raise a minimum of uncomfortable questions. Moreover, Miss Mistral is a woman, and not many Nobel prizes have gone to women poets; she is a South American, and no Nobel prize has previously gone to a South American. This year above all others, with poets in other places submerged by the war, a South American woman poet could be safely chosen, particularly as her fellow-poets held her in such warm regard.

But the Nobel prize, if it is to live up to its great pretensions, should not raise such doubts in the minds of listeners. That it does so this year is a reflection not on Miss Mistral but on the prize committee.

BRIEFER COMMENT

Goods for Goods

STUART CHASE'S gift for assimilating masses of technical and controversial material and then presenting it in a lively and highly readable form is nowhere better revealed than in "Tomorrow's Trade: Problems of Our Foreign Commerce," the latest of the series he is preparing under the auspices of the Twentieth Century Fund ($1). This is a book which needed to be written, and one can feel relief now that it has been done. Any intelligent reader who wants to understand foreign trade can find the basic answers here.

Mr. Chase seizes upon the simple fact that foreign trade cannot exist except by the exchange of goods and services for goods and services. That is the fundamental fact about all trade. The owner of the local department store wants his potential customers to sell their goods; otherwise he will not be able to sell his goods. He does not encourage his customers' customers to stop buying, nor does he insist on selling goods to the man who has no business of his own, and no job, and no prospects. Yet the advertisements in our magazines today and the public utterances of prominent men seem to recommend just that policy in our foreign trade. We are to export. If we export, we can supply 10,000,000 jobs to our people. But never a word about buying. Anyone who after reading Mr. Chase's analysis does not see the stupidity of that attitude should start building himself a deep shelter and wait for the atomic bombs which will follow a policy of exporting our goods and our unemployment.

One should be grateful for so clear an exposition of a problem around which so thick a fog has been cast. But I cannot help wishing that Mr. Chase had found a different formula for expressing the basic fact than "stuff for stuff." Most foreign transactions, as well as most domestic trade, to be sure, are based on the exchange of "stuff for stuff." But this seems to limit trade to tangible material goods. So long as we continue to think in terms of radios and machine tools, cotton and hides, we shall not be able to solve many of our problems. Mr. Chase speaks of the invisible items in foreign trade and gives a clear picture of their importance. But unless he modifies his formula to imply their probable increasing importance, his readers may fail to appreciate that tourist trade, remittances by immigrants, and other services which are not precisely "stuff" may play a very large part in solving not only our domestic and foreign-trade but our full-employment problem. Education, the arts, medical research, social research—these intangible services are likely to furnish an answer to the problem of overproduction of material goods, and the unbalance between our capacity to produce and that of our neighbors. ETHEL M. THORNBURY

The Evolution of Faith

PERHAPS IT IS BECAUSE a modest and critical trust in reason still seems to me the best equipment a man may have in this troubled world that I find it difficult to form an exact picture of the public for which "The Wisdom Tree" by Emma Hawkridge (Houghton Mifflin, $3.75) is intended. Readers of Frazer, or of such books as "Totem and Taboo," or of Jung's "Psychology of the Unconscious" may take interest in this account of the evolution of the major religious faiths. It would probably have value for those who consider it wise to give their children some knowledge of comparative religion, though I should judge Salomon Reinach's "Orpheus" a better book for that purpose. For those who can make a Santayana-like abstraction of the symbolic values of a religion and believe it important and profitable to do so "The Wisdom Tree" may possibly serve better than the French scholar's classic. It is beyond my capacities to criticize the book as a historian of religions might do. The bibliography indicates that Mrs. Hawkridge has followed the best authorities, though in her brief reference to the Egyptian religious revolution which brought in the feudal period about 2000 B. C., she is far less bold than Breasted himself. In general "The Wisdom Tree" is well written, though there is a tendency to lushness and a disinclination to define concepts. There is a fairly satisfactory correlation of the religious with the "non-spiritual" facts of history, and the illustrations are good.

RALPH BATES

VERSE CHRONICLE

TRIBUTE TO THE ANGELS. By H. D. Oxford University Press. $2.

THE SONG OF LAZARUS. By Alex Comfort. The Viking Press. $1.75.

FOR H. D. the Education of Hellas was more than a place and less than an education: it was a religion. But she has worn out the place names and the olives; wandering among barbarians, patching what religious scraps she can pick up into a quilt to warm her bombed old bones, she evokes a wondering and amused affection. Yet imagism was a reductio ad absurdum upon which it is hard to base a later style: H. D.'s new poem is one for those who enjoy any poem by H. D., or for those collectors who enjoy any poem that includes the Virgin, Raphael, Azrael, Uriel, John on Patmos, Hermes Trismegistus, and the Bona Dea.

Although the first part of Alex Comfort's novel is better than anything in his book of poems, he is potentially and in diffusion an interesting poet. Unfortunately, neither organization nor economy is natural to him, and the extensive, rather clumsy energy of his best prose is tenuous in his verse. One out of a dozen of his phrases is thoroughly successful; the other eleven are typical—typical enough to tell you how old he is, where he lives, whom he reads. (Appropriation is the sincerest flattery, as you can see when workers take over the state, or when Mr. Comfort infringes again and again on such notorious patents as Dylan Thomas's "candle in the thighs.") In their elegiac, almost pastoral reflection in these poems, death and the war seem hardly more than allegorical emanations of some passive, amoral reality. There flows by interminably a clear, ripe, shining, well-watered, rather French and feminine nature: blood or vague sexual fluids pulse through its imagined vessels, and as you wander over the "chalk-pit's navel" or the "fruitful thighs of the corn," you feel that you are in some modernist room where all the woods are blond, the hues unsaturated, and the designs unarresting but full of symbols borrowed from "The Interpretation of Dreams." But the inhabitants of this room are dead or dying: everywhere you stumble there are the bones—improbably polished bones, but bones—that the wars of bad men in far-off capitals have scattered here. Such agreeable osseous nonsense—the all too articulate skeletons perpetually popping, like Jack-in-the-boxes, from the duped and temporary flesh—makes it hard to take any death seriously, or to remember that Mr. Comfort is talking about the deaths, not of Corydon and last fall's leaves, but of the peoples of the Second World War.

Mr. Comfort was a conscientious objector; so it is unnecessary to say that he has both courage and individual judgment. But the good luck that made him an interne in a London hos-

WHY has the Catholic Church

Supported
Mussolini
Hitler
Tiso
Franco
Salazar
Peron
?

Why did the Catholic church support Roosevelt's domestic policies and oppose his foreign policy?

Why is the Catholic church anti-Capitalist as well as anti-Communist?

What kind of a political, social and economic system is the Catholic church attempting to bring about?

How has this affected your life and how may it affect the lives of your children?

READ:

"The True Nature of Roman Catholicism"
by L. H. Lehmann

An important series of articles describing aspects of the Catholic church never before revealed.

Beginning in the January issue of
THE CONVERTED CATHOLIC MAGAZINE
Edited by former Catholic priests
Subscription only $1.00 a year (10 issues)
Sample copy 15¢

A limited number of January copies are being reserved for readers of The Nation. To make sure of getting your January copy include Dept. number in the address as follows, or return this ad.

Agora Publishing Company, Dept. D-F 51
229 WEST 48TH STREET NEW YORK 19, N. Y.

FOOD vs. FAMINE

which do you choose ?

for Europe's starving anti-fascists Political refugees, guerrilla fighters, concentration camp victims who fought Hitler for twelve years will die of hunger this winter—unless you send food. Clip coupon below and mail with $5 canned food parcel to the IRRC warehouse, 130 Orchard Street, New York 2, N. Y. If you live in New York City phone LEx. 2-7916 for pick-up service.

Enroll Me As A FAMINE FIGHTER

☐ I am sending a $5 canned food parcel.

☐ I am sending a $5 canned food parcel as one year's dues in the IRRC. Please send me a membership application blank.

(Name)

(Address)

International Rescue and Relief Committee
103 Park Avenue New York City, N. Y.

pital instead of a laborer in some concentration camp in the country has cut him off from all of us in his poems: he is the isolated, pacifist, individualistic anarchist who tells the truth about things to the deceived homogeneous mass that is everybody else. This truth has the attractive and improbable simplicity of the Robinson Crusoe demonstrations of the Jevonian economist. Mr. Comfort believes in conscientious disobedience: if no one obeys the government there will be no war. There can be war only because people are dupes—"upright clock-faced citizens" who are fooled by the "loaded dice," the "stacked cards" of the "drunkards and whoremasters" who are their governors. The poet's irritation at the stupidity of the corpses weakens his pastoral and generalized grief for them; besides, these are the wholesale deaths that happen to other people, not the petty retail deaths that happen to you and yours. And he never wonders: how does it feel to be a dupe? But the way things are for us—not the way they would be if we were rational, economic Benthamic men, intelligently determining the algebraic sum of our own interests—is what has to matter to that witness of the actions of men, the poet. Between Mr. Comfort and the soldiers there is a final barrier: he is right and they are wrong; and he cannot share the sympathetic, unwilling identity in which all their differences are buried—their uneasy knowledge that the mechanics of their living and someone else's dying is statistical. It is hard for him to feel for one of them an unmixed sorrow; he can't help thinking, "He'd have been all right if he'd only had sense enough to disobey." But he means, if they'd only all had sense enough to disobey: though he seems to think he is making plausible political proposals, he is actually making impossible moral demands. To him, as he states in an essay, any resistance to any state is an intrinsic good—since all states are equally and absolutely evil; a person is necessarily virtuous, a citizen necessarily vicious. This is an anarchism possible to the docile inhabitants of a long-established, well-regimented community: that is, to citizens who are protected from each other thoroughly enough, and unnecessarily enough, to believe that there is nothing they need be protected from except the state.

We can hardly fail either to sympathize with Mr. Comfort or to realize that he is right in considering that the states themselves are at present the main danger their citizens face; I do not know whether it would be right for him to sympathize more with us, but—so long as we are his subject matter—it would certainly be expedient. It is hard not to quote to him Cromwell's "I beseech you, in the bowels of Christ, consider that ye may be mistaken." His version of the unarmed, eventually triumphant proletariat of the anarchists reminds one of its contrary, the armed triumphant proletariat of Marx: I remembered the murals in Mexican market-places, with their workers who wave red banners Against the Next Imperialist War—workers whose broad stern faces are complicated by no premonition of their own official future in that war. Yet when one considers the mechanisms of the contemporary states—from the advertising agencies that turn out their principles to the munitions factories that turn out their practice—it is hard to think of the triumph of any proletariat as anything more than a wistful compensating dream: it is we who wither away, not the state.

RANDALL JARRELL

The Art of Cezanne

REALLY valuable texts on art are so few that whenever one appears the fact should be proclaimed in haste. I have had Earle Loran's "Cézanne's Composition" (University of California Press, $6.50) in my hands for almost two years and have delayed reviewing it—which was unfair to everyone concerned—only because I wanted to make sure that I understood Professor Loran's thesis exactly. In the meantime, however, I have learned a great deal from his book about modern painting in general.

Professor Loran—himself a painter as well as associate professor of art at the University of California—devotes his attention mainly to Cézanne's concrete means and methods, and he arrives thereby at an understanding of Cézanne's art more essential than any other I have seen in print. Professor Loran's thesis declares that the French master achieved his effects of volume and space primarily by "linear structure," not by color or texture. This goes against the standard notion—presented impressively by the Austrian Fritz Novotny and more recently repeated in brief by Edward Alden Jewell in his preface to a thin volume of bad reproductions called "Cézanne" (Hyperion Press, distributed by Duell, Sloan, and Pearce, $3)—which contends, in Mr. Jewell's words, that Cézanne "established recession from the picture plane by means of a system of modulated color or the use of different colors to mark the receding planes."

Professor Loran explains his own view in detail by diagrammatic analysis of some thirty-odd paintings, presented in black and white reproduction along with many interesting photographs of the original motifs in nature from which the master made his open-air pictures. From his argument Professor Loran derives a system of principles through which not only Cézanne, he claims, but almost all great artists who explored the illusion of the third dimension on a flat surface obtained their best results. These principles—which are a matter of intuition and experience rather than of conscious thought—make it necessary to simplify, distort, and abstract in order to create spatial and volume tensions without violating the two-dimensional integrity of the picture plane. Here linear outline—not as final effect, as arabesque, but as a means of construction—is more decisive than modeling, whether in facets of pigment or in darks and lights.

Distortions, as we know, play a prime role in Cézanne's art. It is the drawing that they dictate which divides pictorial space into dynamic entities. The little color facets, subtly defining each small variation of plane, do but clothe the skeleton, confirming and making more substantial what is already there in principle. One of the proofs of Professor Loran's thesis—which he himself does not mention—is how well Cézanne's pictures stand up in black-and-white reproduction, by contrast to strictly impressionist paintings, which depend far more on color and texture. But this fact should also give us to think whether Cézanne did not pay more attention to dark and light values than he himself realized.

Of course, Cézanne's color plays an enormously important part in the final effects of his art—and far from overlooking this part, Professor Loran deals with it at length. Cézanne's own conception of the importance of color is shown by his preference for the Venetian and Spanish schools of painting above others of the past. Those who choose painterly painting must stress color, and properly. Yet Picasso and Braque showed how profoundly they understood Cézanne when, in embarking upon cubism under his influence, they stripped themselves down to black, brown, gray, and white in order to lay bare the bones of the problem. In no other way could the meaning of the revolution Cézanne precipitated have been so relevantly made plain.

There is not the space here to go into the nature of that revolution. Suffice to say that it has been radically misunderstood by those critics who argue from Cézanne's example that volume—or "plasticity"—is the end-all and be-all of painting. If anything, the case is exactly the opposite with regard to Cézanne's historical effect, for his example as much as anyone's has strengthened the modern tendency toward flat painting.

And as for his epigones among painters themselves: they have applied his drawing in a fashion and they have applied the general tonality of his color, but they have not digested the inner logic of either. Thus their conception of pictorial space remains essentially pre-Cézannean. I cite as evidence the work of Max Weber, that estimable but somewhat overrated artist who has not yet perceived, as Cézanne did from the first, that it is the unity of a picture that constitutes its virtuality as a successful work of art, not the juiciness of brush strokes, not the amount of paint quality per square inch.

One more word. Professor Loran is no idolator of Cézanne and is not blind to his few shortcomings. It is this among other things that helps make his book such a good textbook for the concrete understanding of modern painting. The failures of a great painter are often more illuminating to the student than his successes.

CLEMENT GREENBERG

STAGE PLAYS

MICHAEL TODD Productions
MAURICE EVANS
In His New Production of Shakespeare's
HAMLET
Columbus Circle Thea. B'way at 59th St.—CO. 5-1173 Eves. 8:30. Mts. Thu.& Sat. 2:30

UP IN CENTRAL PARK
Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS
Lyrics by DOROTHY FIELDS
Music by SIGMUND ROMBERG
BROADWAY THEATRE, Broadway at 53rd Street. Matinees: WED. & SAT.

"DESERVES ITS GREAT SUCCESS!"—Nichols, Times
Rodgers and Hammerstein present
MADY CHRISTIANS • OSCAR HOMOLKA
in JOHN VAN DRUTEN'S
I REMEMBER MAMA
from Kathryn Forbes' "Mama's Bank Account"
with JOHN TETZEL • ADRIENNE GESSNER • RICHARD BISHOP
MUSIC BOX 45th Street, West of Broadway. Phone Circle 6-4636. Eves. 8:35 Sharp. Mats. Thurs. and Sat., 2:35 Sharp.

Kermit Bloomgarden & George Heller present
DEEP ARE THE ROOTS
A New Play by ARNAUD d'USSEAU and JAMES GOW
Staged by ELIA KAZAN
FULTON THEATRE Forty-sixth Street West of Broadway. Circle 6-6380.
Evenings 8:40, $4.20, $3.60, $3.00, $2.40, $1.80, $1.20. Matinees Wednesday and Saturday, $3.00, $2.40, $1.80, $1.20. Tax inclusive.

MOTION PICTURES

Manhattan
ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST.
86th ST.
58th ST. near Lex.
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENT
RIVERSIDE
23rd ST.

Bronx
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

Westchester
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

Brooklyn
BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYOU Coney Island

Queens
Keith's FLUSHING
Keith's RICH. HILL
STRAND Far Rockaway

RKO
HAPPY NEW YEAR HITS!
Beginning Mon., DEC. 31 Gala New Year's Eve Midnight Show
"Elaborate Pirate Thriller"—N. Y. Sun
"Satisfyingly Thunderous"—N. Y. Herald-Tribune
'THE SPANISH MAIN'
STARRING
PAUL HENREID
MAUREEN O'HARA
WALTER SLEZAK
in GLORIOUS TECHNICOLOR
—And—
'SING YOUR WAY HOME' Jack Haley Marcy McGuire

Last 4 Days — Thurs. to Sun., Dec. 27-30
"One of the Best Times You've Ever Had!" —Walter Winchell
'THE DOLLY SISTERS'
Starring
Betty GRABLE • John PAYNE • June HAVER
"CARIBBEAN MYSTERY" JAMES DUNN SHEILA RYAN

B. G. DeSylva presents
BETTY HUTTON in
"THE STORK CLUB"
— with —
BARRY FITZGERALD
DON DE FORE
Robert Benchley • Bill Goodwin
Iris Adrian • Mikhail Rasumny
Mary Young
and introducing ANDY RUSSELL
Midnight Feature Nightly

In Person
WOODY HERMAN and his ORCHESTRA
— featuring —
FRANCES WAYNE
— plus —
DOROTHY KELLER
Extra added attraction
BUDDY LESTER
Don Baker at the Organ

NOW PLAYING PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

Screen Horizons Never Approached!
Hewn out of life's deepest emotions . . . out of the tempest and torment that raged in a woman's soul!
DARRYL F. ZANUCK presents
LEAVE HER TO HEAVEN
In TECHNICOLOR
By Ben Ames Williams
A 20th CENTURY-FOX PICTURE
Now Playing ROXY 7th Ave. at 50th St.

★ Buy Bonds—To Keep ★

Drama

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

LATE in the eighteenth century David Garrick cut the grave-diggers out of his new production of "Hamlet" and was thanked by Steevens, the best Shakespeare scholar of his day, for thus correcting the Bard's characteristic bad taste. The same scene is among those missing from Maurice Evans's "G. I. version," now brought from the Pacific to the Columbus Circle Theater, and we are told that it was eliminated because the soldiers found it a distressing excrescence. This may not be sufficient to demonstrate that our fighting men are pseudo-classicists whether they know it or not, but there are other respects in which the Evans production would have seemed less unconventional to an eighteenth-century audience than it does to a modern one.

Those who were accustomed to seeing Hamlet dressed as a French abbé and Macbeth rigged out in all the red and gold splendor of a grenadier's uniform would find the somewhat neutral and unobtrusively modern costuming adopted by Evans subdued rather than startling, and they would also consider the general tendency to treat the whole play as a declamatory melodrama traditional rather than novel. Many historians have pointed out that Shakespeare was most popular on the stage in the days when a far from sacred text was not only cut but added to as any actor saw fit, and the meaning of it all may be simply that the median taste of a large heterogeneous audience in the Pacific or anywhere else is most accurately hit when the obvious values of any play are accentuated and everything in the slightest degree esoteric or even unfamiliar is as far as possible eliminated.

Mr. Evans's production starts off briskly with the scene on the battlements played as an encounter between a group of hearty, prosaic soldiers going about their routine job. The effect is excellent until, a few minutes after it has begun, one of the Danish G. I.'s is compelled to launch into the ornate passage which begins, "Some say that ever 'gainst that season comes wherein our Savior's birth is celebrated"; that passage, which never fails, no matter how the scene is played, to seem a bit gratuitous, stubbornly defies the effort to make it possible as a bit of casual conversation. And right here it might as well be pointed out that there is more than one moment in the play when Shakespeare's language defies the attempt to present his characters as fundamentally merely a group of regular fellows—it does again, for instance, in the scene of the last parting of Ophelia and Laertes, where in the present production Laertes sits on the arm of a chair, engages in only half-serious badinage with his sister on the subject of seemly conduct for virgins, and almost convinces us that this is the way in which the scene should be played until we become gradually aware that such casual manners and such a casual attitude are not really compatible with the formality of the language he uses. Much of the time Mr. Evans avoids such difficulties by cutting out whatever part of a speech seems to make it either too long or too formal, and I am not saying that the occasional incongruities which remain would or should be more distressing to a heterogeneous audience than much of "Hamlet" as originally written inevitably is to those unprepared by experience or education to participate in the mood which Shakespeare intended to create. But I am maintaining that such a version as the present one is, nevertheless, an ingenious and entertaining perversion rather than an actual interpretation of the play in question.

Some modern critics—Dover Wilson among them—have insisted that Hamlet himself is not the doubting, introverted philosopher which the romantics make him but primarily a man of action who delays because he must, and Mr. Evans seems to have adapted if he has not exaggerated this view. Supposing, rightly perhaps, that the average fighting man would not be too sympathetic toward the sort of fellow whom General Patton would undoubtedly have been glad to slap, Evans has made the melancholy Dane robustiously troubled rather than actually melancholy and permitted him only occasional rather puzzling lapses into morbidity at those times when he is compelled to permit him to indulge in quite uncharacteristic wishes that this too, too solid flesh would melt or in equally improbable speculations concerning that bourne from which no traveler returns. Hamlet's mockery of Polonius and of the hapless Rosencrantz and Guildenstern becomes almost joyously aggressive rather than something which springs from self-torturing bitterness, and frequently his jibes are presented—rather more convincingly than one might at first think possible—as pretty close to wisecracks. But to me it has always seemed that certain passages confounded Dover Wilson almost as effectively as they now confound Mr. Evans. Even if Hamlet's own repeated self-reproaches be dismissed as unjustified self-criticism, there remains the ghost's reference to his son's "almost blunted purpose," and the ghost, we are assured, is "an honest ghost." Nor, leaving G. I. prejudices aside, do I see any reason why anyone should want to surrender the fascinating problem presented by a man temperamentally unfitted for a role which he nevertheless feels it his duty to accept, merely in order that we may gain one more example of the conventional tragic hero of action.

If I had more space I should like to say a word of praise for Frances Reid's Ophelia and for the rather original Queen of Lili Darvas, who makes her less sinister, more merely light-minded than is usual and gives a really admirable performance in the closet scene. As for the production and interpretation as a whole, it should interest not only uncritical audiences, which will, I suspect, like it very much, but also those familiar enough with the play to be curious to see what happens when it is played for broad rather than for subtle effects. But the G. I. "Hamlet" remains an interesting stunt rather than a production to be taken with full seriousness.

Records

B. H. HAGGIN

ON COLUMBIA'S December list is Mozart's String Quintet in C major (K. 515), played by the present Budapest Quartet—Roisman, Ortenberg, Kroyt, Schneider—and Milton Katims (Set 586; $4.50). The grandness of scale and style, the intensity and power of the first movement; the somber strangeness of the minuet, the startling harmonic progressions of the first part of the trio, the violent intensities of its middle part, in the second movement; the heart-piercing loveliness of the slow movement; the breath-taking episodes in the finale; and, most important, the wonderful musical ideas throughout—all these make this one of Mozart's greatest utterances. It gets one of the Budapest Quartet's unapproachably great performances, in which the phraseological inflection and the integration of the lines of sound are something one can scarcely believe as it happens. And the performance gets the best reproduction that Columbia has achieved with the group so far. It isn't perfect reproduction, however:

on some sides the sound is well-balanced, bright, clear, and agreeable to the ear, but without the warmth it should have; on other sides it is disagreeably sharp-edged; on all sides the rich sound of Schneider's cello is hard and dry.

The two sides of a single disc (71696-D; $1) offer an uncut performance of a Mozart aria which hitherto has been recorded only on one side with one of its episodes omitted: the lovely L'amerò, sarò costante from "Il Re Pastore"—or rather L'amerò, sarò co-ho-ho-ho-stante, as Lily Pons sings it. Her singing is agreeable in sound and smooth in style, and is reproduced with more volume, clarity, and brilliance on the second side than on the first. The sound of Bruno Walter's orchestral accompaniment also is better on the second side than on the first. The sound of Bruno Walter's orchestral accompaniment also is better on the second side; but Mishel Piastro's violin obbligato is offensively treacly on both sides.

After recording eleven songs from Schubert's "Winterreise" cycle for Victor several years ago, Lotte Lehmann did the remaining thirteen for Columbia, which issued seven in one volume, and now issues six in a second volume (Set 587; $2.75). The scrambled arrangement of each collection in the volumes makes it all but impossible to hear the series of twenty-four songs in the order, and with the continuity from song to song and the cumulative force, that it was intended to have; moreover, Lehmann's voice is reproduced differently by the Victor and Columbia records—more faithfully by the Columbias, but also with occasional buzzes and other imperfections. Her inflection and coloring of the phrases is eloquent and moving; but I am this time more sharply aware of the lack of rhythmic sense—for example in "Der greise Kopf"—that astonished me previously in "Wasserflut"; and I have come to perceive the badness of Ulanowsky's accompaniments—their feebleness of sound and character, their lack of tonal and rhythmic continuity from one note to the next.

Rehearing a work of Mozart after an interval I get a completely new impression of its wonderful quality; and on the other hand rehearing a Brahms concerto or a Shostakovitch symphony I am impressed as though for the first time by what a dreadful piece of music each is in its own pretentious way. The Brahms concerto this time is No. 2 for piano, played by Serkin with the Philadelphia Orchestra under Ormandy (Set 584; $6.50). Schnabel's style is more authentic than Horowitz's; but Horowitz's performance has a sharpness of contour and a continuity of impetus—for example, in the first piano solo that builds up to the first orchestra tutti—that are lacking in Serkin's. Horowitz's performance also has the advantage of being presented in the wonderful orchestral framework created by Toscanini; and their combined performance has the advantage of being reproduced with clarity and brightness, whereas the sound of the Serkin-Philadelphia Orchestra performance is dull and murky.

The Shostakovitch symphony this time is No. 6, excellently performed by Reiner with the Pittsburgh Symphony, and excellently recorded (Set 585; $5.50).

Not long ago I spoke of how exciting it is to observe the coming into existence —involving extraordinary human powers —of each wonderful detail in the succession that becomes a quintet of Mozart, a ballet of Balanchine, a dance of Danilova. Other musical examples that I should have mentioned are a performance of the Budapest Quartet, and above all a performance of Toscanini. Not only his performance of a great piece of music, but his performance of a Waldteufel waltz, a Sousa march, or one of the delightful Rossini pieces in the volume issued by Victor (Set DV-2; $8.50): the Dance from "William Tell" (one side), the Overtures to "La Cenerentola" (two sides), "Il Barbiere di Siviglia" (two sides), "La Gazza Ladra" (two sides), and "Il Signor Bruschino" (one side). The sound of the N. B. C. Symphony on the records is reverberant but clear and, on most of the sides, bright; on the "William Tell" side it is especially brilliant, on the first "Barbiere" and "Gazza" sides it is dull; and there is variation also in volume and bass. The recordings are pressed on Victor's new plastic records; and a few sides of my review copy have clicks and other such noises.

I might add that from a couple of reports people have given me of their experiences with these plastic records it looks as though they had better be used only with light (one-ounce) pickups. Also, I have discovered that they store up electric charges, which may be what refills the grooves with the dust that has to be cleaned out before every playing. Records of ordinary opaque black vinylite do not store up such charges, and once cleaned remain clean. And finally, someone in a position to figure such things out presented information which indicated that Victor's price for a plastic record is about right.

Inquiries have begun to arrive about new phonographs, pickups, speakers, and so on. As yet I have no information about these things; as soon as I have I will publish it.

CONTRIBUTORS

MILDRED ADAMS has been for many years a student of Spanish and Hispano-American literature.

ETHEL M. THORNBURY was, during the war, an economist for the Office of Strategic Services and the Foreign Economic Administration.

RALPH BATES, the distinguished novelist, is the author of "The Undiscoverables," "The Fields of Paradise," and other books.

RANDALL JARRELL, who will contribute a regular Verse Chronicle to The Nation, is the author of two books of verse, "Blood for a Stranger" and "Little Friend, Little Friend."

CLEMENT GREENBERG is the art critic of The Nation.

The New Philosophy of Modernity

By CHARLES ALGERNON SUNDERLIN, Author of

"LIMITATIONS OF MATHEMATICAL SCIENCE" "THE FUTURE OF AMERICAN DEMOCRACY"

The philosophy underlying atomic energy. A synthetic analysis of basic concepts of science and philosophy in their relationship to spiritual and atomic power. 15 years spent in systematic, analytical evolution of a universal philosophy that harmonizes with atomic knowledge and spiritual understanding. Says Dr. Edward A. Ross: "Well do I understand that constructing a metaphysical basis for our loftier ideals is a most important means of accelerating social advance." In leading university and public libraries of the world. A summary. Price One Dollar

"LIMITATIONS OF MATHEMATICAL SCIENCE OR RELATIVITY"

An intellectual forerunner of the atomic bomb. Price One Dollar

"THE FUTURE OF AMERICAN DEMOCRACY"

Dr. Robert A. Millikan: "I have had much profit in reading it through."
Hon. Winston Churchill: "It has been read with much interest and appreciation."
Says Charles A. Sunderlin: "The future of American democracy depends upon intelligence and courageous action." Price One Dollar

THE ATHENAEUM SOCIETY
206 So. Spring St., Suite 325, Los Angeles 12, California. VA. 7323

Letters to the Editors

Unbelievable

Dear Sirs: Your December 3 issue printed a letter from George Williams of Clarkston, Washington, which contained such a blatantly anti-Semitic statement that I could hardly believe my eyes. Mr. Williams points out several "serious difficulties" in opening Arizona to the refugee Jews of Europe and states that if "all the Jews actually settled in Arizona, they would eventually become American citizens and as such could leave this state and locate in any other." Then "they would thus assume their two-thousand-year role as parasites among other people—as they have been, for example, in Europe."

If Mr. Williams's mind is not totally warped by the vicious hatred he expresses, I recommend that he go to any public library and read a few elementary facts about the history of Jews, civilization, and democracy.

BENJAMIN R. EPSTEIN,
Eastern Regional Director,
Anti-Defamation League

New York, December 14

In Defense of AMG

Dear Sirs: Mea culpa! Having committed the unpardonable sin of writing an article favorable to AMG in Italy, I made it worse by carelessly asserting that "evrybody" in Milan agreed that, thanks to Lieutenant Colonel Harry G. Hershenson, justice was being done in a fair and impartial manner. I should have remembered that there is nothing under the sun on which everybody is in agreement, least of all Donald Downes of the Overseas News Agency, who frequently confuses himself with God. But I am still dismayed that I should have been attacked in The Nation by Downes for deliberately "misleading" readers of the Chicago Daily News's foreign service.

Anyone who cares to reread the dispatch in question will find that I did not credit the Colonel with inventing the Extraordinary Courts of Assize. I simply stated that he had replaced the kangaroo courts of the partisans with the Courts of Assize—which I knew, but did not feel it worth while to mention, had been established by decree of Prince Humbert at the request of the Allied Commission.

By September so-called "partisans"—for not all of them were entitled to that appellation—had put to death at least ten thousand so-called "Fascists"—"so-called" because their guilt was never legally ascertained. The Assize Courts meanwhile tried some two thousand persons accused of Fascist crimes in northern Italy. Of these, 271 were condemned to death, about 300 acquitted, and the rest given prison sentences.

I still think this is a record of which AMG may be proud. All Fascists are not equally guilty. Thanks to AMG, Italian courts, for all their many defects, were enabled at least to make some effort to separate the sheep from the goats.

Yet Mr. Downes asserts that AMG has been "reaping suspicion and distrust by making a fetish of order as opposed to revolutionary justice" (italics mine). I must confess that I am totally unable to grasp what Mr. Downes intends to imply by "revolutionary" justice. There was an insurrection, even revolution if you prefer, in northern Italy at the time of our offensive, but surely it was incidental to the force of Anglo-American arms. The latter won the war in Italy.

What can "revolutionary" justice possibly mean in its application to the situation in Italy? Can Mr. Downes be thinking of "mob" justice of the sort that The Nation so frequently criticizes in the South? Or can he be thinking of the "justice" so popular just now in the Sovietized countries of Europe?

Mr. Downes presumably considers it "reactionary" of AMG to have taken the view that all men are innocent until proved guilty. On the other hand, he presumably considers it "liberal" and "progressive" for a person to be lynched if there is reason to believe him guilty of a political crime.

As for the implication that AMG saved Carlo Emmanuele Basile, the former Fascist prefect of Genoa, from a death sentence: actually, he was saved by an all but forgotten clause in the military code which automatically commutes to twenty years' imprisonment all death sentences imposed on holders of Medals of Valor awarded in World War I. The trial itself was a sickening example of "revolutionary" justice, despite the efforts of AMG and the Assize Court. A Communist-organized claque of about 500 that packed the rear of the courtroom heckled the judges, shouted down Basile every time he opened his mouth, and finally set up such a roar that none of the court officials could hear a word.

Despite our many blunders, our naivete, our ignorance, even our arrogance, we have done a few things in Italy for which we have a right to be eternally proud. It is possible for the average Italian citizen to go to bed at night knowing that there is no longer a secret police which may break into his house and drag him off to prison. Every political and religious group in Italy today enjoys complete freedom of press, speech, and assembly. The Italian people have the basic civil liberties and the individual freedoms necessary to create a democratic society for themselves. Italy's prospects are grim indeed, but, politically speaking, no people in Europe today enjoys more individual freedom than the Italians—Mr. Downes to the contrary notwithstanding. LEIGH WHITE

Correspondent, Chicago Daily News

Rome, October 28

Palestine Perspective

Dear Sirs: I have just finished reading the interesting article by I. F. Stone in the December 8 issue of The Nation.

It is especially gratifying that Mr. Stone states the elementary truth that Palestine "is the one place in the world where Jews are completely unafraid," and that "in Palestine a Jew is a Jew. Period." However, Mr. Stone fails to understand the Yishuv's present insistence on a Jewish Commonwealth.

A realistic and historical perspective of the Palestine problem is a prerequisite to understanding the Yishuv's attitude. In April, 1923, the British decided to appease Abdullah, King Hussein's second son, so that he would not interfere with the French rule in Syria. Consequently they gave him Transjordania—the land east of the River Jordan. During the past twenty years the Arabs here moved freely from Transjordania into Palestine to earn a better living. Their entrance did not require special certificates or favors from the British government. The Jews, on the other hand, were barred from buying land or even living in Transjordania. Jews were not allowed to enter Palestine without a certificate.

The Jews in Palestine sincerely wish to cooperate with the Arabs, and at the same time they have the enormous task of rehabilitation and restoration of human dignity to their people. These purposes are not incompatible.

The Near East must be regarded as a geographic and economic unit. The Arabs in Palestine do not have any basis whatsoever for their fear of being mistreated as a minority by the Jews, in the event the latter are a majority, since the Jews constitute minorities in the surrounding Arab countries.

As a native of Palestine I should like to state here that the tension in Palestine is due primarily to the fact that the feudal Arab landlords—the Arab people have no voice—and the reactionary British Colonial Office do not like to see the growth of democratic forces in the Near East.

S. ZELMANS

Doylestown, Pa., December 9

The President Was Right

Dear Sirs: In your editorial Labor Says No in the December 15 issue I travel along in full accord with your first paragraph that a means for avoiding strikes is most desirable. Permit me, however, to dissent from everything else.

If, as you suggest, President Truman had asked labor leaders for advice on his suggestions to Congress, it would have been grossly unreasonable not to ask representatives of capital also. Both sides must be able to submit to the mediation body with a confidence which could not prevail if only one of them had a hand in the framing of the legislation. To ask both capital and labor for suggestions would evidently have been useless, since it is not likely that their ideas could be reconciled in view of the deadlock existing between them now. It was therefore up to the President to act for both sides in the manner that seemed best to him.

If Philip Murray is going to act up like his erstwhile sponsor, John L. Lewis, then one can only repeat the quotation invoked by the late F. D. R., "A plague on both their houses."

HARRY ORTNER

Brooklyn, December 15

Startling Departure

Dear Sirs: The article Greece in Purgatory by Philip Jordan in your December 8 issue is a startling departure from the distinguished coverage on Greece previously carried by The Nation, especially the fine reports of Constantine Poulos. The Jordan article flatly contradicts the Poulos article, Greek Tragedy, 1945, in your November 3 issue. According to Jordan, the British "saved" Greece, the Greeks want the monarchy, fear Russia, and hate the E. L. A. S. resistance movement. The British ambassador is "much maligned"—the American ambassador has "wisdom and charm." The British keep their troops in Greece to maintain freedom. Says Jordan: "If they were to go, there would be no freedom in Athens."

Poulos, however, writes that all the sweetness-and-light stuff which the British Ministry of Information puts out through its propaganda agency in Greece, the Anglo-Greek Information Service, cannot alter the bitterness which the majority of Greek people feel toward the British.

The Anglo-Greek Information Service is no doubt appreciative of Mr. Jordan's efforts. That is not surprising. What is surprising is that The Nation should carry such an article, the direct opposite of its information the previous month, without some explanation.

M. MANDELENAKIS,
Secretary, Greek American Council

New York, December 17

Here Comes Mr. Jordan

Dear Sirs: I returned from Greece recently, having spent a year and a half there, and I want to say a few things in connection with the article published in The Nation on December 8 under the title Greece in Purgatory.

The impression I received from reading the article was that Philip Jordan in writing about Greece could not forget that he was an Englishman. In this case he threw his liberalism overboard for the "glory of the Empire." The best one can say for Mr. Jordan is that most probably he did not stay in Greece long enough to know the situation.

In Greece in Purgatory we get the familiar story of the Greek right, with very few changes. The changes come occasionally when Mr. Jordan makes a fair statement such as "the terrorist activities of the right," only to take it out in the next sentence. The only part of Mr. Jordan's article where the truth appears is the last part, which deals with the economic situation—admittedly a very sore spot. Here we see the economic plight of Greece—a problem that UNRRA is unable to solve. Greece asks for reparations from Italy, but Allied policy is to be soft toward Italy; so Greece will receive nothing.

Mr. Jordan's article contains many erroneous statements. In the very first few words of the article there are two errors. He speaks of a "revolution by a minority a year ago." Well, the E. A. M., for Mr. Jordan's enlightenment, was not a "minority" at all a year ago. It is true that some Britishers thought so at the time, but they also thought erroneously that they could sweep the E. L. A. S. away from Athens within a couple of days. Coming to what Mr. Jordan calls a "revolution" and what I call "civil war," he conveniently forgets that it was the British who, after preparing for it for some time, finally brought it about. The British were afraid of the E. A. M. and its strength. This was a leftist movement, which, they thought, might side with Russia in the end. But apparently the E. A. M. was liked by the people, for they flocked to it in great numbers.

Next comes Mr. Jordan's contention that the people of Greece want the King back. That again is a misconception arising from the influence of the well-to-do element of Athens, with whom Mr. Jordan must have associated. If your correspondent had been able to talk with the people of the working-class sections of Athens or with the peasants in the Greek villages, he would have known that such is not the case.

Superficially, Athens had a kind of freedom when Mr. Jordan was there, but did it ever occur to Mr. Jordan that although published freely, papers might not be read freely? Did he try to find out if Athenian anti-royalist papers could circulate freely in the provinces?

There are many other misconceptions in Mr. Jordan's article. Suffice, though, to say that even the British government does not agree with him any more. After eleven months of intervention in Greek affairs, the British government now realizes that its policies were wrong. The new policy is to try to stop

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

BOOKS FOUND FREE!

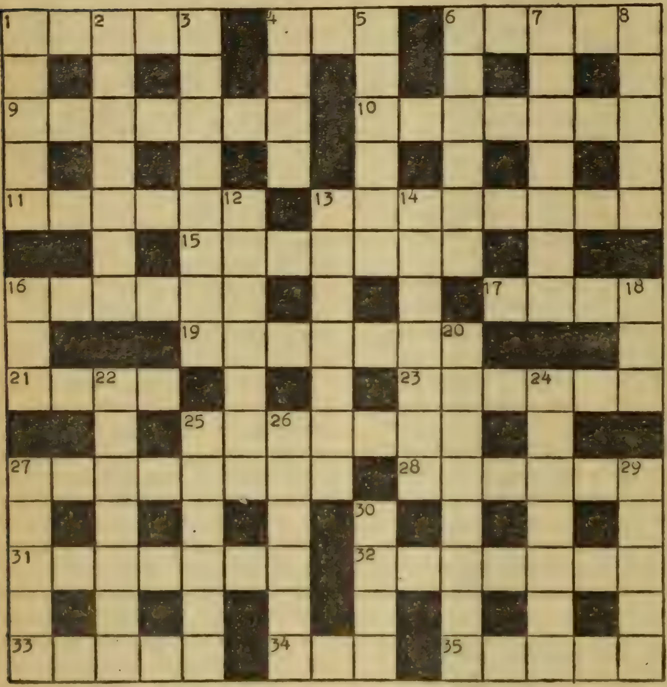
WHAT BOOKS DO YOU WANT?

We quote lowest market prices. No charge for locating Hard-to-Find and Out-of-Print Books. All books, OLD or NEW, mailed POST-FREE.

SEARCHLIGHT BOOK NATION
22 East 17th Street, New York City

Crossword Puzzle No. 141

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 No limit (two words, 2 & 3)
4 Grampus
6 If you put her on you'll get the bird!
9 A ripe old age, even in the pen
10 Result of getting it back in French money!
11 Animal sometime known as "Whistling Rufus"
13 Dante's amoretto
15 Do they refer to their work as "the daily grind"?
16 In the red (two words, 2 & 4)
17 Partly responsible for the housing slump
19 Hearten (anag.)
21 Claret for boys, but this for men, thought Dr. Johnson
23 Name of many an old English tavern (two words, 3 & 3)
25 A 5,700-mile railway spans it
27 As Scottish a name as Aloysius is Irish
28 Trades which usually follow the Arts
31 An Indian hunter
32 Acquitted—well, I declare!
33 You should be getting very close here
34 Gangster's best friend (?)
35 Is usually followed by a calm

DOWN

1 Sambo's master turns up in the East!
2 Jemmied open, and reveled in it
3 Political clap-trap comes from a North Carolina county
4 Agate ox outside New York
5 Made without trouble and drunk without regret, in England
6 Longfellow referred to them as muffled drums
7 Second sight? No, second hearing
8 Pearl's mother
12 Wife of Oberon and queen of Fairyland
13 Garrulous nonsense
14 Poisonous stuff, this, but useful as a weed killer
16 A flibbertigibbet
18 One of the larger carnivora
20 Intimacy
22 Should be made to suffer in the ring
24 A hot place, though a plant liking coolness and damp is to be found there
25 To be thus lacking in mobility is no bad thing in war
26 Bing takes it back, but becomes sarcastic
27 Maud's here!
29 You can hardly think of Gomorrah without thinking of this 30 Trust a Caledonian to conceal the cost!

* * *

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 140

ACROSS:—1 BEN HUR; 5 DAWKINS; 10 CHRISTIAN; 11 ORDER; 12 DISPOSE; 13 STENCIL; 14 ANGRY; 16 ALLOPATHY; 18 CAPSTONES; 20 RESOW; 22 LEERERS; 24 THURBAN; 26 SMILE; 27 BUNTHORNE; 28 PAGEANT; 29 ACTING.

DOWN:—2 EARLS; 3 HISTORY; 4 RAISE CAIN; 5 DENIS; 6 WROTE UP; 7 INDICATES; 8 SHRILLY; 9 ACADIA; 15 GOPHERING; 17 LUSITANIA; 18 CALLS UP; 19 THERESA; 20 ROUGH IT; 21 WINNER; 23 SABOT; 25 BARON.

---

the terrorist activities of the rightist minority and to bring about a fair election which will help the country to settle its pressing political and economic problems.

As the old proverb goes, "Better late than never." C. G. COUVARAS

New York, December 11

Pertinent Poetry

Dear Sirs: In response to Miss Agnes Smedley's request, I am sending the poem Mr. Bertrand Shadwell wrote to satirize the hypocrisy of imperialism.

If you see an island shore
Which has not been grabbed before,
Lying in the track of trade, as islands should,
With the simple native quite Unprepared to make a fight,
Oh, you just drop in and take it for his good.
Not for money, be it clearly understood,
But you row yourself to land,
With a Bible in your hand,
And you pray for him and rob him, for his good:
If he hollers, then you shoot him—for his good.
Or this lesson I can shape
To campaigning at the Cape,
Where the Boer is being hunted for his good;
He would welcome British rule
If he weren't a blooming fool;
Thus you see it's only for his good.
So they're burning houses for his good.
Making helpless women homeless for their good,
Leaving little children orphans for their good.
In India there are bloody sights
Blotting out the Hindu's rights
Where we've slaughtered many millions for their good,
And, with bullet and with brand,
Desolated all the land,
But you know we did it only for their good.
Yes, and still more far away,
Down in China, let us say,
Where the "Christian" robs the "heathen" for his good,
You may burn and you may shoot,
You may fill your sack with loot,
But be sure you do it only for his good.

Moral

If you dare commit a wrong
On the weak because you're strong
You may do it if you do it for his good!
You may rob him if you do it for his good;
You may kill him if you do it for his good.

ERIC HASS
Editor, Weekly People

New York, October 31